Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act for injuries by F. C. Beyerle, claimant, opposed by the Benson Lumber Company, and the Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, insurer. From an order of the Industrial Accident Commission dismissing proceeding for want of jurisdiction, claimant brings certiorari. Affirmed.

A. T. Johnson and Richard M. Kew, both of San Diego, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

Willis I. Morrison, H. R. Kelly, and E. R. Young, all of Los Angeles, for respondents Benson Lumber Co. and Federal Mut. Liability Ins. Co.

HOUSER, J. This is a proceeding brought for the purpose of reviewing an order made by the respondent Industrial Accident Commission in connection with a claim for compensation made by the petitioner, Beyerle, against the respondent Benson Lumber Company on account of alleged injuries received by the petitioner while in the employ of said company.

On the hearing of petitioner's application before the commission it was shown that the respondent Benson Lumber Company maintains a lumber mill at the harbor of San Diego, Cal.; that this mill is located upon land which faces the navigable waters of San Diego Bay; that extending into the navigable waters of the bay immediately in front of its property the said respondent company maintains a log boom for the purpose of impounding logs, which consists of an area of water inclosed by a chain of floating logs anchored to piling; that during each summer season the respondent company assembles large rafts of logs on the Columbia river in Oregon; that these rafts, each of which is approximately 960 feet long and is bound together by heavy chains are towed by tugs from the Columbia river to the harbor at San Diego, where they are anchored in the navigable waters of San Diego Bay, adjacent to but outside of said log boom; that the first raft of the season is anchored by shoving one end upon the mud flats along the beach, with the other end extending out into deep water, and the succeeding rafts are moored outside of the first raft and anchored to dolphins by means of chains; that these rafts are then broken up, and the logs are either placed within the said boom area or are towed to the respondent company's wharf, and then lifted from the water to cars for shipment by rail; that the work of breaking up the rafts and handling the logs is performed by means of a floating derrick scow and a gasoline power boat, both of which are operated by the respondent employer; that the derrick scow is about 30 feet wide and 60 feet long, upon which is mounted a large derrick or crane; that this derrick scow is towed around from place to place on the waters of the bay by a boat, which is propelled by gasoline motor; that the aforesaid operations were all performed upon navigable waters by a special crew employed by respondent employer, and of which petitioner is a member; that the petitioner's duties consisted of operating the engine of the motorboat while towing the raft, logs, and derrick barge, and in working upon the derrick scow and log rafts, assisting in the handling and breaking up of the latter; that while thus employed petitioner, on three separate occasions, sustained injuries to his right hip and leg, on account of which injuries a claim for compensation was filed with respondent commission; that the first of the injuries referred to occurred on May 10, 1924, when, as a result of a strong wind, rough water, and a slack towline, the aforesaid motorboat, which petitioner was operating at the time, and which was engaged in towing the scow outside the boom in deep water, struck a piling, causing the motorboat to rock, and petitioner to receive a severe blow on his hip; that the second injury occurred on May 15, 1924, while petitioner was at work on one of said floating log rafts, from which logs were being removed by means of the derrick on the scow lying alongside a raft, when he was struck below the right knee by the grab hooks of the derrick as he was attempting to catch these hooks, in order to guide them and fasten them to one of the logs; that the third injury occurred on May 24, 1924, while petitioner was again at work on the same raft, and while he was standing on the raft, anchoring the scow in the proper place alongside the raft, in order to remove logs therefrom, at which time he slipped down between two logs on the raft and again struck his right hip.

Following the hearing on petitioner's said application, an order was made by the commission dismissing the said proceeding, on the ground that the commission was without jurisdiction therein, for the reason that at the time petitioner sustained the injuries of which he complained he was working on navigable waters and was engaged in maritime employment. For the purpose of testing the question of jurisdiction in the Industrial Accident Commission to determine the rights of the respective parties to the proceeding, the matter is brought to this court.

The case principally relied upon by the petitioner herein is that of Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. v. Rohde, 257 U. S. 469, 42 S. Ct. 157, 66 L. Ed. 321, 25 A. L. R. 1008, wherein the facts were that a carpenter, who was employed upon a launched, but incomplete, vessel, sustained an injury. It was held that the state law, known as the Workmen's Compensation Act, applied. The court, however, pointed out that the contract for constructing the vessel "was nonmaritime, and, although the incomplete structure upon which the accident occurred was lying in navigable waters, neither Rohde's general employment, nor his activities at the time, had any direct relation to navigation or commerce." In the case of State Industrial Commission v. Nordenholt Corporation, 259 U. S. 263, 42 S. Ct. 473, 66 L. Ed. 933, 25 A. L. R. 1013, a longshoreman was injured on a dock while he was assisting in the unloading of a cargo from a vessel. It was held that the dock was an extension of the land, and that the state statute could be made effective without material prejudice to the general maritime law.

While, in addition to the foregoing cases, a long list of authorities has been submitted in support of the several contentions of the parties to the controversy, for the reason that, in similar proceedings recently had before the Supreme Court of this state, like questions on analogous facts, with identical authorities, were fully considered, it becomes necessary to determine herein only the applicability in principle of the cases heretofore decided by the Supreme Court of California to the facts of the instant case, and therefrom to deduce a conclusion as to the questions submitted in this proceeding.

The first case is that of Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 763, 218 P. 561. Therein it was shown that for a number of years preceding the happening of the accident the petitioner had been a seaman and fisherman on annual voyages made from the city of San Francisco to Alaska waters by a bark known as Star of England. On one of its return trips to the bay of San Francisco, and while the vessel was lying afloat in navigable waters of said bay, the petitioner therein was engaged in working upon the said boat as a rigger, to make it ready again for sea travel. His duties at that time consisted in going over the ropes attached to the yards of the vessel, looking for defective equipment. When a defective rope was found, he took it ashore for the purpose of repairing same. He was injured while removing a rotten foot rope from the yardarm of the vessel. It thus appears that the employment of the rigger was similar to that of the petitioner in the instant case, in that a part thereof was to be done on board a boat afloat in navigable waters, and the remainder of his work was to be performed by him on shore. The court held that, the employment being maritime in its nature, the rights and liabilities connected therewith were within admiralty jurisdiction.

The next case to which attention is directed is that entitled Zurich General Accident, etc., Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 770, 218 P. 563. The facts in that case were that one Denny was employed as a dredger deckhand and launch operator. His work was performed mainly upon a dredger operating on navigable waters. He was drowned while engaged upon an errand in connection with his employment in attempting to proceed from the dredger to the shore in a motor launch, which was afloat in navigable waters. The principal authorities relied upon by the employee for the purpose of establishing the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission were reviewed by the Supreme Court, and the conclusion reached that such commission was without jurisdiction.

In the case of James Rolph Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 192 Cal. 398, 220 P. 669, it appears that one Hayes was employed and was engaged in the capacity of stevedore upon a vessel which was discharging its cargo at a dock. On the morning of the accident, before going to the hold of the vessel where he was required to work, Hayes secured an iron plate used in the unloading process of the vessel, and in attempting to throw the plate below, overbalanced and fell into the hold of the vessel, sustaining injuries from which he died. It was held that the Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction therein.

In Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. v. Rohde, 257 U. S. 469, 42 S. Ct. 157, 66 L. Ed. 321, 25 A. L. R. 1008, the general rule is announced that "in contract matters, admiralty jurisdiction depends upon the nature of the transaction, and in tort matters upon the locality." In our present case petitioner's employment apparently was of a mixed variety. Part of his duties occupied his time in a lumber mill located on the land, and a considerable portion of his work consisted in operating, or assisting in the operation, of a launch and in breaking up of log rafts. Petitioner's injuries occurred while engaged in the latter employment; that is to say, his first injury occurred while he was operating the launch and in towing a derrick scow on navigable waters, and he sustained his second and his third injury while performing services as a member of the crew of the derrick scow, but while actually standing on a log raft—all in navigable waters.

[1, 2] If the question of "contract" as between the petitioner and the lumber company may be said to enter into the correct determination of the controversy, it is clear that the contract included a matter of a maritime nature, and hence that admiralty jurisdiction would prevail. On the other hand, if for the sole purpose of determining jurisdiction, the relationship of the employer and the employee be left out of consideration, the injuries sustained by the petitioner might then assume an aspect comparable with a tort committed in navigable waters, and from such a standpoint the jurisdiction would be in admiralty.

It follows that the order of the Industrial Accident Commission should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. ALLAN. (Cr. 1296.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 30, 1925.)

Criminal law ⇨1084—Writ of probable cause granted, where appeal is not clearly and palpably frivolous.

Writ of probable cause to stay judgment should be granted, where appeal is not clearly frivolous, but presents questions on which there may be honest difference of opinion as to existence of prejudicial error in proceedings leading to conviction.

Harry Allan was convicted of passing a fictitious check in violation of Pen. Code, § 476. On application for writ of probable cause to stay judgment of conviction pending appeal. Writ granted.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Wm. W. Murphy, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The defendant, after trial and conviction upon a charge of making, uttering, publishing, and passing a fictitious check in violation of section 476 of the Penal Code, moved the trial court for an arrest of judgment and for a new trial. Said motions were denied, whereupon defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison at Folsom. Notice of appeal was given, and since then defendant has complied with the necessary legal requirements to perfect said appeal. He also applied to the trial court for a writ of probable cause, which application was denied. A similar application is now presented to this court. The law is well settled that where an appeal is not clearly and palpably frivolous and vexatious, but presents debatable questions upon which there may be honest difference of opinion in regard to the existence of prejudicial error in the proceedings leading to the conviction a writ of probable cause should be granted. People v. Gallanar, 144 Cal. 656, 79 P. 378; In re Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 P. 547; People v. Valencia, 45 Cal. 304; People v. Ramirez, 63 Cal. App. 510, 219 P. 73; In the Matter of Mayen, 49 Cal. App. 531, 193 P. 813; People v. Clinton et al. (Cal. App.) 236 P. 929.

The record here reveals the exclusion of certain evidence sought to be adduced by the defendant, which, it was claimed, had a bearing upon the question of the genuineness of the check upon which the charge was based. Irrespective of the question of whether the rulings of the trial court in connection with the exclusion of such evidence amount to probable cause for a reversal of the judgment, the rejection of said evidence does, in our opinion, constitute probable cause for appeal. It follows that the application for the writ of probable cause should be granted and the execution of the judgment stayed until a final determination of said appeal.

It is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by D. R. McNeill against John S. Pappas, also known as Jan Pappas. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. De La Monte and Walter W. Little, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Pierce Works, Alex W. Davis, and Kemp, Mitchell, Silberberg & Davis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff to compel the specific performance of an alleged contract to sell and buy a piece of real estate. The case was tried in the lower court without the intervention of a jury, the judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Prior to November 23, 1921, the defendant was the owner of the real estate. Some of the deeds executed by his grantors contained certain restrictions. Some of the real estate consisted of improved property that was leased to one George Kolovos. Generally speaking, the plaintiff had some information regarding the existence of the restrictions mentioned and of the existence of the lease mentioned, but he was not fully informed regarding the facts and the law. With the circumstances so existing, certain negotiations were had between the plaintiff and the defendant. Writings were executed which constituted, firstly, an escrow; and, secondly, an executory contract to buy and sell the real estate. Taking the second theory, the plaintiff pleaded meticulously the alleged contract to buy and sell. In so doing he pleaded in hæc verba a writing signed by himself on the 23d day of November, 1921, and also a writing signed by the defendant on the same date. Furthermore, he pleaded a writing dated January 14, 1922, in which he tendered the cash payment and the note and mortgage, the consideration designated in the executory contract. The first two papers were addressed by the makers to the Bank of Italy. At the same time the Bank of Italy issued to the defendant a receipt for: (1) The defendant's title certificate; (2) the defendant's copy of the lease above mentioned; and (3) an insurance policy. The defendant answered, and after the trial was had the trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, which followed closely the language contained in the plaintiff's complaint, and which found every issue in favor of the plaintiff.

[1] During the trial the defendant contended that any performance or tendered performance on the part of the plaintiff came too late; that the plaintiff should have completed his performance within 30 days after November 23, 1921. In presenting this contention the defendant attempted to show that it is the universal custom with all escrow companies to fix a time limit; that that time limit is ordinarily 15 days, and, in rush periods, 30 days; and that it is the universal custom to permit the parties to draw down their papers upon demand after the expiration of such time. There is no claim that in any writing signed by either of the parties a time limit of 15 days, 30 days, or any other length of time for the consummation of the executed contract was inserted. Under these facts the defendant was not authorized to introduce evidence concerning a custom. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 12. As the writings were silent as to the time of performance, the statute on that subject entered into and became a part of the contract. Civ. Code, § 1657; Standard Box Co. v. Mutual Biscuit Co., 10 Cal. App. 746, 103 P. 938. The trial court did not err in refusing the evidence regarding the existence of the custom mentioned.

[2] The defendant contends that if we assume that the plaintiff should have done and performed all things by him to be done and performed within a reasonable time, nevertheless, his performance was too late because he did not act within a reasonable time. Whatever merit that point might have had in the trial court it has no standing in this court, because the trial court had all of the evidence before it, and had the power to determine the point. It did so, and, among other things, it found the amount of the payments, the date of the payments, and each other item of performance, and then it made a finding:

"That said payments and performance were made by the plaintiff within a reasonable time. That plaintiff has duly performed all of the conditions of said contract on his part to be performed."

The writing which the plaintiff signed and delivered to the Bank of Italy contained a passage as follows:

"The undersigned hereby hands you $500.00, and upon completion of search will hand you $5,500.00 together with a mortgage covering the hereinafter mentioned property for $5,500.00 dated Dec. 1, 1921, due on or before two years from date, with interest at 7 per cent. payable quarterly, all of which you are to deliver to John S. Pappas when you can procure for me a continuation guarantee of title covering (describing property)."

"I am to be allowed a reasonable time in which to determine the validity of a certain restriction existing against said property and also whether I will accept said property subject to the store lease now existing against same."

"I agree to pay new owner fee, fee for showing mortgage, fee for recording mortgage, fee for recording deed, $1.10 internal revenue stamps on note, mtgee. clause on insurance, pro rate insurance, rents and taxes to date of filing deed. Indorse on note interest as having been paid to date of filing of deed."

The writing which the defendant signed and delivered to the Bank of Italy contained a passage as follows:

"The undersigned hereby hands you grant deed from John S. Pappas in favor of D. R. McNeill covering (describing same property) which you are authorized to deliver to said grantee when you can procure for me the sum of six thousand ($6,000.00) dollars in cash and a mortgage covering the above mentioned property securing a note for five thousand five hundred ($5,500.00) dollars, dated December 1, 1921, due on or before two years from date with interest at seven per cent. payable quarterly.

"I agree to deliver the above mentioned property, free and clear of all incumbrances except second half taxes for 1921-22, conditions, restrictions and reservations of mortgage.

"It is understood and agreed that D. R. McNeill shall be allowed a reasonable time in which to determine the validity of the restrictions recorded in Book 2133, page 207 of deeds and also to determine whether he desires to accept the property subject to the store lease existing between John S. Pappas and Geo. Kolovos.

"From money due me in this escrow you are authorized to pay the following fees:

"Fee for certificate of title. $11.50 internal revenue stamp on deed. Fee for drawing deed. Insurance transfer fee and your escrow fee. Pay D. M. Anderson of 1902 Sunset Blvd. $575.00 commission.

[3] The appellant calls to our attention these passages, and asserts that the contract was not mutual. The point at first seems to be well made, but when it is considered in the light of the record it is entirely without merit. On November 23, 1921, we may assume that the parties did not intend to be bound as contracting to buy and sell until the plaintiff could examine the restrictions and lease above mentioned. However, the plaintiff made that examination, and within 15 days notified the defendant in writing that he would accept a conveyance notwithstanding the restrictions and the lease. That notice was in the form of a letter dated December 8, 1921. In his complaint the plaintiff pleaded the giving of said notice of acceptance. In his answer the defendant denied that allegation in the following words:

"Defendant further alleges that he has not sufficient knowledge upon which to base a belief, and basing his denial on that ground denies that plaintiff notified defendant or any person for him that he accepted the contract, subject to restrictions and subject to store lease."

That denial was insufficient to meet the plaintiff's allegation. Moreover, Mr. Davis, who was acting as the plaintiff's attorney, orally notified Mr. Stannard, the escrow agent of the Bank of Italy, that the plaintiff had examined the restrictions and lease and accepted the same. That conversation was held on the 15th day of December, 1921. And, as shown above, the trial court made a finding that these notices were given within a reasonable time.

[4, 5] Points 3, 5, and 6 are different methods of attacking the contract to buy and sell on the ground that the contract was not mutual. Conceding that it was not mutual as a binding contract on both parties on November 23, 1921, nevertheless, when the notice of acceptance was given by the plaintiff on December 8, 1921, from that date on the contract became and was binding on both the plaintiff and the defendant. Spires v. Urbahn, 124 Cal. 110, 111, 56 P. 794. The appellant also contends that the alleged contract is void for uncertainty, indefiniteness, and incompleteness. Under this head the appellant argues that the deed was not executed until after November 23, 1921, and therefore was not delivered to Mr. Stannard on that day. That argument might be material if we were considering the case as an escrow, but we are not. The appellant further contends that the defendant had not agreed to do anything, and in this behalf appellant emphasizes the language "hereby hands," and argues that the defendant's writing addressed to the Bank of Italy meant nothing. In construing contracts it is a fundamental rule that several contracts, relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as part of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together. Applying that rule to the facts of this case, the court is not at all in doubt as to what the parties were attempting to state in their contract.

[6] The appellant makes the further point that "mutuality must exist at the inception of the contract. But want of mutuality may be and is only removed by full and substantial performance of the contract." The plaintiff executed the note and mortgage, which the contract required him to execute, on December 23, 1921. On the same date he delivered to the Bank of Italy a check for the moneys called for under the contract. That check was not paid, but, on December 30, another check was delivered that was paid on January 2. As stated above, the trial court found that all acts done and performed by the plaintiff were done within a reasonable time. In presenting the point now under discussion, the appellant places much emphasis upon the fact that the plaintiff's performance must be full and substantial, but the answer is that the record before us shows that said performance was full and substantial. Even though the check delivered on December 23, 1921, had never been delivered, and even though the check delivered on December 30 had not been delivered at that time, but cash in a sack had been delivered and was on deposit on January 2, 1922, we cannot see wherein the appellant would have been injured or that the trial court would have worded the finding regarding reasonable time any differently.

The last point made by the appellant is closely akin. The appellant states "necessity of strict compliance with conditions of escrow." As we have stated above, we find nothing in the record indicating noncompliance in any respect whatsoever.

EGAN v. CROWTHER. (Civ. 5007.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 26, 1925.)

1. Trial — Court held not to have committed error in trying issue of accord and satisfaction first.

Trial court may change ordinary methods of procedure when time of court and parties will be conserved, and no error was committed in trying issue of accord and satisfaction first and then taking up other issues, where if accord and satisfaction had been had controversy would be terminated.

2. Appeal and error — Assumed that trial court considered all facts and gave each circumstance importance it was entitled to.

Where trial court made findings sustaining plea of accord and satisfaction, but no findings as to allegations of complaint, court must assume that trial court considered all facts and gave each circumstance such importance as it was entitled to.

3. Contracts — Neither performance nor promise to perform duty sufficient consideration to support new contract.

Neither a promise to perform a duty nor the performance of a duty constitutes sufficient consideration to support a new contract.

4. Accord and satisfaction — Compromise and settlement — Acceptance of check by principal from agent, in duty bound to give it to principal, held not accord and satisfaction.

Where relation of principal and agent existed, and defendant was bound by terms of contract to pay every cent which he paid plaintiff, held, that retention and cashing of check sent in full settlement, accompanied by refusal to consider it full settlement, did not constitute an accord and satisfaction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by William H. Egan against Ralph W. Crowther. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

James D. Whalen, of San Francisco, for appellant.

David C. Dutton, of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover a judgment for moneys alleged to be due and owing to the plaintiff pursuant to the terms of an oral contract. The defendant appeared and filed an answer denying the material averments of the complaint and pleading an accord and satisfaction. Judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

In August, 1922, the defendant bought for the plaintiff a lot of hay from one Scott. It was estimated that the lot contained 500 tons, but later it transpired that the quantity had been overestimated. The plaintiff informed the defendant that the actual quantity as shown by the weights was 375 tons, and that he was attempting to negotiate an adjustment with Scott. Nevertheless the plaintiff paid the defendant $125. Later in the year the defendant and the plaintiff entered into an oral contract, by the terms of which the defendant undertook to go into the country and purchase hay, and, after the market price had increased as the parties expected, then the defendant would sell the hay and the parties would divide the profits equally. The plaintiff undertook to finance the enterprise. So far we have stated the facts that are not in dispute. It was claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant was, under the terms of the agreement, to pay his own expenses for board, lodging and transportation, and was to pay one-half of the losses if any were incurred. On the other hand, it was claimed by the defendant that his expenses for board, lodging, and transportation were to be paid out of the proceeds first, and then that the profits would be divided. It was further contended by the defendant that he did not agree to share losses if any were incurred.

The defendant went into the field and made the purchases. Shortly thereafter the market commenced to fall instead of rising as the parties had anticipated. By mutual consent the hay purchased was sold by the defendant, and in January the parties commenced to adjust their accounts. The defendant prepared an account including the purchase of the Scott hay as well as the hay purchased in November, and in the account he inserted a charge for his expenses and gave credit for moneys received. That account showed that he had been overpaid $106.60. On February 1st, he wrote to the plaintiff a letter and inclosed therewith the statement of the account and his check for $106.60. The first paragraph of the letter is: "Inclosed find statement covering our account to date also check in the sum of $106.60, same being in settlement of this account." After the plaintiff received the defendant's letter and inclosures he had a telephone call from the defendant. In the telephone conversation the plaintiff asked the defendant to call. The defendant promised to do so on the following Monday. He did not do so, and thereupon the plaintiff prepared a statement of the ac count as he contended it should be. In the account so prepared by him he computed the loss on each of the lots of hay purchased, which losses totaled $1,051.10. He charged the defendant with one-half of the losses, he charged him with moneys received from sales, and gave him credit for the check on account, and thus struck a balance of $981.05. Thereafter he took the account so prepared by himself and the check that had been forwarded by the defendant to his attorney, James D. Whalen, Esq.

On February 15, 1923, Mr. Whalen wrote the defendant a letter asking him to call. About ten days later the defendant called, and in the conversation held between Mr. Whalen and the defendant the defendant stated the terms of the contract between himself and the plaintiff, and Mr. Whalen stated the terms of the contract as the plaintiff contended the terms were. The conversation resulted in no agreement, and the defendant left Mr. Whalen's office saying that he would confer with his own attorney, and that Mr. Whalen would later hear from him or his attorney. In that conversation the defendant made it clear that he had not agreed to pay part of the expenses or to share in the losses. Mr. Whalen made it clear that the plaintiff claimed the right to retain the check for $106.60, but that the plaintiff would sue for the balance claimed by him to be due. In reply to that statement the defendant did not recede from his original position to the effect that the account as rendered by him was in all respects true and correct. In that conversation Mr. Whalen claims that he handed the check back to Mr. Crowther; nevertheless it is not even disputed that when Mr. Crowther left Mr. Whalen's office the check was still in Mr. Whalen's office, and was thereafter retained by him and was later cashed by the plaintiff.

On February 26th, David C. Dutton, Esq., acting as attorney for the defendant, wrote Mr. Whalen that the defendant had stated the facts to him, and that the position of the defendant was that the account which he had rendered was true and correct. No further correspondence was had, and no other conversations were had. On March 24, 1923, the plaintiff cashed the check for $106.60, and, on March 29, 1923, this action was commenced.

[1] When the case was called for trial and the issues were stated, the trial court stated that if an accord and satisfaction had been had that would terminate the controversy and therefore the trial court would take up that issue first. Neither party made any objection, and the court proceeded accordingly. When that issue had been tried, without any objection from either party, the court immediately proceeded to hear the evidence of the parties on the other issues presented by the pleadings. The appellant claims that the trial court erred in the procedure adopted. In this contention we think he is mistaken. The trial court is at liberty to change the ordinary methods of procedure when by so doing the time of the court and the parties will be conserved rather than wasted. Whittier v. Stege, 61 Cal. 238; 38 Cyc. 1305 and 1352.

[2-4] After the trial had been completed and all of the evidence had been introduced, the trial court made findings sustaining the plea of accord and satisfaction, and did not make any findings regarding the allegations of plaintiff's complaint. In ruling on the defendant's plea the appellant contends that the trial court should have considered the facts stated in the plaintiff's complaint. As we understand him, he contends that the trial court should have given consideration to all of the circumstances of the case as adduced at the trial. The answer is that the record does not show that the trial court did not do so, and, in the absence of anything in the record to the contrary, we must assume that the trial court did consider all of the facts and gave each circumstance such importance as it was entitled to. The appellant also contends that the trial court erred in making the finding sustaining the defendant's plea of an accord and satisfaction. The respondent controverts that contention, and relies upon Lapp-Gifford Co. v. Muscoy Water Co., 166 Cal. 25, 134 P. 989, and cases there cited. The appellant does not question the soundness of the doctrine stated in the foregoing authorities, but contends that the facts developed at the trial of this case do not show an accord and satisfaction, and in making this contention he claims that there was no new consideration to support an accord and satisfaction because this appellant, in any event, was entitled to all he received. He specially stresses the fact that the relation existing between the parties in the instant action during the time that the matters occurred which gave rise to this litigation was the relation of principal and agent and not that of debtor and creditor. Thereupon he makes the contention that the authorities cited by the respondent do not apply, are not in point, and that the authorities which are in point are such cases as Eames Vacuum Brake Co. v. Prosser, 157 N. Y. 289, 51 N. E. 986, General Fireproof Const. Co. v. Butterfield, 143 App. Div. 708, 128 N. Y. S. 407, and Wolfe v. Mack, 81 Misc. Rep. 185, 142 N. Y. S. 433. The point has not been passed on in this state. It was within the issues but was not presented to, nor ruled on, by the court in Johnston v. Burnett, 17 Cal. App. 497, 120 P. 436. In the case of General Fireproof Const. Co. v. Butterfield, supra, the Supreme Court of New York said:

"The money collected by the defendant belonged to the plaintiff. The defendant, at most, had a lien upon it for his services, and could retain what he was legally entitled to for such services. When the defendant sent the check for a part of the money, he limited his right to compensation to the amount retained by him, and conceded that the amount sent belonged to the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff was not bound to return his own money to defendant under penalty of acknowledging defendant's right to the balance retained. Plaintiff had a right to retain the money paid to it, and sue for and recover any portion of the balance to which it was entitled. It was not a case for the application of the rule of accord and satisfaction. It would not be quite fair for the defendant to say, 'I send you an amount which I concede is yours, but, if you take it, you must acknowledge you are not entitled to any part of the moneys I have retained.' Eames v. B. Co. v. Prosser, 157 N. Y. 301, 51 N. E. 986. In that case, as in this one, the moneys collected belonged to the plaintiff, subject to any legal claims of defendant for commissions existing, and the court held the plaintiff was not bound to return the moneys actually paid over or be precluded from recovering any of the balance under the rule of accord and satisfaction.

"The distinction between the Gribble and other like cases and the Prosser Case and this one is that claims were made in the former case for moneys due under contracts. The parties disagreed as to the amount to which the plaintiffs were entitled. The defendants sent checks for certain amounts to be accepted, if at all, in full payment and satisfaction of their claims. The checks were retained and suits afterwards brought to recover the balances claimed. There was no question, as in the latter cases, of title to the moneys sent. The rule of accord and satisfaction was improperly applied in view of the Prosser Case."

Every cent that the defendant paid to the plaintiff he was in duty bound by the terms of the contract to have paid. It is well settled that neither a promise to perform a duty nor the performance of a duty constitutes a consideration sufficient to support a new contract. Marinovich v. Kilburn, 153 Cal. 638, 96 P. 303; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 120. Resting its argument on the principle just referred to, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts reaches the same conclusion as the Supreme Court of New York. Whittaker Chain Tread Co. v. Standard Auto Supply Co., 216 Mass. 204, 103 N. E. 695, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 315, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 949, and note.

The foregoing authorities rule the point. In view of the fact that the relation of principal and agent existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, the evidence was insufficient to sustain the finding of an accord and satisfaction. As we have already indicated, the trial court heard all of the evidence offered as to all of the issues made by the pleadings, but did not make findings on any issue excepting that of accord and satisfaction.

The judgment is reversed, but in view of the peculiar condition of the record the trial court is directed to make findings in accordance with the views herein expressed, and to also make findings on the other issues which were tried but on which no findings were made, and thereafter to enter judgment in accordance with the findings so made.

STANWARD et al. v. YELLOW TAXICAB CO. OF LOS ANGELES (two cases).

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 4, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞706(5)—Finding of negligence because of inadequate lights on automobile sustained.

In action for injuries, where it appeared defendant's automobile had in front only two dash lights, enabling driver to see 10 or 15 feet ahead of car, and a spotlight enabling him to see 23 feet ahead on right side only, held trial court was justified in finding defendant negligent because of inadequate lights.

2. Municipal corporations ☞706(5)—Finding of excessive speed of automobile justified.

Where taxicab traveled 20 miles an hour over street crossing in closely built-up section of city on foggy night with insufficient lights, trial court was justified in finding speed such as to endanger life or limb, and hence greater than that prescribed in Motor Vehicle Act of 1915, § 22(a), as amended by St. 1919, p. 220, § 13.

3. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Finding of trial court as to contributory negligence held conclusive.

In action against taxicab company for personal injuries, where evidence that plaintiff did not cross street at intersection, and failed to look for cars, which might establish contributory negligence, was in wide conflict, it was incumbent upon trial court to determine true facts, and such finding was conclusive when based upon substantial evidence.

4. Appeal and error ☞193(6)—Defendant held not prejudiced by form of complaint where issues fairly tried.

In action for personal injuries received in automobile accident, where defendant on appeal for first time presents fact that complaint failed to specify particulars in which automobile was negligently operated, held that defendant was not prejudiced by form of complaint, since issues were fairly and understandingly tried.

5. Trial ☞404(2)—That issues were included in conclusions of law rather than findings of fact held not reversible error.

In action for personal injuries, held there was no merit in objection to court's action in including issues of proximate cause and contributory negligence under head of conclusions of law rather than findings of fact.

6. Damages ☞130(2)—$6,000 for personal injuries in automobile accident held not excessive.

Where, in action for personal injuries, received in automobile accident, evidence showed that plaintiff received broken leg, cuts and bruises on face and head, body, arms, and legs, was confined to bed after accident, and still suffered from effects after 18 months, held judgment of $6,000 could not be set aside as excessive.

7. Appeal and error ☞1004(1)—When judgment awarding damages may be set aside as excessive stated.

Unless it appears that judgment awarding damages is result of passion or prejudice of trial court or jury, it cannot be set aside merely because appellate court might feel that award was too high.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Separate actions by Marie Stanward and another and by Albert E. Stanward against the Yellow Taxicab Company of Los Angeles. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in each case.

W. I. Gilbert, B. P. Gibbs, and Walter W. Little, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Muhleman & Crump, and H. S. Laughlin, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. In the above-entitled actions the plaintiffs sought damages for injuries which they suffered when struck by an automobile operated by an employee of the defendant. The two actions were tried together, under stipulation, before the court sitting without a jury. Two judgments for $6,172.13 and $11,508.13, respectively, were awarded plaintiffs, from which the defendant appeals upon a joint bill of exceptions under stipulation of counsel.

The material facts of each case appear in the findings of the trial court, from which we quote:

"That on the 31st day of December, 1920, at about 10 o'clock p. m., plaintiff, accompanied by his wife, Marie Stanward, attempted to cross Eighth street at the intersection thereof with Union avenues. That plaintiff stopped at the northeast corner of said streets upon the sidewalk and looked to the left, saw an automobile approaching from the east along Eighth street, and waited for said automobile to pass. After it had passed, he again looked to the left, saw no vehicle approaching, and started across the street, proceeding southerly towards the southeast corner of said Union avenue and Eighth street. That in the center of said street he stopped, looked to the right, and saw approaching him an automobile, to wit, taxicab No. 97. That he stood still and waited for said taxicab to pass him, which it did, proceeding east along Eighth street south of the center line thereof. That thereupon plaintiff again looked to the right and saw nothing. That the night was then and there dark and foggy. That thereupon plaintiff again started upon his way, together with his wife across Eighth street southerly towards the southeast corner of said Eighth street and said Union avenue. That at said time and place defendant, by its servant, agent, and employee operated, ran and conducted one of its taxicabs, to wit, taxicab No. 98, over and along said Eighth street in an easterly direction, in a careless, negligent, reckless, wrongful, and unlawful manner, so that said taxicab at said time and place ran into and upon, struck and collided with plaintiff. That said taxicab No. 98 had then and there insufficient headlights. That there were no reflectors to said headlights. That said taxicab No. 98 was then and there driven and operated by defendant, by its agent, servant, and employee, in a careless manner, without due regard for the safety or convenience of pedestrians upon such highway, and particularly of plaintiff herein. That said taxicab No. 98 was then and there operated and driven by defendant, by its agent, servant, and employee, in a careless and imprudent manner, and at a rate of speed greater than was reasonable or proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, and at such a rate of speed as to endanger the life and limb of persons on said highway, particularly plaintiff herein. That said taxicab No. 98 was operated and driven by defendant, by its agent, servant, and employee, at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour, and, to wit, at the rate of at least 20 miles per hour, in approaching and traversing the intersecting highways aforesaid and at the point and time of said collision. That the territory contiguous to said crossing on the 31st day of December, 1920, was closely built up within the meaning of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 397), as amended and in effect on the 31st day of December, 1920 (St. 1919, p. 191). That the operator's view of the road and traffic at said intersection was then and there obstructed by fog and mist. That the street at the point of collision was wet and slippery."

[1] On this appeal the appellant insists that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the finding of negligence on its part, and that it was of such a nature as to have required a finding that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. An examination of the record discloses that the accident resulted from the failure of the appellant to equip its automobile with sufficient lights and from the operation of the car at an unlawful rate of speed. On the subject of the character of lights used by the appellant, we find from the testimony of appellant's driver that "the lights were no good for straight driving," and that "you could see with them if it was an extraordinarily clear night, but, if the atmosphere was kind of foggy or so, you couldn't use those lights." It is conceded that at the time when the accident occurred the night was foggy, and that the defendant's car was equipped with two small dash lights, which had been substituted for the ordinary headlights. These lights were of about 30 candlepower, were covered by frosted lenses, and were without reflectors. They were sufficient to enable the drive to see but 10 or 15 feet ahead of his car. In addition to these lights, he was using a spotlight, which he turned to the right to enable him to watch the right-hand curb, and which enabled him to see about 23 feet ahead of him on his right only. In this evidence there is no conflict, and the trial court was justified in finding that the appellant was negligent because of the inadequate lights on its machine.

[2] As to the rate of speed of the appellant's car, there is substantial evidence that the car was traveling at 20 miles an hour, over a street crossing in a closely built-up section of the city and on a foggy night, when the operator was unable to see objects in his line of travel because of his insufficient lights. In addition to the testimony of the operator of appellant's machine that he was going at a rate of 20 miles an hour, we have the conceded fact that Mrs. Stanward was picked up from the street at a point 8 feet in front of appellant's machine after it had been stopped. As the evidence is that the machine traveled 10 feet after the collision, it is thus apparent that this respondent was either carried or thrown a distance of 18 feet from the point of impact. This in itself is persuasive evidence from which an inference could properly be drawn that the appellant's machine was traveling at a rate of speed greater than was reasonable or proper and such as "to endanger the life or limb of any person" on the highway. Motor Vehicle Act of 1919, p. 220, § 13, amending St. 1915, p. 409, § 22 (a). There is really no evidence in conflict with this; the testimony of the passengers in appellant's cab was merely guesswork on their part; and the trial court was justified in making the finding as to speed adversely to the appellant.

[3] Upon the issue of contributory negligence, the evidence is that the respondents, after stopping at the intersection of the two streets, first looked to their left for approaching vehicles; saw an automobile approaching; waited on the curb for it to pass; looked again and saw the first half of the street clear; walked toward the middle of the street and saw an automobile approaching from their right; waited for it to pass in front of them; again looked for approaching vehicles, and did not see any; then followed their course across the street and were struck by appellant's machine. In opposition to this evidence, the appellant endeavored to show that the respondents must have crossed the street at some point beyond the curb crossing, because their bodies were found lying in the street some distance from the intersection of the streets. Appellant's position is this: The respondents must have failed to look to their right because, if they had done so, they would have seen appellant's machine approaching, and they must have attempted to cross the street beyond the intersection, because their bodies were found some distance east of the intersection. Assuming that either one of these elements might constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law, the evidence on both is in wide conflict, and it was incumbent upon the trial court to determine the true facts. The trial court having found the facts against the appellant upon substantial evidence, that finding is conclusive here.

[4] The appellant for the first time insists that the complaint fails to state sufficient facts because it does not specify the particulars in which the automobile was negligently operated at the exact point of the collision. The pleading comes within the rule of Stein v. United Rys. of S. F., 159 Cal. 368, 370, 113 P. 663. The issues were fairly and understandingly tried, and appellant was not prejudiced by the form of the complaint.

[5] It is also argued that the court failed to find as a fact upon the issues of proximate cause and contributory negligence. The point is that these findings appear under the head of "Conclusions of Law" rather than under the head of "Findings of Fact." There is no merit in the point, as has been held repeatedly. Burton v. Burton, 79 Cal. 490, 495, 21 P. 847; Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 103 P. 889, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207; Terry v. Southwestern Bldg. Co., 43 Cal. App. 366, 370, 185 P. 212.

[6] Finally it is argued that the award of damages in the first case for injuries to Mrs. Stanward is excessive. The finding is:

"That her face and head were thereby cut, bruised, and lacerated, the bones of her right leg were thereby broken below the knee, and her body, arms, and legs were bruised and rendered sore; that she suffered thereby great pain; that by reason thereof she was confined to the hospital and to her bed for a period of 23 days, and thereafter confined at her home for a period of 4 weeks; that she was severely hurt in her health, strength, and vitality; that she is yet unable to walk, except for a short distance, without difficulty and pain in her right leg, and is still suffering from the effects of said injury."

[7] The judgment was rendered about 18 months after the accident. The trial court found that this respondent was still suffering from the injuries inflicted at that time. It was the judgment of the trial court that for these injuries she and her husband were entitled to $6,000 in damages. Unless it appears that a judgment awarding damages is the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the trial court or jury, it cannot be set aside by the appellate court merely because the appellate court might feel that the award is too high. There is nothing in the record which even suggests that this judgment was the result of either passion or prejudice.

Judgments affirmed.

DIMITY v. DIXON et al. (Civ. 5218.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 28, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨422—Appeal not dismissed for misdescription of judgment, unless respondent misled thereby.

Notices of appeal are not strictly construed, and an appeal will not be dismissed because of a misdescription of judgment, or order to which it relates, unless it appears that the respondent has been misled by such description.

2. Appeal and error ⇨419(1)—Notice of appeal specifically designating one of several judgments not interpreted to include others not mentioned.

Where several defendants are joined, and separate judgments are entered as to each, a notice of appeal specifically designating one of them cannot be interpreted to include others not mentioned.

3. Trusts ⇨372(3)—Plaintiff held not to have established that defendant purchased with knowledge of alleged trust and without consideration.

Plaintiff held not to have sustained burden of proving that defendant was not a purchaser for value of alleged trust property, or that she had knowledge of the alleged trust.

4. Trusts ⇨371(2)—Complaint alleging express trust resting in parol defective.

Under Civ. Code, § 852, an express trust must be created by written instrument, and complaint attempting to plead an express trust resting in parol is defective.

5. Trusts ⇨80—Resulting trust not established, where partner, with consent of others, purchases real estate as his own property with partnership assets.

That one partner, with consent of others, used portion of partnership assets to purchase real estate, title to which he took in his own name, held not to create a resulting trust.

6. Trusts ⇨77—Do not arise through furnishing funds to enable purchaser to complete installment payments, where title has passed.

A resulting trust does not arise through furnishing of funds to enable purchaser to complete installment payments on property, where title has passed, or to holder of legal title for purpose of making improvements thereon, but such a trust arises, if at all, the instant the conveyance is made and title vests.

7. Trusts ⇨102(1)—Trust created by partner failing to account after death of one of partners held a constructive, rather than express or resulting, trust.

Where partner holding property in trust for partnership, on death of one partner, which, under Civ. Code, § 2450, dissolved partnership, retained possession of property, he became trustee under constructive, as distinguished from an express or resulting, trust.

8. Limitation of actions ⇨102(8)—Action to establish constructive trust held barred by limitation.

Where constructive trust arose, if at all, in 1914, action to establish trust, not commenced until 1923, was barred by limitations.

9. Limitation of actions ⇨102(8)—In constructive trust, statute begins to run on doing of act by which trust arose.

The statute of limitations, in case of a constructive trust, begins to run on doing of the act by which the trust arose.

10. Trusts ⇨352—When property, with consent of trustor, mingled so it cannot be identified, none of it considered as property of trustor.

Where, with consent of trustor, property has been mingled with that of trustee so that it cannot be definitely traced or identified as part of any specific property, none of it can be considered as property of trustor.

11. Trusts ⇨352—Plaintiff seeking to impress trust on property in hands of defendants held not entitled to relief, where trust property in hands of innocent purchasers, and not segregated.

Suit to establish trust by reason of purchase of property from partnership assets must fail, where alleged trustee mingled funds obtained from partnership with his own, and no segregation was attempted, and wife of trustee to whom property had been distributed had conveyed it to innocent purchasers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

On rehearing. Affirmed.

For former opinion, see 238 P. 1058.

Alfred Siemon, Siemon & Garber and L. E. Nathan, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Clafin & Lambert and W. A. McGinn, all of Bakersfield, for respondents A. H. and Hannah Dixon.

F. E. Borton and James Petrini, both of Bakersfield, for respondent Jessie C. Dixon.

NOURSE, J. On February 13, 1923, plaintiff commenced this action to impress upon certain real property a trust which she alleged arose from the purchase of such property with funds of a partnership which she alleged had been formed by her former husband, O. G. Dixon, his father, F. S. Dixon, and his brother, A. H. Dixon, some time in the year 1908 for the conduct of an undertaking business in the city of Bakersfield.

The plaintiff alleged that her husband, O. G. Dixon, died on October 6, 1914, and that his father, F. S. Dixon, died some time after February 10, 1920; that, in due course of administration, certain property was distributed to the defendant Hannah Dixon, the widow of F. S. Dixon, and to the defendant A. H. Dixon, the surviving son; that these parties conveyed the properties so distributed to them—a portion thereof to one Gettle, and a portion to the defendant Jessie C. Dixon. It is alleged, on information and belief, that F. S. Dixon in his lifetime and A. H. Dixon collected large sums in rents and profits of said property and demand is made for an accounting. Jessie C. Dixon was joined as a defendant on the theory that she was a purchaser of a portion of the property without consideration and with full knowledge of the alleged trust. Answers were filed putting in issue all the material allegations of the complaint and the cause went to trial before the court, sitting without a jury, on November 7, 1923. At the close of plaintiff's case defendants A. H. and Hannah Dixon moved for a nonsuit, in which motion the defendant Jessie C. Dixon joined. The motion was granted, and on November 9, 1923, judgment of dismissal as to A. H. and Hannah Dixon was duly entered therein and recorded on November 10, 1923. On January 28, 1924, a paper entitled "Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law" was filed, which concluded with a judgment of dismissal in favor of Jessie C. Dixon. On February 13, 1924, the plaintiff filed her notice of appeal from the judgment; the notice specifying the judgment "dated November 10, 1923, and entered November 10, 1923."

In a former opinion (238 P. 1058) we dismissed the appeal from the judgment in favor of A. H. and Hannah Dixon on the ground that the appeal was not taken within the time required by section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, and we dismissed the appeal from the judgment in favor of Jessie C. Dixon upon the ground that the record disclosed that no notice of appeal had been filed. Upon a petition for rehearing the appellant filed an addition to the transcript, from which it appears that a motion for a new trial for the purpose of vacating the judgment of November 10, 1923, in favor of A. H. and Hannah Dixon, was filed on November 17, 1923, and denied on January 14, 1924. Upon this showing we concluded that the notice of appeal from this judgment was within time and that as to these respondents the cause should be determined upon the merits.

The record as amended, however, still fails to disclose any notice of appeal from the judgment in favor of Jessie C. Dixon filed on January 28, 1924. The appellant argues in support of this appeal that it was her intention to appeal from both judgments, and states that both judgments were of like character. In this respect, however, she is not supported by the record. The judgment of November 9, 1923, referred exclusively to the defendants A. H. and Hannah Dixon and was based upon the ground that there was a failure of proof that O. G. Dixon furnished any part of the consideration for the purchase of the property, the proceeds of which were claimed to be a trust estate. On the other hand, the judgment filed January 28, 1924, related to Jessie C. Dixon exclusively and was based upon the additional ground that there was a failure of proof that when Jessie C. Dixon had purchased the property she was not an innocent purchaser for value and without notice of the existence of the alleged trust. The fact that the two judgments were separately treated is further emphasized by reference to the notice of motion for new trial which related to and concerned the judgment against A. H. and Hannah Dixon only and was in fact filed prior to the entry of the later judgment in favor of Jessie C. Dixon.

[1, 2] Reference is made to Harrelson v. Miller & Lux, 182 Cal. 408, 188 P. 800, and similar cases holding that a notice of appeal should be liberally construed and that an appeal should not be dismissed for a mere misdescription of the judgment from which the appeal is intended to be taken. We think the rule stated in Harrelson v. Miller & Lux, supra (page 414 [188 P. 802]), is applicable here. It was there said:

"Notices of appeal are not strictly construed, and an appeal will not be dismissed because of a misdescription of the judgment or order to which it relates, unless it appears that the respondent has been misled by such misdescription."

Here the case is not one of misdescription of the judgment, but is one where the description of one of two judgments is so clear and unmistakable as to preclude a description of the other judgment which is not mentioned. In a case where several defendants are joined and separate judgments are entered as to each a notice of appeal specifically designating one of these judgments cannot be interpreted to include others not mentioned.

[3] Though we are satisfied that for this reason the purported appeal from the judgment in favor of Jessie C. Dixon should be affirmed, we have made further examination of the record as to this branch of the case, and are satisfied that the judgment as to her must be affirmed upon the merits. The appellant alleged that on the 24th of April, 1922, Hannah and A. H. Dixon conveyed four lots to Jessie C. Dixon, the wife of defendant A. H. Dixon, and then alleged, on information and belief only, that Jessie C. Dixon paid no valuable consideration for said conveyance and that she knew and had full knowledge at the time that the property had been held by F. S. Dixon prior to his death in trust for the members of the alleged partnership. In support of these allegations of the complaint the appellant offered the testimony of Mrs. Hannah Dixon only and now argues that this testimony shows that no consideration was paid by Jessie C. Dixon. To support this argument the appellant adopts the method of citing a portion of the testimony only, omitting that portion which completely negatives her claims. Appellant cites the following testimony of this witness:

"I did not understand it. I decided that property to Jessie Dixon because I did not want to be bothered with it. * * * She never paid me any money."

In the next line of the testimony of the same witness we find: "She paid him (A. H. Dixon), and, of course, he looks after all my business." There is no evidence of any character that at the time of the conveyance Jessie C. Dixon had any knowledge of the purported trust, or that she at any time had any knowledge of the purported partnership. The appellant has therefore failed to sustain the burden of proof which the law casts upon her to show that Jessie C. Dixon was either not a purchaser for value or one with knowledge of the alleged infirmities. Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 663, 668, 47 P. 691.

The case against A. H. and Hannah Dixon presents numerous difficulties which are not discussed in the brief. The complaint alleges that F. S. Dixon and his two sons A. H. and O. G. constituted a partnership in the year 1909 for the purpose of conducting an undertaking business in the city of Bakersfield; that on December 16 of that year the "said partners" purchased a track of land in the city of Bakersfield for the sum of $7,000, which sum constituted a part of the assets of the partnership and one-third of which belonged to O. G. Dixon; that at the time of the purchase it was orally agreed among the said partners that the property should be conveyed to F. S. Dixon and that the title thereto should be held by him for the use and benefit of the other members of the partnership; that thereafter the "said partners" expended a large sum of the "partnership assets" on the construction of an apartment house upon said premises, of which assets O. G. Dixon owned one-third; that O. G. Dixon died on the 6th of October, 1914; that thereafter and on the 10th day of February, 1920, F. S. Dixon sold said property and invested the proceeds thereof in the purchase of other land designated as lots 1 to 8, inclusive, of block 115 in the city of Bakersfield; that thereafter said F. S. Dixon died and in due course of administration the said property was distributed to Hannah Dixon and A. H. Dixon; that on September 28, 1921, said Hannah Dixon and A. H. Dixon sold lots 1 to 4, inclusive, of said tract to a stranger to this action and that they invested the proceeds from such sale in other properties, the nature and description of which is unknown to the pleader; that on April 24, 1922, said Hannah Dixon and A. H. Dixon conveyed lots 5 to 8, inclusive, of said tract to Jessie C. Dixon, who paid no valuable consideration for the conveyance and took with full knowledge of the existence of the alleged trust; that F. S. Dixon prior to his death and A. H. Dixon had collected large sums of money on account of the rents, issues, and profits of said real property and that the said A. H. Dixon had invested the same in other tracts of land, the character and description of which is unknown to the pleader; that prior to the commencement of this action demand was made upon A. H. and Hannah Dixon that they render an account of the proceeds realized by them from the sale of such properties, but this they refused to do. The complaint concluded with a prayer that the property first described be decreed to be held by F. S. Dixon in trust for O. G. Dixon as to a one-third portion thereof; that the title to the property described as lots 5 to 8, inclusive, of block 115, be adjudged to be held in trust by Jessie C. Dixon as to a one-third portion thereof for the benefit of this appellant; and that A. H. Dixon and Hannah Dixon be required to account to the appellant for the rents, issues and profits of the various tracts of land described in the complaint.

[4, 5] The case is founded upon the theory that the father and two sons were partners in the undertaking business, of which each owned a one-third interest, and that the real property purchased in the year 1909 was purchased by these partners and held by the father in trust for his two sons. We will pass the question of the sufficiency of the proof of the existence of this partnership and assume that the evidence was sufficient to make prima facie proof of the original partnership. Turning to the allegations of the complaint, we find that these partners purchased the land in question with the assets of the firm and at the time orally agreed that the father should take the title in his name and hold it in trust, not for the partnership, but for the two sons. We have, then, an attempt to plead an express trust resting in parol. Herein the pleading fails by reason of section 852 of the Civil Code, which requires such a trust to be created by written instrument. But, aside from the character of the pleading, there is not a word of evidence tending to prove the oral agreement. In so far as the land itself is concerned, there is therefore a complete failure of both pleading and proof to establish a valid express trust. Assuming, however (though, as we have said, these matters are not mentioned in the briefs), that the appellant relies upon these facts as constituting a resulting trust, we are faced with this situation so far as the land itself is concerned. The allegations of the complaint are that the father, with the consent of the other partners, used a portion of the assets of the firm to purchase real property, the title to which he took in his own name. Such a transaction does not constitute a resulting trust. "Partners have an unquestionable right to deal with the funds of the firm as they please; and, if, with their consent or knowledge or acquiescence, a portion of their funds is applied to the purchase of real estate in the name of an individual member, and as his private property, there is in such case no resulting trust." Lefevre's Appeal, 69 Pa. 122, 126, 8 Am. Rep. 229, 233.

Though the complaint alleges that $7,000 of the partnership funds was paid for the land, the proof was that the sum of $2,500 only was paid. The evidence further showed that the father purchased the undertaking establishment for $7,000 and that after conducting it for a period of nine months sold it for the same price; that after using the sum of $2,500 for the purchase of the land in question the father borrowed on his own credit sufficient money to erect the apartment house. Though there is neither pleading nor proof of the dissolution of the partnership, nor of any adjustment of the individual interests of the members thereof, it would appear that in the main the purchase of the realty was effected by the use of the portion of the assets belonging to the father individually. Thus again assuming that a resulting trust is sought to be established, there is complete failure of proof that O. G. Dixon furnished the consideration for the purchase of the realty either in whole or in part.

[6] Coming then to the allegations of the complaint relating to the use of the proceeds of the partnership in the construction of the apartment house, we find that no special agreement is pleaded, and we assume therefore that it is the contention of the appellant that in this respect a resulting trust was created because of the allegation that the partnership furnished a portion of the consideration. In this respect we are met by the well-known rule that a resulting trust arises, if at all, the instant the conveyance is made and the title vests. It does not arise through the furnishing of funds to enable a purchaser to complete installment payments on the purchase of property where title has passed, or where funds are furnished to the holder of the legal title for the purpose of making improvements thereon. Lincoln v. Chamberlain, 61 Cal. App. 399, 401, 214 P. 1013. It would seem, therefore, that there is a complete failure of proof to show either a valid express trust in either the land or the improvements thereon, or to show a valid resulting trust in either.

[7-9] Assuming, however, that it may be the contention of appellant that a constructive trust arose because of the fiduciary relationship of the father and sons while they composed the partnership, the case is no less difficult than under the other cases which have been discussed. If a trust was created whereby F. S. Dixon was obliged to hold the property for the benefit of the partnership, such trust terminated upon the death of one of the partners, O. G. Dixon, in October, 1914. 26 R. C. L. p. 1210, § 52. The partnership having been dissolved by the death of one of the partners (section 2450, Civ. Code), it became the duty of F. S. Dixon (assuming again that he held this property in trust for the partnership) to account to the other partners, or their successors in interest, for the partnership assets which he held. Having failed to do this, and having continued to retain possession of the realty and to exercise the right of ownership over it, he became a trustee for the equitable owners by operation of law and the trust estate thus created was a constructive trust as distinguished from an express or a resulting trust. We do not propose to enter into a discussion of the various lines of distinction between these different classes of trusts. The whole subject-matter is covered in the opinion of Justice Olney in Lezinsky v. Mason Malt W. D. Co., 185 Cal. 240, 196 P. 884. The discussion in that opinion as to the effect of a variance between pleading and proof when these different kinds of trusts are involved is pertinent here, and we quote from page 243 (196 P. 886):

"We may grant, at least for the purposes of discussion, that it would not be a material variance if the complaint were based upon the alleged existence of an express trust and the findings showed but a resulting trust. But it should be noted at the outset that the variance is material, if the findings show facts which would possibly create a trust, but such trust would be neither an express nor a resulting trust, but what is commonly designated as a constructive one; that is, a trust based on fraud, or what is really a particular kind of fraud, a breach of some duty incident to a fiduciary relation. The complaint contains no allegations of fraud or breach of fiduciary duty or of facts from which either would appear, and a cause of action based upon such facts is manifestly very different from one to enforce either an express or resulting trust, based as they are upon the intention of the parties, expressed in one case and presumed in the other."

Bearing in mind that the complaint falls far short of pleading a constructive trust, but assuming again that this was what was intended to be pleaded, we are faced by the plea in both demurrer and answer that the complaint is barred by the statute of limitations. It would seem on the face of the complaint that this plea was good because the trust arose, if at all, upon the death of O. G. Dixon in October, 1914, and the action was not commenced until February, 1923. In the case of a constructive trust the statute begins to run upon the doing of the act by which the trust arose. Varrois v. Gomet, 43 Cal. App. 756, 759, 185 P. 1001.

[10, 11] There is a further difficulty which, aside from any of the points heretofore discussed, is fatal to a recovery on the part of appellant on the record as here presented. It is the commonly accepted rule that—

"Where property, with the consent of the trustor, has been in that manner commingled with the property of the trustee, so that no part of it can be definitely traced and segregated from that held by the trustee, or identified as a part of any specific fund or property, none of it can be considered as the property of the trustor. 'The right of pursuing it fails when the means of ascertainment fails. This is always the case where the subject-matter is turned into money and mixed and confounded in a general mass of property of the same description.' Where the identity cannot be traced, the trustor 'is forced to rely upon the personal liability of the trustee. * * * He has no special lien upon the general estate of the trustee which is superior to that of any other creditor,' and his only remedy is a personal action for damages or for money had and received." Estate of Arms, 186 Cal. 554, 561, 199 P. 1053, 1055.

Now the complaint alleges that a trust was intended to be applied to the premises and to the Dixon Apartments which were purchased by F. S. Dixon in the year 1909. It also alleges that, after the conveyance, assets of the partnership were used in the construction of the apartment house. It appears from the evidence that $2,500 was used in the purchase of the land and that the apartments were built, in part, from proceeds from the undertaking business, but largely from loans obtained on the credit of F. S. Dixon alone. It appears, therefore, that from the time of the conveyance the funds which F. S. Dixon obtained from the business were constantly commingled with his own and no attempt has been made by either pleading or proof to segregate or designate as a part of the trust fund any property now in the possession of any party to the action. Furthermore the pleading is that the trust was created solely for the purpose of holding the property designated as the Dixon Apartments in trust for the members of the partnership. If this is so, the trust was repudiated in the sale of the premises by the trustee in February, 1920. If at that time a valid constructive trust existed in favor of the estate of O. G. Dixon, it could be followed into the property of the parties to this action only by allegation and proof that the proceeds thereof went into property now held by them and which is specifically described. Far from meeting these requirements, the complaint alleges that after Hannah and A. H. Dixon obtained the property as distributees in the F. S. Dixon estate they sold a portion thereof to a stranger to the action and invested the proceeds thereof in property unknown to the pleader, but as to the other portion thereof they sold to Jessie C. Dixon, who took with notice and without consideration. Now the proof is that the property was distributed not to Hannah and A. H. Dixon, as alleged in the complaint, but to Hannah Dixon alone. As to A. H. Dixon, therefore, there is no property upon which a trust could be settled.

Coming now to the four lots conveyed to the stranger to the action by Hannah Dixon, the appellant successfully alleges herself out of court by failing to plead that this purchaser did not take without notice and for a valuable consideration. As to the remaining four lots which were conveyed to Jessie C. Dixon, we have already seen that the proof wholly fails to show that she took with notice, or that she did not pay a valuable consideration. It was also shown as a part of appellant's case that Hannah Dixon at the time of the trial had no property upon which a trust could be settled in favor of the appellant. As to the respondent A. H. Dixon, the only proof was that he did not receive any of the property coming down from the original conveyance and no effort was made to show that he had any of the profits from any of the transfers thereof. At the close of appellant's case, therefore, the uncontradicted evidence was that there was no property in the hands of any of the respondents which could be impressed with any trust in favor of the appellant.

As to that portion of the prayer of the complaint which asked for an accounting from A. H. and Hannah Dixon of the rents, issues, and profits of the various tracts of land mentioned in the complaint, it is sufficient to say that as to Hannah Dixon the complaint wholly fails to put that matter in issue and that as to A. H. Dixon there is no proof of any nature that he received any rents, issues, or profits of any of the property mentioned in the complaint.

Judgments affirmed.

Ex parte BELLIS. (Cr. 1301.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. Nov. 7, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ☞1208(9)—Indeterminate sentence is in legal effect sentence for maximum term.

Indeterminate sentence is in legal effect sentence for maximum term.

2. Criminal law ☞1218—Confinement in state prison held proper for one guilty of attempt to commit burglary.

Where defendant pleaded guilty to charge of attempting to commit burglary in second degree, he was properly confined in state prison in view of Pen. Code, § 461, defining "burglary," and section 664, subd. 1, fixing punishment for attempt.

Application by Harold Bellis for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Warden of San Quentin prison. Writ denied.

Harry S. Harper, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Thomas Ramage, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. The petition alleges that applicant is confined in the state prison at San Quentin under a judgment that is unlawful. The judgment shows that petitioner pleaded guilty of the crime of an attempt to commit burglary, a felony, which the court found to be burglary in the second degree as charged in count 1 of the indictment, and that he was punished by imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin for the term prescribed by law.

It is claimed that under subdivision 2 of section 664 of the Penal Code petitioner could only be imprisoned in the county jail for the offense to which he pleaded guilty. The Code prescribes punishment for burglary as follows: (1) Burglary in the first degree for not less than five years; (2) burglary in the second degree for not less than one or more than fifteen years. Pen. Code, § 461. Every person who attempts to commit any crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable, where no provision is made by law for the punishment of such attempts, as follows: (1) If the offense so attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for five years, or more, or by imprisonment in the county jail, the person guilty of such attempt is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison or in a county jail, as the case may be, for a term not exceeding one-half the longest term of imprisonment prescribed upon the conviction of the offense so attempted. (2) If the offense so attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for any term less than five years, the person guilty of such attempt is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year. Pen. Code, § 664.

[1, 2] An indeterminate sentence is in legal effect a sentence for the maximum term. In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958. The crime of which petitioner pleaded guilty being punishable for not less than one nor more than fifteen years, one-half of the longest term is greater than five years and the crime is, therefore, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison.

It follows that the claim here made is without merit.

ALPINE PETROLEUM CO. v. LEWIS et al. (Civ. 5258.)

1. Mines and minerals ☞74—Assignees of oil leases held not entitled to damages because of actions brought by lessors against assignors to quiet title.

Assignees of oil leases held not entitled to damages because of actions to quiet title, brought by lessors in good faith, in belief that assignors had not complied with terms of leases and that assignees had no legal right thereto because assignment was without lessors' consent.

2. Mines and minerals ☞74—Lessors' refusal to serve assignee of lease, in actions against assignors to quiet title, held not indicative of bad faith as matter of law.

Refusal of lessors, suing to quiet title against assignees of oil leases and fictitious defendants, to serve summons on subsequent assignee which offered to accept service, be substituted for fictitious defendant, and waive technical defense, held not to indicate bad faith as matter of law, so as to entitle such subsequent assignee to damages for bringing such actions.

3. Mines and minerals ☞74—Party not intervening in action against its assignors not injured by plaintiff's refusal to serve it with summons.

As assignee of oil lease might have intervened in lessors' action against assignors and fictitious defendants to quiet title, lessors' refusal to serve it with summons on its offer to accept service and be substituted for fictitious defendant caused it no injury for which it could recover damages.

4. Evidence ☞269(1)—Representations by assignors that leases could not be assigned without lessors' consent held admissible on issue of lessors' good faith.

In action by assignee of oil lease against lessors for damages from commencement of actions by latter against assignors to quiet title, representations by assignors that leases could not be assigned without lessors' consent held admissible, not to vary terms of written contract, but on question of lessors' good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by the Alpine Petroleum Company against Guy E. Lewis and another. From a portion of the judgment against plaintiff, it appeals. Affirmed.

Marshall D. Andrews, of Los Angeles, and Wayne L. Clark, of Ventura, for appellant.

Chas. F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a portion of a judgment denying it damages for alleged interference with leasehold rights in certain land in the county of Ventura, Cal. Judgment was given quieting plaintiff's title to this leasehold interest and restraining defendants from interfering with the enjoyment thereof.

The defendants are the owners of the land, and transferred to lessees the right to sink wells and prospect for oil. Through successive transfers, the plaintiff became the owner of these oil leases. There is no question about this phase of the case, and the portion of the judgment quieting plaintiff's title to the leases, from which no appeal was taken, makes it unnecessary for us to set forth the details of the transactions leading to this result.

In its complaint, plaintiff also charged that defendants interfered with it in obtaining drilling contractors, and persuaded drillers to leave its employment, and circulated false stories that plaintiff was not paying its bills, all willfully and maliciously and for the purpose of obstructing plaintiff in its work under its leases; that defendants commenced certain actions against plaintiff's predecessors in interest in said leaseholds, seeking to have it judicially declared that they had no right, title, or interest in the land, well knowing that plaintiff was the assignee of the defendants in said actions, and that said actions were brought to hamper and interfere with the quiet enjoyment of plaintiff herein.

[1] The trial court has found upon conflicting evidence, that the defendants did not interfere with the drillers or drilling contractors in the employ of plaintiff, and that defendants did not make the statements or do the acts charged by plaintiff. With reference to the other allegations of the complaint, it was found by the court that defendants commenced actions against Spellacy and Neiswender and fictitious defendants to quiet title to the land in question, but that such actions were commenced in good faith and in the belief that the said Spellacy and Neiswender, who were the first assignees of the lessees named in the leases, and who, in turn, had assigned said leases to Alpine Petroleum Company, had not complied with the terms of their leases. This finding is supported by the testimony in the record regarding the assignments of the leases. They were originally given to Messrs. Oaks and Watlington and were nonassignable. The lessors, later, signed a consent to an assignment and in accordance therewith the leases were assigned to Spellacy and Neiswender, trustees, who, later, assigned to plaintiff herein. The lessors contended that, when they signed the consent to the first assignment, they believed, and were assured by Spellacy and Neiswender, that this consent operated only upon the first assignment and that consent would have to be obtained for any further assignments. The court believed their version of this transaction, and that they honestly thought they were entitled to some further consideration for the second assignment and for each successive assignment thereafter, and that the plaintiff herein had no legal right to the leases because the assignment to it was without the consent of the lessors. Upon such a state of facts, the conclusion of the court that the said actions by defendants herein against Spellacy and Neiswender did not entitle the plaintiff herein to damages is undoubtedly correct.

[2, 3] Appellant's contention that these actions against Spellacy and Neiswender were commenced in bad faith is based upon evidence in the record that the plaintiff herein offered to accept service of summons and complaint in said actions and be substituted in the place and stead of one of the fictitious defendants, and to waive the technical defense that no corporation, fictitious or otherwise, was sued in the action, and that the defendants herein refused to so serve plaintiff and thus enable it to litigate and settle its right to the leases. Of course, defendants were under no legal obligation to serve plaintiff and allow it to enter the action in the mode suggested, and their failure to be accommodating in the matter would not of itself necessarily indicate bad faith. The evidence was before the trial court for what it was worth, but the finding was against appellant on this issue. It is to be remarked also that plaintiff might have intervened in the action against Spellacy and Neiswender, but did not see fit to do so, so that the action of defendants in refusing to serve it with summons did not cause plaintiff any injury.

[4] There is also a complaint that the trial court erred in admitting testimony with reference to the representations on the part of Spellacy and Neiswender, to the effect that the leases could not be assigned a second time without the consent of the lessors. This testimony was not admitted to vary the terms of the written contract, but solely upon the question of the good faith of the defendants in refusing to recognize the validity of the assignments to Alpine Petroleum Company. For this limited purpose it was admissible.

The judgment is affirmed.

FINDLEY v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 5102.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 12, 1925.)

1. Master and servant $\S$ 416½, New, vol. 11A Key-No. Series—General statute as to right to certified copy of public writing inapplicable to award of Industrial Accident Commission.

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1893, requiring officer having custody of public writing, which citizen has right to inspect, to give him certified copy on payment of fee, is merely the general rule as to public documents, and is inapplicable to findings and award of Industrial Accident Commission, the law as to which is given by Workmen's Compensation Act, 1917, $\S$ 21.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 416½, New, vol. 11A Key-No. Series—No abuse of discretion by Industrial Accident Commission in withholding certified copy of award, in view of application for certiorari.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, 1917, $\S$ 21(c), authorizing commission to withhold certified copy of findings and award, where it is deemed advisable to stay enforcement of award, there is no abuse of discretion authorizing disturbance of such withholding, where defendants in the proceeding had advised the commission that they intended to apply for certiorari, and that they desired a stay till they should exhaust their rights in the appellate courts.

Petition by Esther Findley for writ of mandate to the Industrial Accident Commission of California and the members thereof to issue certified copy of award. Petition dismissed.

Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. It appears that in a certain proceeding brought before the Industrial Accident Commission an order was made including an award to petitioner herein of the sum of $2,500, to be paid to her by Thomas Gordon, George W. Harrison, and Charles W. Russell, individually and as copartners, doing business under the firm name of Gordon & Harrison, and which award on rehearing of the matter by the said commission was thereafter by it affirmed. Thereupon the petitioner herein applied to said commission for a certified copy of such award, but such application was by said commission refused. Whereupon petitioner filed her petition herein for a writ of mandate to be directed to said commission, commanding it to issue to said petitioner a certified copy of said award.

Before the application herein for said writ of mandate could be heard by this court, the defendants in the proceeding before the commission, against whom the said order of award had been made, petitioned this court for a writ of certiorari for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings which resulted in such order of award. Such last-mentioned matter having come on regularly for hearing and decision, it was ordered by this court that the said order of award, so far as it purported to award to petitioner the sum of $2,500 to be paid by said individual defendants, be annulled. Gordon et al. v. Ind. Acc. Com. (Cal. App.) 249 P. 844. In the proceeding before the Commission, however, the petitioner was granted further pecuniary relief as against one other defendant, and, so far as said award affects said defendant, the rights, if any, of petitioner to have issued to her a certified copy of the award remain intact.

[1, 2] The ordinary rule as to public writings is that any citizen is entitled to inspect them, and that, on his demand and the payment by him of the legal fees therefor, the custodian of such writings is bound to give to such citizen a certified copy thereof. Section 1893, Code Civ. Proc. That rule, however, applies to public documents only in the absence of a special rule to the contrary or one which places some limitation upon the general rule. The law with reference to the right of a party to a certified copy of the findings and the award by the Industrial Accident Commission is set forth in section 21 of the act. Stats. 1917, p. 831. After providing for the filing of a certified copy of the findings and award with the clerk of the superior court of any county, etc., and that judgment must be entered by such clerk in conformity therewith, the statute proceeds with certain limitations thereon, including the following:

"* * * Where it is deemed desirable to stay the enforcement of an award and a certified copy of said findings and award has not been issued by the commission, the commission, or any member thereof, may order such certified copy to be withheld with the same force and under the same conditions as it might issue a stay of execution if said certified copy had been issued and judgment entered thereon." Section 21(c).

The representation is made by respondent, and not denied by petitioner, that the reason for refusing petitioner's application to the commission for a certified copy of the award was that the individual defendants in the proceeding before the commission had advised the commissioner to whom the application for the said certified copy of the award had been made that it was their intention to apply to this court for a writ of certiorari, and that they "desired a stay of proceedings until they should exhaust their rights in the appellate courts."

The records herein show that the said defendants thereafter did apply to this court for a writ of certiorari, and in connection therewith that the defendants furnished a satisfactory undertaking for stay of proceedings, from which it follows that their said statement to the commissioner was made in good faith. The substance of the statute (section 21[c], Stats. 1917, p. 831), is that, where it is deemed desirable to stay the enforcement of an award, the commission may refuse to issue a certified copy thereof. Judging from the language of the statute, the probable intention of the Legislature was to vest in the commission a legal discretion as to whether under given circumstances a certified copy of an award should issue. It is the unquestioned rule that, where a discretion is thus vested in an individual or commission of any sort, the exercise thereof will be disturbed by an appellate court only where a clear abuse of such discretion has been shown. It appearing that good cause existed for the withholding by the commission of the certified copy of the award, its action therein must be affirmed by this court.

It is therefore ordered that the petition for a writ of mandate herein be and the same is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. BRAIN. (Cr. 1234.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 4. 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1925.)

1. Indictment and Information § 111(1)—Different offenses, arising out of single transaction, may be charged in separate counts of indictment.

Where a single transaction includes commission of several crimes, prosecutor may carve as large an offense out of it as he can, and under Pen. Code, § 954, may charge different offenses in separate counts of indictment or information.

2. Criminal law § 200(1)—Plea of former conviction for burglary held not sustainable in prosecution for robbery committed after entry effected.

In prosecution for robbery, plea of former conviction and once in jeopardy, based on plea of guilty of burglary for housebreaking immediately preceding robbery charge, held not a valid plea in bar, as burglary was complete when felonious entry into house was effected, and robbery was a second and later transaction.

3. Criminal law § 296—Court may instruct jury that plea of former acquittal and once in jeopardy not sustained, where evidence uncontradicted.

Where, under special pleas of former conviction and once in jeopardy, evidence submitted is uncontradicted that former conviction relied on was for different offense, question becomes one of law, and court may instruct jury that special pleas are not sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Eugene A. Brain was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. E. Manning, of Vallejo, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. By information filed by the district attorney defendant was charged with the crime of robbery. He was convicted, and appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

Long before the filing of the information which eventuated in the conviction in the present case, appellant had been charged, for a housebreaking immediately preceding the robbery, with the crime of burglary. To this earlier charge he had pleaded guilty, and had made an application for probation. The application was denied, appellant was sentenced to a term in the state prison, and was incarcerated pursuant to the sentence. In the present case he pleaded not guilty, and he entered special pleas of former conviction, former acquittal and once in jeopardy. In support of these special pleas he proved, at his trial under the charge of robbery, the facts above set forth concerning the earlier charge. This was the only defense made. The trial judge instructed the jury that the special pleas were not sustained by the evidence.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the special pleas were good, that, therefore, the instruction given by the judge was erroneous, and, moreover, that the judgment of conviction of robbery cannot stand. In support of this position appellant cites People v. Defoor, 100 Cal. 150, 34 P. 642, and other cases. In the decision named the court, in upholding a plea of former conviction and once in jeopardy, quoted from a Tennessee case to the effect that where a single transaction or set of facts includes the commission of several crimes "the prosecutor may carve as large an offense out of it as he can, but it is said 'he must cut only once.'" And, of course, in "cutting once" out of the facts of a single transaction, the "prosecution" may charge different offenses in separate counts of the indictment or information. Pen. Code, § 954. Here, however, we do not deal with the facts of a single transaction. The burglary was complete when the felonious entry into the house was effected, and the robbery was a second and later "transaction." People v. Devlin, 143 Cal. 128, 76 P. 900; People v. Snyder (Cal. App.) 239 P. 705. These cases are also authority for the proposition that appellant's special pleas were not established.

[3] Appellant insists that the court erred in instructing the jury that the special pleas were not sustained upon the ground that the instruction trenched upon the right and duty of the jury to determine a question of fact. The point is not well taken. Where, under such special pleas as were entered here, the evidence submitted is uncontradicted, and results in such a condition as that with which we have dealt above, the question involved becomes one of law, and the court may instruct the jury directly that the special pleas are not sustained. People v. Conson (Cal. App.) 237 P. 799.

Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, providing for dismissals of appeals from justices' courts, where not brought to trial within one year, refers to dismissals of the appeal, and not of the action.

2. Justices of the peace ☞ 166(6)—Defendant, appealing from justice's court and not objecting to setting of case for trial at date beyond one year from filing of appeal, deemed to have acquiesced therein, and cannot complain of dismissal of such appeal.

Where superior court, on appeal by defendant from justice's court, set case for trial, pursuant to request of plaintiff, at a date beyond one year from date of filing of appeal, held that, under Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, providing for dismissals of appeals from justices' courts, where not brought to trial within one year, the responsibility for calling court's attention to necessity for an earlier date was on the defendant, and he, having failed to do so, must be taken to have acquiesced in date set, and hence cannot seek to compel court to vacate order of dismissal.

Application for writ of mandate by Charles J. Middlebrook and others, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Harry R. Archbald, a Judge thereof, to require respondent court to vacate an order dismissing an appeal. Writ denied.

Benj. M. Stansbury, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

CONREY, P. J. On the 22d day of July, 1924, the petitioners herein appealed to the superior court of Los Angeles county from a judgment rendered against them as defendants in the justice's court of Los Angeles township. On September 18, 1924, the Industrial Loan & Investment Company, plaintiff in that action, duly presented to the court a motion to set the case for trial. That motion was made upon notice, and also according to a stipulation between the parties "that said cause might be called for setting" at that time. Pursuant to said motion, "and pursuant to said stipulation, the respondent superior court set the trial of said appeal for the 23d day of September, 1925, in department 9 of said court." In August, 1925, upon motion of the plaintiff in that action, and solely upon the ground that the appeal had not been brought to trial within one year from the date of filing of the appeal, the appeal was dismissed. By reason of the dismissal so entered the superior court has refused to try the case. The facts above stated appear in the petition for writ of mandate. Petitioners contend that in dismissing the appeal the court acted in excess of its jurisdiction. Wherefore they now by this proceeding seek to compel that court to vacate the order of dismissal and proceed to try the cause upon its merits.

[1] Section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for dismissals of appeals from justices' courts, where not brought to trial within one year, in the following language:

"No action heretofore or hereafter appealed from the justice court to the superior court, shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all such actions heretofore, or hereafter appealed must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been appealed, on its own motion, or on motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court, unless such time be otherwise extended by a written stipulation by the parties to the action filed with the clerk of the superior court to which the appeal is taken. * * *

The dismissal referred to and intended by the statute is a dismissal of the appeal, and not of the action. California Law & Adjustment Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 234 P. 408. In the cited case this court had under consideration a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court to dismiss an appeal, upon the ground that the appealing defendant had failed to bring the appeal to trial within the prescribed period of time. The petition showed that the petitioner itself, by its attorney, on a date less than one year from the time of taking the appeal, had "caused said case to be set for trial in respondent court on the 4th day of December, 1924," which date was more than one year from the time when the appeal was filed. Therefore this court held that the superior court should not be required to dismiss the appeal. The respondent to the appeal, who was petitioner for the writ of mandate, had not only caused the case to be set for trial, but also had caused it to be set for a specified date, which date was after the expiration of the year. It was held here that, if such conduct of said respondent to the appeal was not the legal equivalent of a written stipulation, duly filed with the clerk (as mentioned in the statute), then at least there was an estoppel to take advantage of the defect.

[2] Relying upon the decision of this court in California Law & Adjustment Co. v. Superior Court, supra, petitioner herein argues that the superior court, at the time of the dismissal of the appeal, had not lost jurisdiction thereof, and that in ordering such dismissal that court exceeded its jurisdiction. But we do not think that this contention of petitioner should be sustained. The plaintiff in the superior court (respondent to the appeal therein) did nothing more than ask the court to set the case for trial. The selection of a date beyond one year from the date of filing the appeal was an act of the court. It reasonably may be assumed that if, when the court announced its intention to delay the trial until the date named, the appellant had called to the court's attention the legal consequences of such delay, an earlier date would have been chosen. Boyd v. So. Pac. R. R. Co., 185 Cal. 344, 346, 197 P. 58. Under the provisions of section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure, the responsibility for calling the court's attention to the necessity for an earlier date was on the appealing party, and, since he did not do so, he must be taken to have acquiesced in the date set.

For the purposes of the present decision it is not necessary to express an opinion as to whether or not, in California Law & Adjustment Co. v. Superior Court, supra, the rule of estoppel there stated was properly applied to a case arising under the provisions of said section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure. The parallel existing between the language of that section and sections 581a and 581b, Code of Civil Procedure, was not in that case noticed or considered. Concerning these two sections, and their force in compelling dismissals under the specified conditions, see decision of this court in Sauer v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 241 P. 570.

The petition for writ of mandate is denied.

KERN COUNTY LAND CO. v. NIGHBERT. (Civ. 5255.)

Rights acquired by adverse possession only are stricti juris.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Suit by the Kern County Land Company against Thomas Sanders to quiet title, in which F. A. Nighbert was substituted as defendant and prayed for similar relief. From a judgment refusing to quiet title in either party, defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered in favor of defendant.

J. W. Wiley, of Bakersfield, for appellant.
W. B. Beazley, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the defendant from a judgment denying his claim of ownership to certain real property situated in Kern county, California.

The plaintiff brought an action to quiet its title to the land in controversy and named Thomas Sanders and unknown persons claiming any interest therein as defendants.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff was the owner in fee and entitled to the possession and seized and possessed of the land described therein, and also alleged that for more than 20 years prior to the commencement of the action plaintiff had been in the actual, exclusive, continuous, and adverse possession of the property, holding the same and claiming to hold the same in fee adversely against all the world, and had paid all taxes assessed against said property during said period.

Appellant filed an answer denying specifically the allegations of the complaint and setting forth that on October 30, 1887, the land was conveyed to Thomas Sanders by United States patent, duly recorded; that Sanders remained the owner thereof until April 27, 1920, when he conveyed his interest to defendant Nighbert, who has since been the owner thereof, and asked that he be substituted in the place of Sanders as a defendant, and that his title be quieted against plaintiff.

Sanders filed a disclaimer of any interest in the land and Nighbert was substituted as a defendant.

The court found that the land was granted to Thomas Sanders in 1877 by United States patent and said patent was recorded at the request of J. B. Haggin in the office of the county recorder in April, 1883; that the land was never assessed upon the county assessment roll to said Sanders, but from the date of the recordation of the patent until 1898 it was assessed to Haggin, during which time he paid the taxes thereon; that Haggin was one of the organizers and officers of the plaintiff company, and about the year 1898 executed a deed conveying said land to plaintiff, together with other parcels, and since said time the land has been assessed to plaintiff and the taxes thereon paid by it; that said land is not susceptible of irrigation, except from rainfall or wells which might be drilled thereon; that it is undeveloped and unimproved; that from 1906 to the time of the commencement of this action, the land was used for grazing and pasturage by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, under an oral agreement therefor made with the plaintiff; that no other use was made of the land; that in November, 1915, a notice of the pendency of this action was duly recorded; that in April, 1920, Thomas Sanders and his wife executed a quitclaim deed to Nighbert, conveying all their right, title, and interest in the land; that prior to the execution of said deed Sanders had never seen or occupied said land nor paid any taxes thereon, nor had the land ever been assessed to him; that at the time of the execution of said deed Sanders did not own nor claim to own said land nor any interest therein. It was further found that neither Sanders nor Nighbert had ever occupied the land and that plaintiff, by itself or its predecessors in interest, for more than 20 years, has continuously claimed and asserted, in good faith and openly and notoriously against all the world, the title in fee simple to the land and has occupied and used the land in the manner hereinbefore stated. The court concluded that Nighbert acquired no interest in the land by reason of the conveyance from Sanders. The court decreed that the plaintiff should not be granted the relief prayed for, but that Nighbert should also be denied relief, and that he was not the owner of the property described and that each party should bear his own costs.

Plaintiff has not appealed from the judgment, but defendant attacks it in this court, contending that he has a perfect legal title to the land, being the successor in interest of Sanders to whom the United States patent for the same was issued.

[1] Of course, apparent abandonment or failure to occupy land does not divest one of title except where adverse possession has continued for the statutory period. Northern Assurance Co. v. Stout, 16 Cal. App. 548, 557, 117 P. 617; Davenport v. Turpin, 43 Cal. 597; Barrett et al. v. K. & T. Coal Co., 70 Kan. 649, 79 P. 150, 151; 1 Corp. Jur. p. 10.

[2] In the instant case, since the adverse claim of plaintiff was not founded upon a written instrument, in order to establish possession, it was necessary to show, either that the land had been protected by a substantial inclosure or had been cultivated or improved in the usual manner. Section 325, Code Civ. Proc.; Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 P. 278. Using the land for pasturage would have constituted sufficient possession if the claim of plaintiff had been founded upon a written instrument (section 323, Code Civ. Proc.), but not where the possession alone is relied upon to establish the right. The trial court found against plaintiff on the question of adverse possession, in conformity with the foregoing statutory rules.

It becomes clear, therefore, that the plaintiff had no legal right to the land and the title to the same remained, perforce, as it was before plaintiff and its predecessor in interest did the acts with relation to the land which are set out in the findings, since such acts are insufficient to divest the legal owner of his title. It follows that Sanders had legal title to the land up to the time he executed the deed to the appellant here, and that deed conveyed such title to appellant.

[3, 4] Respondent sets forth fully in its brief the facts appearing from the record with relation to defendant's effort to acquire title to this land, and contends that his claim presents many features which would cause a court of equity to withhold its aid. Sanders' deposition was introduced in evidence on behalf of plaintiff and showed that he was a Civil War veteran. He homesteaded 160 acres of land and was entitled, by reason of his military service, to claim 40 acres additional. This right was transferable and, according to his statement, he sold it for 50 cents an acre. His assignee, however, whose name Sanders does not remember, never had the legal title to this 40 acres of land and the patent for the same was issued to Sanders, and the purchaser of the homestead right is not before the court claiming to be the equitable owner of the land by reason of such purchase.

Forty-eight years after the issuance of the patent and five years after the commencement of the present action, Nighbert visited Sanders at the latter's home in the state of Kansas and said that he (Nighbert) was working for an abstract company in California and that in order to quiet title to the land secured under the homestead right which Sanders had sold, it would be necessary for Sanders to execute a deed "to make sure that I (Sanders) put up no claim on it." Nighbert gave Sanders and his wife $200 for executing the deed and did not tell them that an action had been brought by plaintiff to quiet its title to the land. If Sanders were asserting his right against Nighbert in the present proceeding, these facts would be of great weight, and, certainly, a court of equity would not lend its aid to Nighbert against Sanders upon a showing that the former had secured his deed by fraud or misrepresentation. But the record does not present such a situation. Sanders has disclaimed any interest in the land, and the plaintiff cannot take advantage of any inequities in the dealings between Sanders and Nighbert. The plaintiff is relying entirely upon adverse possession, and rights acquired in this way are stricti juris. North Fork Water Co. v. Edwards, 121 Cal. 662, 666, 54 P. 69. "There are no equities in favor of a party seeking by adverse holding to acquire the property of another." Glowner v. De Alvarez, 10 Cal. App. 194, 196, 101 P. 432.

Upon the face of this record and as between the parties hereto, appellant is the lawful owner of the land and his title thereto should have been quieted. As stated by the trial court in its opinion, the record discloses only two conveyances of title; the first one, a patent from the United States government to Sanders, and the second a quitclaim deed from Sanders to Nighbert. It is to be observed that the pleadings gave no notice that plaintiff was claiming as the successor in interest of one having the equitable right in the land as against Sanders by reason of the purchase from him of the homestead rights in the land, and this position was not taken at the trial. The trial court mentioned in its opinion that Nighbert had information from Sanders that the homestead rights had been sold by him years ago, and that this gave Nighbert notice of an equitable ownership in someone other than Sanders. Conceding that Nighbert thus had notice of some outstanding equitable title in a person unknown, as well as notice from the pendency of the quiet title suit that the Kern County Land Company was claiming statutory adverse possession, Nighbert then took the legal title subject to the successful assertion of either of these claims. We have seen that the claim of title by adverse possession was not substantiated. The equitable title which might have been asserted, if not barred, by the unknown person who purchased from Sanders the homestead rights in this 40 acres of land is not set up in this action and may never be put forth. If it is asserted, a decree in this case quieting the legal title of Nighbert against the plaintiff will be no bar to its enforcement. Conceding for the moment that there is some unknown person to whom Sanders sold the homestead rights, nevertheless, while the legal title was in Sanders, he held the same subject to this equitable title, and Nighbert, standing in the place of Sanders, would also so hold the title. But this cannot enlarge the plaintiff's rights, nor abridge the right of Nighbert to quiet his title against it. The title to land is not a nebulous thing; it must rest somewhere. By the judgment appealed from, the legal title is in no one. Upon the record before us, full justice is done by quieting Nighbert's legal title against plaintiff, leaving him to account to the equitable owner should such equity ever be asserted and proven.

The judgment is reversed, and the title of the defendant Nighbert to the land described in the complaint is quieted as against the plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action on assigned claims, for labor performed and materials furnished by Robert Hutcheson, substituted as plaintiff in place of J. D. Fuller, deceased, against Z. A. Towne. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Sheldon Borden, Richard J. O. Culver, G. C. De Garmo, and Albert A. Kidder, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This action was commenced on August 1, 1916, by J. D. Fuller, as the holder by assignment of certain claims, against one La Rue upon the alleged promise of the defendant, Towne, to pay such claims. On the first trial of the action judgment went for the defendant, and, on plaintiff's appeal therefrom, the judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court. Fuller v. Towne, 184 Cal. 89, 193 P. 88. On the second trial judgment went for the plaintiff, Robert Hutcheson, who had theretofore been duly substituted for J. D. Fuller, who had died subsequent to the commencement of the action. From this judgment, the defendant appealed upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

[1] The facts of the case are fully stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court on the first appeal and no new facts were developed at the second trial. The findings of the trial court at the conclusion of the second trial find those facts as stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court to be true. This opinion was, therefore, the law of the case and compelled judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

On this appeal the appellant urges but three points which require consideration: First, that the suit was prematurely filed; second, that the amended complaint does not state a cause of action because it does not show any consideration for the defendant's promise to pay; and, third, that the defendant made but one agreement in which he promised to pay, and that was before he undertook the completion of the building.

[2] The first point is based upon the theory that the appellant at some stage of the negotiations promised to execute a promissory note secured by a mortgage to pay the claims of La Rue's creditors, and it is argued that this promise constituted an equitable mortgage which could be enforced only by suit to foreclose. There are two answers to this point: First, that the appellant positively denies ever having made such a promise; and, second, that if any such promise were made it was not in writing, and hence did not constitute an equitable mortgage. Hall v. Cayot, 141 Cal. 13, 18, 74 P. 299. In addition to this the trial court found on substantial evidence that the appellant did not execute the note or mortgage and that the representations that he had done so were not true.

[3] As to the second point, the complaint alleges the facts as detailed in the former opinion of the Supreme Court as constituting the consideration for the oral promise and these facts were held by the court in that opinion to be sufficient to take the oral promise out of the statute of frauds. It was because of the facts alleged in the complaint that the Supreme Court in that opinion reversed the cause and held that the finding that no valid promise had been made was unsupported by the evidence.

[4] Third, the contention that but one agreement was made and that it was made before the appellant undertook the completion of the building is negated by all the substantial evidence in the record. The evidence is that after the appellant had completed the building, and at his instance and request the creditors had been called together, he informed them through his agent that it would be necessary for them to withdraw all their stop notices against the school district in order that he might withdraw the money held by the school trustees. At the same time, also, upon the appellant's instance and request, written releases, which had been prepared by the county counsel, were executed by these creditors to enable appellant to secure the money then in the possession of the school district. As a result of those written releases, and because of them only, the appellant did obtain this money from the school district and used it for the payment of the bills which he himself had incurred for labor and materials in the completion of the building and for which he alone was responsible.

As was said in the beginning, the case presented on this record is identical with that presented to the Supreme Court in Fuller v. Towne, supra, and the decision in that case controls the second judgment. The other points which appellant raises for the first time on this appeal do not require consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨706(5)—Evidence held to show person struck by automobile was not negligent.

In action for injuries when struck by automobile, evidence showing that plaintiff after alighting from bus looked for approaching vehicles, then passed in front of bus, at rapid pace, held sufficient to support finding that she was not guilty of contributory negligence.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Finding of trial court in favor of person struck by automobile cannot be disturbed, unless evidence shows contributory negligence as matter of law.

Where plaintiff was given a judgment for injuries received when struck by automobile, unless evidence demonstrates as a matter of law that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, finding of trial court in her favor cannot be disturbed on appeal.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Determination of questions of fact by trial court, in absence of jury, conclusive on appeal.

Determination of trial court, in absence of jury, upon questions of automobile driver's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence, is conclusive on appeal when evidence made questions of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

Action by Nora L. Whitmore against C. T. Smith. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Kapp, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Fred A. Watkins, of Long Beach, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff commenced this action for damages for injuries suffered when struck by defendant's automobile while she was crossing a public street in the city of Long Beach. The cause was tried before the court without a jury with the result of a judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $1,800. From this judgment the defendant appeals upon a record prepared under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The only grounds urged on the appeal from the judgment are that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding of defendant's negligence and that it is also insufficient to support the finding that the plaintiff was herself not guilty of contributory negligence. The evidence is that the plaintiff, having just alighted from a public bus at the corner of Atlantic avenue and Seventeenth street, passed around the front of the bus to cross Atlantic avenue when without warning she was struck by the defendant's automobile and thrown back in front of the bus, suffering the injuries which are the basis of the complaint.

[1] Concerning the finding of defendant's negligence the evidence is in wide conflict, both as to the rate of speed and as to the proximity to the side of the bus in which defendant was attempting to pass. On the part of the plaintiff it was shown that the defendant was attempting to pass this bus "as close as it could come without hitting it" and that he was traveling at a high rate of speed in violation of the statutory regulation at that point. On the part of defendant the testimony was that he was attempting to pass the bus at a distance of 4 or 5 feet; that he was not traveling more than 12 or 15 miles an hour; and that the plaintiff ran into his machine. If the defendant's testimony were true, it is apparent that the accident as detailed by all the witnesses could not have happened as it did. The plaintiff was thrown directly in front of the standing bus, her head toward the curb and her feet toward the path of defendant's machine. If the defendant had been traveling at 12 or 15 miles an hour on a path 5 feet west of the standing bus, he could not have thrown the plaintiff to the place where she was picked up. And, again, if he had been traveling in that manner, he would have had ample opportunity to have avoided the collision. The court believed the testimony offered by the plaintiff, and that settles the question of defendant's negligence so far as this appeal is concerned.

defendant relies is the inference which he insists must be drawn from the fact that the plaintiff was attempting to cross the street at a rapid rate without having previously looked for approaching vehicles. The evidence is that the plaintiff, after alighting from the bus, looked for approaching vehicles and then passed in front of the bus, not running, as claimed by the defendant, but merely walking at a rapid pace. The last thing she remembered after passing the bus was that she looked and saw the lights of defendant's machine directly in front of her. There is no evidence that she failed to take the precautions that an ordinary person would have taken under similar circumstances.

[3] Unless the evidence demonstrates as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, the finding of the trial court in her favor cannot be disturbed on appeal. The only circumstance to which the defendant refers as imputing contributory negligence to the plaintiff is that as she was passing in front of the bus she was looking straight ahead and did not look to see if vehicles were approaching from her left. But there is evidence that at that time she saw defendant's lights directly in front of her and from this it must be inferred that she did look to the left. The fact that she was struck by the right-hand fender at a point about one foot from the front thereof does not necessarily indicate that she ran into the automobile. The testimony was that immediately before the automobile struck the plaintiff the driver turned his wheel sharply to the left "as far as it would go" and that act caused the front of the automobile to swerve so that the point of impact was on the side of the fender rather than on the front portion of the car.

[4] On a review of the entire record, we are satisfied that the evidence is such as would compel a submission of the cause to a jury, both on the question of defendant's negligence and on the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence. Such being the case the determination of the trial court upon those questions, in the absence of a jury, is conclusive on this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

[1, 2] The appeal was taken under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and petitioner has filed with the clerk of said trial court his notice of appeal and notice demanding clerk's transcript and stenographic report of the trial as required by said section. By said section it is provided that:

"The stenographic reporter shall * * * prepare a transcript of the phonographic report of the trial, including therein copies of all writings offered or received in evidence."

It will thus be seen that, by the terms of this section, it is made the duty of the reporter to include in the transcript prepared by him copies of all writings offered or received in evidence. We know of no provisions of law giving to this court any authority or power to vary the express provisions of this section of the Code, or to control in any manner the action of the reporter in preparing said transcript by directing him to exclude therefrom any portion of the proceedings of said trial. This section of the Code has determined the duty of the reporter in this respect. The examination and certification of the reporter's transcript is a function of the trial judge. Martin v. Pacific, etc., Co. (N. M.) 234 P. 321.

[3] Neither do we think petitioner can obtain the relief sought by virtue of rule 25 of the Supreme Court, which provides that:

"When the inspection of an original paper, which was offered in evidence in the court below, is shown to be necessary to a correct decision of the appeal, the court may order the clerk of the court below to transmit such original paper, if in his possession, to the clerk of the court. * * *"

While under the authority given the court by this rule it may order the clerk of the trial court to transmit original exhibits admitted at the trial when it is made to appear that an inspection of the same is necessary, yet we do not understand from this rule that said exhibits can be omitted from the transcript required by section 953a to be prepared by the reporter. The plain provisions of this section require that copies of all writings offered and received in evidence shall be included in the reporter's transcript. Thereafter, if the appellate court deems it necessary that the originals, or any of them, shall be inspected by the court, under rule 25 it is given the authority to order the clerk of the trial court to transmit the same to the appellate court. Petitioner has alleged:

But no facts are stated in the petition showing that an inspection of said exhibits, or any of them, is or will be necessary. But even if such a showing were made, it would still be the duty of the reporter to include said copies of said exhibits in the transcript to be prepared by him. We do not understand, however, that appellant seriously presses this point. His main contention is that, on account of the great cost of transcribing these exhibits, the court should direct that they be omitted from the transcript, and that the originals thereof be transmitted to this court. As we have already stated, this court has no authority to make such an order. If petitioner desired a shorter record than that of the so-called "alternative method," he should have presented his appeal on a record containing a bill of exceptions.

It was suggested at the hearing that the court might have power to make said order under stipulation signed by all the parties to said action. At the time of the hearing, however, the attorneys declined to enter into such a stipulation, and we understand that they are still of the same mind. Without such a stipulation any order made by this court would, in our opinion, be illegal and void.

The petition is denied.

BERTIZ v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.
(Civ. 5243.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 30, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 28, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞742(6)—Governmental act question of law.

Question whether city, in maintaining garage for repair of city automobiles, was engaged in a governmental act, as distinguished from an independent enterprise operated by city, is one of law for the court.

2. Municipal corporations ☞745½—City liable for negligence of garage employee.

City, in maintaining garage for repair of city automobiles, was acting in a proprietary and not in governmental capacity, and hence is liable for negligence of mechanic of such garage who, in driving such automobile for purpose of testing it, injured plaintiff.

3. Municipal corporations ☞742(4)—Complaint for negligence of employee held sufficient without alleging city was acting in private capacity.

Complaint alleging that city maintained garage for repair of city automobiles, and that it was in furtherance of such repair work that automobile was being negligently operated by garage employee at time of injury, to plaintiff, held sufficient, without setting out affirmatively that city was acting in a private capacity in doing acts charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Jose Bertiz against the City of Los Angeles and another, consolidated with three other actions. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Myers, C. J., and Shenk, J., deeming themselves disqualified, not participating therein.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., Lucius P. Green, Asst. City Atty., and Chas. B. MacCoy, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles (Philip C. Sterry, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Harold Ide Cruzan and Harold S. Kiggins, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment for $1,000 against them in an action for damages alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant Boston in operating an automobile as the agent of the defendant city of Los Angeles. The plaintiff brought the action as the father of Marie Bertiz, a minor, who was killed as the result of a collision between the automobile owned and operated by defendants and an automobile in which she was riding.

At the trial of the cause three other cases growing out of the same accident were consolidated with it, and by stipulation of the parties and order of court the transcript on appeal in this cause constitutes the transcript in the other three cases, and the several appeals are to be considered upon the briefs herein.

The parties hereto stipulated that the following facts should be deemed proven: That prior to the year 1913 the city of Los Angeles maintained a mechanical division of the purchasing department, and it was the duty of said mechanical division to repair all automobiles owned by the city; that in 1918 the mechanical division of the purchasing department was transferred to the mechanical division of the board of public works, and that from that time on it was the duty of the mechanical division of the board of public works to repair all automobiles owned by the city of Los Angeles except automobiles belonging to and operated by the bureau of power and light and the water department of said city; that the only departments of the city government of the city of Los Angeles which have automobiles belonging to the said departments repaired by said mechanical division of the board of public works are the following, to wit, engineering department, park department, playground department, library department, fire department, police department, building department, and the city council.

Defendant W. C. Boston was, on the 2d day of July, 1920, employed as a mechanic at a garage owned by the city of Los Angeles, located at Pasadena avenue and Avenue 19 in said city. Among the duties of said W. C. Boston was the testing and repairing of carburetors and cars upon the public highways of said city. The city owned a Cadillac automobile, which was driven by the defendant W. C. Boston on El Monte road on July 2, 1920; and on said date Boston, in performance of his duties as a garage mechanic, was testing out the operation of the carburetor on said Cadillac automobile by driving the automobile in an easterly direction along El Monte road within the corporate limits of said city. In driving the automobile at said time and place Boston exceeded a speed of 30 miles an hour. The plaintiff was driving an automobile in a westerly direction on El Monte road. A collision occurred between the two automobiles, and as a result thereof both automobiles were damaged, Marie Bertiz, minor daughter of plaintiff, was killed, and plaintiff and his two other children were injured. It was further stipulated that at the time of the accident Boston was negligent in exceeding the speed limit applicable under the law to the time of the collision and the injuries resulting therefrom.

[1] It is apparent that this agreement as to facts presents but one legal question: Was the maintenance of the garage for the repair of city automobiles a governmental act as distinguished from an independent enterprise operated by the city and not incidental or necessary to the performance of a purely governmental function? In the former case there is no liability upon the part of the city, but the trial court took the latter view in its instructions to the jury. The question was one of law for the court as evidenced by the case of Chafor v. City of Long Beach, 174 Cal. 478, 163 P. 670, L. R. A. 1917E, 685, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 106, in which the court instructed the jury that the construction, erection, and maintenance of the auditorium building or convention hall by the city of Long Beach was an act of said city in the exercise of its proprietary or private capacity, and the measure of its responsibility or reliability in relation thereto was the same as that of any other individual or private corporation engaged in similar conduct, and no more or no less. A jury would not be qualified to determine this question, for it might involve the interpretation of a municipal charter—a highly technical legal problem in many instances.

In the case above cited it was said:

"But it is of course true that modern cities and towns enter upon many forms of activity, operate utilities for the benefit of the inhabitants, and provide many means for the easing or improving of the condition of the people that were never dreamed of at common law. Nevertheless the uniform holding as to all such activities on principles manifestly just to the people themselves is that no matter how beneficial they may be in a general sense to the inhabitants of the municipality, unless they are governmental in their essence, the municipality's conduct in managing them is controlled by the same rules of liability that apply to an individual. Thus, while schoolhouses, city halls, jails, firehouses, are with much uniformity held to be instrumentalities for governmental purposes, no such rule applies to other buildings constructed by a municipality, though for the benefit, convenience, or advantage of its people."

In Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 109, it was said:

"* * * Municipal corporations * * * possess * * * a double character: The one governmental, legislative or public; the other, in a sense, proprietary or private. The distinction between these, though sometimes, indeed very often, difficult to trace, is highly important, and is frequently referred to particularly in the cases relating to the property and to the implied or common-law liability of municipal corporations for the negligence of their servants, agents or officers in the execution of corporate duties and powers. On this distinction, indeed, rests the doctrine of implied liability. In its governmental or public character, the corporation is made, by the state, one of its instruments. * * * But in its proprietary or private character, the theory is that the powers are supposed not to be conferred, primarily or chiefly, from considerations connected with the government of the state at large, but for the private advantage of the compact community which is incorporated as a distinct legal personality or corporate individual; and as to such powers, and to property acquired thereunder, and contracts made with reference thereto, the corporation is to be regarded quo ad hoc as a private corporation, or at least not public in the sense that the power of the Legislature over it or the rights represented by it, is omnipotent."

In the case of Fire Ins. Co. v. Village of Keeseville, 148 N. Y. 46, 42 N. E. 405, 30 L. R. A. 660, 51 Am. St. Rep. 667, it was said:

"When we find that the power conferred has relation to public purposes and is for the public good, it is to be classified as governmental in its nature and it appertains to the corporation in its political character. But when it relates to the accomplishment of private corporate purposes, in which the public is only indirectly concerned, it is private in its nature and the municipal corporation, in respect to its exercise, is regarded as a legal individual. In the former case, the corporation is exempt from all liability, whether for non-user or misuser; while in the latter case, it may be held to that degree of responsibility which would attach to an ordinary private corporation."

[2] We think respondent's position is correct when he says that if the maintenance of a garage for the repair of city automobiles should be considered as a governmental function, then it might be contended, successfully, that the manufacture of fire apparatus or of arms and equipment for policemen should also be so considered upon the theory that these activities are necessary adjuncts to the governmental duty to protect against fires and to maintain police protection. This would seem to extend governmental activities beyond their proper limits, and there is no public policy demanding such extension of the principle exonerating municipal corporations from liability for negligence of their agents. We concur with the trial court in its conclusion that the city of Los Angeles was acting in a proprietary capacity in maintaining the garage for the repair of its automobiles, and was therefore liable for the negligence of its agents in the course of employment in such enterprise.

[3] This determination disposes of numerous objections in appellant's brief, such as the objection that the evidence does not justify the conclusion of the court, and that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the city was acting in a governmental capacity. The only objection remaining to be considered is that the complaint is defective in not setting out, affirmatively, that the city was acting in a private capacity in doing the acts charged. The complaint alleged that the city owned, operated, and controlled an automobile garage, at which were repaired automobiles used by officers and agents of the city in the performance of their various functions, both governmental and proprietary. It is alleged that the automobile which was being tested by defendant Boston at the time of the accident was used by the city council in both governmental and proprietary functions. Appellant's argument seems to be that if the car was being used for a governmental activity at the time the carburetor became in need of repair, or if it was being repaired and tested for the purpose of being used in a governmental activity, defendant is excused from liability, and that the complaint is susceptible of this construction. Under our view of the matter, it is immaterial whether the automobile was used exclusively in governmental functions when it was in running order. During such use, the city would not be liable for its negligent operation; but when it was not in running order and was not being used in governmental activities, but was being repaired and tested by the city in its private capacity as a garage owner and automobile repairer, then liability existed for damage caused by its negligent operation.

We think it was sufficient to allege that the city maintained and operated a garage for repairing city automobiles. It follows as a matter of law that such business was not governmental. The complaint set forth that it was in furtherance of such repair work that the automobile was being negligently operated at the time of the accident. We think the demurrer was properly overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

75 Cal. App. 150

Ex parte MULLIN. (Cr. 1302.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 9, 1925.)

1. Criminal law — 1218—Imprisonment in penitentiary on conviction for entering inhabited dwelling with intent to commit rape held legal.

In prosecution under information containing counts for entering inhabited dwelling with intent to commit rape, and for assault with intent to commit rape on conviction under first count, indeterminate sentence of imprisonment in state prison, later fixed by prison board at seven years, was legal; conviction being for felony.

2. Burglary — 2—Entry of house with intent to commit felony held to constitute "burglary."

Entry of house with intent to commit felony constitutes "burglary," which is itself a felony.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Burglary.]

Application by M. B. Mullin for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Arthur S. Lawrence, to be directed to the Warden of San Quentin Prison. Writ denied.

L. W. Lovey and Walter E. Dorn, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

TYLER, P. J. It appears therefrom that petitioner is confined in the state prison at San Quentin. It is claimed that his imprisonment is unlawful.

On the 15th day of April, 1922, an information was filed against petitioner by the district attorney of Riverside county. It contained two counts. The first charged a felony, committed as follows: That said Arthur S. Lawrence, on or about the 9th day of April, 1922, at the county of Riverside, unlawfully and feloniously and burglariously entered a certain inhabited dwelling with intent then and there to commit a felony, to wit, rape.

The second count alleged that defendant, and as part of the same transaction, did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and violently make an assault upon one E. A. Rowe, a female person, not then and there the wife of the said Arthur S. Lawrence, with the intent then and there feloniously, and by force and violence, to carnally know and ravish the said E. A. Rowe, and accomplish with her an act of sexual intercourse against her will and without her consent.

[1] Defendant was tried upon such charge, and on the 30th day of June, 1922, and after hearing, was found guilty under the first count, and not guilty upon the second. Thereafter he was sentenced to imprisonment at the state prison at San Quentin under an indeterminate sentence, which was thereafter fixed by the prison board at seven years. It is here claimed that said sentence and imprisonment is illegal and void, and without any effect, for the reason that petitioner was found not guilty of having committed a felony. But defendant was found guilty under the first count of the information of having committed this crime.

[2] The entry of a house with intent to commit a felony constitutes burglary, which is itself a felony.

There is therefore no merit in petitioner's contention.

The writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. FRANK. (Cr. 1293.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 3, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1925.)

1. Witnesses — 277(4)—Cross-examining defendant as to having given false name on arrest held error, where not testified to on direct examination.

Questioning defendant on cross-examination as to having given false name at time of his arrest held error, where defendant had not, in his direct examination, given any testimony on such question, which would justify asking it on cross-examination.

2. Witnesses — 277(4)—Defendant taking stand may be cross-examined only as to matters testified to on direct examination.

One accused of crime cannot be compelled to testify against himself, but, after taking witness stand and testifying in his own behalf, he can be cross-examined as to matters to which he testified on direct examination, but on no other.

3. Criminal law — 1170½(5)—Error in cross-examining defendant as to giving false name on arrest held not prejudicial where such fact already before jury.

Cross-examination of defendant as to having given a false name on being arrested, though error, held not prejudicial, nor to have seriously injured defendant, where such testimony was already before jury.

4. Criminal law — 351(5)—Testimony as to defendant having given a false name on arrest held admissible, in view of attempt to escape officers immediately before arrest.

Testimony that defendant, on being arrested, gave false name, held properly admitted, where immediately prior to his arrest he had attempted to escape officers seeking to arrest him as he was attempting to sell pin he was alleged to have stolen.

5. Criminal law — 720(8)—Referring to defendant as potential murderer held not error, in view of the evidence.

In view of evidence that defendant prosecuted for robbery and burglary had pointed revolver towards his victim and threatened to kill, held that argument of district attorney classifying defendant as a "potential murderer" was not improper.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 730(6)—Reference to pending murder case, if improper, held not prejudicial, in view of court's prompt sustaining of objection with instruction to disregard it.

Though reference by district attorney, in prosecution for robbery and burglary, to case of another charged with murder, which had no connection with case pending against defendant, may have been improper, no prejudice resulted where court promptly sustained defendant's objection to such reference and instructed jury to disregard it.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 723(4)—Statement of district attorney that jurors would make themselves responsible if they suffered defendant to escape held proper.

Argument of district attorney that, if jury suffered defendant to escape, they would make themselves responsible, was proper.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 204, 1175—Failure to render verdict on former jeopardy plea held not prejudicial, where no evidence in support thereof, and plea is waived by failure to produce evidence.

A defendant waives his plea of former acquittal and once in jeopardy by failing to produce any evidence in support thereof, and failure of jury to render verdict on such pleas is not prejudicial to defendant, in absence of any evidence to support them, since in such a case it would be duty of court to advise jury to find against defendant on such pleas.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 1175—Failure of jury to render verdict on plea of once in jeopardy not prejudicial, where plea based on verdict on former trial, which was reversed on appeal.

Defendant being without right under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1180, to interpose pleas of former acquittal or once in jeopardy, based on verdict rendered at first trial, which was reversed on appeal, suffered no prejudice by failure of jury to render verdict on such pleas.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliott Craig, Judge.

George E. Frank was convicted of robbery and burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank W. Allender, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. [1, 2] The appellant was found guilty of the crimes of robbery and burglary, and appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. This same action was before the Supreme Court (193 Cal. 474, 225 P. 448) and later before this court (236 P. 189). The first contention of appellant for reversal of the judgment is that the court erred in asking appellant on cross-examination the following question: "What name, if any, did you give to Officers Rich and Murphy when you were first arrested?" This question appellant answered: "Williamson." From what had transpired during the trial just preceding the asking of this question, it is clear that its purpose was to show that appellant had given a false name when arrested. The question was objected to upon the ground that it was not proper cross-examination. This objection was overruled. Appellant had not, in his direct examination, given any testimony relative to the name used by him at the time of his arrest or any other testimony that would justify the asking of this question on cross-examination. To ask it under such circumstances was error. People v. Mohr, 157 Cal. 732, 736, 109 P. 476. There is no rule better understood in our criminal procedure than that a person accused of crime cannot be compelled to testify against himself. After taking the witness stand and testifying in his own behalf, he can be cross-examined as to such matters to which he testified upon direct examination, but upon no other matter. This rule, limiting the cross-examination of a defendant while a witness to such matters testified to upon his direct examination, is a general rule applicable to all witnesses. But it has been held in some cases that the rule thus limiting cross-examination is much narrower when applied to the defendant as a witness than when applied to ordinary witnesses. People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 P. 45; People v. Crowley, 100 Cal. 478, 35 P. 84. The latter of these two cases quotes with approval the following language found in the former case:

"And in People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171 [31 P. 45], the court say that 'so far as the defendant is concerned, the court is not allowed that discretion as to the extent of the scope of the cross-examination which it is permitted to exercise in the examination of the other witnesses.'"

The court also in this same case says:

"We have been referred to no case, decided since the present condition of the statutory law [section 1323, Penal Code] on the subject, which holds that the cross-examination of a defendant may be as wide as that of any other witness."

[3, 4] While the court erred in overruling appellant's objection to this question, we are of the opinion that the appellant was not injuriously affected thereby. The officer Murphy, to whom he testified he gave the false name, had already been called as a witness for the prosecution, and had testified that appellant had given the name of Williamson to him shortly after his arrest. This evidence therefore being already before the jury, the appellant was not seriously injured by being compelled to testify to what had already been given in evidence by the officer. Nor was it error in our opinion to permit the officer Murphy to testify to this fact. The evidence showed that just prior to appellant's arrest he was in the office of a diamond broker attempting to sell the diamond pin which he was charged with stealing. This office was on the ninth floor of the building. While there, two officers entered the room and announced in the hearing of appellant that they were from the city detective bureau; whereupon appellant hurried from the room out into the hall, and then down eight flights of stairs, closely pursued by the officers, who followed him through the lobby of a hotel situated on the ground floor and then out onto the sidewalk and across the street, where he was arrested by them, after he had assaulted them and attempted to avoid arrest by the use of force and violence. Upon his arrest, he was immediately taken to the police station, and there gave his name to the officers in charge as Williamson. Under these circumstances there was no error in admitting the evidence complained of, as his statement giving a false name was made after the offense had been committed and evidently with knowledge on appellant's part of its commission. It must be considered, in connection with, and as a part of his attempted flight, after he, with a stolen pin in his possession, found himself in the presence of the officers of the law. As was said in People v. Cox, 29 Cal. App. 419, 422, 155 P. 1010, 1011:

"When a person suspected of and charged with crime resorts to deception and falsehood, that is a circumstance which, like flight and concealment, tends to show a consciousness of guilt, * * * arising from other established facts."

No complaint is made as to the evidence that appellant, when the officers appeared in the broker's office, fled from them down numerous flights of stairs and out upon the street, and that, upon an attempt being made to arrest him, he resisted arrest and committed an assault on the arresting officers. This evidence is conceded to be competent and material, as it showed an attempt to elude the officers by flight. His statement giving a false name, made to the officers at the police station only a short time thereafter, was made undoubtedly for the purpose of deceiving them as to his true identity, and with the evident intent and purpose of accomplishing by deception that which he had failed to attain through flight. All of this evidence was of the same general character, and was properly admissible against appellant. There is nothing inconsistent with these views to be found in the former opinions rendered in this action by this court. At the trial of the action resulting in the judgment reviewed by this court and reported in 236 P. 189, the evidence of the assumed name of the appellant was all given on cross-examination, and for this reason it was held to be incompetent. On page 189, the court said:

"On no one of the occasions when a witness was thus interrogated with respect to the use by defendant of an assumed name was the questioning done under proper cross-examination."

[5] The further contention is made that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct, prejudicial to the rights of appellant, in his closing argument to the jury, and that his conduct was such that it prevented appellant from having a fair trial. Appellant specifies three instances in which he claims that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct: First. In his reference to the appellant as "this innocent young man—this potential murderer." Second. In his reference to Dr. Young, accused of murder, and whose case was then pending in said court. And, lastly, in his statement to the jury that, if they suffered appellant to escape, they would make themselves responsible. In each instance, after the remark claimed to be improper had been made by the district attorney, the appellant made his objection thereto and specified the same as misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer. The court in each instance sustained appellant's objection, and instructed the jury to disregard the same. As to the remark of the district attorney that the defendant was a potential murderer, we are not prepared to say that the use of these words on the part of the district attorney was not justified by the evidence before the jury. This evidence tended to show that the appellant had entered the room of Mr. and Mrs. McPherson during their absence, and after their return he pointed his gun at Mr. McPherson and threatened to kill him. According to the testimony of Mr. McPherson:

"He had his gun stuck right in my face or stomach, and he finally grabbed the pin, pulled it out of my necktie, demanded what money I had in my pocket with his gun stuck at me, and turned around and rushed toward the door."

He had previously pointed his gun towards Mrs. McPherson and said, "Drop that telephone." A person guilty of such conduct has no reasonable ground to complain if he is classified as a "potential murderer."

[6] The reference of the district attorney in his argument to the jury to the case of Dr. Young was to the effect that he (the district attorney) expected to try the case of Dr. Young in the next three or four weeks, and that he predicted that there would be a plea of insanity in that case, because of the conclusive character of the case against Dr. Young. He further stated that the other defense which is familiar to prosecutors was that of an alibi. It is apparent that the case of Dr. Young and the character of the defense he might interpose to the charge against him had absolutely no connection with the case then pending against appellant. The reference thereto by the district attorney may accordingly have been improper. But we are unable to see that the appellant was materially or at all prejudiced by this reference to the case of Dr. Young, even though the defense interposed by appellant was that of alibi. The court promptly sustained appellant's objection to said reference, and instructed the jury to disregard the same.

[7] As to the third and final remark of the district attorney, of which appellant complains, we see no objection to it. The prosecutor told the jury, if they suffered the appellant to escape, they would make themselves responsible. It was just another way of stating to the jury that the final determination of the case rested with them, and that they would be responsible for such final determination. The jury would be responsible if they acquitted the appellant, but in no less or greater degree than if they convicted him. This responsibility the law directly places upon the jury and upon them alone, and we can conceive of no impropriety on the part of counsel either for appellant or for respondent in reminding the jury that they have this important responsibility resting upon them.

[8] The third and final ground in support of his appeal is that the jury failed to find upon his plea of once in jeopardy. Upon the first trial of this action, the appellant was convicted, but on appeal the judgment was reversed. Appellant thereafter, and before the second trial, entered his plea of once in jeopardy by virtue of the first trial. On the second trial, the jury found him guilty as charged in the information, and rendered a verdict against his plea of once in jeopardy. From a judgment based upon this verdict, he again appealed, and this second judgment was reversed. On the third trial, the one now under review, no evidence was introduced by appellant upon his plea of once in jeopardy, and the same was not passed upon by the jury. The fact that appellant had interposed such a plea had apparently been overlooked both by the court and by counsel. It has repeatedly been held in this state that:

"Where a defendant accused of crime has interposed a plea of not guilty, and also a separate plea of 'once in jeopardy' for the same offense, he is entitled to have the latter plea passed upon by the jury before judgment can properly be pronounced against him, and, where the jury found a verdict of guilty without passing upon the plea of 'once in jeopardy,' a judgment of conviction will be reversed, and a new trial granted." People v. Tucker, 115 Cal. 337, 47 P. 111; Ex parte King, 10 Cal. App. 282, 101 P. 810; People v. Kinsey, 51 Cal. 278; People v. Helbing, 59 Cal. 567; People v. Fuqua, 61 Cal. 377; People v. Hamberg, 84 Cal. 468, 24

P. 298; People v. Eppinger, 109 Cal. 294, 41 P. 1037.

It has been so held, even where no evidence was introduced or offered in support of the plea. People v. Tucker, supra. Since the above cases were decided, there have been some decisions of the Supreme and appellate courts of this state which, while not directly overruling these cases, or for that matter even referring to them, appear to enunciate a somewhat different rule. In People v. Strickler, 167 Cal. 627, 140 P. 270, it was held that, where a defendant pleaded not guilty and also former acquittal and once in jeopardy, and thereafter withdrew his plea of not guilty and pleaded guilty to the charge, but no action was taken by him or by the court as to his other pleas, he thereby waived his pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy. In the very recent case of People v. Newell, 192 Cal. 659, on page 667, 221 P. 622, 625, the court, said:

"It is just as necessary to support special pleas by proof (People v. Cummings, 123 Cal. 269, 272 [55 P. 898]), as it is to interpose the pleas, and the failure to do either is to be deemed a waiver of the defense. People v. Strickler, 167 Cal. 627 [140 P. 270]; People v. McFarlane, supra [138 Cal. 481, 484, 71 P. 568, 72 P. 48, 61 L. R. A. 245]. It was said in People v. Stoll, 143 Cal. 689, 696 [77 P. 818, 821]: 'The right to interpose a plea of once in jeopardy is a personal privilege, of which a defendant may, or may not, avail himself.'"

In People v. Brannon (Cal. App.) 233 P. 88, the defendant was tried and convicted of first degree murder. He was charged in two counts of the indictment: First, with the crime of an assault with a deadly weapon upon his wife; and in the second count with murder of one Margaret Cronin. He pleaded not guilty to both charges, and moved for a separate trial upon each count of the indictment, and the same was granted by the court. He was first tried for the assault upon his wife and acquitted. He thereupon moved the court to permit him to interpose the pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy. The evidence tended to show that he had fired his pistol at his wife, but that the bullet therefrom had missed his wife and struck and killed Margaret Cronin. The court refused to permit him to interpose either of the special pleas. The appellate court held that the acquittal of said defendant of assault with a deadly weapon upon his wife was not a bar to his prosecution upon the charge of murder of Margaret Cronin, and therefore, to use the words of the court, "that the appellant suffered no prejudice by reason of the court's refusal to permit him to plead former acquittal and once in jeopardy." From these later decisions, we question whether the strict rule invoked in the earlier cases above referred to can now be considered the law in this state. On the other hand, we think that it can be reasonably inferred from these later decisions that the appellant may and does waive his pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy by his failure to produce any evidence in support thereof, and, furthermore, that the failure of the jury to render a verdict upon said pleas in the absence of any evidence to support them does not result in any prejudice to appellant. As we understand the decision in People v. Brannon, the court held that evidence of the acquittal of the defendant of the charge of an assault with a deadly weapon upon the wife of the appellant would not support a plea of once in jeopardy or former acquittal in a prosecution against him for the murder of Margaret Cronin, even though the two charges grew out of the same act on the part of the defendant. Accordingly, the court held that the appellant was not prejudiced by the refusal of the court to permit him to interpose the special pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy. If, therefore, the accused is not prejudiced by the refusal of the court to permit him to interpose such pleas, when there was no evidence to support them, or either of them, how can he be prejudiced by the failure of the jury to find upon such pleas when he has introduced no evidence to support either of them? It may be conceded that the proper procedure would have been in the action now before us to submit these pleas to the jury and require of them a verdict upon each of them. But, as there was no evidence offered by appellant to support either of said pleas, it would have been the duty of the court to advise the jury to find for the people and against the defendant upon each of such pleas. We think it reasonable to assume that the jury under such circumstances would follow the advice given them by the court, and find against the defendant. Had this been done in the present action, the appellant would have been in no better, nor worse, condition than that in which he now finds himself. He therefore suffered no prejudice by reason of the failure of the jury to render a verdict upon the special pleas interposed by him.

[9] There is another provision of law which we consider applicable to this case. Section 1180 of the Penal Code is as follows:

"The granting of a new trial places the parties in the same position as if no trial had been had. All the testimony must be produced anew, and the former verdict cannot be used or referred to, either in evidence or in argument, or be pleaded in bar of any conviction which might have been had under the indictment."

By the provision of this section, the appellant was prohibited from pleading in bar the judgment rendered upon his former trial, which was reversed on the appeal taken by him. It is true that the constitutionality of this section has been questioned, but in so far only as the latter part of said section may apply to an offense of which the defendant has been acquitted by virtue of conviction of another of less degree included in the information. People v. Gordon, 99 Cal. 227, 232, 33 P. 901. In all other respects the section is legal and free from constitutional objections. As appellant under this section had no right even to interpose the pleas of former acquittal or once in jeopardy by virtue of the verdict rendered at the first trial of said action, he cannot be held to have been prejudiced or deprived of any right whatever by the failure of the jury to render a verdict upon pleas that were illegal and were made without any legal authority.

The judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Hamish B. Eddie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of the court upon a verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty of the crime of embezzlement. An information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county charged the defendant and appellant herein, Edgar J. Knox, with embezzlement in count 1 and grand larceny in count 2. Appellant was acquitted on the charge of grand larceny, but was found guilty on the count of embezzlement.

In urging a reversal of the judgment, the appellant admits that under the rule of "conflict of testimony" this court will not disturb the finding of the jury; but he contends that the testimony in the case is so strongly in his favor that the court, in reviewing the points he raises, should apply the doctrine of the "close case."

We have carefully examined the transcript of the evidence, and are moved to observe that, if the complaining witness' testimony was given full credit by the jury, as undoubtedly it was, it cannot be said that this is what may be termed a "close case."

The complaining witness, Alice M. Bright, testified that in November, 1924, the defendant, with whom she had a limited acquaintance, approached her with the statement that he knew where he could purchase for her some lots in a new subdivision, known as the Pico Vista tract, at a discount of 20 per cent. from the market price. Subsequently the defendant took Mrs. Bright out and showed her certain lots which he represented to her to be the lots which he had in mind, and which could be purchased for $1,500. Relying upon these representations, the complaining witness gave the defendant, first, a check for $150 and, a few days later, another check for $1,350, to be used in acquiring these lots for her. At the time she delivered the $1,350 check, according to her testimony, she asked the defendant what she was to receive as evidence that she had given him this money, and he replied that he would give her his note, which he proceeded to do, for the sum of $1,500. She also testified that subsequently she asked the defendant for a contract which she understood was always given in the purchase of property, and that the defendant on one occasion had replied that he never gave any contract to the people for whom he invested money. Subsequently, according to the testimony of the complaining witness, the defendant told her, in response to her inquiry about the lots, that he had sold them and made a profit of $300 for her; that the money was in escrow in the Security Trust & Savings Bank and would soon be paid to her; that, although she made repeated requests thereafter for her money, she had never been able to obtain it.

One Thomas B. Leddy, an attorney at law, testified that Mrs. Bright, the complaining witness, had consulted him with regard to the money she had turned over to the defendant, and requested him to represent her in securing its return; that pursuant to this employment he took the matter up with the defendant, and in one interview with the defendant in the witness' office, the defendant admitted that he had received $1,500 from Mrs. Bright for the purpose of purchasing some property, but that he had never purchased the property with the money.

The defendant, taking the stand in his own behalf, admitted that he had secured $1,500 in two checks from the complaining witness, but contended that it was money which he borrowed from her, and insisted that the note which he gave her was for the purpose of evidencing a loan which she had made to him. For the purpose of our discussion, it may be said that the defendant denied substantially all of the other material assertions made by the complaining witness, and also denied that he had admitted to Thomas B. Leddy, as testified to by him, that he had received the money from the complaining witness for the purpose of buying property and that he had not purchased the property.

The fact that the defendant gave, and the complaining witness accepted, a note for $1,500 at the time the second check was given, is pointed out by the appellant as a strong circumstance in support of his contention that the evidence in the case is very close. As further supporting the defendant's story that the transaction was a loan, it is urged that, after receiving the note, the complaining witness endeavored to discount the note at a bank.

Manifestly, if the jury believed the defendant's story, namely, that the transaction was a loan, there would have been no verdict of guilty, and all that is urged by the defendant here would be entitled to weight; but, unfortunately for the defendant's position, the verdict necessarily presupposes that the jury did not believe his story, but accepted the story of the complaining witness. The jury may very well have construed the giving of the note by the defendant as a bit of sharp practice indulged in for the purpose of covering up any indication of criminal intent, and may likewise have interpreted the action of the complaining witness in accepting the note as due to her inexperience in business; for manifestly the record in the case clearly shows that the complaining witness was inexperienced, if not unfamiliar, with business transactions of this kind.

The first point urged by appellant is that the court committed prejudicial error in overruling the objection of his counsel to certain questions asked by the district attorney of the defendant while on the stand, concerning the use which he had made of the $1,500 secured by him from the complaining witness. At the outset of his testimony while on the stand, the defendant frankly admitted that he used this money for his own personal uses. Upon cross-examination, and over the objection of defendant's counsel, the district attorney elicited from the defendant a statement or admission that he owed the Alexandria Hotel the sum of $600 for personal expenses, and had previously issued a check for this amount, which check he took up with $600 of the money received from Mrs. Bright. Appellant urges that this information, which was in effect forced from the defendant by the questions of the district attorney, was for the purpose of showing "the commission of another offense" by the defendant, and that this was improper and prejudicial. We are unable to find anything in the record, either in the questions asked or answers given on this subject, that could possibly be construed as indicating that the defendant had committed a public offense in connection with either the issuing of the check to the Alexandria Hotel, or in its payment. Appellant admits that in a case of embezzlement it is a proper line of inquiry to ascertain what use was made of the money claimed to have been embezzled, but urges that, when the defendant admitted he made personal use of the money, the district attorney had no right to make specific inquiry as to the particular uses.

[1] We cannot agree with the appellant in this criticism. Once conceded that the inquiry was proper, the district attorney had a perfect right to elicit specific information instead of being satisfied with a general admission. People v. Rowland, 12 Cal App. 6, 106 P. 428; Dimmick v. United States, 135 F. 257, 70 C. C. A. 141; Bridges v. State, 103 Ga. 21, 29 S. E. 859.

The next point urged is that the evidence does not support the charge of embezzlement under the provisions of section 511 of the Penal Code of the state of California. The portion of the section which appellant contends is applicable to this case reads as follows:

"Upon any indictment for embezzlement, it is a sufficient defense that the property was appropriated openly and avowedly, and under a claim of title preferred in good faith, even though such claim is untenable. * * *"

[2, 3] Appellant's contention is based upon the theory that, inasmuch as he testified that the transaction wherein he secured the $1,500 from the complaining witness was a loan, or that he believed it was a loan, even though mistaken as to the legal effect of the transaction, such asserted circumstances bring him within the provisions of the section of the Penal Code above quoted. The question as to whether or not the defendant appropriated the money "openly and avowedly, and under a claim of title preferred in good faith" was one for the jury, and there can be no doubt but that there is sufficient evidence in the record to justify the inference which must have been drawn by the jury that the defendant did not appropriate the $1,500 in question "openly and avowedly, and under a claim of title preferred in good faith."

[4] Appellant urges also misconduct on the part of the district attorney as being prejudicial to his interests and of such a character as to justify a reversal of the judgment. It is contended that the district attorney's questioning of the defendant while on the stand, as to the specific use made by him of the money received from the complaining witness, resulted in the testimony that the defendant had used $600 of this money to take up a check he had issued to the Alexandria Hotel. It is urged that, in pursuing this line of questioning, the defendant was forced to admit that he had committed some other crime. In discussing one of the previous points made by the appellant, we have indicated that we do not believe the record justifies such a deduction, and hence, if the line of questioning was proper, as we have held, there could have been no misconduct on the part of the district attorney in asking the questions referred to.

[5] During a discussion between counsel and the court as to the relevancy of certain evidence which the district attorney was endeavoring to elicit from the defendant on cross-examination, the district attorney used the following language:

"If I can establish he had no source of income at that time, that he was simply living by virtue of his wits, I think the jury has a right to know that."

Appellant's counsel objected to the use of the clause, "simply living by virtue of his wits," and requested the court to instruct the jury to disregard the same. The use of this language and the failure of the court to give a specific instruction is assigned as prejudicial error. The phrase in question is subject to various interpretations; but, assuming that it was intended by the district attorney and interpreted by the jury as meaning that the defendant was making his living by obtaining money improperly from other persons, this was the very crux of the case on trial, and in the argument upon any point raised as to the competency or relevancy of the evidence it could not be said to be improper if the district attorney frankly states his reason why certain evidence should be admitted. There is nothing in the record which discloses that the remark was not pertinent to the question under discussion, or that it was made in other than a fair manner of argument; and, as we have already held, the inquiry, as well as the evidence resulting from the line of questioning, was proper.

[6] Appellant also urges that error was committed by the court in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions requested by the defendant. These instructions simply elaborated in some detail the general principle set forth in other instructions covering the subject of reasonable doubt and the duty of the jury in weighing and considering the evidence. Such amplification is not necessary, and failure to give the requested instructions is not error.

The last point urged for a reversal arises out of three instructions given by the court, dealing with the subjects of grand larceny, obtaining money under false pretenses, and embezzlement. These instructions give the definition of each of the crimes noted, and lay down the rules to be applied by the jury in distinguishing between the several crimes. Counsel for appellant suggests that "the difference between the three offenses should have been clearly stated without confusion. * * *" The instructions under criticism unquestionably state the law on the subjects involved. That some confusion may have arisen in the minds of the jurors in attempting to understand and apply the rules laid down in these instructions is quite possible. In fact, briefs filed in this court by eminent counsel would indicate that members of the bar frequently have difficulty in noting the demarcation between grand larceny, obtaining money under false pretenses, and embezzlement, and that confusion in dealing with these subjects is not limited to the lay mind. In the instant case a careful examination of the evidence leads us to suggest that the jury showed unusual discernment in applying the rules laid down by the court's instructions in arriving at its verdict, for each essential element in the crime of embezzlement has abundant evidence in the record to support it.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment and the order of the court denying appellant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 1170(5)—Errors in exclusion of testimony bearing on counts on which accused was not convicted held not prejudicial.

Any errors in excluding evidence bearing solely on three counts on which defendant was not convicted held not prejudicial on appeal from conviction on fourth count.

2. Larceny $\S$ 3(2)—One obtaining money by fraudulent representations as to intended use with intent to convert it, and who does convert it, guilty of larceny.

A person obtaining possession of money or property on a representation as to its use which is false, and made with fraudulent intent of obtaining the money or property and converting it to his personal use, which he does, is guilty of larceny.

3. Larceny $\S$ 57—Evidence sufficient to justify conviction.

Where accused obtained check from complaining witness, giving in exchange check for $3,300, with request that complaining witness hold same until accused obtained certain moneys, when he would take it up, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for larceny, notwithstanding check given by accused was not presented to bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Frank Solomon was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Milton G. Gill, of Red Bluffs, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The grand jury of Los Angeles county returned an indictment charging Frank Solomon, appellant herein, in four counts, with the crime of obtaining money under false pretense, and also with the crime of grand larceny, in four counts. At the time of trial the district attorney dismissed the four counts charging obtaining money under false pretense, and presented the case to the jury on the four grand larceny counts, three of which alleged the taking of money from one Ralph Marcher, while the fourth, being count 8, alleged the taking of money from one Frederick A. Rose. As to the three Marcher counts, the jury failed to agree, but did return a verdict of guilty upon the Rose count. From the judgment of the court on the verdict of guilty, and the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

Appellant urges a reversal of the judgment upon two grounds: First, that the court erred in sustaining the objection of the district attorney to certain questions propounded in cross-examination to one Frank Clayton, who was a witness on behalf of the prosecution; and, second, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment of conviction of grand larceny.

[1] As to the first point, an examination of the transcript discloses that the witness Frank Clayton had testified on direct examination to an alleged conversation between the defendant and the district attorney relating to the disposition made by the defendant of certain money he had obtained from Ralph Marcher and which alleged taking constituted the basis for the three counts of grand larceny upon which the trial jury had disagreed. Upon cross-examination by defendant's counsel, certain questions were asked, which were objected to by the district attorney upon the ground that the questions were not proper cross-examination. It is not necessary to enter into a detailed consideration of the appellant's contention on this point, because, if any error was committed by the trial court in sustaining the district attorney's objection, such error could not have operated in any way to the prejudice of the defendant, for the reason that the subject-matter of the testimony related wholly and solely to counts other than the one upon which the defendant was found guilty; hence the point raised would have no bearing upon the merits of this appeal.

[2, 3] In support of his second point appellant urges that, while the evidence might support a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, it falls far short of the requirements necessary to support the crime of grand larceny. A consideration of this point requires a brief summary of such evidence as the record discloses may be regarded as supporting the verdict. (It may be noted at this point that the record shows a conflict in the testimony.) The complaining witness,

Frederick A. Rose, had been acquainted with the defendant for some time, during which period the defendant had been engaged as a salesman for a concern selling typewriting supplies. Early in July, 1924, the defendant approached the complaining witness, stating to him that he (the defendant) had an opportunity to purchase a large bankrupt stock of carbon paper and typewriting supplies at a very low figure, which, if obtained, he could sell at a good profit; that, anticipating that he would be able to obtain this stock, he had negotiated for the sale of a portion of it, and in support of this statement he displayed to the complaining witness a check for $18,000, signed by one Lilah Holliser, and which check the defendant represented was an advance payment on account of a sale to Lilah Holliser; that he could not cash this check until he had secured the stock of goods and delivered the portion he had contracted to sell to Lilah Holliser. Defendant further stated that he did not have sufficient funds to make the purchase, and stated to the complaining witness that, if he would furnish him with the sum of $3,000, to be used by him (the defendant) in the purchase of these goods, he (the defendant) would repay the sum of $3,000, with a bonus of $300, in ten days or two weeks, which was the time he suggested would be required in turning over the stock and cashing the $18,000 check.

The complaining witness further testified that, believing and relying upon these statements of the defendant, he gave him a check for $3,000, which was cashed by the defendant. At the time of the delivery of this check, the defendant wrote out a check, payable to the complaining witness, for the sum of $3,300, being the principal advanced, with the promised bonus. This check the defendant requested the complaining witness to hold until the stock had been purchased and turned, and the $18,000 check of Lilah Holliser, which had been exhibited to the complaining witness, could be cashed. After the expiration of the ten-day period, when the complaining witness requested the defendant to take up his check as he had promised, the defendant represented to the complaining witness that Lilah Holliser had written him a letter from San Diego requesting him (the defendant) not to present her check for payment, as she had been unable to accomplish the sale of the goods she had purchased from him, and in payment for which she had given him this check. On one occasion, when the complaining witness requested payment of the check, the defendant exhibited a telegram which he claimed to have received from Lilah Holliser, requesting him (the defendant) not to cash the check because she had been unable to dispose of the goods; and defendant advised the complaining witness that he had suggested to the said Lilah Holliser that she ship the goods to some other point, where she might more readily accomplish the sale.

Lilah Holliser was placed on the stand as a witness for the prosecution, and while her testimony is not direct, and in some respects somewhat conflicting—apparently due to the fact that she was an unwilling witness—she does state that she did sign the $18,000 check in question, and which was exhibited to the complaining witness, at the urgent request of the defendant. She stated that the defendant had for some time been selling typewriting supplies to her, she being a public stenographer, and that on this particular occasion the defendant came to her and represented to her that it was necessary for him to make some showing to his creditors, in order to obtain credit or an extension of time within which to pay some obligation he owed; that, if she would sign this check for $18,000, he could display it to his creditors, and thereby obtain the desired credit or extension of time; that he would in a very short time return the check to her, after it had accomplished its purpose; that she did not owe the defendant the sum of $18,000, or any sum, except perchance a small current bill for typewriting supplies purchased by her for use in her business as a public stenographer; that she did not have the sum of $18,000, or any amount approximating that sum, on deposit in her bank; that when she signed the check in question it was not the intention on her part, nor was it represented that there was any intention on the defendant's part, that it would be cashed, or that any sum of money whatever would be paid the defendant on account of the check; that she had not purchased any portion of a bankrupt stock of carbon paper and typewriting supplies from the defendant for the purpose of resale, nor did she go to San Diego for the purpose of selling any typewriting supplies there, nor did she have any typewriting supplies in San Diego for the purpose of sale; that at the urgent request of the defendant she did write a letter, in which she stated that she owed him the amount of the check which she had signed, and she expected to pay it, but that the letter in question was obtained from her by the defendant upon the representation that it would help him out; that the defendant had promised to return this letter to her.

The jury, in construing the foregoing testimony, interpreted in the light most favorable to the defendant, could hardly have concluded other than that the defendant, in obtaining the check for $3,000 from the complaining witness, practiced a gross fraud upon him. Nor do we discern anything in appellant's brief that attempts to deny that there is abundant evidence in the record to support the charge of fraud. The emphasis made by the appellant upon the testimony is that the evidence in the record does not furnish the foundation necessary to constitute grand larceny, namely, that the complaining witness did not part with the title to the

The rule is well established that, where one person obtains possession of money or property from another upon the representation that it is to be used for a certain purpose, or paid to a particular person, which representation is false, and made with fraudulent intent, title to such property or money remains in the giver, even though possession passes to the defendant; and if, at the time of obtaining such money or property, the defendant harbors the secret purpose of converting the same to his personal use, and did so convert the money or property to his personal use, and not for the purposes represented, he is guilty of larceny. The fraud in the transaction supplies the trespass necessary in larceny. This question, arising out of circumstances similar to those in the instant case, has had such full and careful consideration by this court, as well as the Supreme Court of this state, that we feel a reference to the cases wherein this question has been carefully considered will meet all the requirements of the present case. People v. Tomlinson, 102 Cal. 19, 36 P. 506; People v. Shwartz, 43 Cal. App. 696, 185 P. 686; People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, 81 P. 131; People v. Edwards (Cal. App.) 236 P. 944. The opinion in the last cited case, written by Mr. Justice Finlayson, contains such a thorough and clear dissertation upon this question that we commend it as embodying all that we might say upon the subject.

There is abundant evidence in the record to justify the finding of the jury necessarily involved in the verdict, that the defendant obtained the $3,000 from the complaining witness by fraudulent representations, and that at the time he obtained the check the defendant had no intention of using the money for the purposes referred to, but in fact at that time had in mind the intention to convert it to his own personal use. All of the essential elements necessary to support the charge of larceny are readily discerned in this case.

The defendant urges that, inasmuch as the complaining witness had never presented the $3,300 check which he received from the defendant to the bank for payment, the evidence lacks the essential element of showing that the complaining witness was defrauded of his money; in other words, that there was no evidence in the record showing that the check was not good for $3,300 and would not have been paid, had the same been presented to the bank, and that manifestly, if the check was paid, the complaining witness was not in any sense defrauded, and hence there could be no grand larceny.

The complaining witness testified—and on this point there is no conflict in the record—that when he received the $3,300 check from the defendant he was requested by the defendant to hold the check until he (the deendant) could cash the $18,000 check of Lilah Holliser, at which time the defendant would personally take up his check from the complaining witness. Under these circumstances there was no obligation on the part of the complaining witness to present the check to the bank for payment; nor had he any reason to believe that the bank would pay the check, if presented. The contract was definitely and distinctly that the defendant would take up the check.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court, and the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial, are affirmed.

Issuing publications calculated to prejudice or prevent fair and impartial action in cause pending, including those seeking to influence judicial action by threats or other intimidation, which reflect on court, counsel, parties, or wit-

6. Contempt ☞9—Publication may constitute contempt, whether true or false.

Sufficiency of evidence presented to sustain charge of contempt of court cannot be reviewed on habeas corpus.

Application by Alfred Lindsley for writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Humboldt County, to secure his release from custody on a commitment for contempt of court. Writ denied.

Metzler & Mitchell, of Eureka, and V. A. McGeorge, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

FINCH, P. J. [1] This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt of court and sentenced to pay a fine, or, in default of the payment thereof, to be imprisoned in the county jail. He is now so imprisoned. The petitioner alleges that the affidavit upon which the proceeding for contempt is based is insufficient, and that no proof of the facts stated in the affidavit was produced at the hearing. It appears from the affidavit that an action against the petitioner for criminal libel was pending in the superior court of Humboldt county; that the cause had been set to be tried on the 26th day of October, 1925; that the names of 60 persons had been drawn from the trial jury box from which to impanel a jury to try the cause; that the petitioner is the editor of a newspaper, published and circulated in the city of Eureka and county of Humboldt, and having a large number of subscribers in that county; that, after the drawing of said names from the jury box, in four separate issues of said newspaper, the petitioner published therein certain statements, which are set out at length, attacking the district attorney of the county and impugning his motives in respect to his prosecution of said criminal action, and reflecting upon the character and veracity of the prosecuting witness therein, for the purpose and with the intent of influencing the jurors who had been so drawn and of influencing witnesses against testifying for the prosecution and of interfering with the administration of justice. Among other things, the published statements referred to the prosecuting witness as "a former admitted stool pigeon, and the man who made a perjured expense bill against the county, later stolen from the supervisors' files." Since jurisdiction is the only question which can be considered on habeas corpus in a case of this character, the allegations of the affidavit must be taken as true, and it must be presumed that the publications were made for the purpose of influencing the conduct of the jurors and the testimony of the witnesses in the trial about to be had.

[2-7] The purpose of a contempt proceeding is not that of punishing a person for the mere publication of libelous statements against witnesses or officers of the court or the judge thereof. The laws relating to libel are enacted for the accomplishment of that purpose. The only legitimate purpose of a contempt proceeding, in a case such as this, is to punish for the improper interference with the orderly administration of justice in the trial of a case in court and the decision thereof.

"Liberty of the press, as guaranteed by the Constitution, does not permit publications respecting pending causes which are reasonably calculated to interfere with the due administration of justice. Hence the rule is now firmly settled that it is contempt to issue publications which are calculated to prejudice or prevent fair and impartial action in a cause of judicial investigation then pending, including those which seek to influence judicial action by threats or other form of intimidation, which reflect on the court, counsel, parties, or witnesses, respecting the cause, or which tend to corrupt or to embarrass the due administration of justice. * * * To constitute contempt, the publication need not be made in the place where the court is held; circulation in and about such place is sufficient. Neither is it necessary to show that they were read by the jurors or by those whose conduct was sought to be influenced by them, nor that the court was affected by the publication. According to the weight of authority, the publication may constitute contempt, whether it is true or false. * * * Publications concerning a trial thereafter to be had may constitute contempt." 13 C. J. 34.

The facts alleged in the affidavit upon which the proceeding for contempt is based are clearly sufficient to show willful contempt within the foregoing rule:

"The sufficiency of the evidence presented to sustain the charge upon which the prisoner is held * * * cannot be reviewed on habeas corpus." 29 C. J. 46; In re Jacobs, 175 Cal. 661, 166 P. 801.

The application is denied.

PEOPLE v. BURNS. (Cr. 1248.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 3, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ☞1186(4)—Sufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, based on information, defective to extent it does not charge crime does not entitle state to affirmance.

The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict, based upon an information, so defective that no crime is charged, does not entitle state to affirmance, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, especially where defendant at the trial continually urges the objections constituting the defect in the information.

2. Indictment and information ☞96—Is fatally defective, if it does not state all facts or circumstances contained in definition of offense.

Indictment and information is fatally defective, if it does not state all facts or circumstances contained in definition of offense.

3. Statutes ☞206—Effect must be given, if possible, to every word, clause, and sentence of statute defining offense.

Effect must be given, if possible, to every word, clause, and sentence of statute defining offense, and no part or word can be ignored, discarded, treated as meaningless, or denied purpose and effect in the absence of irreconcilable contradiction and repugnance.

4. Criminal law ☞1186(4)—Information for pandering, not stating offense, held miscarriage of justice, not to be disregarded on appeal.

Information for pandering, under Act Feb. 8, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 9), which failed to charge means designated in statute, held to evidence a miscarriage of justice, which could not be disregarded on appeal, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

5. Prostitution ☞3—Information, not charging means designated by statute, held bad.

Information, charging that defendant induced, persuaded, and encouraged a female to become an inmate of a house of prostitution, and likewise charging persuasion to remain in such house, held fatally defective for failure to charge that defendant employed any of the means designated in the statute such as promise, threat, violence, or some device or scheme, etc., thereby inducing such female to become an inmate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Clara Burns was convicted of pandering, and she appeals. Reversed.

Anderson & Anderson, John L. Richardson, and T. E. Parke, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. By an information containing two counts defendant was charged with the crime of pandering, as defined in the Act of February 8, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 9). A verdict of guilty upon each count was returned by the jury, and defendant now appeals from the judgments entered thereon and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The statute enumerates several separate, definite, and distinct acts, the commission of any one of which constitutes a specific offense, although each offense separately defined by the statute is included within the generic crime of pandering. By the information filed in the court below an attempt was made to charge defendant with the violation of two distinct provisions of the statute, each of which defines a specific offense. The first of these two provisions reads as follows:

"Any person * * * who, by promises, threats, violence, or by any device or scheme, shall cause, induce, persuade or encourage a female person to become an inmate of a house of prostitution * * * shall be guilty of a felony, to wit: pandering."

The second provision under which it was attempted to charge defendant reads:

"Any person * * * who, by promises, threats, violence or by any device or scheme, cause, induce, persuade or encourage an inmate of a house of prostitution or any other place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed to remain therein as such inmate * * * shall be guilty of a felony, to wit: pandering." (Italics ours.)

Appellant contends that in order to constitute an offense under either of these provisions it is imperative that the inmate shall have been caused, induced, persuaded, or encouraged to become or to remain an inmate by means of some "promise," or "threat," or "violence," or "device," or "scheme." The information under which she was convicted omits all mention of any promise, threat, violence, device, or scheme used by her as a means whereby she was enabled to cause, induce, persuade, or encourage the female to become and remain an inmate. The charging part of the first count is as follows:

"That the said Clara Burns on or about the 19th day of June, 1924, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously cause, induce, persuade, and encourage one Alice Jacobs, a female person, to become an inmate of a house of prostitution, and to become an inmate of a place in which and where prostitution was encouraged, allowed, and practiced."

The charging part of the second count is like unto that of the first, except that it charges defendant with causing, inducing, persuading, and encouraging the inmate "to remain" in the house of prostitution.

Appellant urges here, as she did in the lower court, that neither count of the information states a public offense, for the reason that it wholly fails to charge that the female was caused, induced, persuaded, or encouraged to become or to remain an inmate by the use of any of the means mentioned in the statute, i. e., by "promises, threats, violence or by any device or scheme." Appellant vigorously urged her objection at each and every proper stage of the proceedings in the court below. She presented it by demurrer and likewise by a motion in arrest of judgment; and she requested an instruction to the effect that, to justify a verdict of guilty, the jurors must believe beyond a reasonable doubt "that the defendant, by use of, or by means of, some promise, or threat, or violence, or by any device or scheme, or any one of them, did thereby cause, or induce, or persuade, or encourage" the female to become or to remain an inmate of the house in question. The demurrer, the motion in arrest of judgment, and the requested instruction were without avail; for the learned trial judge, assuming that the facts alleged in each count were alone sufficient to state the offense denounced by the particular provision of the statute under which appellant was charged, overruled the demurrer, denied the motion in arrest of judgment, and refused to give the proffered instruction. Indeed, the district attorney, with the concurrence of the learned trial judge, presented the case for the people upon the theory that it was not necessary to show that appellant made any promise, or used any threat, or violence, or device, or scheme, as a means to enable her to cause, induce, persuade, or encourage the female to become or to remain an inmate of the house. And the evidence fails to show that any promise was made, or that any threat, or violence, or device, or scheme was used by appellant as a means to enable her to cause, induce, persuade, or encourage the female to become or to remain such inmate.

[1] It follows from the foregoing that if, as appellant claims, it was necessary to allege and to prove that she did make some promise, or that she did use some threat, violence, device, or scheme, then there has been a "miscarriage of justice" within the meaning of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, and that provision of our organic law may not be employed, like a broad mantle of charity, to cloak the error. If the making of a promise, or the use of a threat, violence, device, or scheme has been made by the statute an essential ingredient of each of the two specific offenses with which it was attempted to charge appellant, then the defect in the information is not one of mere form, but, as there was a failure to state one of the constituent elements of the offense, it is a defect of substance. And, if it be a defect of that character, then appellant would be entitled to a reversal, even if the proof had shown the existence of some one of the essential facts omitted from the information. In People v. Salisbury, 59 Cal.

App. 299, the court, on page 301 (210 P. 642, 643), says:

"The fact that the evidence would have sustained the verdict if the information had described the commission, by defendant, of a criminal offense, does not entitle the state to an affirmance when the information is so defective that no crime was charged, and particularly when, as in this case, the objections made by the defendant were continually urged upon the attention of the court. Under such circumstances, section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution does not apply to the case."

[2, 3] Is the making of a promise, or the use of a threat, or of violence, or of some device, or scheme, a necessary and essential element of each of the two offenses defined in the above-quoted provisions of the statute? If it is, then there can be no doubt as to the necessity for alleging such promise, or such threat, violence, device, or scheme; for it is an elementary rule of criminal pleading, needing no citation of authority to substantiate it, that an indictment or information is fatally defective if it does not state all the facts or circumstances contained in the definition of the offense. Equally elementary is the uniformly recognized canon of statutory construction that effect must be given, if possible, to every word, clause, and sentence of the statute defining the offense, and that no part or word can be ignored, discarded, treated as meaningless, or denied purpose and effect, unless there be irreconcilable contradiction and repugnance.

[4] If effect be given to every word which the Legislature has employed in its definitions of the two specific offenses with which it was sought to charge appellant—and it is manifest that some effect can be, and therefore must be, given to every word in those definitions—then it necessarily follows that it has not been made a crime merely to cause, or to induce, or to persuade, or to encourage a female to become or to remain an inmate of a house of prostitution, but that an additional fact has been made a prerequisite, namely, some one or more of the means named in the statute, i. e., a promise, threat, violence, or some device or scheme whereby the female was thus caused, induced, persuaded, or encouraged to become or to remain such inmate. A mere persuasive argument addressed to the female for the purpose of inducing her to become or to remain an inmate, but which is wholly dissociated from any promise, threat, violence, device, or scheme to make it an effective argument, is, of course, a most heinous infraction of the moral code; but by neither of the statutory provisions under which this information was drawn has the Legislature seen fit to make inducement of that character a crime. The courts can go no further than the Legislature has gone, and their duty is to see that punishment is confined to the particular species of immoral conduct intended to be suppressed by the lawmaking body. Appellant's acts were grossly immoral and were flagrantly violative of the divine law; but the question for dispassionate judicial consideration is whether in what she did she was guilty of either of the offenses denounced by those particular parts of the statute under which she is being prosecuted. Says the Supreme Court of Utah in State v. Topham, 41 Utah, 39, 123 P. 888:

"The Constitution and the statute prescribe the rules by which the sufficiency of an information may be determined, and they apply to all alike. They do not prescribe one rule for a keeper or director of a house of prostitution and another for a nun, nor one rule for one offense and another for another offense."

So far as we are advised, the question here under consideration has never been directly presented to, or definitely decided by, any of the appellate courts of this state. But our conclusion that it was necessary to allege and to prove that some promise, threat, violence, device, or scheme was the means whereby appellant caused, induced, persuaded, or encouraged the female to become or to remain an inmate is in line with well-considered decisions by the highest courts of sister states. For example, the Supreme Court of Utah, in State v. Topham, supra, having under consideration an information drawn under certain statutory provisions of that state which are practically the same as ours, said that it not only is necessary to allege that the accused used some promise, threat, device, or scheme, but that it is necessary to go further and to allege the facts and circumstances constituting the promise, device, etc.; the court there holding that a charge in the language of the act is not sufficient, even though it states the offense in the precise language of the statute. In the course of its opinion in that case the Utah court employs this language:

"What are here the essentials of the charged offense? The state urges to cause, induce, and encourage an inmate of a house of prostitution to remain therein as such inmate. That is one essential; but it is not all the essentials declared by the statute. It declares that 'any person who shall, by promises, threats, violence, or by any device or scheme,' cause, induce, etc., an inmate of such a house to remain therein, is guilty of an offense. The act or conduct of the person who shall, by a promise or threat or violence, or by a device or scheme, cause, induce, or encourage, etc., is a necessary 'act constituting the offense,' and is a 'particular circumstance of the offense to constitute a complete offense.' Without it no offense under the statute is committed."

And later in the opinion it is further said:

"It is not enough that the defendant made some kind of a promise to the inmate; it must also appear that the promise was made with the design or purpose of causing or inducing the inmate to remain in the alleged house of prostitution, and that it was one fairly calculated or naturally tending to produce such a result, and that the inmate in fact did so remain, not as evidenced by a state of mind expressed on the witness stand, but as evidenced by some act or conduct on her part, or by something said or done by her, showing, or tending to show, that she acted on, or was induced or influenced by, the promise, and by reason thereof remained in the house of prostitution."

The Oklahoma Criminal Court of Appeals, having before it a similar question, employed this language:

"The gist of this offense is not that a woman is in a house of prostitution, but that she has been procured or induced by some of the means named in the statute to enter or remain in a house of prostitution. Hence a state of facts must be pleaded that will show that the person charged did, in reality, by some one or more of the means named in the statute, procure or induce the female to enter or remain in such house." Abrams v. State, 13 Okl. Cr. 11, 161 P. 331. (Italics ours.)

It is not necessary to consider whether in this jurisdiction a charge in the language of the statute would be held sufficient. That question is not before us. This is not a case where the information insufficiently alleges an essential ingredient of the offense. Here there is a total failure to charge one of the essentials of the offense, even in the language of the statute.

The judgments and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

MURPHY v. MURRAY, Acting Chief of Police, et al. (Civ. 5252.)

1. Death ☞21—Officer making arrest not acting in self-defense.

Rule that, where person attacked may use only such force as is necessary to protect himself, does not apply to peace officer seeking to arrest one charged with crime, as he does not then act in self-defense but in defense of the state.

2. Assault and battery ☞10—Liability of peace officer in arresting without warrant depends on whether he acted in good faith and had reasonable grounds to believe person committed felony.

Where peace officer, under Pen. Code, § 836, makes an arrest without a warrant of one who proves not to have committed felony, or where officer injures person in attempting to make such arrest, his liability for damages depends on question whether he acted in good faith and had reasonable grounds to believe that person committed felony.

3. Appeal and error ☞842(1)—Whether peace officer had reasonable grounds to believe that party he attempted to arrest committed felony is a question of law for appellate court.

Whether peace officer had reasonable or probable cause for believing that party whom he attempted to arrest had in fact committed a felony is a question of law for appellate court, which is not bound by conclusion of trial judge.

4. Death ☞21—"Reasonable cause" for arrest without warrant "probable cause."

Provision of Pen. Code, § 836, that peace officer may arrest without warrant when he has "reasonable cause" to believe that person has committed a felony, is same as requirement of "probable cause," defined as a suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant reasonable man in belief that charge is true.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Probable Cause; Reasonable Cause.]

5. Death ☞75—Evidence held to show arresting officer had reasonable cause to believe deceased committed felony.

Evidence held to show that peace officer had reasonable or probable cause to believe that deceased had in fact committed a felony, that he acted in good faith, under honest belief that deceased committed felony and was endeavoring to resist arrest, and that officer shot only to intimidate deceased, so that officer was not liable in damages for death of deceased, caused by one of his shots.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by Joe Murphy against A. W. Murray, Acting Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles, and B. C. Croft. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Croft appeals. Reversed.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Chas. B. MacCoy, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles (Philip C. Sterry, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Martin Forrest and W. R. Rutherford, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the defendant Murray as acting chief of police of the city of Los Angeles, and the defendant Croft as a member of the police department of that city, for damages for the death of his son, caused by the defendant Croft while attempting to arrest the son. Judgment went in favor of the defendant Murray and in favor of the plaintiff as against the defendant Croft in the sum of $2,600. The defendant Croft has appealed from the judgment upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The facts of the case are that, about 10:57 p. m. of the night of October 30, 1920, Officer Croft reported by telephone to the central police station and he was informed that a burglary had been committed at the home of a Mr. Eaton, and was directed to go over there as quickly as possible. He picked up another member of the police department, Officer Bligh, and on the way to the place of the burglary they picked up a Mr. Kloepfel, asking him to direct them to the house they were seeking. When these three parties arrived at the Eaton home, they immediately called Mr. Eaton out and he then informed them that his house had just been robbed. While Officer Croft was questioning him further as to the result of the burglary, Mr. Kloepfel called to him that two fellows were running away from the rear of the house. These four parties immediately started in pursuit; Croft running around the south side of the house, and Bligh running around the other. The men pursued were at first about 75 feet in advance of Croft and were continually gaining as they ran. They separated in their course, and when about 100 feet apart Croft called upon them to stop, that he was an officer, and that he would shoot. They continued to run, and Croft fired three shots in the air. Nelson, the companion of young Murphy, then stopped and threw up his hands, whereupon Croft called to him, asking him if he knew the other fellow who ran down the hill, referring to young Murphy, who continued on his course down the ravine and into a grove of trees. Nelson denied that he knew him, and Croft then called to him, asking if he knew where he lived. Nelson again answered, "No," and then he called to Murphy, who was then concealed in the grove of trees at a point about 250 feet from where the officer stood, demanding that he come out, and threatening him that if he did not he would shoot. After waiting a minute or two, and believing that Murphy was getting into a position to shoot at him, he fired once into the grove for the purpose, as he said, "to intimidate the fellow and make him come out." At that time Officer Bligh joined Croft, and the two went into the grove and found that Murphy had been mortally wounded. The night in question was the night commonly called Hallowe'en, and Nelson and Murphy afterward proved to be boys of about 16 years of age who were engaged in Hallowe'en pranks. They had previously approached the Eaton home from the rear and entered the back porch, after Murphy had cut the screen to unlock the door, and had there turned off the electric current, leaving the house in darkness. The Eatons were having a party at the time and some of the men of the party soon succeeded in turning the lights on again. About 10 minutes later the boys approached the rear of the house again, for the purpose, as stated by Nelson, of entering the back porch and again turning off the current. It was at this time that they were surprised by the police officers and attempted to flee from the premises. They were both about 6 feet in height and weighed about 150 or 155 pounds; in the darkness giving the appearance to the police officers of being adult men.

[1] The theory of respondent's case as maintained in the trial below and on this appeal is expressed in that portion of his brief which reads:

"The rule of law applicable, we contend, is no different than it would be where a person is attacked by another, he may use only such force as would be necessary to protect himself from his assailant's attack."

The error of this position is that, when a police officer is seeking to arrest one charged with crime he is not acting in self-defense, but in defense of the state. The law requires him to make arrests under certain circumstances, and, if he merely assumes the position of a private citizen protecting himself against harm, he is neglectful of the duty imposed upon him and is open to censure therefor. The authority of the police officer to arrest without a warrant is fixed by section 836 of the Penal Code as follows:

"3. When a felony has in fact been committed, and he has reasonable cause for believing the person arrested to have committed it. * * * At night, when there is reasonable cause to believe that he has committed a felony."

[2,3] When a peace officer, acting under this authority, makes an arrest of one who afterward proves not to have committed a felony or when in attempting to make such an arrest he causes injury to the party arrested, his liability for damages therefor depends upon the question whether he acted in good faith and had reasonable grounds for believing that the person did commit the felony. The rule applicable here is found in 11 R. C. L. 801, where it is said:

"But since in such a case the person to be arrested is not specifically indicated by a written warrant, and the officer must necessarily act on his own reasonable judgment and often in haste to prevent the escape of the criminal, he is protected if he acts in good faith and on reasonable grounds of suspicion, though the person arrested proves not to have been the felon, or no felony was in fact committed."

This being the issue which arises in all cases of this nature, the primary question to be determined is whether the peace officer had reasonable or probable cause for believing that the party whom he attempted to arrest had in fact committed a felony. This the court must determine as a matter of law, and the appellate court is not bound by the conclusion of the trial judge on that issue. Michel v. Smith, 188 Cal. 199, 205, 205 P. 113. In the case just cited a rule of guidance for the trial courts was laid down where the Supreme Court say:

"Whether there is probable cause for making an arrest depends upon all the circumstances of each case, including delay which might enable the guilty person to escape, the nature of the information, the character of the person at whose instance the alleged wrongful arrest is made, and the extent of possible inquiry as to facts and circumstances."

Reference should also be made to People v. Kilvington, 104 Cal. 86, 93, 37 P. 799, 801 (43 Am. St. Rep. 73), where the Supreme Court says:

"In considering this question of probable cause upon the part of the defendant to arrest the deceased, we are to look only at the facts and circumstances presented to him at the time he was required to act. The defendant did not recognize the deceased before he fired, and the fact that the latter was an innocent and respectable citizen, and who may have been fleeing from an assailant, cannot be allowed to affect the question we are now discussing." (Emphasis ours.)

[4] The latter case is closely analogous to the one under consideration. The defendant in that case was a police officer of the city of San Jose and was tried and convicted of murder. While in the performance of his duty, he heard some one cry "stop thief," and observed two men, one in advance of the other, running down the street. The officer ordered the men to stop and threatened to shoot. The order was not obeyed, and the officer fired, killing the pursued man, whom it was afterward shown had not committed any felony. The Supreme Court, in reversing the conviction, pointed out that it was not only the right but the duty of the police officer to arrest any person in the nighttime when he had reasonable ground to believe that such person had committed a felony, and held that the trial court should have instructed the jury that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe at the time of the killing that the deceased had committed a felony. In People v. Adams, 85 Cal. 231, 24 P. 629, the Supreme Court approved an instruction given to the jury to the effect that a peace officer making an arrest has the right to use all the force which from the surrounding circumstances seems to him as a reasonable man necessary, and that, where the offense charged is a felony, he has a right, if apparently necessary to a reasonable man, to kill the person whom he is seeking to arrest. In People v. Matthews, 6 Cal. Unrep. 341, 58 P. 371, the Supreme Court approved an instruction to the effect that, if the defendant, a peace officer, had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that the deceased had committed a felony and had fired the fatal shot, intending to shoot over the head of the deceased, the jury should find the defendant not guilty, if they believed that such act on the part of the defendant was necessary for the purpose of effecting an arrest. The term "reasonable cause" as used in the Penal Code expresses the same thought as the term "probable cause" as used in the decisions cited. "Probable cause" is defined in Michel v. Smith, supra, page 205 (205 P. 116), "as a suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the charge is true."

[5] In view of these authorities, we must approach the case as in the first instance to determine whether as a matter of law, under the facts and circumstances as they appear in the record the appellant had reasonable or probable cause for believing, at the time of the shooting, that young Murphy had in fact committed a burglary, and that it was necessary, in order to prevent his escape, to fire the shot into the grove of trees. In determining this question, the case is made more difficult because the findings on all material issues of the case are either directly contrary to all the competent evidence appearing in the record or are unsupported by any evidence of any nature.

The meat of the case appears in finding No. 6, wherein the court found that, about 10:57 p. m. on the night of October 30, Croft was informed by some one at the central police station that a burglary had been committed at 951 Micheltorena street, and that at some time after being informed, to wit, about one-half hour, Croft and Officer Bligh drove in an automobile to said address. Now the only evidence covering this portion of the finding is found in the testimony of Officer Bligh, who testified that as soon as he and Croft got the call they drove to the place of the burglary "just as though we were going to a fire," and in the testimony of Croft that they went over as quickly as possible. Inasmuch as the complaint alleged, and the trial court found to be true, that the shooting occurred at about 10:30 p. m. of that evening, the finding that these officers had delayed answering the call for a period of one-half hour is so inconsistent with the pleading and other finding that it must be disregarded. In the same finding the trial court found that it was not true that, when the officers arrived at the Eaton home, Eaton informed them "that his house had just been burglarized." The only evidence covering this portion of the finding is found in the testimony of Croft as follows:

"He said, 'My house has just been robbed,' and I said, 'What did they take?' and he said, 'They cleaned me out,' in a decided manner; and I asked him again, 'What did they take?' and he said, 'A hundred and fifty dollars' worth of silverware and my wife's jewelry and good clothes;'" —and from the testimony of the same witness that from Eaton's actions and the tone of his voice he was led to believe that the burglary had just occurred. The finding that Russel Murphy, the deceased, was not guilty of the crime of burglary or any misdemeanor is not supported by any evidence. An offer was made of the record in the juvenile court wherein Murphy's companion was tried and found not guilty of the burglary. In the record before us no proof was made that Murphy was not guilty of any crime or any misdemeanor. The finding that it was not true that, when Eaton informed Croft that a burglary had been committed, the latter commenced an investigation or that while in the course of such investigation some one called to Croft, "There they go," or words to that effect, is contrary to all the evidence. The only evidence on this subject is found in the testimony of Croft to the effect that he was questioning Eaton regarding the burglary when Kleopfel drew his attention to the two boys at the back of the house, and, pointing to them, "There is the two fellows running sneaking away right now;" and in the testimony of the witness Kleopfel to the same effect. The finding that when Croft started in pursuit of Murphy and Nelson he overtook Nelson is not supported by any evidence. The only testimony on the subject is that of Croft that, when Nelson stopped in obedience to the officer's command, they were then about 200 feet apart, and that Croft continued after Murphy while Mr. Eaton and Officer Bligh approached and put Nelson under arrest. The finding that Murphy, in obedience to the command of the officer, "attempted to come out of said grove," is unsupported by any evidence. The evidence is that, while Croft was at a distance of 250 feet from the grove, he called upon Murphy to come out and threatened to shoot, but that Murphy made no attempt to come out.

The real facts of the case as disclosed by the record are that Croft went to the place of the burglary with all possible speed, and, while investigating the charge, his attention was suddenly directed to these two boys who were running away from the rear of the house. The night was dark, and it was impossible for the officer to determine their ages. The fact that they were running in the darkness from the premises which had been burglarized and their refusal to heed the repeated commands to stop were sufficient to give the officer reasonable grounds to believe that they had participated in the felony. All the testimony goes to show that both officers were acting in good faith, that Croft honestly believed that the boys had participated in the felony and were endeavoring to escape into the darkness, and as to Murphy he believed that he was endeavoring to secure a favorable position in the grove of trees to resist the arrest, and that all the shots fired by Croft were fired into the air for the purpose of intimidating the boys and to bring them to a stop. There is therefore no evidence to support the conclusion that Croft did not have reasonable cause to believe that Murphy had committed the burglary, or that it was necessary, in order to arrest him, to fire the shot which caused his death. The case comes squarely within the rule of Michel v. Smith, supra, and is controlled by that decision.

Judgment reversed.

MCBRIDE v. CLARA BARTON HOSPITAL
(Civ. 5242.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 10, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 7, 1926.)

1. Hospitals ⇐8—Evidence held to make jury case imposing on defendant hospital burden of showing that plaintiff's nurses were not its agents.

In action for injuries to patient in defendant's hospital, plaintiff's evidence held to make out jury case, imposing on defendant burden of introducing evidence that nurses responsible were not defendant's agents, and that defendant was not negligent.

2. Hospitals ⇐8—Instructions relieving hospital from liability if injuries were caused by negligence of nurses not in its employ held properly refused.

In action against hospital for injuries to patient, where defendant failed to show that nurses responsible were not its agents, and that it was not negligent, instructions to find for defendant if injuries were caused solely by negligence of nurse not in its employ or under its control or supervision were properly refused.

3. Hospitals ⇐8—Contents of notices limiting hospital's liability for injuries to patient held properly excluded.

In absence of evidence that minor, suing hospital for injuries inflicted on him while patient, or his parents saw or read posted notices, or entered into contract limiting its liability, or any statute authorizing hospital to limit liability by posting notices, court properly excluded contents of such notices from evidence.

4. Hospitals ⇐8—Custom of hospitals as to employing special nurses from outside, etc., held inadmissible in action for injuries to patient.

In action against hospital for injuries to patient, evidence of custom in city as to hospitals employing special nurses called in from outside, controlling and supervising them, and collecting and paying them their compensation, held inadmissible.

5. Appeal and error ⇐237(2)—Defendant not asking for continuance or right to introduce evidence to meet testimony erroneously admitted in rebuttal cannot complain.

Defendant cannot complain of error in receiving in rebuttal testimony admissible in chief, where it did not ask for continuance because of surprise nor request privilege of introducing evidence to meet such testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by John William McBride, a minor, by Ethel M. McBride, his guardian ad litem, against the Clara Barton Hospital. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Dehm, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Carroll Allen, Lorrin Andrews, and Howard L. Grace, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff, a minor, commenced an action to recover damages for burns inflicted on his leg while a patient in the hospital operated by the defendant corporation. The defendant answered. A trial was had in the lower court before a jury. The jury brought in a verdict for $5,000. A judgment was entered for that sum, but on the presentation of a motion for a new trial the plaintiff consented to waive $2,000 of the verdict, and that the judgment be reduced to the sum of $3,000. Thereupon the motion for a new trial was denied, and the defendant has appealed, bringing up a bill of exceptions.

Mrs. McBride, the mother of the plaintiff, testified:

"That at the date of the trial the plaintiff was nine years of age; that in February, 1920, Mr. McBride and I were living at 1147 Benton Way, Los Angeles. We had but one child, Johnnie, and at that time there was nothing the matter with his health, except for his tonsils and his nose bothering him. I consulted Dr. Ruddy, who advised that there was a growth in the nose, and that it should be removed, and that his tonsils should be removed. The doctor advised me to go to the Clara Barton Hospital. Later I called the hospital on the telephone and engaged a private room. On Friday morning, February 6, 1920, we took the child to the hospital at about 7 a. m. When we arrived there we registered, and I stated that we wanted a special nurse detailed on the case. We were taken to a wardroom containing several beds, and when I stated that I had engaged a special room I was told that the hospital had none, and that the bed in the ward was the only vacant bed. The child was put to bed undressed. At that time he was perfectly conscious. About 8 o'clock attendants took him in a wheel chair, and the child was operated upon. While the child was absent from the room the witness remained in the wardroom and in the hall adjacent. A nurse in a blue drab uniform, with a white apron and cap (hospital uniform), came forward and made the bed and put a hot water bottle in the bed. I asked why that was done, and the nurse replied 'that it was necessary, when a patient is coming out of an anæsthetic, to have the bed warm.' There were very likely three hot water bottles put in. The nurse was a young girl. After she put the hot water bottles in the bed, she left, and I did not see her again. After the child was brought from the operating room and placed in bed I went into the room and remained there until about noon. During that time the child was unconscious. When I entered the room the second time there were present a nurse (Miss Woodward), dressed all in white, Mrs. McBride, and the doctor who had given the anæsthetic. Before that time I had not seen Miss Woodward. In reply to a question by me the nurse stated that she was to be the nurse on the case. I next saw John the next morning. The nurse told me 'that she was very sorry that John had been burned on hot water bottles; that she had shown the burn to the doctor and head nurse, and they had bandaged it up, and it would be all right in a few days.' The nurse was there when I arrived about 9 a. m. I had not hired any nurse. I did not do anything about a special nurse other than has been stated above. John was conscious, but I did not see his leg. He stayed in the hospital until the following Monday at noon. I was there every day, but did not see his leg at any time. No one offered to show it to me, and nothing else was said about it. On the Monday following the nurse, Miss Woodward, carried John out to the machine, and told the witness that she would be out the next day to dress the burns. The nurse came to the house the next day. Her coming was not at my request. She came about a month or six weeks after that to treat the burn."

On cross-examination the witness testified:

"I asked them to detail a nurse to me. I asked whoever was in the hospital. That was not over the telephone. That was when I went down there that morning. The nurse in white who was in the ward room when I went into the room after the operation was Miss Woodward, and she remained on the case and was the same individual who went to our house to dress the boy's leg. On one of those visits I asked Miss Woodward to have a doctor come to examine the burn. The boy's tonsils were healed, and he could eat and drink before he left the hospital. Dr. Sprague came to the house twice to treat the boy. The first visit was made within three weeks after the boy returned home. He unwrapped the wound, and dressed it, and gave the nurse instructions. About a week later he did the same thing. He did not return any more. We did not have any other doctor after that. The nurse came for a month or six weeks, a couple of times a week, then she did not come any more."

Marie Hodgdon, a witness called on behalf of the defendant, testified:

"In the month of February, 1920, I was employed as superintendent of nurses in the defendant's hospital, and was there when John McBride was received as a patient. At that time the defendant did not have any special nurses in the hospital. When any person wanted a special nurse we did not have any nurses employed by the hospital that would go on special duty. I had known Miss Woodward about a year and a half before that. She was a graduate nurse. She had never been employed in the hospital up to that time. She was not employed at the Clara Barton Hospital at that time. There was a request made in this case for a special nurse. I obtained Miss Woodward. My duties as superintendent of nurses are that I have charge of the student nurses in the hospital, in the training school. I did not have any control or supervision over special nurses who came into the hospital to take care of cases.

The special nurses report to the superintendent of nurses. Miss Woodward reported to the superintendent of nurses' office; that is my office. I mean when she first came she reported to the superintendent's office to see what room she is going to. After she has taken charge of the patient, she reports as to the condition of the patient to the doctor. After that I have no authority as superintendent of nurses to discharge her. I have authority to discharge the undergraduate nurses that are in the hospital right along. The custom in regard to preparing the bed for a patient who comes for an operation is that the bed is made with the blankets and hot water bottle put in to keep the bed warm, and those bottles are removed when the patient is put in. That is a custom of the hospital. I know the custom of the hospitals in this city. It is the duty of the nurse in charge of the case who receives the patient to take out the hot water bottle, whether one of our nurses or whether a special nurse—whatever is in charge of the room when the patient comes. No part of the money that was collected for the special nurse Miss Woodward was kept by the Clara Barton Hospital. Supervising nurses have charge of the floors—the head nurses. I have tried, but am unable, to locate Miss Woodward. I did not send her to the McBride home after the boy left the hospital. I did not know anything about her going until this case came up."

"Miss Woodward was not employed in the hospital before that time. After that time she was employed as a night nurse. She was so employed from May until July. After that I don't know what happened to her. She left of her own accord. She was not discharged. I don't know who put the hot water bottle in the bed. The uniform of the students in February, 1920, was blue with white aprons. If the case is on general it is the custom of these young girls to attend to the hot water bottle; that is, put it in and take it out—they carry the hot water bottle in and take it out under my supervision and order. It is not always the business of the nurse in the hospital to put the hot water bottle in the bed. They do sometimes. If the special nurse has not arrived when the operation is over that is done by the hospital nurse. They take it out if the case is on general. If the case is on special the special nurse looks after the patient entirely. These student nurses work in the hospital under my instructions. I do not know whether these hot water bottles were tested before they were put in the bed of little John McBride. The special nurse had arrived at the hospital when he was taken from the operating room. I know because she reported in. I know the boy had not been taken from the operating room when she reported, from the chart, from the record. I am just repeating what I understand from the record. I say that the special nurse came before the boy was removed to the ward room because of the chart. The chart reads, '9:45, from surgery; pulse good; respiration poor; doctor called and removed nasal pack.' That is in Miss Woodward's handwriting. The chart also reads, 'Friday 7:30, patient entered hospital, walked to room 114 to bed; ready for surgery; to surgery.' That is all in Miss Woodward's handwriting. The chart also reads, '4:50, blisters on leg.' Below it reads 'Doctor Ruddy notified,' and on the next line 'Blisters opened.' Below that '6:30, dressing applied to leg.' I don't know whether the portion of the chart 'from surgery' in Miss Woodward's hand means whether she first saw him when he came from surgery. A nurse is not supposed to make any entries excepting what she sees. I don't remember at this time whether I personally had any conversation with Mrs. McBride from the start to the finish of this matter. I don't remember whether I was the one that had the first conversation with her about the nurse or not. No student nurse had anything to do with the patient after he was brought into the room until after he was burned. My knowledge is from the chart. I cannot remember each individual case. When a special nurse goes on a case, our nurses have nothing to do with it because she has special charge of the case."

Dr. Barton, called as a witness for the defendant, testified:

"I am president and general manager of the Clara Barton Hospital in Los Angeles. In our hospital we do not have any special nurses. When a patient comes to our hospital and wants a special nurse it is the custom of the hospital to telephone outside—look in the nurses' directory. I don't think Miss Woodward was employed by our hospital in February, 1920, because those things are turned over to the superintendent of nurses, and I don't have personal knowledge. If she was a special nurse she was not employed by our hospital. We have no control of the special nurses at all. They report to the doctor in charge of the patient. He is not one of our doctors. Dr. Ruddy never was connected with the hospital in any way. I know what the custom is in regard to preparing the bed where a patient is undergoing an operation. The custom is that the bed is prepared with blankets, and the hot water bottle put in there, and, when the anesthetized patient is returned to the bed, the fixed rule of the hospital is to remove the hot water bottle. It is the duty of the nurse in charge of the patient at the time the patient is returned to take out the hot water bottle. When Miss Woodward went out to the house from time to time to change the dressing after the patient went home, that was not done under my direction nor the direction of the hospital. We did not pay her for any services rendered in that connection. Dr. Sprague, who went out there several times and dressed the wound, was not employed by us. He did not go out there under my direction. I never received any word from Mrs. McBride or from Miss Woodward that we should send a nurse or a doctor out there. I never heard of this matter after the patient left the hospital until suit was filed against us. It is the custom in our hospital when a special nurse is employed in a case that we collect a fee for them. The hospital gets no part of it. The hospital did not get any part of Miss Woodward's fee. We got money for the board of the nurse and for the room, but no money for her compensation. We collect for the nurse just for accommodation—that is the custom. We never paid Miss Woodward any more than the amount that was collected; the $15 shown by the bill. The hospital has no authority to discharge the special nurse who is employed. The doctor in charge of the patient—the doctor in charge of the case—or else the patient, has that authority.”

On cross-examination Dr. Barton testified further:

“We have a regular printed form of bill, ‘Hospital room,’ ‘Board of special nurse,’ ‘Special nurse’s fee,’ ‘Use of surgery,’ are printed on each bill as a matter of accommodation to save writing the words ‘Special nurse.’ We do not charge any board for regular nurses. We do not charge any board for our supervising nurse. I do not know when Miss Woodward came.”

Iva B. Lounsbury, called as a witness by the defendant, testified:

“I know the custom in the hospital in regard to employing and paying a special nurse. The hospital makes no charge nor takes any part of the pay of the special nurse. In this case the hospital received nothing except what is shown on the bill. In this case the hospital charged Mrs. McBride $23.70, which does not include $10 collected for Dr. Biddle for giving the anæsthetic, nor a fee for Miss Woodward. That is the hospital charge. I did not enter in our cash book the $15 for Miss Woodward or the $10 for Dr. Biddle.”

In rebuttal John W. McBride was called as a witness for the plaintiff. He testified:

“I am the father of the plaintiff. I was present at the operation. There was a regular hospital attendant in the surgery room when the operation was going on. Miss Woodward was not there. After I left the surgery room I accompanied the boy to his room. Miss Woodward was not there. A nurse put the boy to bed. She was dressed in regular probation nurse, blue and white, I guess. After the patient was in bed was the first time I saw Miss Woodward in the room. I saw her come in the room after the boy was placed in bed. The other nurse went on about her duties, I presume. This nurse stated that she had charge of the case.”

All of the evidence given by Mr. McBride was objected to as not being in rebuttal; nevertheless, it was admitted. No motion for a continuance was made, but, when the time arrived, the appellant cross-examined Mr. McBride. On cross-examination the witness testified:

“Mrs. McBride arranged with the hospital to supply the room with a special nurse. I don’t know when she told the hospital she wanted to get a special nurse. I was not present when my wife made arrangements about a special nurse. I was there all the time when the operation was going on in the operation room. I came down with the boy when he was wheeled in. The man that administered the anæsthetic and a hospital attendant also came down. By a hospital attendant I mean a girl that worked in the hospital—probation nurse I call them. I don’t know whether that is right or not. When the boy had been in bed Miss Woodward appeared and stated she was the special nurse.”

[1, 2] After the foregoing evidence had been received, the case was argued to the jury. Thereupon the court instructed the jury that—

“There is only one question for you to consider in this case, and that is the question of damages this boy is entitled to recover.”

Continuing, the court fully instructed the jury on the rules governing it in estimating damages. We do not understand that the appellant questions the correctness of any of the latter instructions. However, in connection with the first instruction which the trial court gave, appellant contends that the trial court erred in refusing to give Nos. V and VI of the instructions requested by the appellant. Those two instructions were worded as follows:

“V. You are instructed that, if the injuries claimed to have been sustained by the plaintiff, were caused solely by the fault, carelessness, or negligence, of a special nurse employed by the parent, or parents, of the said plaintiff, and that the said special nurse was not at the said time in the employ, nor under the control or supervision, of the defendant, then your verdict should be for the defendant.

“VI. You are instructed that a person, or corporation, is not liable for the negligence, or carelessness, of a person in an independent employment, over whom he, or it, exercises no control or supervision.”

In view of the evidence which we have recited above, we think it is quite clear indeed that the trial court committed no error in giving the instruction taking from the jury all issues excepting the amount of the damage. There was no legal evidence before the trial court that the first nurse (name not disclosed by the record) mentioned by Mrs. McBride, nor the nurse mentioned by Mr. McBride as the nurse that put the plaintiff in bed in contact with the hot water bottles (name of nurse also not disclosed), nor that Miss Woodward, the special nurse, and each of them, were not the agents of the defendant. The plaintiff made out a case for the jury. The law imposed on the defendant the burden of introducing evidence to show that said individuals, and especially the two last named, were not its agents, and that the defendant was not guilty of negligence. Meyer v. McNutt Hospital, 173 Cal. 156, 159 P. 436. It wholly failed to sustain that burden. There was no evidence before the court calling for the application of the rules stated in instruction No. V, or instruction No. VI, assuming, but not deciding, that such rules are correctly stated. All other requested instructions became immaterial in view of the first instructions given by the trial court.

[3] There was evidence that the appellant had posted in different places in its premises certain notices limiting its liability. There is no evidence that the plaintiff or his parents saw or read the notices or entered into any contract limiting the liability of the appellant. The appellant does not call to our attention any statute which authorizes a hospital to limit its liability by posting notices. The trial court did not err in refusing to admit the contents of the notices in evidence. Carter v. Service Co., 160 Iowa, 78, 90, 141 N. W. 26.

[4] During the trial the appellant sought to introduce in evidence what it claimed to be the custom obtaining in the city of Los Angeles in regard to hospitals employing special nurses called in from the outside, controlling and supervising such nurses, and collecting for and paying to such nurses their compensation. The trial court interrupted the proceeding, and suggested to the respondent that such evidence was inadmissible. Thereupon an objection was made, and the objection was sustained. The ruling was clearly correct. 6 Thompson on Negligence, § 7882.

[5] A point is made that the trial court erred in receiving as in rebuttal the testimony of Mr. McBride because his testimony should have been offered by the plaintiff as a part of his case in chief. The trial court did not err. If the appellant was taken by surprise, it could have asked for a continuance, or it could have asked the privilege of introducing any appropriate evidence to meet the evidence of Mr. McBride. Having failed to take either of those courses, the appellant may not complain. Nuckolls v. College of Physicians, etc., 7 Cal. App. 233, 94 P. 81.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

SECURITY COMMERCIAL & SAVINGS BANK OF SAN DIEGO v. SOUTHERN TRUST & COMMERCE BANK.
(Civ. 4012.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 28, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 24, 1925.)

1. Banks and banking §174—Drawee's negligence may preclude recovery for payment of forged check.

Where drawee bank seeks to recover money paid to a collecting bank on forged check, negligence of drawee may preclude recovery by it, unless collecting bank's negligence induced it to omit ordinary care in detecting forgery.

2. Banks and banking §147(2)—Drawee bank chargeable with knowledge of signature of drawer.

Drawee bank of negotiable instrument is chargeable with knowledge of signature of drawer, and if it pays upon forged signature it cannot recover against innocent payee, if such recovery would result in loss to payee.

3. Banks and banking §174—When drawee bank not liable for failure to detect forgery stated.

Where bank, without inquiry or identification of person presenting forged check, purchases it, indorses it generally, and presents to drawee bank, which pays it, latter may recover, if its only negligence is failure to detect forgery.

4. Banks and banking §174—Collecting bank not liable for payment of forged check honored by drawee.

Where bank receives check for collection only, and relying on fact that drawee bank has honored it disburses amount required by payee, the drawee cannot recover when it afterwards discovers that check was forged.

5. Bills and notes §296—Liability on general indorsement stated.

Indorser, by general indorsement, warrants to subsequent holders, not liable to him, that paper is what it purports to be, that he has good title, and that signatures of prior parties are binding on them, as distinguished from his liability by restrictive indorsement set out in Civ. Code, § 3117.

6. Banks and banking §319—Rules of association of banks, as between members, may supplant law.

Banks may associate themselves together and make rules for own government, which, as between members of their association, will supplement and even supplant the law.

7. Banks and banking §320—Indorsement of check by bank for clearing house with prescribed stamp held not to indicate purchase.

In action by drawee bank to recover amount of forged check paid through defendant bank, wherein it appeared defendant indorsed check with stamp prescribed by clearing house containing word "paid," held, stamp was for clearing house purposes only, and "paid" did not indicate defendant had purchased paper.

8. Banks and banking §319—Member banks bound by rules of clearing house association as to significance of clearing house stamp indorsement.

Member banks of clearing house association were bound by any interpretation of significance of clearing house stamp indorsement, which they had agreed upon between themselves.

9. Banks and banking §318—"Clearing house" defined.

A clearing house is an association composed of a number of banks for convenient and expeditious handling of certain claims and credits against and in favor of members.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Clearing House.]

10. Banks and banking §320—Bank presumed to have known usage and customs in banking.

In action by drawee bank on forged check, held, plaintiff presumed to have known and recognized usage and custom of banks taking paper drawn on other banks and passing it through clearing house.

11. Banks and banking ⚡320—Indorsement by clearing house stamp did not imply identification of payee.

In action by drawee bank on forged check paid through defendant bank, held latter's use of its clearing house stamp in indorsing check would not support finding that it represented to plaintiff that it knew payee, that indorsement was his genuine signature, and that defendant had identified him.

12. Banks and banking ⚡174—Restrictive indorsement conveys no information of payee.

A restrictive indorsement conveys no information to drawee concerning original payee, and does not purport to do so.

13. Banks and banking ⚡175(3) — Evidence held not to establish usage of banks in handling deposits by mail.

In action by drawee bank on forged check paid through defendant bank, wherein employees of other banks testified as to usage of banks respecting deposits received by mail, held, evidence did not show existence of any special custom.

14. Customs and usages ⚡3 — Requisites stated.

Custom or usage which will affect rights and liabilities of persons in dealings with each other must be certain, uniform, and either known to those sought to be charged, or so generally known that knowledge and adoption thereof must be presumed.

15. Banks and banking ⚡174—Liability of collecting bank not that of holder.

Law regarding liability of holder of check is not applicable to bank which has received check for collection only, in view of definition of "holder" stated in Civ. Code, § 3266, subd. (g).

16. Banks and banking ⚡148(1)—Drawee is bound to know depositor's signature.

Drawee is bound to know its depositor's signature, both by virtue of judicial decision and by Negotiable Instruments Law (Civ. Code, § 3143).

17. Bills and notes ⚡70—Payment of check includes acceptance.

Civ. Code, § 3213, providing "acceptance must be in writing and signed by the drawee," held not applicable where check is paid, because payment amounts to more than acceptance, and has all the efficacy of acceptance.

18. Banks and banking ⚡174—Bank held to have taken forged check for collection only.

Where bank received check in mail, indorsed it with clearing house stamp, sent it through clearing house, and did not pay it until it was honored by drawee, held, bank took check for collection only, and was not liable to drawee when it developed later that check was forgery.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by the Security Commercial & Savings Bank of San Diego against the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for appellant.

Ray M. Harris, of San Diego, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The principal question presented for decision upon this appeal is whether or not, under the facts of the case, a collecting bank is legally liable to a drawee bank for moneys paid upon forged checks by the former, which had no means of determining the payor's signature, after their submission to, and honor by, the latter, through the clearing house, in the regular course of business.

On September 13, 1920, the respondent bank was carrying the account of Thing Bros., a firm consisting of J. L. Thing and C. E. Thing, who maintained a commercial house at Potrero in the county of San Diego. On that date appellant received by mail a letter signed "E. E. Snyder," postmarked at Tecate, B. C., Mexico, inclosing two checks drawn on the Security Commercial & Savings Bank of San Diego, respondent herein, for a total of $2,002, and signed "Thing Bros., by J. L. Thing." The writer requested that appellant collect the amount, and send him by the conductor of a passenger train the sum of $1,700 in cash to pay his help, and that with the remaining $302 it open a checking account in his name, send him a receipt, some blank checks, and accept "this letter signature as my regular signature to be used in checks." He also requested that remittance be made not later than the following Wednesday, as his men were waiting for the money. On the same day appellant opened an account in the name of E. E. Snyder, for $2,002, and placed upon the checks its clearing house stamp, which was similar to that used for such purposes by all San Diego banks, and reading: "Paid. San Diego, Cal. Clearing House, Sept. 14, 1920. Southern Trust & Commerce Bank, No. 3." There is an abundance of evidence in the record tending to show that the clearing house stamp used by appellant was of a regulation form in wording and character, and that under the rules of the clearing house all checks passing through it from one bank to another for collection must be indorsed therewith. On the same day the checks were sent through the clearing house for collection, and were honored by respondent. Appellant wrote its depositor, inclosing signature cards for execution, and advising him that the bank's vaults would not open until 8 o'clock in the morning; that to send the funds by a conductor would necessitate leaving the money at the depot over night, and that they would therefore forward the money "in the usual way, which is by registered mail and insured," and that he should call at the post office at Tecate and receipt for the package. Appellant forwarded no money, however, until the checks had been honored and credit transferred to it by the respondent. It then sent to its correspondent a package containing $1,700, which was addressed to E. E. Snyder, Tecate, Cal., where mail was delivered on the American side of the international line; the package was registered and insured, and a receipt demanded. In due course of mail appellant received the usual card required by the government as a receipt in such cases, signed, "E. E. Snyder, By P. S. Zarate (Signature of Addressee's Agent)." On September 16, 1920, at the request of its depositor, appellant forwarded $300 more in the same manner, for which a like receipt was received, signed, "E. E. Snyder, by F. Appel." No further deposits were made by Snyder with the appellant bank.

On or about November 19, 1920, more than two months thereafter, Thing Bros. discovered that $2,002 had been charged to their account for which they had not issued checks; the Snyder checks were found among their returned vouchers, and respondent was immediately notified that they were forgeries. Representatives of the respondent bank thereupon demanded reimbursement from appellant. Zarate, alias Snyder, was arrested and convicted of the crime (54 Cal. App. 372, 201 P. 955), and the instant suit was commenced for $1,402, respondent having collected about $500 from the forger. The case was tried before the superior court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals.

The substance of this action is embodied in certain statements contained in the findings of the trial court, which, if legally tenable, would require an affirmance. The lower court found that:

"The plaintiff, relying upon the fact that said checks had each been cashed in the regular course of business by defendant, and that the defendant had taken due precautions to identify the person cashing same, and to determine the genuineness of his signature, paid same to defendant."

And it is then recited that by the acts of appellant it represented to respondent that it knew the payee, that the indorsement was his genuine signature, and that appellant had identified him and knew him to be E. E. Snyder; that as a matter of fact, appellant did not determine the genuineness of said signature, and did not identify the payee; that he did not appear before any officer or agent of appellant bank, and was not known to it.

[1] A careful, thorough, and painstaking study of the evidence and of the cases cited by the respective parties impels us to conclude that the findings in question are not supported by the evidence nor by the weight of authority. The defendant has two distinct lines of defense, either of which, holding true, must result in the denial of respondent's claims. If the finding that appellant's conduct constituted negligence is unsupported by the evidence, clearly no recovery can be had. Again, even though the appellant may have been negligent in the respect found, the respondent bank is still left without a cause of action if it also was negligent, unless it appears that respondent was misled by the appellant's negligence and induced to omit that degree of scrutiny which it would otherwise have used to detect forgery of the depositor's signature.

Counsel in their briefs have apparently agreed that their respective rights depend upon the comparative negligence of the banks. At any rate respondent so contends, and bases its claims for recovery upon the proposition that, although it was negligent, it was misled, and its carelessness was caused by the preceding and inducing negligence of the appellant. Numerous opinions are cited and excerpts therefrom quoted, in which the right of a drawee bank to recover money paid to another bank on the forged signature to a check of one of the former's depositors has been upheld. We have examined these cases and many others, and find that, with few exceptions, each possesses some element making it distinguishable from the one before us. These decisions will be discussed later.

Some conflict exists in the decisions, as to certain phases of the law, upon matters which, unless close scrutiny be applied, may be confused with the issues involved in the instant case. Therefore it will be well at the outset to state certain legal principles applicable here which are firmly established and cannot be the subject of doubt.

[2] A drawee bank of a negotiable instrument is chargeable, among other things, with knowledge of the signature of the drawer. If the drawee pays upon a forged signature of the drawer he cannot recover against an innocent payee, if such recovery would result in loss to the payee. Price v. Neal, 3 Burr, 1354, 97 Eng. [3, 4] Where a bank, without inquiry or identification of the person presenting a forged check, purchases it, indorses it generally, and presents it to the drawee bank, which pays it, the latter may recover in the event that its only negligence is its mistake in having failed to detect the forgery, for, in this instance, its mistake did not mislead the purchaser of the instrument or bring about any change in its position. Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, supra; Canadian Bank v. Bingham, 30 Wash. 484, 71 P. 43, 60 L. R. A. 955; First Nat. Bank of Danvers v. Bank of Salem, 151 Mass. 280, 24 N. E. 44, 21 Am. St. Rep. 450; *First Nat. But the rule is otherwise if the check was received by the bank for collection only, and upon presentation to the drawee bank is paid by it. If the drawee bank has honored the check it cannot recover from the collecting bank which, in reliance upon the act of the drawee, has disbursed the amount required by the payee. Bank of Williamson v. McDowell County Bank, 66 W. Va. 545, 66 S. E. 761, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 605; Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Georgia, supra; Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bank, 17 Mass. 33; *Bank of St. Albans v. Of course, if the collecting bank is alone culpable, and on account of its negligence only the loss has occurred, the drawee may recover. But where the drawee is alone at fault it must stand the loss. And also, where the drawee and the collecting banks are equally at fault, the burden will be left where it is found, and the drawee bank cannot recover. Bank of Williamson v. McDowell County Bank, supra; Com. & Savgs. Bank v. Citizens' Bank, 68 Ind. App. 417, 120 N. E. 670; San Francisco Nat. Bank v. Amer. Nat. Bank of L. A., 5 Cal. App. 408, 90 P. 558; *First Nat. With the correctness of these principles we apprehend there can be no contest. The difficulty, if any, may arise in making application of them to the facts found, or which should have been found, from the evidence. Before attempting to do this, certain other principles must be taken into account, for they intervene between those above stated and the circumstances making up the transaction which is the subject of this litigation.

[5] Two of the classes of indorsements enumerated in our Civil Code are general and restrictive. By a general indorsement the indorser warrants, among other things, to every subsequent holder, not liable to him, that the paper is in all respects what it purports to be, that he has good title to it, and that the signatures of all prior parties are binding upon them. An indorsement is restrictive which constitutes the indorsee an agent of the indorser. Civ. Code, § 3117.

[6] Banks may associate themselves together and make rules for their own government, which, as between the members of their association, will supplement and even supplant the law. Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, supra; Davis v. First Nat. Bank, 118 Cal. 600, 50 P. 666; Luckehe v. First Nat. Bank, 193 Cal. 184, 223 P. 547.

At first it will be well to eliminate from consideration any irrelevant matter contained in the facts as we have stated them. Both sides have given considerable attention to the conduct of the appellant bank in delivering the money through registered mail. This entire incident is beside the subject. Excepting only that appellant allowed the conditional credit to Snyder to become unconditional, and paid him the money as it did, whatever else was done subsequently to the payment of the checks by the respondent has no bearing upon the rights of the parties. No degree of negligence on the part of appellant after this act of respondent could have influenced the latter in the least or constituted any inducement to its lack of care in honoring the checks without making the usual effort to detect the possible forgery of Thing Bros.' signatures. It is upon the theory that some act or omission of appellant served as such an inducement, and upon that theory only, that the respondent can hope to recover. The question of appellant's want of care after the checks were honored by respondent is necessarily a false quantity.

Likewise it is unimportant to determine or consider whether E. E. Snyder is a real or fictitious person. It is conceded that Zarate indorsed the name "E. E. Snyder" on the checks; that Zarate was the person, and the only one, actually involved in the fraud. He forged the name of Thing Bros. to the checks; he wrote the indorsement "E. E. Snyder" on the back of each of them; and he received the money in question. For the purposes of this opinion, therefore, Zarate and Snyder are one and the same person, and he will be referred to herein as Snyder.

The essential facts, then, may be thus stated: Thing Bros. were customers of and maintained a checking account with the respondent bank; the signature of this firm was forged to two checks, drawn on respondent, purporting to be in favor of E. E. Snyder; the name of "E. E. Snyder" was written upon the backs of the checks by Zarate; they were sent by mail to the appellant bank, inclosed with a letter signed "E. E. Snyder," asking that they be collected, that a part of the money be sent to E. E. Snyder, and that the balance be deposited in that name, and that the signature to the letter be retained as the regular signature of Snyder, to be used upon checks. On the same day on which this letter and the checks were received, appellant opened an account in the name "E. E. Snyder" in the amount of the checks, and sent them through the clearing house with its clearing house stamp imprinted on the backs thereof; they were honored by respondent, and, after being so honored and paid by respondent, appellant forwarded the money requested by Snyder, and two days later received and cashed a check upon the account of E. E. Snyder for $300 additional.

[7] It is clear that unless there is some element contained within these facts to remove this case from the province of a general principle previously stated, respondent cannot recover. That principle provides that where a drawee has honored and paid a forged check presented to it by another bank for collection, the drawee bank cannot require repayment from the collecting bank, if this would result in loss to the latter. Respondent maintains that there are circumstances here present which withdraw this case from the application of that rule. First, it is said that, regardless of the fact that appellant did not irrevocably credit Snyder with the checks signed "Thing Bros.," or forward the money in part payment of them until after learning that the respondent had honored the same, still, that the wording of appellant's clearing house stamp amounted to a representation that appellant had purchased the checks, and that it knew the payee, had identified him, and that the indorsements upon them were his genuine signatures. It should be borne in mind that the other facts stated in the findings which legally justify recovery by the respondent are predicated on the proposition that the appellant's stamp indorsement constituted a representation that it had purchased the checks and had become the owner of them, and was not merely an agent for their collection. This the court found to be the fact. All of the other material findings either grow out of or derive their materiality from this pivotal proposition, that the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank cashed the checks before sending them through the clearing house, and indorsed them generally. The court found that by said acts appellant represented that it knew the payee of said checks, and that the signatures on the backs thereof were his genuine signatures, and that it had identified the party presenting said checks for payment, and knew that he was the payee thereof. Again, it found the existence of a well-established custom among the banks of San Diego that no check shall be "paid" to a stranger, but that in presenting a check for "payment" he shall be properly identified before any money is "paid" to him thereon. Obviously, these findings would become immaterial if it were the fact that the appellant, instead of paying the amount of the checks to a stranger, merely took them for collection and so indicated by its indorsement. Again, the entire finding, beginning with the proposition that appellant "had special reason to have acted with caution in the cashing" of said checks and indorsing the same with its clearing house stamp, etc., springs from the idea and the fact previously found and unquestionably central in and essential to the respondent's cause of action, that appellant did cash these checks before sending them through the clearing house to the respondent for payment by it. Hence, the interpretation to be given the placing by appellant of its clearing house stamp indorsement upon each of the checks is vital to the rights of the parties. It is hardly open to dispute that these banks are bound by any interpretation which they have agreed upon between themselves and with other members of the clearing house association.

[8, 9] It is quite possible that a person ignorant of banking usages and rules might have been misled by the use of the word "paid" in appellant's clearing house stamp; but it is unthinkable that a bank, or any one at all conversant with the customary methods in which bank clearing houses function, would believe for a moment that any regulation clearing house stamp represents to another bank member of the clearing house association that the checks or other negotiable instruments upon which it is placed have been purchased by the bank whose stamp appears thereon. It is common knowledge that a clearing house is what its name indicates; it is an association composed of a number of banks for convenient and expeditious handling of certain claims and credits against and in favor of members. Instead of the collecting bank placing its formal general indorsement upon the back of a check and sending an employee to the drawee to receive the money, the check is stamped with the regular clearing house stamp, the form and legal effect of which have been agreed upon by all of the members, and is transmitted, with dozens of other similar instruments to the clearing house. The stamp is for clearing house purposes only. It is not a general indorsement. The word "paid" does not import or indicate to any drawee member that the holder member has purchased the paper. We repeat, this word "paid," as well as the entire stamp, for that matter, is used for clearing house purposes only. The stamp is a receipt, a conditional one, to become absolute when the check is honored by the drawee. It amounts to an acknowledgment that the drawee has paid the check. These facts are matters of common knowledge, known to business men generally. Some of them are recognized in the decisions, such as the case of Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, supra. Some are stipulated in the rules of the San Diego Clearing House Association, and the testimony of witnesses established the usages of members of the association as to a part.

Among the findings is one to the effect that section 2 of rule 8 of the clearing house association provides:

"All negotiable paper deposited for clearance by members of this association shall bear the stamp of the depositing bank, which shall clearly indicate the name of the bank, its clearing house number, and the date of clearance. The stamp shall be for clearing house purposes only, and shall guarantee the validity and regularity of all prior indorsements on the paper so cleared except the indorsement of an original payee of a certificate of deposit, and shall not be construed to supply a missing indorsement."

In Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, supra, a clearing house rule which was identical in its language with the above was considered and construed, and it was held that the use of the clearing house stamp pursuant to its regulation resulted in a special and restrictive indorsement for clearing house purposes only, "and conveyed no 'representation' whatsoever to the plaintiff that the defendant claimed or asserted itself to be the owner of the check"; and further that this rule "eliminates, amongst other things, from the warranty of indorsement the Code provision that the instrument 'is in all respects what it purports to be.'" The wording of that stamp was precisely the same as here, but regardless of its wording, the rules fixing its meaning as between members of the association are also the same, and must govern. The language contained within the stamp is immaterial; it might be so worded as to be entirely meaningless when considered according to its ordinary acceptation; it might be in Code form, but, in any case, the rule of the association would govern as to its interpretation. Even if the stamp stated in so many words, "this check has been purchased by this bank and its genuineness is guaranteed," it could not be held to mean what that language ordinarily imports in the face of a rule agreed upon by members stipulating that this particular stamp made up of these exact words shall, as among member banks and when so used, have a different meaning and be for clearing purposes only, and shall constitute only a restrictive indorsement. Under clearing house rules of like language and import it was held in the case last cited that the use of the clearing house stamp indorsement conveyed no representation nor warranty to the drawee that the drawer's signature was genuine.

[10] Outside and independent of this rule, the usage and custom of banks taking paper drawn on other banks and passing it through the clearing house is well established, and must be regarded as having been known and recognized by the respondent. This custom and its recognition was clearly stated in the opinion of our Supreme Court in Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, supra, in which it is said:

"Common knowledge and common experience inform us that in the case of local checks such as this, it is the uniform, if not the well-nigh universal, practice for banks to take them from their depositors and clients for collection only. They do not 'buy' them. They take them as agents. And if this common knowledge needed re-enforcement, it is abundantly furnished by the evidence of the officers of the banks testifying in this case, to the effect that if it was not the uniform practice never to buy local checks, it was certainly the general practice to take them only for purposes of collection. * * * It will not be assumed against the uniform practice of banks in this regard, and in the absence of any evidence at all upon the subject, that the plaintiff here, and in this sole and peculiar instance, put reliance upon the supposed ownership of the check by defendant. If indeed it did have such belief, then the complete answer is, that the restricted indorsement did not justify nor warrant it in that belief, nor make the defendant liable because such belief was entertained."

The above reasoning and pronouncement exactly fits the situation before us. It may logically be added that if the drawee bank did actually believe the collecting bank had purchased the checks, although such a belief was prohibited by usage, rule, and law, in view of the fact that it was so prohibited it was the drawee's duty before placing any reliance upon such a belief to have made inquiry and ascertained whether or not that belief was in accordance with the facts.

We must therefore conclude that, when construed by the rule of the association above quoted, the meaning and authority of which has been passed upon by our Supreme Court, and in the light of usage, the use of the clearing house stamp was a mere formality, placed there in compliance with the provision of the rule requiring it upon all negotiable paper deposited for clearing. It constituted a restrictive indorsement only, and, as such, it involved no representation that appellant was the owner of these checks.

[11] It obviously follows that the finding of the lower court that "the plaintiff, relying upon the fact that said checks had each been cashed in the regular course of business by defendant, and that the defendant had taken due precautions to identify the person cashing them, and to determine the genuineness of his signature, paid same to defendant," is entirely unsupported by the evidence. And it is equally clear that the further finding to the effect that by the acts of the appellant it represented to respondent that it knew the payee, that the indorsement was his genuine signature, and that appellant had identified him and knew him to be "E. E. Snyder," is unsupported by the evidence, since the only act which could possibly be construed as constituting such representation is the use by appellant of its clearing house stamp on the checks.

[12, 13] Now, let up consider the significance of the fact that checks were received by appellant through the mail, and that information to this effect was not communicated to respondent. At the outset we are confronted with the proposition that, since the indorsement was of a restrictive character, it conveyed no information to the drawee concerning the original payee, nor did it purport to do so. Com. & Savings Bank Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank of Franklin, 68 Ind. App. 417, 120 N. E. 670, and cases there cited. Consequently, the drawee could not have been misled into believing that the payee had been identified by appellant. We might end the discussion of this point here, but if we turn to the testimony of the several witnesses who were interrogated as to the usage of banks in San Diego with respect to deposits received by mail, the result is an utter failure to show any special custom concerning the manner in which checks so received are transmitted through the clearing house to banks on which they are drawn. In the entire absence of any evidence of the existence of such usage, it cannot be said that the finding of the trial court that there was such a usage, and that a failure on the part of appellant to comply with it was negligence, has any support. The nearest approach to testimony which might justify such an inference is that of the witness Mueller, assistant cashier of the San Diego Savings Bank. In response to a hypothetical question, this witness testified on direct examination that in a case where the circumstances of the transaction were such as here involved the general custom among San Diego banks would "require the taking of the matter up" with the drawee bank. This answer is decidedly uncertain, but, assuming that the witness intended to convey the idea that the general custom was to inform the drawee under such circumstances that checks were received by mail, the force of the answer was destroyed by the witness' admission under cross-examination that he could not say whether or not this usage had been acceded to by each member of the clearing house association, nor was the witness able to mention a single instance where such a practice had been followed in a similar transaction, or a single bank, aside from the San Diego Savings Bank, which had ever recognized it as a custom. It is true that another witness Alexander Reynolds, vice president of the United States National Bank, called as witness for the plaintiff, in answer to the same general hypothetical question, on direct examination, testified that the general custom would be to notify the drawee bank of the circumstances under which the checks were received. But he also on cross-examination even more clearly than the witness

Mueller qualified the foregoing assertion by saying that there was no uniform custom among the banks as to the method of handling checks sent for collection through the mails, and again, "some banks fail to follow the custom I have just testified to; those who fail to follow don't adopt it."

[14] It is elementary that to measure up to the legal definition of a custom or usage which is binding upon all persons of a class it must have been universal, uniform, and undisputed. Duval v. Farmers' Bank, 9 Gill & J. (Md.) 31; Greenfield Bank v. Crafts, 2 Allen (Mass.) 269. A custom or usage which will enter into and affect the rights and liabilities of persons in their dealings with each other must be certain, uniform, and either known to those sought to be charged thereby, or so generally known and notorious that knowledge and adoption thereof must be presumed. Russell's Ex. v. Ferguson, 77 Vt. 433, 60 A. 802; Baltimore B. B. & Ex. Co. v. Pickett, 78 Md. 375, 28 A. 279, 22 L. R. A. 690, 44 Am. St. Rep. 304; Citizens' Bank of Baltimore v. Grafflin, 31 Md. 507, 1 Am. Rep. 66; Harper v. Pound, 10 Ind. 32; Smith v. Gibbs, 44 N. H. 335; C. M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Lindeman, 143 F. 946, 949, 75 C. C. A. 18. In the case last cited it was held that, where a plaintiff's witnesses testified that there was a custom of doing certain railroad work in a certain way, and defendant's witnesses testified that they did the same work at the same time in a different way, a finding of a uniform custom was not authorized.

The record contains positive testimony of other witnesses to the effect that there was no general custom among members of the clearing house association as to notifying a drawee bank when checks were received by mail. From the testimony of various witnesses it cannot be doubted that it is no unusual thing for banks in San Diego to receive checks for collection by mail, and the court so found; but the evidence does not support the finding that such checks are treated differently from any others in any way, and particularly in the matter of sending them through the clearing house, or giving special notice to the drawee bank of the fact that they came to the collecting bank by mail.

We must, then, eliminate as unsupported by the evidence the trial court's finding that "it is not customary among the banks in said city to indorse the same with the clearing house stamp of the receiving bank, and to send said checks so received and so indorsed through the clearing house for collection on a drawee bank." This finding referred to checks received for collection by mail. Also, as we have shown, the finding that "the plaintiff, relying upon the fact that said checks had been cashed in the regular course of business by defendant, and that the defendant had taken due precautions to identify the person cashing same, and to determine the genuineness of his signature, paid same to defendant," has no support or justification in the evidence. The finding last quoted is based upon, and falls with the elimination of, the finding that appellant cashed the checks before sending them through the clearing house, since the checks were not cashed before being sent through the clearing house and before being paid by the drawee, and the stamp was no representation that they had been cashed. In other words, as they were not purchased, but only received and passed on under a delegation of authority from the payee for collection, it also necessarily follows that the further finding that there existed a well-established custom among San Diego banks that no checks shall be "paid" to a stranger without proper identification is immaterial. It may also be noted that the testimony of the various bank witnesses produced by respondent upon this point each alluded to the payment and purchase of checks, and not to their receipt, as these were, for purposes of agency only and for collection. The existence of a custom that banks will not purchase checks from strangers without identifying the payee is utterly worthless in bolstering up the claim that the same identification is customary or required of a bank which merely accepts employment as an agent to collect a check for a stranger. In this connection it is significant that the cashier of respondent bank testified:

"There is a difference between the payment of a check to a payee and the presentation of a check for collection through the clearing house. If there are no suspicious circumstances connected with the checks or the receipt of them by our bank, we would send the checks through the clearing house for collection against another bank in the city without first identifying the person presenting them. If a check came to the plaintiff bank through the mail drawn on another bank on an unknown account we would send it through the clearing house for collection, if there were no suspicious circumstances."

This being true, the fact that the defendant sent these checks through the clearing house with its regular clearing house stamp, including the word "paid" on the backs thereof, and the fact that no mention was made to the clearing house or the drawee that the checks had been received by mail, must be removed from consideration; and we have left merely a case of a bank receiving checks for collection, sending them through the clearing house in the ordinary manner, the drawee bank honoring and paying them without detecting or using the means within its hands to detect the fact that they were forgeries, and now asking the collecting bank to reimburse it, notwithstanding that the collecting bank would suffer the loss because of having paid the money out, relying upon the drawee's payment of the same. Such a case is clearly covered by the principles which were stated in the early part of this opinion. They are amply sustained by the authorities there cited, and preclude recovery by the drawee bank.

As we have heretofore indicated, the decisions cited by respondent do not conflict with this conclusion. Many of them agree with and conform to it, and this follows as a logical consequence of the fact that the keystone of respondent's argument as set forth in its briefs consists of the proposition that the appellant's acts and conduct were such as to justify respondent in believing that the appellant had purchased the checks and owned them, rather than being merely an agent for their collection. In summing up its position, counsel for respondent begin by saying that the universally accepted rule is that the negligence of the bank "cashing" a check overcomes the constructive negligence of the drawee bank in failing to detect a forged signature of its depositor. And under the heading "It makes a difference whether the check is indorsed 'paid,' or 'for collection,'" respondent cites the following cases: First National Bank of Belmont v. First National Bank of Barnesville, 58 Ohio St. 207, 50 N. E. 723, 41 L. R. A. 584, 65 Am. St. Rep. 748; First National Bank of Pukwana v. Brule National Bank of Chamberlain, 38 S. D. 396, 161 N. W. 616, 12 A. L. R. 1079; Ellis v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co., 4 Ohio St. 628, 64 Am. Dec. 610. To this list may be added Commercial & Sav. Bank Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank of Franklin, 68 Ind. App. 417, 120 N. E. 670. These authorities fully sustain the point for which they are cited, but since the indorsements are to be construed as "for collection," and not "paid," these same decisions result in the point-blank holding against the respondent's right of recovery. In distinguishing authorities cited by respondent from the instant case, or of showing their confirmation of the principles announced, many of them may be grouped into well-defined classes: First, we find those where the bank presenting checks for payment had cashed and purchased them, and which are consequently not in point, in which class are the following: Canadian Bank v. Bingham, 30 Wash. 484, 71 P. 43, 60 L. R. A. 955; First Nat. Bank of Danvers v. Bank of Salem, 151 Mass. 280, 24 N. E. 44, 21 Am. St. Rep. 450; First Nat. Bank of Crawfordsville v. First Nat. Bank of Lafayette, 4 Ind. App. 355, 30 N. E. 808, 51 Am. St. Rep. 221; First Nat. Bank of Pukwana v. Brule Nat. Bank of Chamberlain, 38 S. D. 396, 161 N. W. 616, 12 A. L. National Bank v. Farm Trade Bank, 159 Ky. 141, 166 S. W. 986, L. R. A. 1915A, 77; Newberry Savings Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 91 S. C. 294, 74 S. E. 615, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1200; Third Nat. Bank v. Allen, 59 Mo. 311; Williamsburgh Trust Co. v. Tum Suden, 120 App. Div. 518, 105 N. Y. S. 335; Woods v. Colony Bank, 114 Ga. 683, 40 S. E. 720, 56 L. R. A. 929; and Bank of Italy v. First Bank of Kern (Cal. App.) 231 P. 44. It may be added that in none of these cases was the indorsement restrictive. Several reasons are given for distinguishing this type of cases from those where one bank has taken for collection only checks drawn on another, where, as here, the issue is one of comparative negligence. The reason most clearly indicated as applicable is that, if a bank receives a check from a stranger, cashes and purchases it and becomes its owner, and thereafter passes it on to the bank on which it is drawn, and receives payment from the latter, and it later develops that the check was forged, the holder bank cannot defend in an action brought by the drawee to recover, upon the ground that any act of the drawee misled the other and induced it to part with the money. But, if the first bank, instead of purchasing the checks, had merely taken it for collection and refused to pay out money until confirmation of the genuineness of the signature of the drawer by the drawee, and then, after receiving such confirmation, had disbursed the money received from the drawee to an imposter, the drawee would be in no position to recover, because its negligence deceived and misled the collecting bank.

In these cases cited by respondent the issues were such, and the several opinions were so worded, as to uphold appellant's, rather than the respondent's, contention concerning the right of recovery of a drawee bank which has paid out moneys on a forged signature of a depositor. First Nat. Bank of Portland v. U. S. Nat. Bank of Portland, 100 Or. 264, 197 P. 547, 14 A. L. R. 479; Bank of Williamson v. McDowell County Bank, 66 W. Va. 545, 66 S. E. 761, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 605; Dedham Nat. Bank v. Everett Nat. Bank, 177 Mass. 392, 59 N. E. 62, 83 Am. St. Rep. 286; Trust Co. of America v. Hamilton Bank, 127 App. Div. 515, 112 N. Y. S. 84.

[15] The Civil Code (section 3266, subd. [g]) defines a "holder" as the "payee or indorsee of a bill or note, who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof." Many of the cases cited by respondent, and quoted as upholding the right of a drawee to recover money paid by mistake on a check where the drawer's signature has been forged, use language to the general effect that a drawee may recover against a "holder." Of course this cannot apply to cases like that before us, where recovery is sought against, not a holder, but a bank which has received the check for collection only. One example of a case so cited is Farmers' Nat. Bank v. Farm & Trade Bank, 159 Ky. 141, 166 S. W. 986, L. R. A. 1915A, 77. One having the mere physical possession of a check for collection is not such "holder" as contemplated by the Code definition or the cited cases. The "holder," under circumstances such as there presented, is the principal who is entitled to the beneficial interest in the check rather than his incidental agent for collection only. Aurora State Bank v. Hayes-Eames Elevator Co., 88 Neb. 187, 129 N. W. 279; Rice v. Hogan, 38 Ky. (8 Dana) 135; Nat. Bank of Commerce of Lincoln v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 87 Neb. 841, 128 N. W. 522; Nat. Exch. Bank of Tiffin v. Wiley, 195 U. S. 257, 25 S. Ct. 70, 49 L. Ed. 184; Scotland County Nat. Bank v. Hohn, 146 Mo. App. 699, 125 S. W. 539. McCall v. Corning, 3 La. Ann. 409, 48 Am. Dec. 454, is not in point. There the drawee was allowed to recover money paid to a holder and payee, and not as against one presenting for collection only. The element especially distinguishing it is contained in the following brief excerpt from the opinion:

"It is an important feature in this case that the holders were not induced to take the bill by any act of the plaintiffs, and the case is thus relieved from any equity which might be urged, in the case of a forged bill accepted by the drawee, and going after acceptance into the hands of a bona fide holder for value."

In the following cases the indorsement was unrestricted, thus differentiating them from the case at bar: Bank of Williamson v. McDowell County Bank, 66 W. Va. 545, 66 S. E. 761, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 605; Nat. Bank of North America v. Bangs, 106 Mass. 441, 8 Am. Rep. 349; Ford & Co. v. People's Bank of Orangeburg, 74 S. C. 180, 54 S. E. 204, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 63, 114 Am. St. Rep. 986, 7 Ann. Cas. 744.

Composing another class of cases where the issue involved was entirely different from that in the instant case, and in which the language involved in the several opinions could not have been intended to be applicable to such a condition as here presented, are the following: First Nat. Bank of Washington v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 343, 24 L. Ed. 229; Figuers v. Fly, 137 Tenn. 358, 193 S. W. 117; Nat. Bank v. Northwest Nat. Bank, 152 Ill. 296, 38 N. E. 739, 26 L. R. A. 289, 43 Am. St. Rep. 247; First Nat. Bank of Belmont v. First Nat. Bank of Barnesville, 58 Ohio St. 207, 50 N. E. 723, 41 L. R. A. 584; Arkansas ex rel. Penitentiary v. Bank of Commerce, 133 Ark. 498, 202 S. W. 834, L. R. A. 1918F, 538; Snyder v. Corn Exch. Nat. Bank, 221 Pa. 599, 70 A. 876, 128 Am. St. Rep. 780. In each of the above the indorsement was forged, but not the signature; hence the entire decision is necessarily inapplicable to a case where the issue arises and the loss results from a forged signature.

First Nat. Bank v. U. S. Nat. Bank, 100 Or. 264, 197 P. 547, 14 A. L. R. 479.

Without discussing them, it may be said that the following cases have no bearing on the issues involved in the instant case: Elyria Sav. & Banking Co. v. Walker Bin Co., 92 Ohio St. 406, 111 N. E. 147, L. R. A. 1916D, 433, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1058; Nat. Gold Bank & Tr. Co. v. McDonald, 51 Cal. 64, 21 Am. Rep. 697. While having to do with the general subject at issue, the cases next enumerated are clearly not in point, nor are they in conflict with any principle herein said to bear on the issues of this case. Rambo v. First State Bank of Argentine, 88 Kan. 257, 128 P. 182; Ryan v. Bank of Montreal, 12 Ont. Rep. 44; State Bank of Chicago v. Mid-City Trust & Sav. Bank, 295 Ill. 599, 129 N. E. 498, 12 A. L. R. 989; Arkansas ex rel. Penitentiary v. Bank of Commerce, 133 Ark. 498, 202 S. W. 834, L. R. A. 1918F, 538.

In respondent's brief it is stated:

"The following cases hold that the drawee can recover from the holder because of his negligence, notwithstanding the fact that the checks were payable to bearer or to cash: Dedham National Bank v. Everett National Bank, 177 Mass. 392, 59 N. E. 62, 83 Am. St. Rep. 286."

The decision in that case is squarely the other way. It is there held that where forged checks made payable to cash were deposited with the Everett National Bank, and were paid to it through the clearing house by the Dedham National Bank, the latter being the drawee, and it appearing that the Everett National Bank required no indorsement of the checks, these facts did not render it liable in an action by the Dedham National Bank to recover the amount of the checks. This holding is based upon the proposition that the Dedham National Bank should have known the genuineness of the signature of the maker, and that the Everett National Bank owed no duty to, and in no way deceived, the plaintiff, Dedham National Bank.

Another of respondent's citations is First National Bank of Belmont v. First National Bank of Barnesville, 58 Ohio St. 207, 50 N. E. 723, 41 L. R. A. 584, 65 Am. St. Rep. 748. The court there holds that an indorsement "for collection" is notice to the drawee that the indorsee is not the owner of the paper, but only the agent of the owner, authorized to receive payment for him; hence, that such an indorsement does not justify the drawee bank in relaxing its vigilance in determining whether or not the signature of the drawer is genuine. The effect of this decision is to squarely uphold the proposition that in the instant case the respondent had no right to relax its care in examining the drawer's signature and ascertaining as to its genuineness. For, as we have shown, under the clearing house rules, as well as the custom and general authority, the clearing house stamp indicates to member banks that the paper on which it is placed is presented for collection only, just as plainly as though the words "for collection" were written thereon. The same may be said of Ford & Co. v. People's Bank of Orangeburg, 74 S. C. 180, 54 S. E. 204, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 63, 114 Am. St. Rep. 986, 7 Ann. Cas. 744. Greenwald v. Ford, 21 S. D. 28, 109 N. W. 516, does sustain the respondent's contention in holding:

"When payment is made to the holder of paper who has come into possession of it without any fault on his part, and his situation would be rendered worse if compelled to refund than it was before receiving payment, the money cannot be recovered from him. If, however, he has been negligent in any regard, he cannot retain the money. To justify him in doing so the bank alone must have been negligent. If neither party has been negligent, or both have been, then the bank can recover the money."

But it will be noted that this quotation from Cyc. (vol. 5, p. 546), cited with the court's approval, refers to the holder of the paper, and also there is nothing to indicate that a restricted indorsement was contemplated. The indorsement with which the court was there dealing was one by which all prior indorsements were expressly guaranteed, and it was held that this was of such a character as to mislead the drawee bank. First National Bank of Orleans v. First State Bank of Alma, 22 Neb. 769, 36 N. W. 289, 3 Am. St. Rep. 294, is strongly relied upon by respondent. That case is easily distinguishable from the one before us, not only because the defendant bank had purchased the check of a stranger before presenting it to the drawee for payment, but also as the litigants did not belong to the same clearing house, and the first bank indorsed the check generally. There were no clearing house rules or restrictive indorsements involved.

Another case especially stressed by respondent deserves further mention. It is First National Bank v. U. S. National Bank, 100 Or. 264, 197 P. 547, 14 A. L. R. 479. While the language quoted therefrom by respondent is to be found in the opinion, a cursory examination shows that two facts were considered most vital in that connection: One was that the defendant bank had purchased the forged checks, the first indorsements upon which were forged, and the other, that the drawer's name was forged, but certain indorsements immediately preceding delivery to the collecting bank were genuine. The case expressly recognizes the rule in Price v. Neal, and cites numerous authorities affirming it. It states the further rule that, where a bank negligently purchases checks which afterward are found to have been forged, and secures payment of them from the drawee bank, the former must refund. The opinion admits that even under such circumstances there is some conflict, and that four decisions have held to the contrary, going on to say that, to the extent that these four cases are to be regarded as authority for relieving a bank from its mistakes in negligently purchasing a check drawn on another bank, they are out of harmony with practically all else that has been written on the subject. The decision repeatedly indicates that what is there said is predicated on the assumed fact that the defendant bank had purchased the checks and had become their holder, and that the forged indorsement was not involved in consideration of the general principles discussed in that portion of the opinion. The decision itself is decidedly opposed to the respondent's recovery in the instant case. In this Oregon case the drawer's name had been forged to the checks, the forgers had then indorsed on the backs thereof the names of Rose and Shea, which were fictitious names, and had passed them upon a number of merchants, who, in turn, placed their respective indorsements upon the several checks and presented them to the United States National Bank; this bank placed its clearing house stamp on the backs of the checks and presented them through the clearing house to the First National Bank, in which the drawer was a depositor, for payment. The latter bank paid all of the checks to the United States National Bank. It was decided under clearing house rules similar to those existing in San Diego, that the indorsement of the checks by the collecting bank with its clearing house stamp and the presentment of them to the drawee bank was neither a representation nor a warranty to the drawee that the drawer's signature was genuine; further, that these acts of the collecting bank did not constitute representations as to the genuineness of the drawer's signature, either under the common law, Negotiable Instruments Act, or rules of the clearing house association. The decision also announces another principle which we have had occasion to state. Its position is best expressed in its own language:

"The clearing house rule which provides for the guaranty of prior indorsements refers to the signatures of indorsers and does not include drawers. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Bank of Rutherford, 115 Tenn. 64, 88 S. W. 939, 112 Am. St. Rep. 817; National Bank of Rolla v. First Nat. Bank of Salem, 141 Mo. App. 719, 125 S. W. 513; State Bank v. Cumberland Savings & Trust Co., 168 N. C. 605, 85 S. E. 5, L. R. A. 1915D, 1138; Cherokee Nat. Bank v. Union Trust Co., 33 Okl. 342, 125 P. 464. In the instant case it must be remembered that the checks were never at any time valid substituting orders; they were not orders originally valid but subsequently unlawfully changed by the addition of an invalid incident. The checks involved here as well as all their incidents were invalid from the very beginning. The loss incurred by the plaintiff is traceable to the act which originated the checks. The loss sustained by the plaintiff was caused by its failure to detect the forgery of the drawer's signature. From the moment of their origin the checks were invalid because not bearing the genuine signature of the drawer. If the indorsements of Rose and Shea be treated as forgeries, the plaintiff is nevertheless precluded from recovering for the reason that the plaintiff failed to detect the forgery of Insley's signature. The forged indorsements of Shea and Rose, assuming them to be forgeries, put the plaintiff in no worse position than it would be left if the indorsements were genuine. The First National Bank cannot be called upon to pay again, and the United States National Bank has not received the proceeds of an instrument to which another had a better title."

On the whole, this case is very similar to the one before us, and upon every material element is against the recovery by the drawee bank under the circumstances here presented.

[16] There is much discussion in the briefs of the rule that a drawee is bound to know its depositor's signature, as announced more than 160 years ago in England (Price v. Neal, 3 Burr. 1354, 97 Eng. Repr. 871), wherein it was said:

"It was incumbent upon the plaintiff, to be satisfied 'that the bill drawn upon him was the drawer's hand,' before he accepted or paid it; but it was not incumbent upon the defendant, to inquire into it. * * * He made no objection to them, at the time of paying them. Whatever neglect there was, was on his side."

Respondent insists that such is not the modern rule, that there has been much conflict of authorities, throughout the country, and that in our own state it has been abandoned. We think from careful comparison and study of various authorities, including those cited, that the divergent holdings may generally be accounted for by the fact that each case presented its own peculiar circumstances, and was required to stand upon them. This undoubtedly has led to some confusion, but, as was said by the author in 12 A. L. R. 1089:

"The application of the proper rule to a given state of facts is seldom difficult, if the attention is fixed solely on the problem to be solved, but if a rule which is inapplicable is first stated and then an attempt made to show that it is unsound, conflict and confusion result, which, in most cases, are entirely unnecessary."

Prior to the enactment of our Negotiable Instruments Law, the case of Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, 139 Cal. 564, 73 P. 456, 63 L. R. A. 245, 96 Am. St. Rep. 169, was decided, wherein it was said:

"Thus, it is the law beyond controversy that the drawee of a negotiable instrument is chargeable with knowledge of the genuineness of the signature of the drawer, of the condition of his funds, and of the state of his credit. If the drawee pays upon the forged signature of the drawer, he cannot recover against an innocent payee, if the recovery would subject such payee to loss. Such has been the rule since Price v. Neal, 3 Burr. 1354, decided by Lord Mansfield in 1762."

Such was the holding in Bank of Williamson v. McDowell County Bank, supra, the Supreme Court of West Virginia there saying:

"It was the duty of the drawee to determine, at its peril, the genuineness of the signature of its depositor, and its sole right to demand reimbursement from the defendant rests upon technical fault in the latter. * * * Though the forged name and the genuine signature are very similar, even the slight difference might have been noticed had a comparison been made at the time."

A judgment for the defendant was affirmed, and one of the learned justices of that court wrote a concurring opinion especially emphasizing the fact that the majority opinion is really in line with Price v. Neal, and should have so stated. Many other authorities cited by both parties to the instant case, decided before and after the advent of the Negotiable Instruments Law, adhere to the same rule. Some of these are National Bank of Rolla v. First Nat. Bank of Salem, 141 Mo. App. 719, 125 S. W. 513; Dedham Nat. Bank v. Everett Nat. Bank, 177 Mass. 392, 59 N. E. 62, 83 Am. St. Rep. 286; Ellis v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co., 4 Ohio St. 525, 64 Am. Dec. 610; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Bank of Rutherford, 115 Tenn. 64, 88 S. W. 939, 112 Am. St. Rep. 817; Farmers' Nat. Bank v. Farm & Trade Bank, 159 Ky. 141, 166 S. W. 986, L. R. A. 1915A, 77; Figuers v. Fly, 137 Tenn. 358, 193 S. W. 117; Minnehaha Nat. Bank v. Pence, 42 S. D. 525, 176 N. W. 37; 5 R. C. L. 556.

In Utah Nat. Bank v. Smith, 180 Cal. 1, 179 P. 160, it was said by our own Supreme Court:

"It is generally held that it is the duty of the courts in construing this law to have in mind the purpose of securing uniformity in the law of commercial paper. State Bank, etc., v. Bilstad, 162 Iowa, 433, 136 N. W. 204, 144 N. W. 363, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 132; Felt v. Bush, 41 Utah, 462, 126 P. 688; Union Trust Co. v. McGinty, 212 Mass. 205, 98 N. E. 679, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 525; Broderick v. McGrath, 81 Misc. Rep. 199, 142 N. Y. Sup. 497; Rockfield v. First Nat. Bank, 77 Ohio St. 311, 83 N. E. 392, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 842. As the view of the Supreme Court of Utah on this rule of interpretation is of special interest, we quote from the case of Felt v. Bush, supra, as follows:

"The question, therefore, it seems to us, has passed beyond the domain of judicial discussion. As we understand it, the Negotiable Instruments Law was intended to give legislative sanction to the majority rule, to which reference has been made, and was conceived by its authors and adopted by the different state Legislatures for the express purpose of harmonizing the conflicting decisions which had been rendered on the subject of negotiable instruments and the rights of those interested therein whose rights were acquired before maturity. As we view it, therefore, it is our plain duty to follow the numerous decisions that have directly passed upon the negotiable instruments law, and have construed it in accordance with the majority rule."

It will be seen, therefore, that the majority rule has expressly been adopted in this state, and that since by almost unanimous judicial action in all jurisdictions drawee banks are held liable for payments made upon forged instruments and charged to the accounts of their depositors, that uniformity sought to be secured by enactment of the Negotiable Instruments Law must be said to have continued in force the rule announced in Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, supra. Union Tool Co. v. Farmers' & Merchants' Nat. Bank, 192 Cal. 40, 218 P. 424, 28 A. L. R. 1417, involved the question of direct liability of a drawee bank to its depositor, but the same question of diligence in comparing signatures was discussed, and it was said that:

"Assuming that the plaintiff was negligent in not making a more thorough examination of the returned checks, although the trial court found it was not negligent, still the depository bank may not escape liability for the payment of amounts paid on forged checks unless it has itself been free from negligence. Here the finding of the trial court that the bank was negligent is clearly sustained by the evidence."

And in Glassell Development Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 191 Cal. 375, 216 P. 1012, 28 A. L. R. 1427, where, as in the case last cited, the drawee bank failed to make the comparison, it was held that:

"When by the exercise of proper care it could have discovered the alteration or forgery, it must bear the loss notwithstanding that the depositor failed in his duty to examine the accounts."

In the case at bar, the drawee had in its files for convenient immediate reference the genuine signatures of its depositors; it was testified that the forgeries were unlike the specimen signatures, and dissimilarities were pointed out during the trial, yet respondent's president said that he did not think any comparison was made in this instance.

The Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law of this state (Civ. Code, § 3143), provides as follows:

"The acceptor by accepting the instrument engages that he will pay it according to the tenor of his acceptance; and admits—

"(1) The existence of the drawer, the genuineness of his signature, and his capacity and authority to draw the instrument; and

"(2) The existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse."

[17] Appellant contends that, had the plaintiff bank discovered the forgeries, the funds would not have been forwarded, and that no loss would have occurred; but that by payment to appellant and cancellation of the checks respondent accepted them, represented to appellant that they were genuine, and caused the latter to change its position. Respondent, relying upon section 3213 of the Civil Code, that "acceptance must be in writing and signed by the drawee," insists that it did not accept the checks, within the express intendment of said section, and that therefore its cancellation and credit to appellant was subject to repudiation upon discovery of the forgery two months later.

An engagement by one party to perform some act under the Negotiable Instruments Law, such as to honor a bill of exchange when presented in future, or to meet the paper of another, must concededly be in writing, and be signed; such is the plain language of the statute, and it facilitates notice and other steps that may be found necessary. But we are not aware of any rule requiring that payment of a check by a drawee bank shall be confirmed by a simultaneous written acceptance. This question was decided by the Supreme Court of Oregon, in First National Bank of Cottage Grove v. Bank of Cottage Grove, 59 Or. 388, 117 P. 293, where it was said:

"The payment of a bill or check by the drawee amounts to more than an acceptance. The rule, holding that such a payment has all the efficacy of an acceptance, is founded upon the principle that the greater includes the less. Bank v. Bank, 141 Mo. App. 719, 125 S. W. 513; Neal v. Coburn, supra [92 Me. 139, 42 A. 348, 69 Am. St. Rep. 495]. * * * Under the provision in section 6021, L. O. L. that, where the holder of a check procures it to be accepted or certified, the indorsers are discharged from liability, the plaintiff, when it paid the checks in question, precluded itself from setting up that the check was a forgery on any want of authority of the person affixing the signature it purported to bear, within the meaning of section 5856, L. O. L. The following cases, in which the negotiable instruments law is applied, sustain this view: Bank of Com. v. Mech. Nat. Bank, 148 Mo. App. 1, 127 S. W. 429; Title Guarantee & T. Co. v. Haven, 126 App. Div. 802, 111 N. Y. S. 305; Bank of Rolla v. Salem Bank, 141 Mo. App. 719, 125 S. W. 513; Farmers' & Mer. Bank v. Rutherford Bank, 115 Tenn. 64, 88 S. W. 939, 112 Am. St. Rep. 817."

It is further argued by appellant, and denied by respondent, that the checks in controversy, having been worded "Pay to E. E. Snyder, or order," were in a measure not unlike checks payable "to cash," and so required no indorsement, and that identification of the payee was therefore unnecessary. As we have shown, whether or not Snyder, alias Zarate, indorsed his true name upon these instruments, there can be no question that the purported payee and indorser received the money. Respondent admits that the checks were forgeries, and that it honored them as the genuine paper of Thing Bros. Having done so, it transmitted the funds or credit to the collecting bank, which thereupon sought out and paid the identical person who had opened an account and deposited the checks. Hence, we think the question as to whether or not appellant would have been absolved from liability had it proceeded without indorsement or identification is beside the issue and need not here be decided.

[18] In conclusion, we hold that, since it was the custom among members of the San Diego clearing house association to accept business by mail, the fact that the checks in question were received by the collecting bank in that manner does not constitute a suspicious circumstance; also that the indorsements upon these checks did not constitute a representation that they had been paid, or a guaranty of their genuineness, but were placed thereon only for the purposes of collection. Therefore the conduct of the appellant was free from any negligence which could possibly have induced the respondent to relax the scrutiny required of it as a drawee to detect the forgery of its depositor's signature. On the other hand, failure of the respondent bank to make comparison of the signatures upon the checks with their exemplars was a negligent omission. Under these circumstances, the collecting bank, having paid the checks only after they had been honored by the drawee bank, cannot be held liable to reimburse the latter for its loss in having paid its customers' money on the purported drawers' signatures, which subsequently were shown to have been forgeries.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

Foote, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was charged with and convicted of maintaining a common nuisance in a certain building, "in that the said defendant did then and there willfully and unlawfully possess and keep on the premises aforesaid certain intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and not for sacramental or medicinal purposes." This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial. The questions presented by the appeal are identical with those considered by this court in People v. Mehra, 238 P. 802, in which case the judgment was reversed and the defendant discharged, and in which respondent's petition for a hearing in the Supreme Court was denied. The information is in the same language as that in the Mehra Case. The instructions are the same, and the evidence shows mere possession of the liquor in the defendant's residence. The defendant, prior to the trial herein, had been convicted and punished for such possession. No brief has been filed by the respondent, and the case is not distinguishable in any respect from the Mehra Case. It would serve no useful purpose, therefore, to repeat the discussion fully set forth in that case, and no reason appears why the decision therein should not be followed in this. The judgment is reversed, and defendant's bail is exonerated.

KELLEY v. HODGE TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM. (L. A. 8194.)(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 11, 1925.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 7, 1926.)1. Negligence $\S$ 93(1)—Guest in automobile held not engaged in joint enterprise with driver.

Guest riding in automobile, having no right of control and management of automobile, was not engaged in common or joint enterprise with driver thereof so as to be responsible for his negligence, if any, contributing to collision causing injury to guest.

2. Pleading $\S$ 403(2) — Failure of complaint for injuries in automobile collision to jointly charge driver of automobile, in which plaintiff was riding, with negligence with defendant held not to impeach judgment for variance.

Insufficiency of evidence to support judgment for plaintiff in action for injuries suffered in automobile collision while riding as guest in one of cars cannot be predicated on variance because of plaintiff's allegation that collision was solely due to defendant's negligence, where answer put in issue negligence of plaintiff's driver, and case was fully developed on both issues.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1001(1)—Finding of jury, supported by evidence, not disturbed on appeal.

In action by guest riding in automobile for injuries in automobile collision, where substantial evidence pointed to defendant's negligence, and there was no evidence of plaintiff's negligence, finding of jury for plaintiff cannot be disturbed on appeal.

4. Pleading $\S$ 166—Pleadings of negligence of driver of plaintiff's automobile held new matter in avoidance or constituting defense, and deemed controverted on trial by opposite party.

In action by guest riding in automobile for injuries in collision, answer pleading negligence of driver of plaintiff's automobile was new matter in avoidance or constituting defense, and must, on trial, be deemed controverted by opposite party, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 462.

5. Trial $\S$ 296(3)—Prejudice, if any, in instruction as to negligence from violation of provisions of State Motor Vehicle Act, held cured by another instruction.

In action by guest riding in automobile for personal injuries in automobile collision on city streets, instruction that if defendant violated any of provisions of Motor Vehicle Act to find it guilty of negligence, if error for failure to limit it to violations of such act on which plaintiff relied, was cured by instruction that law did not prohibit defendant from driving across street into filling station, if it exercised due care in operating motor truck and otherwise complied with law regulating operation of motor vehicles, and other instructions concerning Motor Vehicle Law.

6. Trial $\S$ 232(5)—Instructions defining terms "a man of ordinary prudence" and "ordinarily prudent person" and "reasonable man" held not confusing.

In action by one injured in automobile collision, instruction as to meaning of terms "a man of ordinary prudence," and "ordinarily prudent person," and "reasonable man," stating that conduct must be compared with that of average man or ordinary man, and that question for jury to determine was whether, under facts and circumstances, parties whose conduct was under consideration acted as ordinarily prudent men would act, was not confusing, because court, in defining term "a man of ordinary prudence," closed one sentence with interrogatory, "What would I have done under such circumstances?"

7. Trial $\S$ 219—Leaving meaning of terms "man of ordinary prudence" and "reasonable man" to understanding of average man held ordinarily better than to attempt to amplify.

Meaning of terms "man of ordinary prudence" and "reasonable man" is understood by average person, and ordinarily it is better to leave their meaning with average man than to hazard difficulty and danger of amplifying them.

8. Damages $\S$ 132(1)—\$15,000 for injuries, causing disfigurement of young woman's features, held not excessive as matter of law.

In action for personal injuries in automobile collision to unmarried woman 27 years of age, verdict for $15,000, largest part of which must have been for permanent scars on face and neck, was not excessive as matter of law.

9. Appeal and error $\S$ 1004(3)—Verdict not set aside for excessive damages, unless result of passion, prejudice, or corruption.

Verdict awarding damages and sustained by trial court should not be set aside on appeal as excessive, unless it shocks sense of justice, and raises presumption that it was result of passion, prejudice, or corruption.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. Lucas, Judge.

Action by Edna Kelley against the Hodge Transportation System. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. G. Ritter and Joseph Scott, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. The jury in this case awarded the respondent the sum of $15,000 as damages for injuries suffered by her from cuts made upon her face and neck by glass as the result of a collision between a Ford coupé driven by James Fisher, a salesman and "courtesy man" in the employ of the Hubbard Auto Sales Company, at the city of Los Angeles, with whom she was riding as a guest, and a very large truck carrying five and one-half tons of freight, and drawing a trailer carrying three tons of freight, owned and operated by appellant. The facts of the case are brief, and are as follows:

Miss Edna Kelley, the respondent herein, was an unmarried woman of the age of 27 years, a stenographer by occupation, in the employ of the Associated Supply Company in the city of Los Angeles, at a salary of $100 per month, and who had, for several months prior to the day of the collision, to wit, Sunday evening, December 10, 1922, been accustomed to take pleasure rides upon each Sunday into the suburban districts and country with said James Fisher. During the week preceding the day last mentioned they had been told by a mutual friend that holly berries were obtainable in the vicinity of Saugus or Newhall, and accordingly, as they had intended to go in some direction on their usual Sunday outing, upon the suggestion and invitation of Mr. Fisher, planned a trip to Saugus, where it was expected that they would be able to gather, and bring to Miss Kelley's home, holly berries to be used for Christmas decorations.

Upon passing through the city of San Fernando at about 6 o'clock p. m. on their return trip, Mr. Fisher, in obedience to the traffic laws, paused on Porter street, which extends in a northerly and southerly direction, before crossing Brand avenue at the point where it intersects Porter street at right angles. The lot on the southwest corner of Porter street and Brand avenue is used by the Standard Oil Company as a gas and oil filling station. The station is located in the center of the lot. The entrance into and exit from the station is on Porter street, near the southerly boundary of the lot, and is some distance southerly from Brand avenue. The station is illuminated by a system of reflectors so arranged upon poles as to concentrate the light rays upon the station. The illumination is quite bright at the intersection of Brand avenue and Porter street, as well as at the station, but the light zone ceases within the limits of the station going southerly. Therefore, a person traveling in a northerly direction would have the benefit of the street and station lights, while one going southerly would, upon reaching the station, be facing an unlighted highway. Southerly from the station, and a few feet distant therefrom, building improvements were being made, and building materials were piled into the street at the curb line, and lighted lanterns had been placed thereon to warn the traveling public of the partial obstruction to travel. While it was not raining at the time the collision occurred, which was at the hour of about 6 o'clock, an overcast sky added to the darkness that had set in.

The collision occurred at a point on the street which would have been included within the limits of the driveway had its exterior lines been projected into the street. Fisher, after having crossed Brand avenue, proceeded down Porter street at a rate of speed variously estimated as ranging from 10 to 15 miles per hour. He was on the west side of Porter street, which is about 45 feet wide, and it was his claim that he was proceeding southerly on said street about 5 feet distant from the westerly curb line. He observed the headlights of several machines approaching him on Porter street, and also saw the rear lights of machines traveling ahead of him. As he approached the driveway of the oil station he was on a lookout for outgoing machines, and his attention was also directed to the obstruction which extended into the street some 30 feet south of the oil station, upon which lights had been placed as a warning signal. When he arrived at a point practically opposite to the entrance of the driveway, he suddenly found himself confronted with the truck drawing a trailer which had turned from its course on the easterly side of the street to enter the oil station premises. The truck and trailer were approaching the station practically at a right angle. Fisher was then about 5 feet distant from the truck, and both were moving. The truck and trailer were traveling at a speed estimated at not less than 9, nor more than 15, miles per hour. Fisher applied his brakes, but could not avoid the impact. The truck and Ford came together in such a manner that the front fender of the truck came in contact with the radiator of the Ford. No horn was sounded or signal given in any way by the driver of the truck to warn Fisher of his intention to enter the station, although the driver of the truck admitted that he saw Fisher some time before the accident, and supposed he would stop, as he thought it easier for the Ford to stop than it would be to stop the truck. The impact caused the Ford to rebound 5 feet. Miss Kelley, who was seated to the right of Mr. Fisher, was thrown forward with such violence that her face and the upper portion of her body went through the glass windshield. The blood flowed so profusely from the wounds and cuts which she received upon the face and neck as to have almost resulted in her death before medical attendance could be procured. By reason of her extreme weakened condition no anæsthetic was administered during the time that the 35 or 40 stitches were taken to close up the several wounds made upon her face. She remained in a hospital for some 2 weeks under the treatment of a physician, and was later taken to her mother's home, where she remained in a convalescent state for another period of 2 weeks. At the expiration of a month she resumed her duties as a stenographer.

[1] That respondent was not guilty of contributory negligence and that she was not engaged in a common or joint enterprise with Mr. Fisher, under the undisputed evidence in the case, there is not room for a difference of opinion. She was clearly the guest of Fisher. In Pope v. Halpern, 193 Cal. 168, 223 P. 470, this court very clearly pointed out the difference between persons who are engaged in a joint enterprise with another, within the meaning of the law of negligence, and a guest who has no right to be heard in the control and management of an automobile in which he or she is riding. It was there said that—

"In order that there be such a joint enterprise it is not sufficient merely that the passenger of the machine indicate the route, or that both parties have certain plans in common, such as a 'joy ride,' but the community of interest must be such that the passenger is entitled to be heard in the control and management of the vehicle."

Quoting from Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385, and making reference to Wentworth v. Town of Waterbury, 90 Vt. 60, 96 A. 334, the Court in Pope v. Halpern, continuing, said that the doctrine of imputed negligence should not be applied to those cases, where—

"The only basis for the imputation of negligence of the driver of an automobile to the plaintiff was the circumstance that they were both engaged in the common purpose of taking two ladies for an afternoon's drive to view a lake. * * * To do so leaves the law in an uncertain state. The better view is expressed by Nonn v. Chicago City Ry. Co., 232 Ill. 378 (122 Am. St. Rep. 114, 83 N. E. 924): 'There can be no such thing as imputable negligence, except in those cases where such a relation exists as that of master and servant or of principal and agent. In order that the negligence of one person may be properly imputed to another, they must stand in such relation of privity that the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se directly applies.' Indeed, no other rule is consistent with section 1714 of the Civil Code, wherein it is declared that every one is responsible for an injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care 'except so far as the latter has, willfully or by want of ordinary care, brought the injury upon himself.'"

The respondent did not drive the automobile at any time, nor did she exercise any control or management over it whatsoever. Therefore the contributory negligence attributable to Fisher, if any, would not bar her right of recovery against appellant, unless it was shown that she was guilty of negligence. There is no evidence in the record that would indicate that respondent was guilty of independent negligence in the remotest degree. She violated no duty to herself or to others, and it is not shown that she neglected to do anything that a reasonable person in her situation should have done or that she did anything that could be regarded as negligence on her part under the circumstances of the collision.

legations of the complaint; that there was a variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof; that the evidence does not support the verdict; erroneous instructions on the part of the court; and excessive damages. No reference is made to the part Fisher played in the complaint. The allegation as to appellant is that, while plaintiff was riding in a Ford coupé in the city of San Fernando, and was proceeding in a southerly direction on Porter avenue, near the junction of Porter avenue and Brand boulevard in said city, the defendant, its agents, servants, and employees, so negligently, carelessly, and unlawfully operated its motor truck in approaching the automobile in which plaintiff was riding that said motor truck ran into and collided with said automobile, thereby shattering the glass in said machine, and injuring plaintiff, as described in the complaint. The complaint contains the following allegation, which is made the basis of an attack upon the theory that it is not supported by the proofs:

"That in said collision, caused alone by the negligence of defendants, aforesaid," etc. (Italics supplied.)

In addition to the permanent facial disfigurements, it was alleged that she was hurt in her health, strength, and activities, and received a severe shock to her nervous system, and from the injuries received she has suffered great physical pain and mental anguish on account of the disfigurements which she has and will sustain, and that by reason of her injuries she has been unfit and unable to work at the usual duties of her employment, or any employment since the time of her injury. Appellant forthwith answered, specifically denying each of the material allegations of the complaint, and in addition thereto alleged affirmatively that respondent was engaged in a joint and common enterprise with the aforesaid James Fisher, and that each of them exercised joint and common control as to the places that Fisher visited and the speed at which they were driving, and that each of them was careless and negligent, in that they failed to keep a proper lookout for automobiles, and that the automobile in which they were riding was carelessly and negligently driven by Fisher, with the consent and knowledge of plaintiff, and that such negligence directly and proximately contributed to the happening of the accident in question.

[2-4] That which has been heretofore said disposes of the contributory negligence claim imputed to respondent by appellant. The objections made to the allegation of the complaint that the injuries were caused alone by the negligence of appellant loses much of the force it may otherwise have had but for the affirmative allegations of the answer which ex industria brought into the case the issue of Fisher's alleged negligence.

By the answer it is alleged that his negligence wholly caused the collision, and that, as both he and respondent were engaged in a joint and common enterprise, his negligence was attributable to respondent. But there are two answers to appellant's claim of prejudicial error arising from the pleadings. First, appellant specifically put in issue the alleged negligence of Fisher as a defense, and the case was tried upon the theory that Fisher's negligence and his relation to respondent were material factors in the case. Second, the jury was fully and correctly instructed as to the extent that Fisher's negligence should be made referable to respondent if it should find that they were engaged in a joint or common enterprise. If the jury believed that both Fisher and appellant were negligent, but that respondent was a guest of Fisher, and, further, that she was not guilty of negligence, such joint negligence would, if it contributed proximately to the injuries, render either or both liable in damages. If the injuries of respondent were caused by the negligent act of appellant, its liability would not, so far as respondent is concerned, be lessened by the fact that the negligence of Fisher was also a contributing cause. There being at least substantial evidence pointing to negligence on the part of appellant, and there being no evidence whatever of respondent's negligence, the finding of the jury cannot be disturbed. The pleading of Fisher's negligence was new matter in avoidance, or constituting a defense, and must, on the trial, be deemed controverted by the opposite party. Code Civ. Proc. § 462; Platner v. Vincent, 94 Cal. 436, 229 P. 24; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 P. 630; Peck v. Noe, 154 Cal. 351, 97 P. 865; Jose Realty Co. v. Pavlicevich, 164 Cal. 613, 130 P. 15; Curtiss v. Sprague, 49 Cal. 301; Wendling, etc., Co. v. Glenwood, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 411, 95 P. 1029; 2 Cal. Jur. 1017. We conclude that the appellant could not have been misled to its prejudice by the omission to jointly charge Fisher with negligence. The case was tried upon the issue as tendered by appellant.

[5] The court instructed the jury that—

"If they should find from the evidence in the case that defendant at the time and place of the collision herein complained of violated any of the provisions of the state Motor Vehicle Act, then it is your duty to find that defendant was guilty of negligence."

The portion of the instruction objected to contains the words "violated any of the provisions of the state Motor Vehicle Act." It is argued that the words within the quotation marks were not limited to those violations of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1917, p. 382, St. 1919, p. 191) upon which respondent relied as the cause of her injuries. It is insisted that by the instruction as given the jury was told that any violation of the Motor Vehicle Act, whether or not it had any causative relation to the injuries inflicted, might be considered as a material element in the determination of the question of liability. It is scarcely conceivable that the jury should have been thus misled. Practically the only question in the case was whether or not the driver of the truck was guilty of negligence by continuing his course from one side of the street into the other in the face of the admitted fact that he saw Fisher at some distance prior to the collision, and knew, or ought to have known, that he would soon be in his path without giving an alarm of any kind whatsoever. But if it may be said that appellant suffered prejudice by the criticized instruction standing alone the prejudice was removed by the giving of other instructions. The court later told the jury that, under the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act in force at the time of the collision, there was no provision of law which prohibited the defendant from operating its truck so that it might be driven into the oil station as described by the testimony, provided the defendant exercised due care in thus operating his truck so that it might be driven into the oil station, and by otherwise complying with the law regulating the operation of motor vehicles upon public highways. "Therefore if you shall find that the defendant was otherwise operating his truck in a careful and prudent manner, and in accordance with the law, you would not be justified in finding for the plaintiff solely for the reason that the defendant operated its truck across the street and into the oil station." As to those violations of the act which the court said constituted negligence per se under the Motor Vehicle Act, there was none which was not germane to the duty of the defendant in making the street crossing at the time of the collision. The jury could not have been led into the realm of surmises as to other violations of the Motor Vehicle Act inasmuch as none other was claimed to have occurred.

[6] The court at considerable length instructed the jury as to the meaning of the terms, "a man of ordinary prudence," and "ordinarily prudent person," and a "reasonable man." These terms, like the term "reasonable doubt," are easily understood, but are difficult to define. It is claimed that by giving the instruction the court violated the rule laid down in the case of Freeman v. Adams, 63 Cal. App. 225, 218 P. 600. In that case the court gave the following instruction:

"In determining what a reasonable and prudent man would do under the circumstances you will remember that presumably a jury is composed of such reasonable and prudent persons, and you may each ask yourself, did the defendants do, or fail to do, anything which under the circumstances, I would not have done or would have done."

It is difficult to understand how jurors, if not men of reasonable understanding, would be able to determine whether others whose conduct is under investigation acted in a reasonable manner. The instruction considered in its entirety does not run counter to the instruction given in the Freeman Case, nor is it open to the interpretation that, if there be two or more lawful modes or methods by which a lawful act may be performed, a person who in good faith selects one of said modes, and injures another in the performance of said act, while acting as a reasonably prudent and cautious person, will, nevertheless, be held liable in damages therefor merely because it should thereafter appear that, had he selected one of the other lawful modes or methods, the injury would not, in all human probability, have happened.

It is true, as pointed out by appellant, the court, in its effort to enlarge upon the meaning of the term "a man of ordinary prudence," etc., did close one sentence with the interrogatory, "What would I have done under such circumstances?" but the phrase was used relative to the conduct of "a person of ordinary prudence," or "a reasonable man." But immediately preceding the clause last above mentioned the court said:

"In other words, in measuring the conduct of men and determining whether or not they are negligent in those cases which do not arise from contract, * * * we must compare their conduct with that of the average man, or, to use the language we are accustomed to, the ordinary man."

And later it instructed as follows:

"The question for you to determine is: 'Under all the facts and circumstances as shown you by the evidence did the parties whose conduct is under consideration act as ordinarily prudent men would act?' If they did not they were negligent and if either failed in this particular he was negligent. It should be observed that the care to be exercised by a person of ordinary prudence varies with the condition under which he is called upon to act. In other words, the care that an ordinarily prudent person must use in the exercise of ordinary prudence in dealing with agencies that because of power of momentum or for any other reason are liable to do great injury is very much greater than under other circumstances."

[7] The same general thought runs through the entire charge. We see nothing in the criticized instruction that should have confused the jury as to what was meant by the well-known terms. The meaning of said terms is well understood by the average person, and ordinarily it is better to leave their meaning with the understanding of an average man than to hazard the difficulty and danger of an amplification thereof.

[8] The last and most serious question for consideration is whether or not the verdict is as a matter of law excessive. Three surgeons, one of whom treated the respondent, testified that in their opinion the cuts made upon respondent's face by broken glass had left permanent scars. The nature of the wounds and the extent to which they disfigured the face of the respondent we are unable to determine, as she has not been in our presence for observation. We are therefore compelled to defer to the opinions of the three physicians who examined her, and the judgment of the court and jury to whom the injuries were exhibited. Doctor J. G. Mackey, who attended respondent immediately after she received the injuries, gave a description of the same. We quote from appellant's brief a short but fair résumé of his testimony:

"If she (respondent) will come here, I can show the jury a whole lot more than I can describe. There is one cut here, extending—you cannot see for the hair now—extending from here down to here. There is a scar on the left side of the face, extending from about an inch in the hair line, down over the ramus of the superior maxilla or superior jaw. I mean the cheek bone. Carrying it down through the muscles here, cutting the nerve, one branch of the seventh nerve, that comes across to supply the eyebrow here, and then on the left side of the face again there was a cut here, over the jaw, and one just below the jaw on the same side, a very irregular cut there. Under the chin there was a horse-shoe incision here, about —oh, it was about an inch wide, and about an inch and a half long, as I remember. It is hard to see it in this light. On the other side of the face there was another deep cut here, extending thus—pretty near to the ear, clear across underneath the jaw, and coming over the jaw to very nearly even with the mouth, you see, here; and then another one on the right cheek, which is very deep; and then there were numerous little cuts. I think I took about 35 stitches, all told, in the face. It was very extensive."

[9] In addition to the foregoing, it was testified to by one of the witnesses that she received numerous cuts upon the neck. The doctor who attended her testified that the accident was a severe shock to her nerves at the time, and that she lost a large amount of blood, and was in his hospital for a period of about two weeks. Of course, she suffered pain, and there was some evidence that her nervous system had not, at the time of trial, entirely recovered from shock. Evidently the facial disfigurements constitute the largest element of damages sustained by the respondent. She was a young woman—27 years of age—unmarried, and doubtless has suffered, and will continue to suffer, mortification and humiliation such as naturally comes to one of her sex by reason of permanent scars or blemishes upon her face. Both the jury and the trial court had ample opportunity to observe the natural features and comeliness of the respondent, and the extent of the facial blemishes and disfigurements which she sustained. The court, in passing upon a motion for a new trial, was in a position to have reduced the damages allowed by the jury's verdict had it, in the exercise of a sound discretion, believed the damages excessively large, but instead permitted the verdict of the jury to stand as its appraisal of the damages sustained, and we are not in a position to intelligently challenge the judgment of court and jury with nothing of a substantial character before us to support a contrary conclusion. It is true that no organs of the body were permanently disabled, so far as we are advised. No contradictory evidence was offered by the defense as to the permanent character of the scars which are the result of said injuries. Unless we are able to say that the award of damages made by the jury and sustained by the trial court were grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as presented to us on appeal as to shock the sense of justice and raise at once a presumption that it was the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than an honest and sober judgment, this court may not exercise the power of revision. 8 Cal. Jur. 834; Holmes v. California Crushed Fruit Co. (Cal. App.) 232 P. 178; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SVOBODA v. PURKITT, Judge. (Civ. 5393.)

Criminal law §982—Mandamus §61—Granting probation is discretionary, and discretion of court as to hearing application not reviewable by mandamus.

Where one guilty of robbery in second degree, who was possessed of loaded revolver at time of crime, moved for order placing him on probation, held, in view of Pen. Code, § 1203, court had power to hear application, but whether he would do so was entirely in discretion of court, which cannot be controlled or reviewed by mandamus.

Application by Charles Svoboda for writ of mandate to be directed to Claude F. Purkitt, Judge of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco. Writ denied.

Milton T. U'Ren, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and William W. Murphy, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An application for a writ of mandate directing respondent, as judge of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, to hear and determine a motion for an order placing petitioner upon probation.

Petitioner was charged by information filed in the court mentioned with the crime of robbery, to which charge he entered a plea of guilty, and respondent thereupon made a finding determining the degree of the crime of which petitioner was guilty to be robbery of the second degree. Petitioner thereupon moved for the order mentioned, which motion respondent declined to hear or consider, for the reason stated in respondent's answer to the petition herein, which is as follows:

"That the sole and only reason for the refusal and failure of said defendant (respondent) to entertain said motion for probation was based upon the belief of this defendant that this defendant was wholly without jurisdiction or power to entertain and/or hear and/or determine said motion for probation by reason of the fact that certain information was given to this defendant that said petitioner was possessed of a deadly weapon, to wit, a loaded revolver, at the time of the commission of said crime, and in this connection defendant alleges that he was ready and willing to assume jurisdiction of said motion for probation and to determine and consider the same provided he, the said defendant, had jurisdiction to entertain said motion and to hear and determine the same."

It is provided by section 1203 of the Penal Code that, "after the conviction by plea or verdict of guilty of a public offense, where discretion is conferred upon the court or any board or commission or other authority as to the extent of the punishment, the court or board or commission or other authority before judgment and sentence and except as hereinafter provided, may upon oral suggestion of either party or of its own motion when it appears that there are circumstances which may properly be taken into view either in aggravation or mitigation of the punishment, may in its discretion refer the same to the probation officer directing said probation officer to investigate and to report, * * * at a specified time, and the court shall hear the same summarily at that specified time and upon such notice to the adverse party as it may direct, * * *" and, further, that nothing contained in the section shall apply to certain cases, including robbery, where the person convicted of such crime was at the time of the commission thereof armed with a deadly weapon. It is contended that the above provisions not only limit the power of the court to grant probation, but also its power to hear and determine a motion therefor, and that, having received the information mentioned in the answer before the making of a motion for relief under the statute, the court is precluded thereby from hearing or acting thereon.

While we are satisfied, in view of the facts in the instant case, that the court has power to hear and determine the application for probation, whether any proceedings to that end shall be entertained is a question resting entirely in the discretion of that court (Pen. Code, § 1203; People v. Dunlop, 27 Cal. App. 460, 470, 150 P. 389), which cannot be controlled or reviewed by mandamus (Kerr v. Sup. Ct., 130 Cal. 183, 62 P. 479; Richards v. Sup. Ct., 145 Cal. 38, 78 P. 244; Realty Construction Co. v. Title, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 543, 132 P. 1048; Bender v. Hatton, 160 Cal. 372, 117 P. 322; Tomkin v. Harris, 90 Cal. 201, 27 P. 202), and the petition for writ of mandate will therefore be denied.

1. Prohibition ⚡11—Writ not available to restrain substitution of new attachment bond.

As superior court has jurisdiction under Code Civ. Proc. § 1057, to grant motion for substitution of new bond for attachment bond given under section 540, writ of prohibition is not available to prevent such action, which would amount to no more than error committed in exercise of jurisdiction.

2. Prohibition ⚡3(3)—Writ will not lie to prevent substitution of new attachment bond, if appeal affords complete and adequate remedy.

Writ of prohibition will not lie to prevent substitution of new attachment bond, if appeal affords complete and adequate remedy and will accomplish same ends, though question of jurisdiction be involved in determination of motion.

3. Appeal and error ⚡81—"Final judgment" from which appeal lies applies to final determination of collateral matter.

"Final judgment," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 963, authorizing appeal from such judgment, is not limited to final or last judgment in action, but applies to final determination of collateral matter, affecting only parties to, and finally settling, particular controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Decree or Judgment.]

4. Appeal and error ⚡81—Order in collateral proceeding finally disposing of controversy therein, is "final judgment."

Order requiring doing of some act by or against aggrieved party, not merely conditional or interlocutory in nature or reviewable with or as part of final judgment in action, and made in collateral proceeding finally disposing of matter there in controversy, is final judgment, and hence appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

5. Appeal and error ⚡81—Order granting motion to substitute new attachment bond appealable.

As order on motion to substitute new attachment bond would not become part of judgment roll under Code Civ. Proc. § 670, and such bond constitutes contract in which parties to action are beneficially interested, granting of motion would finally determine certain legal rights and obligations not subject to adjudication in action itself, and hence could not be reviewed on appeal from judgment therein, so that aggrieved parties could appeal from order and give stay bond under section 943, thus precluding use of prohibition to restrain substitution.

Application by the Colma Vegetable Association for writ of prohibition to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and George H. Cabaniss, Judge thereof, to prevent substitution of personal for surety bond. Alternative writ discharged, and petition denied.

Harry H. Baier, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Howard Harron, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition. The material facts alleged in the petition and in the affidavit attached thereto are not disputed, and may be stated as follows:

The petitioner, Colma Vegetable Association, a corporation, brought suit in the superior court in and for San Mateo county to recover from G. Bonetti and G. Bonetti & Co., a copartnership, the sum of $1,000 as liquidated damages for the alleged breach of a marketing agreement. A writ of attachment was issued and directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco for service. Pursuant to said writ an automobile truck belonging to said defendants was attached by said sheriff, and thereupon, but prior to the return of said writ or the appearance of the defendants in said action, said defendants, availing themselves of the provisions of section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure, caused to be delivered to and deposited with said sheriff a bond or undertaking in the principal sum of $1,500, executed by the Royal Indemnity Company, a corporation, as surety, which bond or undertaking, it is alleged, was "accepted by the said sheriff after approval by the court pursuant to section 540" of said Code, and the property seized by virtue of said writ, which is alleged to be of a value greater than $1,000, was thereupon released from said attachment. The trial of the action followed, and on July 28, 1925, the trial court announced its decision awarding damages in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $500 only. At the time this proceeding was instituted findings in the action had not been made, and judgment had not been entered. On August 14, 1925, defendants served notice that they would move the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, Department 3 thereof, "for an order directing the substitution of a personal bond in lieu and place of the bond of the Royal Indemnity Company." Said motion was heard on August 21, 1925, petitioner appearing therein and objecting to the proceeding upon the ground "that said court had no jurisdiction to entertain, pass upon or grant said motion." The petitioner avers that said court overruled said objection, and "announced in open court" that the motion would be granted. It does not appear, however, that the order granting said motion has ever been made or entered. In the supporting affidavit, filed with defendants' notice of motion for the substitution of said bond, it is set forth that at the time defendants procured said indemnity company to qualify and act as surety on said bond they deposited with said indemnity company the sum of $1,500 in cash, which deposit defendants now desire to withdraw "and have said bond canceled and annulled, and in lieu thereof a personal bond in the sum of fifteen hundred ($1,500) dollars substituted therefor"; and in this connection petitioner alleges that "the said surety company, upon the substitution of said bond, will return to the defendants the said collateral security, and the bond heretofore executed by the said surety company will be returned to the said surety company and will be canceled, annulled, lost, and destroyed."

It is the contention of petitioner that the jurisdiction of a superior court, or of a judge thereof, in regard to a bond given upon release of an attachment, is limited by statute to the acts of approving said bond (Code Civ. Proc. § 540; Ayres v. Burr, 132 Cal. 125, 64 P. 120), and of requiring a new bond to be given if it appears "to the satisfaction of the court that any surety upon such undertaking has for any reason become insufficient" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1057); that since it is not claimed by the moving party herein that the surety on said bond has become insufficient, the court is without jurisdiction to entertain a motion or to grant an order for the substitution of the bond for any other purpose. We are of the opinion that whether the proceeding which the petitioner seeks to arrest is or is not without or in excess of the jurisdiction of said court, the writ of prohibition herein applied for ought not to issue, for the reason that the petitioner has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal from any order the court may make by which it would be injuriously affected.

[1, 2] By virtue of section 1057 of said Code of Civil Procedure, the superior court is expressly vested with jurisdiction to entertain and to grant a motion for substitution of a new bond upon certain grounds. Its authority therefore to decide such a motion correctly or incorrectly is beyond question. Assuming, then, as petitioner contends, that said court intends to and will decide such motion erroneously, it follows that its action in that respect would amount to no more than error committed in the exercise of its jurisdiction (Department of Public Works v. Superior Court [Cal. Sup.] 239 P. 1076), and it is well settled that a writ of prohibition is not available to restrain the commission of error (Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903; High on Extraordinary Remedies, § 772). As above suggested, even though a question of jurisdiction be involved in the determination of such motion the writ will not lie if an appeal affords a complete and adequate remedy and will accomplish the same ends. Glougie v. Superior Court, 169 Cal. 675, 147 P. 972; Lindley v. Superior Court, 141 Cal. 220, 74 P. 765; Jacobs v. Superior Court, 133 Cal. 364, 65 P. 826, 85 Am. St. Rep. 204; White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 54, 42 P. 471; Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 101, 27 P. 49; Johnston v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. App. 90, 87 P. 211.

[3] That petitioner has such right of appeal from any adverse order that might be made in the determination of said motion is quite certain. Section 963 of said Code of Civil Procedure, in declaring when an appeal may be taken, provides in part:

"An appeal may be taken from a superior court in the following cases: 1. From a final judgment entered in an action, or special proceeding, commenced in a superior court, or brought into a superior court from another court."

[4] The term "final judgment," as used in said section, is not limited, however, to final judgment in the action, or to the last judgment necessarily rendered therein. Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 185, 7 P. 456, 635, 8 P. 709. "It applies also to a final determination of a collateral matter distinct from the general subject of litigation, affecting only the parties to the particular controversy and finally settling the same." 2 Cal. Jur. p. 144, and authorities therein cited; Cline v. Superior Court, 35 Cal. App. 150, 169 P. 453. "A judgment that is conclusive of any question in a case is final as to that question. The Code provides for an appeal from a final judgment, not from the final judgment in the action." Sharon v. Sharon, supra. If the order requires the doing of some act by or against the aggrieved party, and is not merely conditional or interlocutory in its nature, or one that may be reviewed with or as a part of the final judgment in the action, and is made in a collateral proceeding which finally disposes of the matter there in controversy, the order is in effect a final judgment, and therefore appealable. Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Cal. Development Co., 159 Cal. 484, 114 P. 838; Hildebrand v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 86, 159 P. 147; City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Water Co., 134 Cal. 121; Cline v. Superior Court, supra; Sharon v. Sharon, supra. The order that might be made in the instant proceeding would not become a part of the judgment roll. Code Civ. Proc. § 670. And a bond such as we have here under consideration is not given alone for the protection of the sheriff, but constitutes a contract in which the parties to the action are beneficially interested. Ayres v. Burr, 132 Cal. 125, 64 P. 120.

[5] The granting of the motion herein for the substitution of the bond would therefore have the effect of finally determining certain legal rights and obligations of these parties, arising out of said bond which are not subject to adjudication in the trial of the action itself, and, consequently, could not be reviewed upon an appeal from any judgment which might be rendered therein. In view of that situation, and having in mind the authorities hereinabove cited, it would seem obvious that either the petitioner or the sheriff (Cline v. Superior Court, supra), if they be the aggrieved parties, would have the right of appeal from any adverse order the court may choose to make in the premises, and, upon taking such appeal, may give a stay bond (section 943, Code Civ. Proc.), so as to prevent the surrender of the bond now held by the sheriff, and thus protect the interests of all parties concerned until the appeal is heard and determined.

The alternative writ is discharged, and the petition is denied.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

PEOPLE v. DUTRO et al. (Cr. 1241.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 6, 1925. Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 4, 1926.)

1. Criminal law § 1158(4)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence that confession was voluntary not interfered with.

Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence that confession was made voluntarily, without hope of reward or promise of immunity, and hence admissible, will not be interfered with by appellate court.

2. Criminal law § 736(2)—Whether confession is voluntary for court to decide at outset.

Whether confession is free and voluntary is for court to decide at outset.

3. Criminal law § 736(2), 741(3)—Whether confession was voluntary for jury, though admissibility is for court in first instance, and jury is judge of its weight.

Admission of confession is for court to decide in first instance, but it should finally go to jury to determine whether it was free and voluntary act and what weight should be given to it.

4. Criminal law § 530—Admission of confession, not stating name of complaining witness nor place of robbery, held not error.

Admission of confession, not stating name of victim nor place of alleged robbery, held not error, where time of act and amount obtained were clearly stated, and it appeared from testimony on voir dire that subject of discussion between defendant and officers at time of confession was robbery of such victim.

5. Criminal law § 531(2)—Officer's testimony as to mask found and as to defendants' planning a bank robbery held immaterial and incompetent.

Officer's testimony, on voir dire examination concerning admission of confession of robbery, as to mask found and bank robbery planned, held immaterial and incompetent as respects case in chief.

6. Criminal law § 1169(1)—Admission of officer's testimony as to mask found and planned bank robbery held not prejudicial error.

Admission of officer's testimony, on voir dire examination concerning admission of confession of robbery, as to mask found and planned bank robbery mentioned in officer's conversation with defendant immediately before signing of confession, which defendants had testified was obtained by threats and coercion, held not prejudicial error.

7. Criminal law § 875(2)—Verdict held not void because of foreman's failure to insert word.

Verdict reciting that jury finds defendant guilty of robbery, "and find it to — robbery of the first degree," held not void because of foreman's failure to insert word "be" after "to"; verdict clearly showing that jury intended to and did find defendant guilty of first degree robbery.

8. Criminal law § 875(3)—Error in grammar or use of words in verdict immaterial, when language clearly shows intent.

Any error in grammar or use of words in verdict is immaterial, when language clearly shows what is intended.

9. Criminal law § 726—District attorney's reference to defendant's failure to deny charge on witness stand held justified by argument of defendant's attorney.

Where defendant's attorney in argument to jury asserted that defendants, who testified only in voir dire on question whether confession was voluntary, had denied on witness stand any complicity in robbery charge, district attorney had right to ask jury whether there was any evidence from lips of either defendant on witness stand in denial of or concerning robbery.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 1037(2)—Defendant, not requesting instruction to disregard district attorney's remarks, cannot complain thereof on appeal.

Where defendant did not request instruction to disregard district attorney's remarks concerning defendant's failure to deny robbery on witness stand, and evidence overwhelmingly pointed to guilt, defendant cannot complain of such remarks on appeal.

11. Robbery $\S$ 24(1)—Conviction held supported by evidence.

Conviction of robbery held supported by evidence.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 1165(1)—Conviction supported by evidence not reversed for error in rulings by which jury was not misled.

Conviction supported by abundant evidence will not be reversed for error in rulings by which jury was not misled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Arthur Dutro and Marion D. Stuart were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; CURTIS, J., disqualified and not participating.

Marshall A. Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for appellant Dutro.

L. G. McArthur and Earl W. Wood, both of San Francisco, for appellant Stuart.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Appellants, Arthur Dutro and Marion D. Stuart, were jointly charged by information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county with the crime of robbery. From the judgment upon a verdict of guilty, and the order denying their motion for a new trial, appellants prosecute this appeal.

Appellant Stuart alone has filed briefs; it being stipulated, however, that the appellant Dutro rests his appeal upon the points and authorities filed on behalf of appellant Stuart.

The complaining witness, one Lionel Gardner, testified that at about 7 o'clock on the evening of October 24, 1924, while walking along Seventh street, in the city of Long Beach, he was met by Dutro and Stuart, appellants herein, coming from the opposite direction. As they met, one of the appellants addressed Gardner with the inquiry, "Where are you going?" Upon the failure of Gardner to immediately reply, defendant Dutro stepped back of Gardner, while defendant Stuart drew a revolver, and, pointing it at him, demanded, "Have you got anything?" Under the influence of the revolver, Gardner replied, "Yes;" and handed over to Stuart three $1 bills. Thereupon Gardner was told to "Beat it," which advice he proceeded to obey with alacrity. As soon as possible thereafter, Gardner communicated the fact of the holdup to the police of Long Beach, giving a detailed description of both Dutro and Stuart.

On the following morning Gardner was called to the Long Beach Police Station where he at once identified the defendants, who had been arrested that morning upon the description given the night before by him.

It further appears from the record that within a few hours after the arrest of the defendants, through the efforts of the police, defendant Dutro was induced to write out and sign an alleged confession, which paper was subsequently shown to the defendant Stuart and signed by him. The offer and admission of this alleged confession over appellant's objection is the first point urged as a ground for reversal. Appellant Stuart in his brief uses the following language in stating this point:

"The court erred in admitting the alleged written confession of Marion D. Stuart, for the reason that the voir dire evidence conclusively shows that this alleged confession was not voluntarily signed. The alleged confession was procured by indirect promises of reward, threats, and the beating of the defendant Stuart and torturing of the defendant Dutro, as is conclusively shown by the evidence."

[1, 2] An examination of the voluminous transcript, some 400 pages of which is devoted to the examination of witnesses, and more or less bickering on the part of several of the counsel in the case, in connection with the admission of the alleged confession in evidence, discloses the fact that the evidence upon the question as to whether or not the confession was made voluntarily and without hope of reward or promise of immunity and not under duress, is in marked conflict, and, under the well-established rule, this court will not interfere with the finding of the trial court on this question. People v. Fouts, 61 Cal. App. 242, 214 P. 657. It is well settled that the question as to whether or not a confession is free and voluntary is at the outset one for the court to decide. People v. Castello, 194 Cal. 595, 229 P. 855; People v. Black and France (Cal. App.) 238 P. 374.

We do not deem it necessary, under the circumstances, to discuss the relative weight or merit of the testimony offered on this point, but we are moved to observe in passing that the evidence cannot under any circumstances justify the use of the word "conclusively," as used by appellants in stating their point.

[3] The second point urged is that error was committed by the trial court in giving to the jury the following instruction:

"You are instructed that the action on the part of the court in admitting the alleged confession or statement into evidence does not bind you to accept the court's conclusion, and that the question as to whether such alleged confession, or statement, if made, was voluntary or not, is for you to determine. If you conclude that it was not made voluntarily, then you have the right to, and it is your duty to, disregard the same altogether. In other words, you have the right to reconsider the question as to whether the same was voluntary or not, and in this connection you are the judges of the effect and value of the evidence and of the credibility of the witnesses as the same pertains to such alleged confession or statement."

It is the well-settled rule in this state that the question of the admission of an alleged confession is in the first instance one for the court to decide. It is, however, a matter that should finally go to the jury, which body has the right to determine what, if any, weight is to be given to the alleged confession, and whether or not the confession was a free and voluntary act of the defendant. People v. Castello, 194 Cal. 595, 229 P. 855; People v. Black and France (Cal. App.) 238 P. 374.

[4] Appellants further urge that error was committed in admitting the alleged confession written by the appellant Dutro, for the reason that nowhere in the writing does the name of the complaining witness Gardner appear as the person from whom the $3 was taken, nor does the confession designate the place where the alleged holdup occurred. It is true that these matters of information do not appear in the writing, and yet the language clearly states the fact that the act was committed the night before, and the amount obtained by the holdup men was $3. Furthermore, it appears from the testimony given on voir dire that, prior to and at the time the confession was written by the appellant Dutro, the subject under discussion between him and the officers was the robbery of Gardner, and it was the robbery of Gardner with the statements as to time and place it occurred that was charged to the appellants. There can be no doubt that, at the time Dutro wrote and signed the confession, as well as at the time Stuart attached his name to it, both appellants knew that the affair referred to in the written confession was the holdup of the complaining witness Gardner.

[5, 6] Another point urged by appellants as a reason for reversal of the judgment is the fact that, during the voir dire examination relating to the admission of the written confession, the court permitted certain testimony to be given by one of the officers relating to a mask found and also a planned bank robbery. It appears from the record that, during the conversation had by this officer with the defendant Dutro prior to the writing of the confession, mention was made of a certain mask which the officers questioned appellant Dutro about, and which the officers claimed belonged to Dutro. In this same conversation reference was also made to an alleged plan or attempt to rob a bank by the appellants. Questions and answers relating to these matters were objected to by appellants and overruled by the court. The admission of this testimony, it is urged, was a serious error operating to the disadvantage of the appellants, particularly in view of the fact that the complaining witness Gardner testified that neither of the appellants wore a mask at the time of the holdup. Manifestly the evidence relating to the mask and to any planned bank robbery was immaterial and incompetent so far as this case in chief was concerned. But we are not prepared to say that there was prejudicial error in admitting this testimony, which was received after the defendants had testified to the effect that the confession had been obtained by means of threats and coercion. The matters objected to formed a part of the conversation and discussion between the appellants and the officers at the time that the officers were endeavoring to ascertain information concerning the history and conduct of appellants in and about Long Beach, and all of this conversation took place immediately prior to the signing of the confession and at the time that the appellants claimed they were being subjected to brutal treatment and undue influence which resulted in the confession. That the court intended to and did limit the testimony to the voir dire examination appears from the fact that the court gave to the jury the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that all the evidence in this case pertaining to a mask, the larceny of an automobile, and an intent or attempt to rob a bank, if you find that there is any such evidence in this case, should be entirely disregarded by the jury in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendants as to the offense charged in the information."

"We, the jury in the above-entitled action find the defendant Marion D. Stuart guilty of robbery, a felony as charged in the information, and find it to — robbery of the first degree."

[8] Appellant Stuart contends that the verdict is null and void, because of the failure of the foreman to insert the word "be" between the words "to" and "robbery." There is absolutely no merit in this contention. The verdict clearly shows that the jury intended to find and did find the defendant guilty of robbery in the first degree. Any error in grammar or the use of words when the language clearly shows what is intended is wholly immaterial. The record shows that in the verdict found against the defendant Dutro the foreman did insert the word "be," but apparently overlooked this in the Stuart verdict.

[9] It is urged that prejudicial error was committed by the district attorney, in that during his argument in connection with this matter he used the following language:

"And he was afraid they were going to kill him. That is why he signed it. Did they ask him if the confession was true or false? No. They begged the issue. If it had been false, do you not think there would have been some testimony, when they were on the voir dire proceeding, to that effect? Mr. Stutsman said that 'they denied to the Long Beach officers at the time of their arrest; they denied it on the 25th; and they have denied it; and they denied it on the witness stand.' Is there a single bit of evidence from the lips of either of these defendants on the witness stand in denial? Is there a single bit of evidence in this record from the lips of the defendant or either of them concerning the robbery?"

[10] An examination of the record discloses the fact that the attorney for defendant Dutro, in his argument to the jury, asserted that the defendants had denied upon the witness stand any complicity in the robbery. It was evidently this statement of defendant's counsel that the district attorney was answering. It appears that the defendants took the witness stand only for the purpose of testifying in voir dire on the question of whether the confession had been given freely and voluntarily. Evidently counsel for the defendant in his argument, referring to the fact that the defendant had denied the commission of the offense while on the witness stand, referred to the testimony given on the voir dire examination. But the appellants now contend, even if that be true, the district attorney had no right to refer to it in his argument. This contention might have been upheld were it not for the fact that the attorney for the appellant Dutro invited the district attorney to use the language he did, by making the assertions that the defendants had denied that they were implicated in the offense. Without question the district attorney had a right to answer or reply to any assertion of fact made by the defendant's counsel in his argument to the jury, and the record clearly shows this is all that the district attorney did or attempted to do. It does not appear that the district attorney made any further reference to the matter after the controversy which took place at the time that the district attorney made the statement in question had closed. Nor did appellant request the court to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks made by the district attorney. In the light of the overwhelming evidence produced in the case pointing to the defendant's guilt, we do not believe, from any standpoint in considering this question, the appellant can be heard to complain. People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 193 P. 92.

[11, 12] Other points are urged by appellants in support of their request for a reversal of the judgment, but we do not deem them of sufficient importance to merit detailed attention. Conceding that there may have been a deviation by the court from a correct course in some of its rulings, we do not feel that any such error justifies a reversal of the judgment. The record shows an abundance of evidence to support the verdict, and we are satisfied that the jury was not misled by any error in the court's ruling.

The judgment of the court and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

A. B. Lindsay was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John W. Bantz, of San Francisco, and Peck, Bunker & Cole and W. B. Bunker, all of Oakland (Henry G. Tardy, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Chas. A. Wetmore, Jr., Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered upon a verdict of a jury finding him guilty of embezzlement.

[1] It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict in several particulars, and also that there is a variance between the information and the proof. At the outset let us state that there are numerous conflicts in the evidence, and we shall not concern ourselves with these conflicts, but proceed upon the assumption that the jury resolved all conflicts against the defendant.

The information charged that on or about November 24, 1922, and before July 11, 1923, in the county of Alameda, state of California, the defendant was the clerk, agent, servant, and bailee of Clara Hellesto and Emil Hellesto, her husband, and by virtue of such employment came into possession of the sum of $1,250, the personal property of the said Clara and Emil Hellesto, and that defendant unlawfully and fraudulently converted, embezzled, and appropriated said personal property to his own use.

[2] The proof was that the defendant was a real estate agent in Oakland, Cal., and about June, 1920, sold a house on Miles avenue in Oakland for Mrs. Hellesto. The purchaser, Mrs. Hayes, made a cash payment of $2,500 on this property, assumed a first mortgage, and gave a promissory note for $1,200, secured by a deed of trust to Mrs.

Hellesto. In July, 1920, Mrs. Hellesto purchased another house on Manila avenue, Oakland. She paid $1,000 down and gave a note secured by a deed of trust for the balance, which note was payable at the Bank of Italy at the rate of $50 a month. Mrs. Hellesto arranged with the defendant to act as her general agent and collect the money upon the Hayes note and the rent from the property on Manila avenue and to make the payments upon her note at the Bank of Italy, pay the taxes upon the Manila avenue property and such other bills as he was authorized to pay, and to pay the balance to her. The defendant received $250 as his commission upon the sale of the property to Mrs. Hayes, which sum was taken out of the initial payment. He also sold the Manila avenue house to one Van Dyke, and later Van Dyke deeded the property back to Mrs. Hellesto and continued to occupy it as a tenant, paying the sum of $1,025 to defendant as the agent of Mrs. Hellesto. Defendant also rented this house to one Cardinet in 1922 for six months at the rate of $75 a month and to a tenant named Genelly for eleven months at $75 a month. The defendant collected money from these various sources for the account of Mrs. Hellesto from July, 1920, to November 24, 1922. In November, 1922, Mrs. Hellesto, not having received an accounting of the proceeds of the Hayes note, asked defendant if Mrs. Hayes had made any more payments upon it. The defendant replied that she had not and asked Mrs. Hellesto to come to his office. She did so on November 24, 1922, and was told that there was then due $542 upon the Hayes note, but that defendant would give Mrs. Hellesto $100 if she needed money and take an assignment of the Hayes note and remit the balance due thereon in monthly payments. At that time the entire amount of the Hayes note had been paid, but Mrs. Hellesto, believing defendant's statement to the contrary, assigned the note to him, which assignment recited a consideration of $542 paid to Mrs. Hellesto and her husband by defendant. Defendant then gave Mrs. Hellesto his check for $100 and his promissory note for $442, as a payment of this Hayes note, although he had collected the full amount thereof from Mrs. Hayes. Before Mrs. Hellesto left defendant's office, defendant's wife, who assisted him in his business, entered, and, upon her suggestion, defendant stated that there was about $242 due him for payments upon the Manila street property and had Mrs. Hellesto indorse that amount as paid upon the back of the note which he had given her. He then had Mrs. Hellesto sign a receipt for $342, received upon the note for $442, leaving a balance of about $99 due thereon. It is to be observed that by these maneuvers defendant secured credit twice for his $100 check. He credited himself with it as a payment upon the Hayes note before he gave his note for the balance, which he said was due—$442. Later, he included it in a receipt for money to apply upon that $442 note. Apart from this, he had two indorsements acknowledging the same amount of money—one on the back of the note and another in a separate receipt. Apart from this, he had falsely represented that the Hayes note had not been paid, and had thus retained for himself the money paid upon it and induced Mrs. Hellesto to accept his unsecured note for this amount and to assign to him a note secured by deed of trust. By this "juggling" of accounts Mrs. Hellesto was led to believe there was nothing more due her on the note, and in the statement compiled by the defendant and his wife, and used by them in the trial of this case, Mrs. Hellesto is given credit for no further sum with reference to this transaction. It thus appears that in this one transaction, in which, according to the defendant's statement, he was to pay Mrs. Hellesto $542, he gave her $100 and credit for $242 owed by her, a total of $342, making a balance due to her of about $200. In addition to this, it appears from the evidence that he collected over $100 interest upon the Hayes note for which he never accounted to Mrs. Hellesto. In his statement used at the trial he mentions only $1,250 as being received upon this note and makes no attempt to account for the interest which he received and which amounted to over $100. Defendant accounted for only $800 rent received from the tenant Van Dyke and for $675 received from Genelly. Van Dyke testified that he had paid $1,025 to the defendant for the account of Mrs. Hellesto, and Genelly testified that he had paid $825. The jury believed the testimony of these men, and this constituted a further embezzlement of $375. In defendant's accounting he charged Mrs. Hellesto with an item of "Check to Mrs. Hellesto $33.90." Defendant claims this item as an offset to the money he collected for Mrs. Hellesto. Mrs. Hellesto stated that this check for $33.90 was given her as change for $100 in currency which she had given to defendant to pay a bill of $66.10, and this is corroborated by documentary evidence in the record. This false entry was another embezzlement.

There is also an item, "Receipt from Mrs. Hellesto $163." Defendant credited himself with this amount in accounting to Mrs. Hellesto. She testified she signed this receipt at the request of the defendant, but that she received no money at that time, but was told by defendant that he had paid this amount upon the Van Pelt paint bill. In another place in the account defendant credited himself with the amount of this bill, thus making two credits for the same item.

If the jury believed Mrs. Hellesto and the other witnesses on behalf of the people, as it had a right to do, it could only conclude that the defendant had misrepresented many things to Mrs. Hellesto and had made false entries in the statement of account and had contrived, by duplication of receipts and misrepresentations as to the amount of money he had collected, to defraud Mrs. Hellesto of many hundreds of dollars. Besides the evidence regarding the specific items mentioned, Mrs. Hellesto testified that defendant had collected about $3,600 for her and had accounted for but $2,400.

It is also to be remarked that the testimony of the defendant, in many respects, is unconvincing. Upon his preliminary examination he stated that in his settlement with Mrs. Hellesto he had represented that the Hayes note in her favor was unpaid at a time when he had collected the full amount thereof. At the trial of the action he contradicted this testimony and insisted that he had told Mrs. Hellesto that the Hayes note had been paid in full. No reasonable explanation is given of the fact that he required an assignment of it to himself. If it had been paid in full and Mrs. Hellesto was so informed, it was only necessary to mark the note paid and return it to the maker. But if the proceeds thereof had been collected by the defendant and not accounted for and the facts had been misrepresented to Mrs. Hellesto as she testified, the reason defendant desired the assignment becomes apparent.

[3] We see no merit in appellant's contention that the proof does not correspond with the allegation in the information that the embezzlement occurred on the 24th day of November, 1922. It was on that date that defendant procured receipts from Mrs. Hellesto and purported to make with her a settlement in full, while concealing and misrepresenting the facts with relation to his collections and disbursements to her damage and loss as hereinbefore set forth. It is true that at a later date Mrs. Hellesto's attorney made a demand upon defendant for the money due her, but this does not change the date of the embezzlement.

[4] Appellant complains that there is a variance between the information and the proof, in that the information alleges the money was the property of Mrs. Hellesto and her husband and that the evidence does not establish that the husband had any interest in the money. Mrs. Hellesto testified that she made the assignment of the Hayes note for herself and her husband, and the assignment recites that this note was executed and delivered to Mrs. Hellesto and her husband. There is also in evidence the complaint in a civil action wherein Mrs. Hellesto and her husband sought to recover the money due them from defendant. While the proof might have been fuller upon this subject, it is, nevertheless, sufficient, and even its entire absence would not prejudice the defendant, as it would be immaterial in the preparation of his defense whether the money was the separate property of Mrs. Hellesto or property of the community. He was misled in no way in the trial of the action.

[5] There are a number of minor objections made which are too trifling to be considered in detail, such as the objection that the information charged the receipt of lawful money of the United States and the proof showed that some of the money had been received by check. Judgments are no longer reversed for such technical inaccuracies.

[6] Appellant complains of the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions. Most of these were refused upon the ground that the jury was fully instructed as to the matters covered thereby and an examination of the instructions as a whole confirms this position.

[7] The only other contention made, while presented as an attack upon certain instructions of the court, is that section 487, Penal Code, prior to its amendment in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 271), making an embezzlement of a sum in excess of fifty dollars a felony embezzlement, is not applicable here. In 1923, this section was amended by raising the value of the property from $50 to $200. The instructions of the court proceeded upon the theory that the statute, as it existed at the time of the commission of the offense, was the law to be applied. Section 329 of the Political Code of California meets the situation. It reads as follows:

"The repeal of any law creating a criminal offense does not constitute a bar to the indictment or information and punishment of any act already committed in violation of the law so repealed, unless the intention to bar such indictment or information and punishment is expressly declared in the repealing act."

The cases of People v. Pratt (Cal. App.) 228 P. 47, People v. Davis (Cal. App.) 227 P. 494, People v. Vincent, 95 Cal. 425, 30 P. 581, and People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 P. 597, 29 P. 61, are in point. Appellant contends, however, that a different rule should apply where the amending statute ameliorates the punishment. No authorities are cited in support of this contention, and such a situation is not excepted from the general rule stated in section 329, Political Code.

The judgment is affirmed.

WISE v. RADIS. (Civ. 4063.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 28, 1925.)

1. Brokers ⇨42—Contract of unlicensed real estate broker to act for another in capacity of broker held illegal and unenforceable.

Under Real Estate Brokers Act, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1294, contract of unlicensed real estate broker to act for another in capacity of such broker for compensation is illegal and unenforceable.

2. Brokers ⇨42—Failure of one of two brokers to obtain license until after sale of property had been negotiated held to render acts of brokers in negotiating sale of property illegal.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1608 and 1667, relating to unlawful contracts, failure of one of two real estate brokers, who had agreed to carry on business and divide profits, to obtain license required by Real Estate Brokers Act as amended by St. 1921, p. 1294, until after negotiation of deal, rendered acts jointly performed by such brokers illegal, and would have rendered recovery against owner of property impossible.

3. Partnership ⇨20—Agreement of real estate brokers to carry on joint enterprise and to divide "profits" and losses held to constitute "partnership."

Profits resulting from joint venture, in which two real estate brokers were engaged, and of which each was to receive equal share, were "profits" in strict sense of such term, and did not constitute compensation to be paid by one to other for services rendered, and such joint venture in general constitutes a "partnership," under Civ. Code, § 2395.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Partnership; Profit.]

4. Brokers ⇨66—Real estate broker not licensed held not entitled to recover share of commission against broker with whom he acted.

Where real estate brokers agreed to share profits of transactions, and one did not have license required by Real Estate Brokers Act, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1294, until after negotiation of sale he could not recover his share of commission from other broker.

5. Contracts ⇨138(1)—Party to illegal contract or transaction cannot enforce rights arising thereunder.

Party to illegal contract or transaction cannot enforce rights arising thereunder.

6. Brokers ⇨66—Defendant may set up illegality of contract as defense.

Courts will not enforce contract between brokers, one of whom did not procure broker's license required by Real Estate Brokers Act, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1294, and will permit defendant, sued for share of profits arising thereunder, to defend thereon because of public policy, regardless of whether defendant was in pari delicto.

7. Contracts ⇨140—Defendant cannot set up as defense to action for accounting of legal transactions that some other transactions are illegal.

Defendant cannot set up as defense to action, based on legal transactions, fact that some other transactions were illegal, especially where transactions were distinct and not so connected as to require court to pass on those which were illegal.

8. Contracts $\hookrightarrow$ 140—If, after execution of illegal contract, parties thereto make new one settling rights, latter contract governs.

If, after illegal contract has been executed, parties thereto make new one, settling their rights as between themselves, latter governs, and original contract becomes functus officio, and no longer is to be reckoned with.

9. Brokers $\hookrightarrow$ 66—Principle that execution of new contract, after entry into illegal contract settling parties' rights, governs relations held not to apply to party seeking recovery on executory illegal contract.

Doctrine that, after illegal contract has been executed, if parties make new one settling rights between themselves, latter governs, and former is not to be reckoned with, does not apply in action by real estate broker to enforce contract with another broker to pay him share of profits of joint enterprise, defended on ground that plaintiff had failed to procure broker's license required by Real Estate Brokers Act, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1294.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Wise against W. F. Radis to recover a real estate broker's commission. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Clark, Law & Clay, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. C. Mishler, John F. Keogh, and Julius V. Patrosso, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover a sum which plaintiff claims is due him as his share of a commission jointly earned by himself and defendant in negotiating the sale of certain real property on behalf of the owner. The commission was paid to the defendant by the owner of the property. The complaint, which is cast in the form of a common count for money had and received, alleges that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $875 for money received by the former to and for plaintiff's use. From a judgment for plaintiff in the sum sued for the defendant appeals.

It is the theory of plaintiff that he and defendant were partners in the real estate transaction in which was earned the commission that was paid to defendant, and that therefore he is entitled to recover from defendant one-half of the commission so received by the latter. Briefly, the facts are these: During the year 1921 each of the parties to the action was a real estate broker engaged in business as such in the city of Los Angeles. Each maintained an office at his own residence, and each had obtained a real estate broker's license for the year 1921, issued to him individually. In the early part of that year they orally agreed to work together as brokers in negotiating the purchase and sale of real properties. They agreed to divide equally all profits and losses made or incurred by them in each deal. Plaintiff testified that "each deal would be closed up separately"; that, upon closing each deal, they "would divide the profits after the expenses had been paid," and that they "arranged to and did work together" on each deal. Some time in the month of November, 1921, the property, the sale of which resulted in the payment of the commission here in question, was listed by the owner with the parties to this action to negotiate a sale thereof as real estate brokers. Thereupon plaintiff and defendant caused a painted sign to be placed upon the premises, which read in part:

"For Sale. See Radis & Wise, * * * exclusive agents."

On January 6, 1922, plaintiff and defendant commenced the negotiations with the prospective buyer who later purchased the property, and on January 10, 1922, that person and the owner, who meanwhile had been introduced to one another by the parties to this action, came to an agreement upon the terms of the sale. On that date, therefore (January 10, 1922), plaintiff and defendant earned the commission which the vendor had agreed to pay them for their services. Thereafter, and prior to the commencement of the action, the vendor paid the full amount of the commission, amounting to $1,750, to defendant, who keeps it and refuses to pay any part of it to plaintiff. It is a fair inference from all the evidence in the case that defendant, before the commencement of the negotiations with the person who later bought the property, had applied for and had received his real estate broker's license for the year 1922. Plaintiff, however, did not apply for his license for the year 1922 until January 28th of that year, and none was issued to him until the 31st day of that month, or about three weeks after the sale of the property and the accrual of any right of action against the owner for the agreed commission. It may reasonably be inferred from all the testimony in the case that at no time did plaintiff or defendant apply for or receive a copartnership real estate broker's license, i. e., a real estate broker's license issued to the copartnership, as such, in the firm name. Whatever license either possessed was one which had been issued to him individually and not as a member of a copartnership.

Appellant contends: (1) That, since he and respondent earned the commission as copartners, the latter must fail in this action, for the reason that one partner cannot maintain assumpsit for moneys received by his copartner, but must resort to equity for an accounting; and (2) that to succeed in his action respondent must rely upon a contract which is illegal under the provisions of the Real Estate Brokers Act. Stats. 1919, p. 1252; amended 1921, Stats. 1921, p. 1294. In reply to appellant's first point, respondent contends that each real estate "deal," jointly participated in by them, was a separate partnership transaction, and that, while it is the general rule that one partner cannot maintain an action at law for moneys received by his copartner, but must resort to equity for an accounting, there is an exception to this rule which permits an action in assumption where the right of action is based upon a single partnership transaction and the facts are such that no complex account, involving a variety of partnership transactions, is necessary. As bearing upon this reply to appellant's first point, Jepsen v. Beck, 78 Cal. 540, 21 P. 184, and the authorities cited in the note to Martin v. McBryde, 21 A. L. R. 57, 60, and 64, may be consulted. However, if appellant's second point is well taken, and we think it is, it will not be necessary to determine the question presented by his first point. We shall proceed, therefore, to a consideration of appellant's second point. This point involves two main questions: (1) Was the contract for a commission which was made with the owner of the property illegal under the terms of the Real Estate Brokers Act? Or, what in effect amounts to the same thing, was the transaction under which the commission was earned an illegal transaction? (2) If the contract or transaction was illegal, must respondent rely upon it in order to make out a case against appellant for his share of the commission?

The Real Estate Brokers Act contains these provisions:

Section 1: "It shall be unlawful for any person, copartnership or corporation to engage in the business, or act in the capacity of a real estate broker * * * without first obtaining a license therefor."

Section 2: "A real estate broker within the meaning of this act is a person, copartnership or corporation who, for a compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate * * * for others, as a whole or partial vocation. * * * One act, for a compensation, of buying or selling real estate of or for another, or offering for another to buy or sell * * * real estate * * * shall constitute the person, copartnership or corporation making such offer, sale or purchase * * * a real estate broker within the meaning of this act."

Section 10: " * * * If the licensee be a copartnership, the license issued to it shall entitle one member of said copartnership to engage in the business of real estate broker within the meaning of this act. For each other member of such copartnership who engages in the business of real estate broker within the meaning of this act the annual fee shall be two dollars * * * all licenses shall expire on December thirty-first of each year."

Section 11: " * * * Each person, firm or corporation licensed as a broker under the provisions of this act shall be required to have and maintain a definite place of business in the state of California which shall serve as his [or its] office for the transaction of business."

By section 9 of the act it is provided that each application for a license shall not only state the name of the person, copartnership or corporation applying for the same, but shall also state "the location of the place or places of business for which such license is desired."

Section 11a provides that every individual, firm, or corporation licensed as a broker "shall erect or maintain a sign on the premises wherein is located his [or its] place of business, on which shall be plainly stated that he [or it] is a real estate broker."

Section 18: "It shall be unlawful for any licensed broker to pay a commission for performing any of the acts herein specified to any person who is not a licensed broker, or a licensed salesman."

Section 20: "No person, copartnership or corporation engaged in the business or acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or a real estate salesman within this state shall bring or maintain any action in the courts of this state for the collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section two hereof without alleging and proving that such person, copartnership or corporation was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman at the time the alleged cause of action arose."

The provision in section 2 to the effect that a single act, for a compensation, of buying or selling real estate of or for another, or offering for another to buy or sell real estate, constitutes the person, copartnership, or corporation making such offer, sale, or purchase a real estate broker, means precisely what it says. The particularity with which the clause is phrased "leaves no room for any other interpretation than that which its plain terms import." Haas v. Greenwald (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 38.

The licenses required by the act do not run from year to year. They automatically expire at the close of each calendar year, and a new license must be applied for and issued for the ensuing year. Section 10, subd. 4; Firpo v. Murphy (Cal. App.) 236 P. 968.

[1,2] The contract of an unlicensed real estate broker to act for another in the capacity of such broker, for a compensation, is, without doubt, illegal and unenforceable. Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, 200 P. 55; Gardner v. Tatum, 81 Cal. 370, 22 P. 880. It has been held in analogous cases that no subsequent compliance with the statute will cure the illegality of the previous contract. Gardner v. Tatum, supra; Luce v. Cook, 227 Pa. 224, 75 A. 1093. Section 20 of this act, however, does, in effect and somewhat as an act of grace, permit a recovery by the broker, though he possessed no license when his contract was entered into with the person agreeing to pay the commission, if he in fact became a duly licensed broker by the time his cause of action arose, i. e., at the time when his commission was earned and became payable. Houston v. Williams, supra. That, however, is not this case. No license was issued to respondent for the year 1922 until after the "deal" was closed and the commission was earned.

With the above provisions of the statute in mind, we proceed now to a consideration of the legality of the transaction which the parties to this action carried on with the buyer and the seller of the property. It is obvious that the acts performed by appellant and respondent in bringing buyer and seller together and in negotiating the sale of the property on behalf of the latter were acts performed by them as real estate brokers for an agreed compensation. Those acts, therefore, constituted an illegal transaction, unless the requisite license had been issued at the times when the negotiations were being conducted. Equally obvious is it that, if the requisite license was not issued, the commission which was paid by the owner to appellant was paid as the result of an illegal transaction.

[3] Under the facts of this case the transaction was illegal whether we regard the relation between appellant and respondent as that of partners, in the true sense of that term, or not, though we incline to the view that they were partners in the full meaning of the word. The profits resulting from the joint venture in which they were engaged, and of which each was to receive an equal share, were "profits" in the strict sense of that term, and did not constitute a compensation to be paid by one to the other for services rendered. Their joint venture was an association of two persons to carry on a definite joint enterprise and to divide the profits and losses. This, in general, constitutes a partnership. Civ. Code, § 2395. See Gray v. Janss Investment Co., 186 Cal. 642, 200 P. 401; Quinn v. Quinn, 81 Cal. 14, 22 P. 264; Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 569, 17 P. 702; Westcott v. Gilman, 170 Cal. 562, 569, 150 P. 777, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 437; and Sullivan v. Sullivan, 122 Wis. 326, 99 N. W. 1022. However, as we have stated, the result must be the same whether the relation between appellant and respondent was or was not that of copartners.

If the relation between appellant and respondent was such that a copartnership existed between them, then, if the strict letter of the Real Estate Brokers Act must prevail, it may be gravely doubted whether a copartnership license, issued to the firm as such, was not an essential prerequisite to the validity of the negotiations which appellant and respondent conducted in bringing the buyer and seller together. The language of section one of the act is that it "shall be unlawful for any * * * copartnership to engage in the business, or to act in the capacity, of a real estate broker * * * without first obtaining a license therefor." There would seem to be some reason to believe that this language, when read in connection with other provisions of the act, means that, when a copartnership is acting as a real estate broker, its acts are illegal, unless a copartnership license has been issued to it, and that the issuance of a license to each copartner as an individual real estate broker will not alone suffice to legalize acts done by them for their firm as copartners. Not only does the statute expressly declare that it shall be unlawful for any copartnership to engage in the business, or act in the capacity, of a real estate broker without first obtaining a license therefor, but it also is provided in section 10 that, "if the licensee be a copartnership, the license issued to it shall entitle," etc. And in section 11 it is declared that "each * * * firm licensed as a broker * * * shall be required to have and maintain a definite place of business" in the state "which shall serve as his [its] office for the transaction of business"; and by section 11a that "each * * * firm * * * licensed as a broker * * * shall erect and maintain a sign on the premises wherein is located his [its] place of business, on which shall be plainly stated that he [it] is a real estate broker." We confess that we are unable to perceive how a compliance with these regulatory provisions would be possible where the business is conducted by a firm to which no copartnership license has been issued, even though each of its members may have procured the issuance to him of an individual license, particularly where, as here, the individual copartners have separate and distinct places of business.

However, it is not necessary to decide whether a copartnership license is necessary in a case such as this, and we expressly refrain from doing so, for here one of the joint adventurers neglected to secure a license for the year 1922 until some time after the close of the negotiations which resulted in the sale of the property; i. e., until some time subsequent to the earning of the commission and the accrual of any cause of action therefor. Respondent's failure to secure such license until after the sale of the property had been fully negotiated and the stipulated commission had been earned rendered the transaction illegal and void, so far as it affects the parties to this action as real estate brokers, even if a copartnership license was not necessary. The performance of services jointly by both respondent and appellant constituted the consideration for the commission which the owner of the property agreed to pay. If any part of this consideration was illegal, the entire contract was void. Civ. Code, § 1608. The rendition of services by respondent subsequent to January 1, 1922, was, as we have seen, unlawful, because those services were rendered in direct violation of an express provision of the law, and likewise in direct contravention of the express policy of the statute, Civ. Code, § 1667. It follows, therefore, that, even if the parties to this action were not copartners in the strict sense of the term, and even if the procurement of a copartnership license in the firm name was not a necessary prerequisite, still, since appellant and respondent had agreed to render their services jointly, the contract for the payment of a commission became illegal and void after January 1, 1922; or, if the contract did not become illegal, the acts jointly performed by appellant and respondent subsequent to that date—acts which culminated in the sale of the property through their joint efforts and which constituted the consideration for the commission agreed to be paid them—were illegal, and no recovery of the commission could have been enforced by the parties to this action against the owner of the property. See Haas v. Greenwald, supra; McIver v. Clarke, 69 Miss. 408, 10 So. 581; Hittson v. Browne, 3 Colo. 304, and Central Trust & S. D. Co. v. Respass (Ky.) 56 L. R. A. 479. This brings us to the second phase of the question: Can respondent recover his share of the commission from appellant notwithstanding the illegality of the transaction?

[4] It may be conceded, for the purpose of this decision only, that the "commission" referred to in section 18 of the act means a commission paid by one real estate broker to another for services performed by the latter for the former in the way of assistance rendered in bringing buyer and seller together or in otherwise helping in the negotiations, and that it does not include money sought to be recovered by one partner, as his share of the partnership profits, in an action by him against a copartner who has received the profits. It also may be conceded, for the purpose of this decision only, that the "compensation" referred to in section 20 of the act means the compensation which is due from the principal to the broker, and that it does not include a partner's share of such compensation after it has been paid by the principal to one of the members of the brokerage firm which has effected the sale. It is claimed by respondent that, if it be conceded, as it is, for the purposes of this decision, that there is nothing in either of these sections of the statute which directly inhibits the recovery by him of his share of the commission paid to his copartner, then he is entitled to such recovery, notwithstanding the illegality of his acts in earning the commission. His argument is substantially this: The contract which he and appellant made with the owner of the property was fully executed on the part of the latter, who paid appellant the agreed commission, notwithstanding the illegality of the transaction; where an illegal contract or an illegal transaction has been fully executed, and one of the parties has the avails thereof, all the harm that can be done to public policy has been done, and therefore, so respondent argues, the party who has the avails can be compelled to pay them, or a proportionate share thereof to the other party.

[5] We are unable to agree with respondent's reasoning. No principle of law is better settled than that a party to an illegal contract or an illegal transaction cannot come into a court of law and ask it to carry out the illegal contract or to enforce rights arising out of the illegal transaction. He cannot set up a case in which he necessarily must disclose the illegal contract or the illegal transaction as the basis of his claim. In Moore v. Moore, 130 Cal. 110, 62 P. 294, 80 Am. St. Rep. 78, our Supreme Court quotes Judge Duncan in Swan v. Scott, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 164, as follows:

"The test whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced is whether the plaintiff requires the aid of the illegal transaction to establish his case. If the plaintiff cannot establish his case without showing that he has broken the law, the court will not assist him, whatever his claim in justice may be upon the defendant."

If the issuance of a copartnership license was a necessary prerequisite to the legality of the firm transactions which appellant and respondent jointly carried on as copartners, then, since no such license was ever issued, or was ever even within the contemplation of the partners, the partnership contract was illegal from its inception, for in that case the partnership contract necessarily would involve the performance of illegal acts. And since respondent, in order to establish his case, necessarily must invoke the partnership contract, it follows that, if the issuance of a copartnership license was requisite, the court will not lend its aid to assist either party to the contract in an action against the other, notwithstanding the receipt by the latter of partnership profits, but will leave both parties where it finds them. Chateau v. Singla, 114 Cal. 91, 45 P. 1015, 33 L. R. A. 750, 55 Am. St. Rep. 63; Moore v. Moore, supra; Woodson v. Hopkins, 85 Miss. 171, 37 So. 1000, 38 So. 298, 70 L. R. A. 645, 107 Am. St. Rep. 275; Kennedy v. Lonabaugh, 19 Wyo. 352, 117 P. 1079, Ann. Cas. 1913E, p. 133; McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 19 S. Ct. 839, 43 L. Ed. 1117; Vandegrift v. Vandegrift, 226 Pa. 254, 75 A. 365, 18 Ann. Cas. 404; King v. Winants, 71 N. C. 469, 17 Am. Rep. 11. In Chateau v. Singla, supra, our Supreme Court held that a partnership formed to carry on the business of letting furnished apartments for the purpose of prostitution is illegal, and that therefore one partner could not maintain an action against the other for an accounting of the rents collected by the latter.

The same result must follow if it be held that the issuance of an individual broker's license to each partner would satisfy the requirements of the statute, and that the issuance of a copartnership license in the firm name was not a sine qua non. If, in a case like this, the issuance of each partner of an individual broker's license satisfies the requirements of the statute, then, even though the contract of copartnership may have been valid at its inception, and during all of the balance of the year 1921, nevertheless the real estate transaction in which the partners engaged in January, 1922, and out of which grew the payment of the commission to appellant, was an illegal transaction, for the reasons stated in Haas v. Greenwald, supra. And with respect to that transaction respondent was in pari delicto. Indeed, he was, if anything, more guilty than appellant, for it was he who failed to make timely application for a license for the year 1922. According to respondent's testimony, it was agreed, when the partnership was formed, that the two should work together on each deal. This agreement, therefore, if we assume that a firm license was not essential, involved the implied undertaking on the part of each that at all times during the existence of the partnership he would maintain his status as a duly licensed real estate broker. But this respondent failed to do for the period of almost a month, and it was during this period that the partners initiated and consummated the deal out of which grew respondent's claim to a share of the commission paid to appellant. It was because of respondent's delinquency that the real estate transaction, in so far as it affected appellant and respondent as real estate brokers, was an illegal and void transaction.

Respondent testified that each of the transactions in which he and appellant jointly participated was treated separately, and that upon the termination of each "deal" the net profit was divided between them. Hence there was, in effect, a separate oral partnership contract as to each transaction. To entitle respondent to a recovery in this action he must rely upon the contract which he had with appellant to co-operate with the latter in this particular "deal," and to share equally in the commission to be earned, after deducting all expenses. But on January 1, 1922, this contract, as an agreement by two persons, one of whom was not a licensed real estate broker, to jointly negotiate the sale of real property became, and until the final consummation of the deal between the buyer and the seller continued to be and was, through respondent's fault, an illegal contract—a contract which involved the doing of an unlawful act. Respondent's cause of action grows directly out of this illegal contract between himself and appellant. Only through it and by proving it can he get at his share of the commission. There is nothing collateral, in respect of which, the partnership contract being out of the question, a collateral demand arises, as was the case in some of the decisions cited by respondent. "Here," as was said by the master of the rolls in Sykes v. Beadon, 11 Ch. D. 170, "you cannot stir a step but through that illegal agreement." In it respondent's case is inextricably entangled.

[6] Our conclusion from the foregoing is that whether the partnership contract be regarded as illegal from the beginning because of the failure of the joint adventurers to take out a partnership license, or whether it became illegal on and after January 1, 1922, by reason of respondent's failure to maintain his status as a duly licensed real estate broker, in either case the action must be regarded as one to enforce an illegal contract. The courts refuse to enforce such a contract, and permit the defendant to set up its illegality as a defense. While the defense is not an honorable one, yet the courts permit it to be set up even though in doing so the defendant may allege his own moral turpitude. Violators of the law who are parties to such illegal contracts are repudiated by the courts because of the great supervening principle of public policy involved, without reference to the attitude which one of the parties may occupy to the other, where both are in pari delicto. As pungently put in McMullen v. Hoffman, supra:

"The court refuses to enforce such a contract and it permits defendant to set up its illegality, not out of any regard for the defendant who sets it up, but only on account of the public interest. It has been often stated in similar cases that the defense is a very dishonest one, and it lies ill in the mouth of the defendant to allege it, and it is only allowed for public considerations and in order the better to secure the public against dishonest transactions. To refuse to grant either party to an illegal contract judicial aid for the enforcement of his alleged rights under it tends strongly towards reducing the number of such transactions to a minimum."

[7] The decisions relied upon by respondent, and now to be adverted to, are clearly distinguishable from this case. In Walker v. Kremer, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,076, the complainant sued upon an account stated, and the action was based, not upon the illegal contract, but upon a collateral contract; namely, the implied agreement to pay the balance shown to be due by the account stated. In Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bradley, 66 Hun, 635, 21 N. Y. S. 876,¹ the complaint alleged, and the answer admitted, facts which showed that the contract was not an illegal one. In Decell v. Hazlehurst, etc., Co., 83 Miss. 346, 35 So. 761, complainant sought an accounting from its agent for moneys received by him in that part of complainant's business which was confessedly legal. It is well established that, where there have been both legal and illegal transactions, the defendant cannot set up, as a defense to an action for an accounting of the legal transactions, the fact that some other transactions are illegal, especially where the transactions are distinct and not so connected as to require the court to pass upon those which are illegal. Central Trust & S. D. Co. v. Respass, supra. See, also, note to Fryer v. Harken, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 485. Baldwin v. Potter, 46 Vt. 402, is more nearly but not quite in point. It was a case where an agent, in the course of his agency, received from third parties for his principals the proceeds of illegal contracts to which his principals were parties, and who, therefore, were in pari delicto. The agent likewise was a participant in the making of the illegal contracts, and he, therefore, also was in pari delicto. It was held that the agent could not set up the illegality of the contracts to defeat a recovery by his principals of the moneys which he had received for the latter's use. This Vermont case, though it is in line with a number of decisions from other jurisdictions which support the doctrine there announced, is opposed by such well-reasoned cases as Woodson v. Hopkins, supra, where the authorities on both sides of the question are collected and exhaustively analyzed. See, also, 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 1009, 1010. However, the Vermont case is not strictly in point, for the reason that here both appellant and respondent were principals in their contract with the owner of the property, and the money was paid to appellant, not as an agent to receive it for respondent, but as one of the principals to that contract. In Woodson v. Hopkins, supra, the court says:

"The other misconception is in confusing the case of a suit by one of two parties to an illegal contract against the other with a suit by one of the parties against a third party, no way connected with the illegal contract [italics ours], to collect money paid by the other party to the illegal contract, which has been executed, to such third person for the use of the party suing. This principle is clearly stated at page 1007 [2] A. & E. Ency. of Law, par. 9, and it is stated there, with great exactitude of statement, that the reason that the third person cannot defend an action by the latter is 'that in such a case the action is not based on the illegal contract, but, instead, upon the independent contract of such third person to deliver over the property received by him.'"

We may add that the author of the article in the American & English Encyclopædia of Law states with equal exactitude the rule which obtains where, as here, one partner is suing another for his share of the profits of an illegal transaction. The author says:

"Where an illegal contract entered into by a partnership as a party of the one part is fully executed, and profits arising therefrom come into the hands of one of the partners, the general rule [italics ours] seems to be that he will not be compelled to account to his copartners for their share of such profits; and where the agreement of partnership is illegal on account of the consideration moving between the partners, or the character of the business to be transacted, the court will not, if business has been transacted and the profits of the transaction have been received by one partner, compel him to account to the others for their share of the profits. In some cases [italics ours], however, the proposition has been advanced that if the illegal purpose of the partnership has been accomplished the courts may direct a division of the profits." 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 1011.

Referring to the last sentence in this quotation, the court, in Woodson v. Hopkins, supra, says of it that "the text repudiates this as unsound." And the Mississippi court is right. The doctrine referred to in the last sentence of the quotation is unsound. The doctrine which has the support of reason and the weight of authority, and the one which has been recognized by our own Supreme Court in such cases as that of Chateau v. Singla, supra, is the doctrine which is set forth in the preceding sentence of our quotation from the American & English Encyclopædia of Law.

[8, 9] It is a generally recognized doctrine that if, after an illegal contract has been executed, the parties thereto make a new one settling their rights as between themselves, the latter contract governs their relations and the original becomes functus officio and no longer is to be reckoned with. That was the doctrine announced and applied by the district court of appeal in Johnson v. Davidson, 54 Cal. App. 251, 202 P. 159. That doctrine, however, is not applicable to the facts of this case. Here respondent is seeking to enforce a contract which he says he had with appellant. As between the parties to this action that contract is yet executory, and appellant has repudiated it.

We do not deem it necessary to prolong this discussion by referring further to specific cases. It is sufficient to say that the better reasoning and the great weight of authority condemns the doctrine of an implied promise in the matter of the division of the profits of an illegal contract between partners or joint adventurers who are in pari delicto.

I concur: WORKS, J.

CRAIG, J. I concur, but am not prepared to say that, where two brokers engage in a partnership for the sale of a single unit of property, and each at the time holds a broker's license which he retains throughout the transaction, the law requires these brokers to secure a license in the name of a firm to be organized for that particular transaction. This point is in no way involved in the instant case, and I therefore expressly reserve judgment upon it.

CAREY v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (Civ. 2963.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 6, 1925. Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 4, 1926.)

1. Trial ☞139(1)—Weight of negative testimony that witness did not see street car nor hear bell before collision for jury.

Weight of negative testimony that witnesses did not see street car nor hear bell or other signal before collision of automobile therewith is for jury.

2. Evidence ☞586(2)—Finding of company's negligence held sustained by evidence.

Negative evidence that signals were not heard held sufficient to sustain jury's implied finding that street railway company, sued for damages from collision between automobile and street car at street intersection, was negligent notwithstanding positive testimony that warning was sounded.

3. Street railroads ☞112(3)—Burden on company to prove contributory negligence.

In action against street railway company for damages from collision between automobile and street car at street intersection, burden of proving contributory negligence was on defendant.

4. Street railroads ☞117(29)—Contributory negligence of automobile driver held for jury.

Contributory negligence of driver of automobile colliding with street car at street intersection, on dark, foggy night, held for jury on conflicting evidence.

5. Negligence ☞136(9)—Contributory negligence law question when reasonable man can draw but one inference.

Contributory negligence is question of law only when court is compelled to say that reasonable man could draw from facts but one inference pointing unerringly to plaintiff's negligence contributing to his injury.

6. Street railroads ☞85(4), 99(10)—Pedestrians and drivers crossing or using tracks not bound to stop, look, and listen.

Duty of one about to cross right of way of steam railroad to stop, look, and listen does not govern rights of pedestrians and vehicle drivers crossing or using tracks of street railroad; their duty being no higher than that of street railway company except that they must give way to clear passage of car because latter is confined to tracks.

7. Trial ☞194(17)—Instruction referring to street car as car "which collided with plaintiff's automobile" held not error; "collide."

In action for damages from collision between automobile and defendant's street car, instructions referring to latter as car "which collided with the automobile," held not inconsistent with defendant's instructions referring to automobile as in collision with street car; "collide" meaning "to strike or dash against each other, to come into collision," and material question for jury being whether plaintiff, defendant, or both, approached point of collision negligently.

8. Trial ☞191(8)—Instruction in action for damages from collision between automobile and street car held not erroneous as assuming disputed facts.

Instruction to find for plaintiff, if he was exercising reasonable care, and defendant operated street car which collided with plaintiff's automobile at excessive speed, and plaintiff did not know, and in exercise of ordinary care could not have learned, of car's approach until automobile was on tracks, held not erroneous as assuming existence of disputed facts.

9. Street railroads ☞90(2)—Speed may be negligent, though not exceeding legal limit.

Mere fact that street car was not exceeding speed limit fixed by statute or ordinance at time of collision with automobile is not conclusive on question whether it was running at negligently excessive rate of speed.

10. Trial ☞253(4)—Instruction on street car motorman's right to assume that automobilist would exercise due care held properly refused, as ignoring issue whether motorman gave warning of car's approach.

In action for damages from collision between automobile and defendant's street car, instruction that defendant's motorman had right to assume that plaintiff would exercise due care in approaching tracks, and stop or turn aside until his conduct was such as should reasonably have led motorman to apprehend contrary, held properly refused, as ignoring issue whether motorman gave warning of car's approach.

11. Street railroads ☞90(4)—Motorman, giving no warning, cannot assume automobile would stop or turn aside.

Motorman, giving no warning of car's approach to street intersection, could not act on assumption that automobile driver approaching tracks would stop or turn aside, in absence of any indication that he was aware of street car's approach.

12. Trial ☞260(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by instructions given not error.

Refusal of instructions containing statements of law included in instructions given was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by John C. Carey against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. J. Straub, Leo. H. Susman, and John P. Coghlan, all of San Francisco, and V. L. Hatfield and W. H. Hatfield, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Martin I. Welsh and Robert H. Schwab, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment for damages resulting from a collision between his automobile and one of the defendant's street cars in the city of Sacramento. The defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment. Appellant contends that the evidence not only fails to show that it was negligent, but that it shows conclusively that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

At the time of the collision the plaintiff was driving his automobile south along Fourteenth street and near the west curb line thereof, and defendant's street car was going west along the north car tracks of K street. Both streets are 48 feet wide from curb to curb. Photographs of the automobile and of the street car, taken after the accident, indicate that they were both moving with considerable velocity at the time of the impact. The evidence is sufficient to warrant the inference that the street car ran into the automobile rather than that the automobile ran into the street car. The front bumper of the automobile was not bent or injured, but the left front wheel was demolished, and the left front fender and the left door were badly crushed and broken. The front wheels of the street car were forced off the rails of the track, and, according to the testimony of the motorman, the street car thereafter moved forward about four and a half feet before coming to a stop. The automobile was a new Stephens roadster, and the side curtains were in place and the windshield was closed. There is no contention that the plaintiff was not severely injured. The evidence bearing upon the questions of negligence and contributory negligence is sharply conflicting.

[1, 2] The plaintiff testified that he did not see or hear the street car until the instant of the collision; that it sounded no bell that he could hear; that he heard no bell or signal of any kind; and that his sight and hearing were good. He also testified that the night was "very foggy." Another witness testified that he was driving a Ford touring car west on K street, and had reached a point "about 16 or 17 feet" west of the west curb line of Fourteenth street when he heard the collision; that it was a "very foggy and dark" night; that he was driving with his head "outside the windshield" because he could not see through the glass "on account of the fog"; that he heard no bell or signal; and that his hearing was "all right that evening." The motorman and the conductor on the street car testified that the former rang the bell as he approached the intersection, and rang it violently while passing through the intersection; he having seen plaintiff's automobile when the street car was about 25 feet east of the crossing. The weight to be given to negative testimony of the character of that produced by the plaintiff is a question for the jury, and "It has frequently been held that negative evidence of this character is sufficient to sustain a verdict, * * * even though it conflict with other evidence to the effect that a warning was actually given."

Keena v. United Railroads of San Francisco (Cal. Sup.) 239 P. 1061; Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709; Jones v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. App.) 239 P. 429. Whatever opinion may be entertained as to the preponderance of the evidence upon the issue of negligence, it is clear that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the implied finding of the jury that the defendant was negligent.

"Where contributory negligence is set up as a defense, it seldom happens that the question is so clear from doubt that the court can undertake to say as a matter of law how the jury should find upon the issue." 19 Cal. Jur. 735, and cases there cited.

[4] The plaintiff testified that he had driven south for the length of three blocks on Fourteenth street before the accident; that the night was "very foggy"; that the windshield "was covered with fog to some extent"; that it was equipped with a hand-wiper, which he used before starting, but not afterwards; that his headlights were adjusted to official requirements, and were turned on; and he could see objects ahead "possibly 15 or 20 feet"; that he was traveling 8 or 10 miles an hour, and could have stopped his automobile in 8 feet; that from a point 25 feet north of the north curb line of K street he "could see just past the corner" of a building at the northeast corner of the intersection, which appears to have been some 50 feet distant; that from the time he reached said point he looked to his left up K street for "quite a while," but saw no street car; that he then looked to the right, then "straight ahead"; and that as he was turning to look to the left again the collision occurred. The plaintiff also testified that it was "relatively quiet on the inside" of his automobile; that his eyesight and hearing were good; but that he did not see or hear the street car or hear the bell thereof or other signal. The driver of the Ford touring car referred to testified that, on hearing the collision, he "pulled up to the curb," and looked back, and that he could "just barely see the light in the street car," but could not see "the form of the street car." The plaintiff testified that it was dark "at the intersection." Several witnesses for defendant testified that there were street lights at the intersection, and that the street car and other objects could be seen from points a block or more distant therefrom; that as the plaintiff approached the intersection he was traveling at a high and unlawful rate of speed; that at the time the street car entered the intersection it was moving, with the power turned off, at a speed of about 15 miles an hour. The motorman testified that at that time he applied the brakes and stopped the car "just as soon as I could"; and that, when running at the rate of 15 miles an hour, the street car could not be stopped under 80 feet.

It was stipulated at the trial that the ordinances of the city of Sacramento permitted street cars to run at not to exceed 25 miles an hour in that part of the city where the accident occurred, and gave street cars "the right of way over vehicles" at intersections.

[5, 6] While there is ample evidence upon which to have based a finding of contributory negligence, it cannot be held as a matter of law, contrary to the implied finding of the jury, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence. The jury may have inferred from the foregoing evidence that the plaintiff was proceeding with due care; that he reasonably looked to the left to see if a street car was approaching along K street; that he did not see defendant's car, by reason of the dimness of the lights thereof in the fog, or hear its approach; and that the motorman did not sound the bell or give any warning of the approach thereof. "Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury." Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125.

"The duty of stopping, looking, and listening made incumbent upon one about to cross the right of way of a steam railroad is not the rule governing the rights of foot passengers and vehicle drivers in venturing upon, crossing, or using the tracks of a street railroad. The duty of such is no higher than or different in law from the duty of the company operating the electric car, saving in the one particular so often pointed out that, because the car is confined to its tracks, vehicles and foot passengers must give way to clear its passage." Runnels v. United Railroads, 175 Cal. 528, 531, 166 P. 18, 20.

In a case involving a collision between a street car and an automobile it is said:

"The failure of plaintiff to look and listen * * * was * * * not, as a matter of law, negligence on his part, but at most, a question to be determined by the jury." Bidwell v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 169 Cal. 780, 783, 148 P. 197, 199.

[7] In some of the instructions the court referred to defendant's street car as the car "which collided with the automobile" of plaintiff. Appellant argues that such language "tended to create in the minds of the jury an impression that the court believed that appellant's street car did collide with the automobile rather than the automobile with the street car." In another instruction framed by defendant's counsel and given at defendant's request the automobile is referred to as in "collision with the defendant's street car." There is no inconsistency between the two expressions. The definition of "collide" is "to strike or dash against each other; to come into collision," and the jury doubtless so understood the language criticized by appellant. Counsel for both parties must have so understood the terms employed by them in framing their respective instructions. It is not of great importance whether the street car or the automobile first reached the intersection of their paths, they having arrived at that point at approximately the same instant, but the material question for the jury to determine was whether the plaintiff or the defendant or both approached that point negligently.

[8, 9] Appellant contends that the court erred in instructing the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff "was exercising reasonable care for his own safety, and that the defendant operated said car which collided with said automobile * * * at a rate of speed in excess of what a prudent person would have operated said car under like circumstances toward said automobile," and plaintiff "did not know, and in the exercise of ordinary care could not have learned, of the approach of said car until his automobile was on the northerly tracks of said defendant, * * * and too late for him to have avoided the accident, and the said defendant failed to give" plaintiff "any warning whatsoever of any kind of the approach of said car towards said automobile in sufficient time to enable" plaintiff "to get out of the way of said approaching car, and by reason thereof, and without any contributory negligence of any kind on the part of" plaintiff, "said car collided with said automobile and inflicted injuries" upon plaintiff, then a verdict should be returned in his favor. There is evidence sufficient to warrant the inference that the facts were as enumerated in the instruction. The instruction does not, as appellant contends, assume the existence of any disputed fact, but tells the jury, in effect, that, if they find the facts to be as stated therein, their verdict should be for plaintiff. The photographs of the wrecked automobile and of the street car, and the testimony of witnesses to the effect that the night was dark and foggy, that plaintiff looked for, but did not see, the approaching car, or hear any bell sounded or warning given, and that the motorman, after seeing plaintiff's automobile, was unable to stop the street car in time to avoid the accident, considered together, are sufficient to justify the inference that the street car was being run "at a rate of speed in excess of what a prudent person would have operated said car under like circumstances," and that the other facts were as enumerated in the instruction. The mere fact that the street car was not exceeding the speed limit fixed by statute or ordinance is not conclusive upon the question whether it was running at a negligently excessive rate of speed. Gross v. Burnside,

"The defendant's motorman had the right to assume that the plaintiff would exercise due care in approaching defendant's car tracks. He had the right to presume that plaintiff would stop or turn aside, until the conduct of plaintiff was such as should reasonably have led him to apprehend the contrary. So long as it appeared that plaintiff, with reasonable care, could stop his automobile or turn it to one side or the other, so as to avoid a collision, and there were no obvious indications that he might not do so, the motorman had the right to assume that he would do so and upon that assumption to proceed along the track."

The proposed instruction is substantially in the language of the decision in Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 5, 164 P. 798. As said in Hall v. San Francisco, 188 Cal. 641, 643, 206 P. 459:

"The instruction is an illustration of the dangers of attempting to frame a charge to the jury upon isolated extracts from opinions of this court."

In the Arnold Case the driver of the automobile saw the approaching car in time to have avoided the collision by the exercise of reasonable care on his part. Negligence of the defendant in that case, therefore, could not be based upon failure of the motorman to give warning of the approach of the car. In this case the plaintiff's main reliance was upon defendant's failure to give such a warning. The proposed instruction entirely ignores that issue. The case of Wallis v. Southern Pacific Co., 184 Cal. 662, 673, 195 P. 408, 413, was an action for damages for the death of the driver of a team of horses in a railroad crossing accident. When the engineer rounded a curve "some four or five hundred feet from the crossing he saw the heads of decedent's horses some ten feet from the tracks." The court said:

"He immediately sounded the warning whistle. He doubtless believed, and had a right to believe, that the driver would at once stop his team and not attempt to cross the track. * * * He was justified in assuming that at the distance from which he sounded the warning, and with the headlight and noise of the approaching train, the driver would be warned of his danger."

[11, 12] In this case there is sufficient evidence to justify the inference that no warning was given. The motorman certainly had no right to act upon the assumption that the plaintiff would stop or turn aside if no warning was given of the approach of the car, in the absence of any indication that the plaintiff was aware of its approach. The statements of law contained in other proposed instructions which the court refused to give were included in other instructions which were given. Other points made by appellant are sufficiently disposed of by what has already been said, and need not be discussed separately.

The judgment is affirmed.

Irrigation districts are public corporations or agencies, and have only such powers as are expressly given them by act of Legislature, under and by virtue of which they exist, or are necessarily implied to carry out purposes of district.

2. Waters and water courses ⚡228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No. Series—Board of directors of irrigation district without power to dispose of property other than as provided by law.

While board of directors of irrigation district, in performance of their duties, have power to construct, acquire, or purchase water rights, canals, ditches, dams, etc., property so acquired is property of district, and board of directors possesses no power to dispose of any property other than as provided by law.

3. Waters and water courses ⚡228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No. Series—One dealing with irrigation district chargeable with knowledge of powers.

Any one dealing with a public corporation, such as irrigation district, a state agency, or an "executive arm of the state" is chargeable with knowledge of all powers that officers of such corporation or state agency possess or may legally exercise, and all contracts or purported contracts beyond scope of power vested in such officers are void, and knowledge must be taken, not only of extent of power, but also mode in which it may be exercised.

4. Waters and water courses ⚡230(4)—Expenditure for payment of claims for services in settlement of differences between owners and irrigation district held unauthorized.

Irrigation District Act, § 30, as amended by St. 1919, p. 662, does not authorize expenditure of money raised from sale of bonds of irrigation district towards payment of claims for services rendered in settlement of differences existing between owners of land within district and the district, irrespective of Bond Certification Act, § 3b, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1198.

5. Waters and water courses ☞230(4)—Otherwise carrying out purposes of act as applied to bonds issued by irrigation district construed.

Irrigation District Act, § 30, as amended by St. 1919, p. 662, authorizing issuance of bonds by irrigation district for purpose of constructing or purchasing necessary irrigation canals and works, " * * * and otherwise carrying out provisions of this act," or any other act, etc., held to authorize expenditure of moneys derived from sale of bonds in any construction work authorized by that act or any other act authorizing the district to acquire property to construct works, etc.

6. Waters and water courses ☞228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No. Series—Irrigation Act held to prohibit contract to pay for services in settlement of dispute.

General grant of powers to board of directors of irrigation districts, in Irrigation Act, § 15, as amended by St. 1919, p. 661, is relative only, and must be exercised in accordance with limitations found in sections 30, 30a, 37, 39, 55, 59, 61 (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended [see Gen. Laws 1923, pt. 1, p. 1447 et seq.]) and hence board of directors could not contract to compensate plaintiffs for services rendered in settlement of dispute, without having first made provision for payment thereof in manner prescribed in Irrigation Act.

7. Waters and water courses ☞228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No. Series—Compromise agreement between irrigation district and landowner held ultra vires.

Under Irrigation Act, as amended by St. 1915, p. 859, and Act May 19, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 660), agreement between irrigation district and landowner for settlement of disputes by formation of water storage district, with boundaries to be fixed by parties' engineers, and board of directors to be selected as therein provided, the dissolution of the irrigation district, and the turning over of its property to the water storage district, held, beyond power of board of directors, ultra vires, and void.

8. Waters and water courses ☞227—Powers of board of directors of irrigation districts limited.

Board of directors of irrigation districts have only such powers as are expressly granted or necessarily included in exercise of powers granted.

9. Work and labor ☞2—Agreement held not settlement authorizing recovery for services in negotiating it.

Agreement between irrigation district and landowner, with whom it was in litigation for formation of water storage district and dissolution of irrigation district, held, not a settlement so as to authorize recovery on quantum meruit by persons employed to effect settlement, in that it merely pointed out method by which settlement might be reached.

10. Appeal and error ☞1170(1)—That order allowing intervention by owners in action against irrigation district was erroneous held not to require reversal.

In action for services rendered irrigation district in settling dispute between district and owner of land therein, any error in order allowing intervention by such owner did not constitute grounds for reversal, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, where plaintiffs were not in any event entitled to recover.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by P. H. Bottoms and another against the Madera Irrigation District, with intervention by Miller & Lux, Incorporated. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for appellants.

Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

J. E. Woolley, of San Francisco, for intervenor.

PLUMMER, J. Action to recover the sum of $176,000, alleged to be due the plaintiffs from the defendant for services rendered by the plaintiff for the uses and purposes of the defendant. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiffs appeal.

The record shows the existence of the Madera irrigation district, organized and existing under and by virtue of the act commonly referred to as the Wright-Bridgford Act (St. 1897, p. 254), and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto; that prior to the 10th day of July, 1922, the qualified voters of the Madera irrigation district had voted bonds in the sum of $28,000,000 for the purpose of effectuating and carrying out the plans of said irrigation district to appropriate, impound, store, and distribute the waters of the San Joaquin river upon the lands situated within the boundaries of said district for the purpose of irrigation. It also appears from the record that, during all of the times mentioned in this proceeding, the intervenor, Miller & Lux, Incorporated, was a corporation owning a large tract of land lying within the exterior boundaries of said Madera irrigation district; that between said Madera irrigation district and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, much litigation was pending (some 29 actions in all). The complaint alleges that this pending litigation seriously impaired, retarded, and threatened to subvert the purposes for which the district had been formed, and that the initiation of additional actions against the district were threatened by the said Miller & Lux, Incorporated. It further appears: That on or about the 8th day of July, 1922, the board of directors of the Madera irrigation district, having in view the litigation to which we have referred, adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas, this board of directors of Madera irrigation district has heretofore placed itself on record as favorable to any fair and equitable composition and settlement of any adverse claims of riparian owners and appropriators on the San Joaquin river; and

"Whereas, it appears that it is necessary and advisable to constitute a particular authority for initiating and for receiving such proposals of settlement and composition:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved: That there be and there is hereby created a committee to be known as the 'conciliation and settlement committee.' That said committee shall have four members and shall consist of the president of the board, the general manager of the district, and two members of the board of directors to be appointed by the president. That said committee continue in existence during the pleasure of the board. That the duties of said committee be to enter into negotiations and endeavor to compromise the differences now existing between Madera irrigation district and any other parties having or asserting any riparian or appropriation or other claims adverse to the right of the Madera irrigation district to divert and store waters of the San Joaquin river and its tributaries, and to do all things that may seem, in the judgment of the committee, necessary or proper in the premises. provided, however, that said committee shall in no way do or agree to do anything that may delay, impair, or abate any legal proceedings now under way or that hereafter may be instituted, and provided further that the committee, before agreeing finally to any proposition of settlement, must have the approval of the board of directors thereto. That said committee be authorized to call the board in session as a committee of the whole, at any reasonable time or place, whenever any of the negotiations shall reach the point requiring any further approval of this board; and that the said committee shall have authority in their discretion, and on such terms as they may deem proper, arrange to employ any person or persons as mediators in effecting or negotiating any settlement, and may call upon the legal and engineering departments or any other department of the district for any matter required by them."

That thereafter, and on or about the 10th day of July, 1922, the committee referred to in the resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Madera irrigation district entered into a contract with the plaintiffs purporting to employ the said plaintiffs to negotiate a settlement and composition of all matters of controversy between the Madera irrigation district and Miller & Lux, Incorporated. This memoranda of agreement reads as follows:

"This memorandum of agreement, made this 10th day of July, 1922, at Madera, Cal., by and between P. H. Bottoms and Tom F. Saunders, of Fresno, Cal., hereinafter referred to as 'mediators,' and J. W. Schmitz, N. E. Sanders, J. L. Davis, and Walter C. Maloy, the conciliation and settlement committee of Madera irrigation district, a public corporation, thereunto authorized by resolution No. 457 of the board of directors of said district, hereinafter referred to as the 'committee,' witnesseth:

"That the committee, on behalf of Madera irrigation district, do employ the mediators to negotiate a settlement and composition, satisfactory to the committee and to the board of directors of Madera irrigation district of all conflicting claims and rights and all pending litigation and controversies now existing, or that may arise prior to a settlement, between Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and its subsidiary corporation, as parties on one side, and Madera irrigation district as the party on the other side, and the committee by the authority above set forth agrees that Madera irrigation district will pay to the mediators, on the negotiation of such a settlement on the conditions and in the time, place, and manner hereinafter set forth, the compensation hereinafter mentioned.

"And the mediators agree to undertake to negotiate a settlement and composition, satisfactory to the committee and to the board of directors of Madera irrigation district, of all conflicting claims and rights and all pending litigation and controversies now existing or that may arise prior to settlement between Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and its subsidiary corporations as parties on one side and Madera irrigation district as party on the other side, and said mediators agree to receive and accept as full compensation for their services and expenses the compensation hereinafter mentioned.

"And it is agreed between the committee and the mediators that, within 30 days after the conclusion of a settlement and composition of said claims, rights, litigation, and controversies between said parties, and after the approval of the same by the California bond certification commission, the Madera irrigation district will pay to the said mediators, in consideration of the negotiation of such settlement and composition, and in full payment for their services and expenses and of all fees and sums by them paid or agreed to be paid to any attorneys, engineers, or other persons, a fee to be determined as follows: That is to say, 50 cents for each acre of land in Madera irrigation district under the terms of such settlement; said fee being payable in cash in lawful money of the United States.

"The parties hereto further agree as material conditions and considerations hereof: That such settlement shall be negotiated within six months from date hereof, unless such time shall be further extended by the committee. That the mediators shall communicate all proposals of settlement to the committee, and that the same shall not be otherwise communicated to the Madera irrigation district until the same shall be approved by the committee. That, in case a settlement shall not be negotiated within six months from date hereof satisfactory to the committee and to the board of directors of Madera irrigation district, nothing shall be due or payable to the mediators hereunder, and the said district shall not be liable in any case for any fees or other compensation agreed by the mediators to be paid to any attorneys, engineers, or other persons, nor for any expenses of the mediators."

While the plaintiffs count upon an area of 353,000 acres as the basis of computing the value of their services, the trial court found that the contemplated water district would include only 284,000 acres, and was the ultimate acreage within the contemplation of the parties when entering into the agreement dated July 10, 1922. Thereafter, and on or about the 30th day of July, 1922, the board of directors of said irrigation district passed a resolution purporting to ratify and approve the execution of the foregoing agreement, and the following day, to wit, the 31st day of July, 1922, the agreement purporting to settle and compose the differences between the Madera irrigation district and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and procured by the plaintiffs, was signed by the defendant, Madera irrigation district, and the intervenor, Miller & Lux, Incorporated. This instrument is worded as follows:

"In order to compose all of the differences existing between Miller & Lux, Incorporated, the proposed West Side water storage district and the Madera irrigation district, the following course of procedure is hereby agreed upon:

"(1) A water storage district shall be formed, including all of the territory included in the proposed West Side water storage district and the territory petitioned to be included therein, and such parts of the Madera irrigation district, Webster irrigation district, and Medano irrigation district situated south of the Chowchilla river as are found to be susceptible of economical irrigation in view of their character and available water supply. The boundaries of the proposed district shall be immediately determined by two engineers, one selected by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and one by the Madera Irrigation District, who shall co-operate with the state engineer, or his representatives, so as to fix the boundaries of the said district in such manner as will meet with the approval of the state engineer. The said work shall be completed within 30 days from the date hereof. The said district shall be known as the San Joaquin river water storage district.

"(2) The parties hereto shall immediately co-operate through their respective engineers, in making such investigations as to water supply of the San Joaquin river, Fresno river, and Chowchilla river, of dam sites and reservoirs and land susceptible of economical irrigation as shall be necessary in order to prepare a petition for the formation of said district, to establish the boundaries thereof, the sources of water supply, and the location of dam sites and reservoirs, and in order to determine whether the said Fresno river and Chowchilla river shall be developed by said water storage district as well as the said San Joaquin river and be made a part of the general project.

"(3) Immediately upon fixing the boundaries of the said district, the parties hereto shall jointly prepare a petition for the formation of said water storage district, circulate the same for signatures, and present the same to the state engineer for approval, and take all other actions and steps necessary for the approval of said petition and the formation of said district.

"(4) An agreement shall be entered into between Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and other landowners in said water storage district so to be formed, providing that the board of directors of such district shall consist of nine directors, four of whom shall be selected by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, four by the other landowners in said district, and one by the eight directors thus selected. Such agreement shall be of the same general tenor as the agreement heretofore entered into between Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and the other landowners on the west side of the San Joaquin river. The district shall be divided into nine divisions, four of which shall be situated on the west side of the San Joaquin river, four on the east side of the San Joaquin river, and one partly on the east side and partly on the west side, and two of the directors selected by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, shall represent divisions on the west side and two divisions on the east side, and two of directors selected by the other landowners shall represent divisions on the west side and two divisions on the east side, and the ninth director shall represent the division situated partly on the east side and partly on the west side. During the period of 3 years from date hereof, unless said Madera irrigation district shall be sooner dissolved, that the board of directors of said district may secure, hold, and exercise the proxies and powers of attorneys of the landowners of said water storage district, situate within the area thereof now embraced within said Madera irrigation district, or any portion thereof, authorizing said board of directors, on behalf of said landowners, to cast the ballots or votes of said landowners on any matter submitted to the voters of said proposed water storage district, or at any election of officers thereof.

"(5) Pending the formation of said district, all actions and proceedings and all litigation pending between the parties hereto shall stand in abeyance, and no proceedings shall be had or taken therein by either party, except such proceedings as are necessary to preserve during said time the rights of the parties therein. It is the intention that no additional liability shall be imposed upon Miller & Lux, Incorporated, with respect to the assessments now involved in litigation during said period, and no penalty for nonpayment thereof, accruing during said period, and after the date hereof, shall be collected. But, if the action involving said assessments should become final by the denial of the pending petition for rehearing and for a writ of error or otherwise during said period, the said Miller & Lux, Incorporated, agrees to forthwith pay said assessments.

"(6) Pending the formation of said district, no further expenditures shall be incurred by the Madera irrigation district in connection with its dam site or in connection with construction, engineering, litigation, or the acquisition of property or property rights, except by agreement between the directors of the Madera irrigation district and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and, after the formation of said water storage district, all such expenditures shall be made by said water storage district, but nothing herein contained shall prevent the said Madera irrigation district from carrying out any outstanding contracts or from paying its necessary expenses of administration, including such legal and engineering expense as may be necessary in carrying out the provisions of this agreement or in preserving during said time the rights of the parties in pending litigation. The contract made by said district for making borings at its dam site shall be modified so that said work shall be done jointly by the parties hereto.

"(7) Upon the formation of said district, the present petition now before the state engineer for the formation of the said West Side water storage district shall be withdrawn and dismissed and all other litigation, cases, and proceedings now pending between the parties hereto shall likewise be dismissed without prejudice to either party and without costs for or against either party, and proceedings shall at once be taken for the dissolution of the said Madera irrigation district and the reclamation districts heretofore formed in said territory by Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and the turning over to said water district of all property and property rights of Madera irrigation district and the assumption by the said water storage district of all indebtedness of the said Madera irrigation district and said reclamation districts and all expenses of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, in litigation with said Madera irrigation district and all expenses incident to the formation of said West Side water storage district, and all expenses of the parties hereto in carrying out this agreement. All the indebtedness of, and expenses incurred by, said Madera irrigation district, and so assumed, shall be assessed to the portion of the territory included in the said proposed water storage district now included in said Madera irrigation district, and all the expenses of the said West Side water storage district and said Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and said reclamation districts thus assumed shall be assessed on the balance of the territory in said proposed water storage district. The petition for the dissolution of the said Madera irrigation district shall be circulated and signed at the same time as the petition for the formation of said water storage district, but said petition shall not be filed with the board of directors until and when said water storage district has been formed and there has been formed and there has been turned over to said district the water rights, as hereinafter provided, and plans and specifications for the irrigation and drainage of lands within said district have been duly approved and adopted by said board of directors, and the voters of said district shall have, pursuant to the provisions of said California Water Storage District Act, voted that said project shall be completed, and said petition shall state said conditions as to filing thereof.

"(8) Upon the formation of said water storage district, the said Miller & Lux, Incorporated, shall convey to the said district all of its water rights and all water rights of its subsidiaries in the San Joaquin and Fresno rivers, and all canals and other works connected therewith. It is intended hereby that said water rights shall be so turned over that the lands now irrigated, or entitled to be irrigated, by the canals of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, and other existing canals, shall continue to have a prior right to irrigation therefrom from the gravity flow of said streams, but sharing with other lands in the district in any water stored, pumped, or acquired by said district. Said Miller & Lux, Incorporated, as a riparian owner, in turning over said rights, shall also consent to the diversion and storage by said water storage district of all water of the San Joaquin river and the Fresno river necessary for the irrigation of the land within said water storage district, in excess of the amount needed for the irrigation of riparian lands of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, now irrigated, or entitled to irrigation therefrom. The question as to the quantity of water reasonably needed for the irrigation of the lands of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, already irrigated, or entitled to be irrigated, is hereby delegated to the board of directors of said water storage district and may be determined by said board. The valuation at which such rights shall be so turned over to said water storage district shall be agreed upon between the directors of said water storage district and the owners of such rights. In the event that the said parties cannot agree upon such valuation, the parties hereto agree that the value of such rights may be established by condemnation proceedings.

"(9) The parties hereto pledge themselves to carry out the provisions of this agreement and to form the said district and proceed with the said irrigation project with all reasonable speed and with due diligence until completed. Unless the said water storage district is formed and work commenced by it on said irrigation project within one year from the date hereof or within such further time as may be agreed upon by the parties, this agreement shall terminate and all parties shall be restored to their present position."

Upon the transaction herein referred to becoming public, the then board of directors of the Madera irrigation district was compelled to resign and another board of directors was elected. The record shows that the new board of directors is pursuing a procedure in the settlement of the difficulties facing the district similar to that pointed out in the memorandum signed by the defendant and intervener of date of July 31, 1922. Plaintiffs claiming under the writing hereinbefore set forth that their services had been fully performed, presented their bill in the sum of $176,000, and, payment being refused, this action was instituted. Payment is resisted on three grounds: (1) That no composition or settlement of differences between the district and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, has been effectuated; (2) that the board of directors of the Madera irrigation district had no authority to enter into the contract first set out herein by reason of the fact that there was no money in the treasury of the district applicable to the payment of the plaintiffs' fee for any services they might perform; (3) that the agreement alleged to have been procured by the services of the plaintiffs between the Madera irrigation district and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, was ultra vires and void, and therefore could not constitute the basis for any legal claim against the defendant district. The intervener also sets forth the further defense that the employment agreement was kept secret and information thereof withheld from the intervener, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs, and consequently void, by reason of the trust relation which the board of directors of the district hold to all landowners, and that the lands of the intervener were being charged with several thousand dollars as the intervener's pro rata share of the 50 cents an acre agreed to be paid the plaintiffs in violation of the trust relation existing between the board of directors of the district and the intervener; in other words, that the lands belonging to the intervener situate within the district were to be taxed to pay the fee claimed by the plaintiffs for their services, as employees of the district, in settling differences between the trustee and the cestui que trust.

The trial court found that no fraud had been committed upon the intervener, and rested its decision upon the ultra vires character of the proceedings which we have outlined. It was also found by the court that a considerable period of time prior to the occurrences here narrated the district had sold $200,000 worth of bonds of said district, but had expended the proceeds thereof in pursuance of the purposes for which the district was created; that these bonds were certified as provided by the Bond Certification Act (St. 1913, p. 778) as amended in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1198). The court further found that no money had been provided by levy of assessment, or otherwise, as specified in section 59 of the California Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 274, as amended by St. 1919, p. 668), except the sum of $66,689.63, and that all of said money had been provided for by an annual assessment for purposes of the district other than for the payment of plaintiff's alleged compensation, and had been so expended by it prior to the institution of this action. The court further found that the memorandum of agreement executed by the defendant intervener procured by the plaintiffs was ultra vires, as claimed by the respondents, and constituted no basis upon which to predicate a valid claim against the district.

[1-3] In considering these questions, we think the following propositions are so firmly established that citation of authority is unnecessary, to wit: That irrigation districts are public corporations or agencies; that such agency has only such powers as are given to it by the act of the Legislature under and by virtue of which it exists, either as are expressly stated or such as are necessarily implied in order to carry out the purposes of the district; that, while the board of directors of the district, in the performance of their duties, have the power to construct, acquire, or purchase water rights, canals, ditches, dams, etc., the property so acquired is the property of the district, and that the board of directors of the district possess no power to dispose of any of the property of the district other than in the manner provided by law; that any one dealing with a public corporation, a state agency, or what has been sometimes called an "executive arm of the state," is chargeable with knowledge of all the powers that the officers of such corporation, or state agency, possess, or may legally exercise, and that all contracts or purported contracts, which may be entered into, which go beyond the scope of the power vested in the officer exercising the functions of said agency are void; that knowledge must be taken, not only of the extent of the power, but also the mode in which such power may be exercised.

Controverting the contentions of the respondents, the plaintiffs insist that there is in the hands of the district $27,500,000 in authorized but unissued bonds of the district; that the various sections of the Irrigation District Act do not prohibit the incurring of the expense referred to herein without having first made provision for its payment; that the memorandum of agreement between the district and the intervener is not ultra vires, but, if ultra vires, a settlement has been secured, and plaintiffs should recover upon a quantum meruit count in their complaint. Answering the argument of plaintiffs that the authorized or unissued bonds are available and were, at the time of the entering into of the contract of date of July 10, 1922, available for liquidating the demands of the plaintiffs, the respondents call attention to section 3b of the Bond Certification Act, as amended in 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 1198), which section, after setting forth the manner in which irrigation district bonds may be certified, and limiting the manner in which the moneys so raised may be expended and the purpose to which such moneys may be applied, contains the following:

"Nor shall any expense of any kind be incurred in excess of money actually provided by levy of assessment or otherwise except as provided in section fifty-nine of the California Irrigation District Act."

It is conceded that the certification of the bonds as issued by the district contains no authorization to apply the proceeds thereof toward the payment of the plaintiff's claim. Basing their argument upon this condition, respondents insist that the district is inhibited by this section from entering into any contract incurring an obligation or liability unless an assessment has first been levied to liquidate the obligation about to be incurred. The appellant offers the interpretation that this clause means that no expenditure of money of any kind shall be made from bonds which have been certified, nor shall bonds of an irrigation district, if part or all of them have been certified, be used as collateral security for the performance of any unapproved act, or if the defendants' construction be correct, then and in that case, in so far as the quoted part of said section purports to modify or amend the California Irrigation District Act, it is unconstitutional and violative of the provisions of article 4, § 24, of the state Constitution. Conceding the wisdom of the limitation upon the acts of boards of directors of irrigation districts attempted to be fixed by the controverted clause contained in section 3b of the Bond Certification Act, we are not required to pass upon its constitutionality for the reasons hereinafter stated.

Sections 30 and 30a of the Irrigation District Act, relating to the issuance of bonds, fix the purposes for which the money provided from the sale thereof may lawfully be used. Section 30 (as amended by St. 1919, p. 662) gives the power and defines the purposes; section 30a (as added by St. 1917, p. 762, and amended by St. 1919, p. 662) is procedural in its subdivisions, excepting as to the latter portion thereof. The authority and the use are found in the first sentence of section 30 of that act, to wit:

"For the purpose of constructing or purchasing necessary irrigation canals and works, and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor, and for the purpose of acquiring waters, water rights, reservoirs, reservoir sites, and other property necessary for the purposes of said district, and otherwise carrying out the provisions of this act, or any other act under which said district is or may be authorized to acquire property or construct works, the board of directors of any such district must, as soon after such district has been organized as may be practicable, and also whenever thereafter the board of directors shall find that the construction fund raised by the last previous bond issue is insufficient, or that the construction fund has been exhausted by expenditures herein authorized therefrom and it is necessary to raise additional money for said purposes, estimate and determine the amount of money necessary to be raised."

[4, 5] There is nothing in this section which authorizes the expenditure of money raised from the sale of bonds toward the payment of claims such as we are considering in this case. We think that, in ascertaining the meaning of the words, "and otherwise carrying out the provisions of this act," contained in said section, these words should be read as though the following words, "or any other act," were not found in the section, and that these words mean that for the purposes of construction or purchasing necessary irrigation canals, etc., bonds may be issued for acquiring property necessary for the purposes of the district and otherwise carrying out the provisions of this act, under which said district may be authorized to acquire property or construct works, and also under the provisions of any other act covering the same power. In other words, the quoted language and "otherwise carrying out the purposes of this act," as found in said section, relate to cognate subjects and are not to be read as granting unlimited power in the expenditure of money derived from the sale of bonds, simply because of the punctuation or lack of punctuation found in said section. Properly construed, the words give the power of carrying out and expending all moneys derived from the sale of bonds in any construction work authorized by the act in which the words are found, or any other act authorizing the district to acquire property, construct works, etc. It is thus apparent that when bonds are issued for construction purposes, the acquisition of water rights, the building of canals, dams, reservoirs, etc., that the money so raised must be devoted to such purposes, and cannot be diverted at either the pleasure or desire of any board of directors. It is thus apparent that, irrespective of whether the respondents' or the appellants' contention relative to the true interpretation and meaning of the controverted words found in section 3b of the Bond Certification Act is correct, the Madera irrigation district on the 10th day of July, 1922, had no bond money nor unissued bonds available for payment of the plaintiffs' demand. If the memorandum of agreement entered into between the district and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, can be construed as a purchase or acquisition of water or water rights, and therefore within the permissive portion of section 30 as to the purpose for which bond moneys may be expended, it nevertheless remains true that compensation of employees, agents, and officers is an entirely different subject, and must be provided for in accordance with the powers granted in other sections of the Irrigation Act, the only exception made in the expenditure of bond money other than for the construction of works, or the acquisition of property, is that for a limited period of time interest on bonds issued for such purposes may be paid out of the proceeds of bonds subsequently issued. Compensation of agents for the settlement of controversies, even though that settlement contemplates the acquisition of property, is not in any sense of the word "purchase money."

[6] These considerations bring us to the question, Was the board of directors of the Madera irrigation district on the 10th day of July, 1922, empowered to enter into the contract with the plaintiffs sued upon in this action? Appellants base their contention in this particular principally upon the provisions of section 15 of the Irrigation Act (as amended by St. 1919, p. 661), which section, with other grants of power, contains the following:

"Said board shall also have the right to acquire, by purchase, lease, contract, condemnation, or other legal means, all lands, and waters, and water rights, and other property necessary for the construction, use, supply, maintenance, repair and improvements of said canal, or canals," etc.

And, also:

"The board of directors shall have the power and it shall be their duty to manage and conduct the business and affairs of the district; make and execute all necessary contracts; employ and appoint such agents, officers, and employees as may be required, and prescribe their duties."

While the grant of powers contained in this section are general and comprehensive in terms, the grant is not absolute and independent of other sections of the same act. The grant of power is relative only, and must be exercised in accordance with the limitations and restrictions defining the mode of the exercise of the granted powers. The mode, the time, and the manner of executing the powers granted by section 15 are found in sections 30, 30a, 37, 39, 55, 59, and 61 of the Irrigation Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended [see Gen. Laws 1923, pt. 1, p. 1447, et seq.]). If the limitations contained in the various sections, to which we have just referred, are disregarded, then the exercise of the power granted in section 15 cannot be said to be in accordance with law. In section 61 we find:

"The board of directors or other officers of the district shall have no power to incur any debt or liability whatever, either by issuing bonds or otherwise, in excess of the express provisions of this act; and any debt or liability incurred in excess of such express provisions shall be and remain absolutely void; except that for the purposes of organization, or for any of the purposes of this act, the board of directors may, before the levying of the first assessment, incur indebtedness in such sum or sums as shall amount to two thousand dollars, or, if the district shall contain more than four thousand acres, to one-half as many dollars as there are acres of land in the district, and may cause warrants of the district to be issued therefor. * * *

The different provisions of the act referred to by the language contained in section 61 fix the time and define the mode for levying and collecting the taxes to pay the expenses of maintaining the district, compensating its officers, agents, and employees, and in section 59 sets forth a proviso clause to cover unexpected emergencies arising from excessive flow of water or damage to the works of the district, and limits the incurring of a liability for such purposes in the sum of $40,000. The different sections to which we have referred for the raising of money set forth specifically how the money shall be raised, either by the levying of an assessment by the board of directors, or the submitting of the question of raising money by a special assessment to the voters of the district.

It does not appear that the provisions of these various sections relative to the raising of money and limiting the liabilities which may be placed upon the district by the board of directors were complied with or in any manner attempted to be complied with, either prior or subsequent to the 10th day of July, 1922. As said by the learned trial judge:

"There is nothing in the contract of employment which brings it within the purview of the exception contained in section 61, which exception relates exclusively to the incurring of indebtedness before levying the first assessment."

Clearly the contract sued upon, as already shown, attempted to create a liability against the district far in excess of the provisions of the act, because nothing had been done as required by section 39 or section 59, or any other sections which apply to the raising of money for the purposes of the district other than by the sale of bonds, in the levying of assessment or otherwise or at all. In this particular the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Hughson v. Crane, 115 Cal. 413, 47 P. 120, quoted by the trial judge, is also applicable:

"The Irrigation Act is evidently framed upon the theory, and with the intention on the part of the Legislature, that the affairs of the district shall be conducted upon a ready money basis, and not upon credit, and, to enable the directors to carry out this purpose, provision is made for levying special assessments for the payments of salaries, wages, and expenses of management," etc.

In Ser-Vis v. Victor Valley Irr. Dist., 190 Cal. 732, 214 P. 223, the sections of the Irrigation Act with which we are dealing were considered by the Supreme Court, and the ruling there announced is the same relative to the incurring of liabilities which we are following here, and which, we think, prohibits boards of directors from incurring liabilities such as are presented in this case, without having first made provision for the payment thereof in the manner prescribed in the Irrigation Act. In Lincoln & Dawson County Irr. Dist. v. McNeal, 60 Neb. 613, 83 N. W. 847, the Supreme Court of Nebraska, construing the various sections of the Irrigation Act of that state, which, in the particulars now being considered, is almost an exact copy of the California act, it was held that the incurring of liability without first making provision for its payment was inhibited, and collection could not be had. It was also held in that case, if the contract was one which the district was authorized to make at the time it was made, but that the manner of making the same was irregular and the district had received the benefit thereof, then and in that case recovery could be had. In other words, if at the time the power is exercised it may be lawfully exercised, and benefits have been received under the contract so entered into, the district will not be permitted to defend payment on that ground, but must pay on a quantum meruit count the value of the benefits received or services performed. In the case at bar, we have a lack of authority to exercise the power at the time it was attempted to be exercised, and not simply a defect in the mode of exercising that power. The authorities are practically uniform in support of the rule that, where the want of funds at the time of the execution of the proposed contract renders the same invalid, recovery cannot be had. If the contract is valid at the time of its execution, the want of funds to pay the claim when presented is immaterial, unless some other statutory inhibition invalidates a judgment made and entered for the plaintiff on such a contract, even though funds are unavailable for present payment thereof. City of Santa Cruz, 202 F. 357, 120 C. C. A. 485; Arthur v. Petaluma, 175 Cal. 216, 165 P. 698; Chester v. Carmichael, 187 Cal. 287, 201 P. 925; Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 527, 45 P. 824, 50 P. 670; Buck v. City of Eureka, 119 Cal. 44, 50 P. 1065; Montague v. English, 119 Cal. 226, 51 P. 327.

[7] Respondent further insists that the memorandum of agreement dated the 31st day of July, 1922, is ultra vires and void; that the making and entering of such an agreement is entirely outside of, and contrary to, the provisions of the Wright Irrigation Act. We think that a reading of the memorandum is all that is necessary to answer this contention in the affirmative. Clearly the board of directors of the Madera irrigation district are only empowered to execute the various provisions of the Irrigation Act for the preservation of the district, for the protection of its properties, and for the distribution of water to the irrigable lands within the boundaries of the district. There is nothing in the Irrigation Act which empowers a board of directors to contract to dispose of its properties, to provide for the dissolution of the district, and the conveyance of its rights and privileges to some other corporation. There is a section in the Irrigation Act empowering a board of directors under certain circumstances to sell property unnecessary for the uses and purposes of the district, but there is nothing in any of the sections which contemplates the entering into a contract for the dissolution and death of the district. Voluntary dissolution of a district can only be had in accordance with the provisions of the act of the Legislature as amended in 1915. Stats. 1915, p. 859. Involuntary dissolution must be had in accordance with the act approved May 19, 1919. Again, the memorandum calls for an illegal delegation of power to determine the boundaries of a proposed district, provides for the turning over of the property of the Madera irrigation district, provides for the management of the new district, contrary to the mode prescribed by statute, and in various ways constitutes a virtual surrender on the part of the board of directors of the Madera irrigation district of the powers and functions which by statute they are expressly authorized and required to perform in a definite and particularized mode.

[8] The wisdom of the agreement has nothing whatever to do with its ultra vires character. If the agreement procured is not one authorized by the Irrigation Act, it is illegal, even though there is no taint or color of moral wrong. It is not a question of right or wrong. It is simply a question of legality or illegality. It may be that the differences between the district and Miller & Lux, Incorporated, which the record shows to be owners of several thousands of acres of land situate within the exterior boundaries of the district, can best be settled by the dissolution of the Madera irrigation district and the formation of a water storage irrigation district, but this does not alter the situation as to the ultra vires and unauthorized contract presented in this case. The rule is uniform that boards of directors of irrigation districts have only such powers as are expressly granted or necessarily included in the exercise of the powers granted. Stimson v. Alessandro Irr. Dist., 135 Cal. 389, 67 P. 493, 1034; Danley v. Merced Irrigation Dist., 226 P. 847-854; Colburn v. Wilson, 23 Idaho, 337, 130 P. 381. That boards of directors cannot in any such manner abdicate their powers and turn over the properties to other corporations is well established. Colburn v. Wilson, supra, where it is said:

"A contract by the board of directors of such a district, giving to others the management or control of any part of the system, and taking that management and control out of the hands of the district board, would be ultra vires and void."

See, also, Chase v. Treasurer, Los Angeles, etc., 122 Cal. 540, 55 P. 414; Egan v. San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576, 133 P. 294, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 754, and for a general discussion of the subject Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) vol. 3, § 2426 et seq.

[9] The trial court further found that the services to be performed by the plaintiffs under the contract were not fully performed; that the making of the agreement procured did not constitute a composition or settlement of the differences between Miller & Lux, Incorporated, on the one hand and Madera irrigation district on the other; that no suits were settled, no pending litigation was terminated. A reading of the instrument shows that at best it is only a proposed method by which a composition or settlement may be had, that, as said by counsel, it is only an armistice and not a treaty of peace, in that it points out a road by which a final settlement may be reached, but it is in no sense a settlement and is not binding upon anybody. For these reasons, among others, the trial court also found that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover on the quantum meruit count contained in their complaint.

[10] Appellants present the further point that the order allowing intervention on the part of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, is erroneous, but from the views here expressed it is clear that, if erroneous, the order of the court has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, and would not constitute grounds for reversal, as it is covered by the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution. It is further contended on the part of the respondent intervener that, notwithstanding the finding of the court that no fraud as a fact was perpetrated upon the intervener in this case, that fraud as a matter of law exists, in that the board of directors occupying the position of a trustee toward the landowners were entering into an undisclosed agreement, which would, if consummated, fix a charge upon intervener's land as a cestui que trust without its knowledge or consent. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and whether the contention of the respondent is or is not meritorious does not, from the views which we have heretofore expressed herein, affect the final determination of this case. For this reason we do not think it necessary to pass upon this contention made by the intervener.

BIURRUN v. ELIZALDE et al. (Civ. 2976.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 3, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1925.)

1. Trusts $\S$ 345—One receiving money to be paid to owner accountable therefor, though appropriated to payment of debts of trustor or otherwise diverted.

Where one receives money in trust to be paid to another who is owner thereof, owner may hold trustee accountable therefor, even though trustee appropriated money to payment of debts of trustor or otherwise diverted its use to a purpose other than that for which it was delivered to him.

2. Money received $\S$ 1—Owner may sue to recover money or property retained by another to which owner is entitled to possession.

Where one obtains possession of money or property of another and retains it, owner may proceed against him for its recovery, whenever owner is entitled in law to such possession.

3. Trial $\S$ 377(1)—Within discretion of trial court sitting as jury to accept or reject testimony of any of the witnesses.

It is duty of trial court sitting as jury to accept or reject testimony given before it by any of the witnesses, but such power may not be arbitrarily or capriciously exercised, but only in exercise of sound discretion.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 926(5)—Presumed on appeal, in absence of contrary showing that there was no arbitrary rejection or acceptance of any testimony.

In absence of contrary showing, presumption is that there has been no arbitrary rejection or acceptance of testimony, but that the triers have, for sufficient legal reasons, accepted as true the testimony with which final result arrived at harmonizes, and rejected as of no probative value testimony leading to an opposite conclusion.

5. Trial $\S$ 404(4)—Findings phrased in general language imply finding of every fact essential to support of judgment, and further finding that any fact not supporting judgment was not true.

Findings phrased in general language, or substantially in language of one of the pleadings whose averments, whether affirmative or negative, are not themselves specific, if otherwise sufficient, always imply findings of every fact vital and essential to support of judgment, and further finding that any fact not supporting judgment was not true.

6. Trial $\S$ 404(4)—General findings in favor of defendant imply findings of facts relied on as defense.

In action for money had and received, based on alleged payment to defendant of money received from sale of plaintiff's sheep, in which defense was that defendant was not instructed to pay money to plaintiff, and did not know it was proceeds of such sale, general findings for defendant imply findings of facts asserted in defense.

7. Judgment $\S$ 570(4)—Judgment of nonsuit, either of trial court or court of review, not res adjudicata on issues of fact.

A judgment of nonsuit, whether by trial court or a court of review, cannot operate as an estoppel upon the issues of fact or be pleaded as res adjudicata.

8. Trial $\S$ 384—"Motion for nonsuit" admits truth of facts proved, but denies that they operate as matter of law to sustain plaintiff's case.

A "motion for a nonsuit" is in effect a demurrer to the evidence, and, like a demurrer to a pleading, admits truth of facts proved, but denies that, as a matter of law, they operate to sustain plaintiff's case.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Motion for Nonsuit.]

9. Appeal and error $\S$ 1195(3)—Doctrine of law of case not applicable to judgment of nonsuit.

Holding, in reversing judgment of nonsuit, that plaintiff had made prima facie case, was not conclusive on trial on the merits that facts were as claimed by plaintiff, under doctrine of law of the case.

10. Trial $\S$ 395(3)—General findings sufficient, where they follow averments of pleading, and thus decide issues submitted by pleadings.

Though specific findings are preferred to general findings, latter are sufficient, where they follow averments or denials of complaint or answer, and thus decide issues submitted by the pleadings.

11. Trial $\S$ 395(5)—Findings of fact should be ultimate conclusions deduced from facts proved.

Findings must be of ultimate and not of probative facts; that is, findings of fact are or should be ultimate conclusions educed from the facts proved.

12. Trial ⚡395(3)—General findings in negative language of answer held sufficient, without special findings on various probative facts.

In action for money had and received, wherein issue was merely whether defendant received and held in his possession money belonging to plaintiff, general findings in negative language of answer was sufficient, without specific findings on variety of probative facts.

13. Appeal and error ⚡1078(4)—Appellate court authorized to assume that point not referred or discussed in briefs abandoned or waived.

Where point that court erred in admitting evidence was included in specifications of errors, but no reference or discussion of point is made in briefs of counsel for appellant, appellate court is authorized to assume that point was abandoned or waived.

14. Witnesses ⚡392(1)—Signed written statement of party, contradictory to testimony on trial, held admissible for purposes of impeachment.

A signed written statement of a party, contradictory to his testimony on trial, was, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, admissible to impeach testimony of such party, and failure to lay foundation for its introduction as expressly prescribed by such section was immaterial, where such party stated he remembered having signed statement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action for money had and received by Vicente Biurrun against Eulalio Elizalde and A. G. Ramirez. Judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendant Elizalde and in favor of defendant Ramirez, and action as to him dismissed. From a judgment in favor of defendant Ramirez, and from an order denying plaintiff a new trial as to said defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 61 Cal. App. 675, 215 P. 690.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, and Russell W. Cantrell, of San Francisco, for appellant.
W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. The complaint alleges that defendants, within two years immediately preceding the commencement of this action, became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $6,300 for and on account of money "had and received by said defendants to the use of and benefit of plaintiff," etc.; that said sum "and the whole thereof is still due, owing, and unpaid."

The defendants Ramirez and Elizalde filed separate answers to the complaint. The former denied that he became indebted to plaintiff in the sum alleged in the complaint, or in any other sum, within "the two years last past immediately preceding the commencement of this action, or at any time," and denied that there is due plaintiff from him said sum or "any sum or at all," etc.

Elizalde, by his answer, admitted that, within the time mentioned in the complaint, "defendants did become indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $6,300, for and on account of 900 head of sheep sold defendants by plaintiff," but denied that "there is now due to plaintiff from defendant" (Elizalde) the sum named or any sum; that, "within the last two years past," he (Elizalde) paid to defendant Ramirez the sum of $6,300, "as and for plaintiff herein"; that said Ramirez, as defendant "is informed and believes, * * * has appropriated said sum of $6,300 to his own use." Said answer asked that judgment be awarded plaintiff as against said Ramirez and that he (Elizalde) "be dismissed with his costs."

The trial was before the court, sitting without a jury. The court found that Ramirez was not at any time indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $6,300 or in any sum whatever, but that Elizalde was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $5,600, for and on account of money had and received by the said defendant Elizalde, to the use and benefit of plaintiff, and that the whole of said sum "is now owing and unpaid," etc.

Judgment was, upon the findings, awarded and entered in favor of plaintiff against Elizalde for the sum of $5,600 and costs, and in favor of Ramirez, and the action as to him dismissed. The plaintiff moved for a new trial as to Ramirez, and the motion was denied. The appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment in favor of defendant Ramirez and from the order denying him a new trial as to said defendant.

This case in a different form was once before considered by this court; the appeal therein being from a judgment entered upon an order granting a nonsuit. Biurrun v. Elizalde et al., 61 Cal. App. 675, 215 P. 690. Therein it was held that the plaintiff had introduced sufficient evidence to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of his complaint, and the judgment of nonsuit was accordingly reversed.

The points urged for a reversal are: That the findings are not supported by the evidence; and that what purport to be the findings are not findings of fact, but conclusions of law.

It appears that plaintiff was, in the latter part of the year 1919, the owner of a band of 728 head of sheep and that he was then without the necessary pasture for the proper feeding of the sheep. On the 26th day of December, 1919, the plaintiff, so he testified, met Elizalde, who is a cousin of plaintiff, and Ramirez, in front of the Western Hotel, in the city of Marysville, and on that occasion plaintiff proposed to Elizalde that if he (Elizalde) would take possession of his 728 head of sheep, and feed and care for them, he (plaintiff) "would pay him $2,176 as expenses for running them, and when he (Elizalde) sold the sheep he was to pay me $8 per head and keep for himself all that he received over that sum. We then went to the First National Bank," plaintiff proceeded to testify,

"and I gave Mr. Elizalde a check for $2,176. I had 728 head of sheep that I turned over to Mr. Elizalde. After we left the bank, we had a conversation outside, on the same day, and Mr. Ramirez suggested that we make a note, and Mr. Ramirez wrote a note for us for the sum of $8,000. After I got the note, I took it up to Mr. Carlin's office, and Mr. Carlin said it was no good, and he drew another note, which note Mr. Elizalde signed."

This note, plaintiff testified, was given to him as security for the sheep or for the payment of any money received by Elizalde in the sale of the sheep. Plaintiff also stated that he did not sell the sheep to Elizalde, but merely turned them over to the latter on the conditions above explained. The plaintiff further testified that Elizalde sold 700 of the sheep to a Mr. Carey, receiving therefor the sum of $9 per head. Having learned of this sale, plaintiff made a demand on Elizalde for the payment of the money received on said sale. This money, or the check therefor, as will presently be more fully explained, was by Elizalde turned over to Ramirez, with certain directions as to the disposition thereof.

Elizalde testified that he did not buy the plaintiff's sheep, but took possession of the flock to feed and care for under the terms and conditions of the agreement as shown by the testimony of plaintiff as above given; that the agreement was made in the presence of Ramirez. He stated that the latter suggested that plaintiff advance the sum of $2,176 to witness for the "running expenses" incurred in feeding and taking care of the sheep and that witness then execute and deliver to plaintiff his note for $8,000 "as security for the sheep"; that plaintiff, acting upon said suggestion, advanced the sum of $2,176 to witness; and that the latter, likewise prompted, gave his note to plaintiff for the sum of $8,000. Elizalde further testified that, after the delivery of plaintiff's sheep to him, and, on the 8th day of January, 1920, he sold 700 head thereof, together with 108 head of his own, to a Mr. Carey at the rate of $9 per head; that he received from Carey for the sheep a check for the sum of $7,272; that he later indorsed and delivered said check to Ramirez, with instructions to pay to plaintiff out of the money represented by said check the sum of $5,600, said sum being the total amount for which he had sold plaintiff's 700 head of sheep at $8 per head, and to "put the balance to my credit." At that time, Elizalde testified, he was indebted to Ramirez in the sum of $16,000.

It appears that Ramirez did not appropriate the money to the purposes for which Elizalde (so the latter testified) intrusted it to him. The plaintiff testified that, having been informed of the delivery of the money to Ramirez, he made a demand on the latter for so much of the money as represented the amount received by Elizalde for his (plaintiff's) sheep, but Ramirez refused to comply with the demand for reasons explained by him in his testimony given when the case was called for the further trial thereof after it had been returned to the court below by this court upon reversing the judgment entered upon the order granting the nonsuit. This brings us to the testimony of Ramirez, which, in substance, is as follows:

"I know Vicente Biurrun, the plaintiff, and Eulalio Elizalde, the other defendant. I knew them both in the latter part of 1919 and the fore part of 1920. I did not meet Mr. Elizalde or Mr. Biurrun on or about the 26th day of December, 1919, or close to the 1st day of January, 1920, at the Western Hotel in Marysville. I met Mr. Elizalde. He came to my place of business at 224-C street in Marysville, and wanted me to make a note for Mr. Biurrun. I told him to bring Mr. Biurrun here, but he said, 'No; he is at the Western Hotel,' and I said, 'I have not got the time; but I will see if I have a blank,' and I took up a blank from the Rideout Bank and rushed over to the Western, filled it out, and gave it to Mr. Elizalde. I could not swear whether I saw Mr. Biurrun sign the note. I do not remember the amount of the note, and I do not know what the transaction was at all. I do not recall going to the First National Bank with these gentlemen on that day. I made the note out at the Western Hotel. Mr. Elizalde told me at that time that he wanted to give Mr. Biurrun a note, and I wrote it out as he dictated it to me, and I went right back to my place of business. Some time about January 1, 1920, I saw Mr. Elizalde and received some money from him; $6,272 I believe it was. It was on a check, and, when I received it, I put it in the First National Bank of this city, the exact date I do not know, about January 13, 1920. At the time Elizalde gave me this check, he told me to pay $3,000 to Feliciano Goni, and he said, 'I need the balance for feed. You deposit it for me and I will draw on you.' I know Feliciano Goni. Elizalde was in the sheep business at that time. Upon receipt of this money, I paid $3,000 to Feliciano Goni, on the 23d day of January, 1920, by check upon the First National Bank. I have not got the check; I have lost it. The canceled check was returned to me. After paying the check of $3,000, I still had some money in my hands belonging to Elizalde, and he was drawing on me, and I was advancing him money at that time. I did not keep one cent of the money for myself. At the time Mr. Elizalde gave me $7,272, he did not mention Mr. Biurrun's name, nor did he tell me to pay it to Mr. Biurrun, the plaintiff in this action. There was not a word said about Biurrun at all. I was not interested financially in the transaction between Elizalde and Biurrun with reference to the sheep. I did not know anything about their business. Mr. Biurrun did not call at my place of business on the 1st day of April, 1920, and ask me for any money. He never at that time, or any other time, told me that Elizalde was willing to pay in sheep, and I did not tell him, 'I will not give you the sheep or any money.' My only reason in filling out the note was as an act of accommodation and friendship, and that ended my connection with the sheep transaction. After paying Goni, I paid out to Elizalde more than the balance that was left. I am not indebted to Biurrun on my own account. I never sold him any sheep, nor bought any sheep from him."

Ramirez, on cross-examination, stood by his direct examination, but added that, while it was true that Elizalde was indebted to him in a large sum, he did not ask him whether he (plaintiff) "could apply this check on that indebtedness," and that he did not so apply it. He further stated on cross-examination that "Elizalde simply gave me the check"; that "he did not tell me what the check was for"; that "he simply said 'pay Goni $3,000, and keep the balance to my account.' There was not a word said about paying my bill." He stated that, when Elizalde handed him the check, he (Elizalde) did not tell him that he (Elizalde) sold 700 of Biurrun's sheep. Ramirez, further testifying on cross-examination, stated that, when he prepared the $8,000 note in favor of Biurrun for Elizalde to sign, he had no conversation with Biurrun; that he merely exchanged greetings with him, and that he (Ramirez) did not "mention any sheep" to Biurrun, "nor did he to me"; that Biurrun "did not tell me why he wanted this note from Elizalde"; that "Biurrun never asked me for any money" (referring to the testimony of Biurrun that he demanded of Ramirez payment of any of the money delivered to the latter in the form of a check by Elizalde).

W. C. Owens, assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Marysville, testifying from "ledger sheet No. 1" of the account of defendant Ramirez, stated that, according to said account, Ramirez, on the 13th day of January, 1920, deposited the sum of $6,272, and that it also showed that on the 28th day of January, 1920, a withdrawal of $3,000 from said account was made, but that, as the check was returned to the maker on the 31st day of January, 1920, he had no way of ascertaining to whom the withdrawal was made.

A statement, reduced to writing, made by Elizalde in the office of an attorney on May 17, 1921 (at which time a suit by one Bastiqueta against Ramirez and Elizalde was pending), in which Elizalde declared that he gave the check mentioned to Ramirez, with directions to pay $3,000 to F. Goni on a note held by the latter against Elizalde, and to retain the balance of the check for him (Elizalde), was introduced in evidence. W. P. Rich, the attorney in whose office said statement was made, testified that he heard Elizalde make the statement that he gave the check to Ramirez, with directions to pay Goni $3,000 of the check and to keep the balance thereof for him (Elizalde); that, in fact that statement by Elizalde was made in response to questions propounded to him by Rich; and that thereupon the latter caused the statement to be reduced to writing by his stenographer, and that Elizalde signed it after Ramirez had explained to the former the purport thereof. Elizalde, in rebuttal, stated that, while the signature to the written statement was his, he had no recollection of signing it; that Ramirez did not translate the writing to him. The above embodies a comprehensive statement in substance of the testimony presented by the parties to the action.

[1-6] The specific contention of the plaintiff, in support of his general contention that the decision below is afforded no support by the evidence, is that the sum of money to which he was entitled on account of the sale of his sheep having been delivered to Ramirez by Elizalde, with specific instructions by the latter that he (Ramirez) pay the same to plaintiff, Ramirez held said sum of money in trust for his (plaintiff's) use or benefit, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is authorized in law to proceed against Ramirez in an action for money had and received, irrespective of the disposition the latter might have made of it. Indeed, the plaintiff goes further and contends that, even if Ramirez received the sum of $5,600 out of the check to which plaintiff was entitled without knowledge, either at the time he received it or at any subsequent time, that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to receive said sum out of said check, Ramirez was, nevertheless, subject to an action by plaintiff for the recovery of said sum of money.

It is obviously true that where one receives money in trust to be paid to another who is the owner thereof, the latter may hold the trustee accountable for the money so received, even though the latter had appropriated it to the payment of the debts of the trustor, or otherwise diverted its use to a purpose other than that for which it was delivered to him. And undoubtedly, if one obtains possession of the money or other property of another and retains it in his possession, the owner of the money or other property may proceed against and maintain an action against the party having possession of the money or other property for the recovery of the same, whenever the owner is in law entitled to such possession. But, in urging the propositions above stated, the plaintiff necessarily proceeds upon the assumption that it is undisputed that Elizalde, on delivering the check to Ramirez, instructed the latter to pay to plaintiff, out of said check, $5,600, and that Ramirez accepted the check upon the condition that such payment should be made; that Ramirez did not pay Goni $3,000 out of the check and the balance to Elizalde; and that he (Ramirez) still retains the money received by him on the check. The assumption is without foundation.

It was with the trial court, as the trier of the questions of fact, to accept as true or reject as untrue the testimony given before it by any of the witnesses. Of course, as often it has been said, the power thus vested in juries or trial courts may not be arbitrarily or capriciously exercised, but only in the exercise of a sound discretion upon a consideration of the testimony by the tests alone available to the triers of issues of fact at nisi prius. And, where, as here, there is no showing, or nothing on the face of the record to indicate, that the triers of the fact have arbitrarily or without just reason accepted or rejected particular testimony, the presumption must be indulged on appeal that there has been no arbitrary rejection or acceptance of any testimony, but that the triers have, for sufficient legal reasons, accepted as true the testimony with which the final result arrived at, or the judgment, harmonizes, and rejected as of no probative value testimony which tended to lead to an opposite conclusion. There is, as is to be observed, a positive conflict in the testimony, and the findings show that the trial court accepted the testimony of Ramirez and by reason thereof of necessity rejected that of Elizalde and Biurrun upon the points upon which the testimony of those parties disagree. It is true that the findings are not specific, but follow, substantially, the negative averments of the answer.

Findings phrased in general language or which are substantially in the language of one of the pleadings, whose averments, whether affirmative or negative, are not themselves specific, if otherwise sufficient, always imply the finding of every fact vital and essential to the support of the judgment and the finding that any fact which would not support the judgment, and to which some of the witnesses had testified in the trial, was not true. Hence the findings here imply the finding of every fact vital and essential to the support of the judgment, or, specifically speaking, the findings imply the finding of the following facts: That Ramirez knew nothing at any time, until perhaps this action was brought, about the agreement between plaintiff and Elizalde, whatever it may have been, whereby the latter was to feed and care for plaintiff's sheep, or that he (Elizalde) had authority to sell said sheep; that Ramirez did not know, when he received the check from Elizalde, that the latter had sold plaintiff's sheep, or that, if such was the fact, the bulk of the money represented by the check was received by Elizalde as in payment for plaintiff's sheep on the sale thereof by Elizalde; that Elizalde, on delivering the check to Ramirez, did not instruct the latter to pay any part thereof or any money to plaintiff, but specifically directed Ramirez to pay Goni, to whom Elizalde was indebted in a large sum, out of said money, the sum of $3,000, and to keep or deposit the balance for him (Elizalde) and for his use and benefit; that Ramirez, in accordance with the directions so given him by Elizalde, paid Goni $3,000 within a few days after he received the check; that he deposited or kept for Elizalde the balance of the money represented by the check and from time to time, as Elizalde called for it, paid him said balance; that plaintiff, at no time prior to the bringing of this action, demanded from Ramirez payment of any money received by the latter on said check; that Ramirez, neither at the time this action was instituted nor for some time prior thereto, had in his possession any money belonging to plaintiff.

The findings thus interpreted render untenable the argument of plaintiff's counsel, as indicated above, and, consequently, render inapplicable the cases cited in plaintiff's brief as in support of said argument.

[7-9] The contention that upon the question whether plaintiff did or did not sell his sheep to Elizalde, instead of employing the latter to feed and care for them, the decision of this court on the appeal from the judgment of nonsuit is res adjudicata, for the reason that, after the case was returned by this court to the court below for a trial thereof upon the facts, no other testimony addressed to that question was received, is without merit. In the first place, it is to be remarked that the point thus made is of no legal consequence in the decision of this appeal. In the second place, it is to be observed that a judgment on nonsuit, whether by a trial court or a court of review, cannot operate as an estoppel upon the issues of fact. A motion for a nonsuit, as has often been declared in the cases, is in effect a demurrer to the evidence, and, like a demurrer to a pleading, admits the truth of the facts proved, but denies that they as a matter of law operate to sustain or support the plaintiff's case. It may happen, and no doubt it has happened, that, upon the very same evidence upon which a reversal of a judgment of nonsuit has been ordered the trial court may render an unimpeachable judgment upon the merits of the case in favor of defendant. The reason is that the trial court, when entertaining a motion for a nonsuit, is dealing entirely with a question of law, and must attach to the evidence, whether properly or improperly received, its full probative value, whereas, when deciding the case on its merits, so far as the facts are concerned, it is dealing with a question of fact, in the decision of which it is vested with the power of believing or disbelieving any testimony in the case and deciding accordingly. See Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 545; City and County of San Francisco v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 648, 96 P. 281; Ramsey v. Powers et al. (Cal. App.) 241 P. 567. Nor does the doctrine of the "law of the case" apply here, if that is what plaintiff really means to claim in asserting that the judgment of this court on the nonsuit is res adjudicata. The cases of McGraw v. Friend & Terry Lumber Co., 133 Cal. 589, 65 P. 1051, and Neale v. Morrow, 163 Cal. 445, 125 P. 1052, cited by counsel for plaintiff in support of their view of the effect of the judgment of this court in the respect mentioned, contain no pronouncements inconsistent with the views here expressed.

[10-12] The contention that the findings are insufficient because they constitute or involve conclusions of law rather than findings of fact cannot be upheld. Specific findings are always to be preferred to general findings, but findings in general terms have been held sufficient where, as here, they follow the averments or denials of the complaint or answer and so decide the issue or issues submitted by the pleadings. It is true that the findings here involve, in a measure, conclusions of law. This is more or less true of nearly every set of findings made by trial courts, and it is so because the rule is that findings, as is true in pleading the facts, must be of ultimate and not of probative facts; that is to say, the findings of fact are or should be ultimate conclusions deduced from the facts proved. Yet, as stated, we often find what strictly are conclusions of law properly serving the office of findings of fact. For illustration, on an issue of debt, where the court finds generally that the defendant was not, at the time mentioned in the complaint, nor at any other time, indebted to the plaintiff in the sum claimed, or any other sum, we have a good finding of fact, although, strictly speaking, whether one is or is not indebted to another is also a question of law to be determined from the probative facts. In the present case the plaintiff's action, as seen, is one for money had and received. No fraud or mistake or mala fides in the handling of trust funds is or are alleged. The defendant, therefore, was required merely to set up the general issue or a general denial. Therefore the issue tendered and to be tried was merely whether Ramirez received and held in his possession money belonging to plaintiff. Hence the findings in the negative language of the answer as clearly, squarely, and effectually decided the single issue made by the complaint and answer as the court could have done by specifically finding upon the variety of probative facts directed to the support or the demolition of the affirmative of that issue, and measures up to the rule that findings must be sufficiently definite and clear as not to require an investigation on review to determine what issue has been decided. Chatfield v. Continental Building, etc., Association, 6 Cal. App. 665, 669, 92 P. 1040.

[13, 14] While the point that the court erred in admitting in evidence the written statement made and signed by Elizalde prior to the trial hereof to the effect that he directed Ramirez to pay out of the check the sum of $3,000 to Goni is included in the specifications of "errors in law occurring at the trial," there is no reference to or discussion of said point in the briefs of counsel for plaintiff. We are therefore authorized to assume that the point is abandoned or waived. Still it may be well enough to explain why the point cannot be maintained. The only ground of objection to the admissibility of the statement was that—

"No foundation had been laid outside of the testimony of an interested party that he interpreted this instrument to Elizalde; that it had not been shown that Elizalde understood the contents because he cannot read or write the English language."

The statement was admissible as in impeachment of the testimony of Elizalde by virtue of the provisions of section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No objection was made that the foundation for the introduction of impeaching testimony as expressly prescribed by said section was not laid, but, if such objection had been made, it would have been without legal justification, inasmuch as Elizalde stated that he remembered the time and place at which he signed the statement and that the signature to the statement received in evidence was his, declaring, however, that he did not understand the purport thereof when he signed it. Ramirez testified that he explained to Elizalde in his own language (the Spanish) the real contents of the statement before the latter subscribed his name thereto. While Elizalde contradicted this testimony of Ramirez, it was for the court to decide whether Ramirez or Elizalde told the truth about the translation of the contents of the statement to the latter in his native language and to find, as presumptively it did find, that Elizalde thus learned and, at the time he signed the statement, well understood and knew the full import thereof.

There are no other points requiring attention herein.

The judgment is affirmed.

WALKER v. BOYLE, Auditor. (Civ. 5422.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 9, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 7, 1926.)

1. Witnesses ⇨29—Witness from another state, appearing in criminal case, but not in pursuance of undertaking or on subpoena, held not within statute allowing payment of reasonable expenses.

Where witness from another state attended criminal trial without being subpoenaed, and not pursuant to any undertaking or order requiring his attendance, as authorized by Pen. Code, § 1330, he was not entitled, under section 1329, to payment of expenses on the judge's certificate of approval, regardless of Pol. Code, § 4300g, relating to witness fees and mileage.

2. Witnesses ⇨29—In construction of statute relating to payment of expenses of witness from outside county, court should not disregard any part thereof.

On petition for mandamus to require warrant to be drawn for expenses of witness from outside state attending criminal trial, court may not disregard any portion of Pen. Code, § 1329, permitting payment of such witness' expenses only when he attends on subpoena or in pursuance of undertaking.

3. Witnesses ⇨29—Witness in criminal case from outside state held entitled to reasonable and necessary expenses, if method prescribed by law for payment of expenses is followed.

Under Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 2, making expenses necessarily incurred by district attorney in detection of crime and prosecution of criminal cases county charges, witness from outside state attending criminal case at request of county attorney is entitled to reasonable and necessary expenses under Pen. Code, § 1329, if method prescribed by such statute for payment of such expenses is followed.

Original application by Harry Walker for writ of mandate to be directed to Thomas F. Boyle, as Auditor of the City and County of San Francisco, requiring him to draw a warrant for expenses incurred by petitioner as witness in a criminal case. Writ denied.

Louis Ferrari and J. J. Posner, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Edward F. Moran, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the respondent, Thomas F. Boyle, as auditor of the city and county of San Francisco, to draw his warrant upon the treasury of said city and county, pursuant to an order of court made for the payment of expenses necessarily and reasonably incurred by petitioner as a witness on behalf of the prosecution in a criminal action heard and determined in the superior court of said city and county.

It appears that the defendant in said criminal action, while in the employ of a bank in San Francisco, embezzled certain American Express Company's travelers' checks, which later he converted into cash in New York City. The testimony of the petitioner herein, Harry Walker, who cashed said checks in the city of New York, became indispensable at the trial of said action in order that the defendant might be identified as being the person who presented said checks for payment. The importance of having said witness present to testify at the trial was brought to the attention of the court in which said action was pending by the assistant district attorney and the bank's attorney; the latter being associated with the district attorney in the prosecution of said action. In response, the judge of said court directed that said witness be produced at said trial. The attorney for the bank then communicated with Walker, requested him to proceed to San Francisco, and represented to him that his traveling and other necessary expenses as a witness would be paid in said action. Walker complied with said request, came to San Francisco, and after testifying in said action, presented a claim for expenses in the total sum of $389.68. The court thereupon made and signed the following order:

"In this cause, it appearing to the court that Harry Walker has come into this city and county from New York, state of New York, by virtue of a subpoena duly and legally issued by said court, and duly and legally served upon him, in the above-entitled proceeding, and has attended before this court as a witness on behalf of the prosecution in the above-entitled proceeding, now agreeably to the provisions of section 1329 of the Penal Code of this state, it is ordered that Thomas F. Boyle, the auditor of the city and county of San Francisco, draw his warrant upon John McDougald, the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, in favor of said Harry Walker for the sum of $389.68 necessary expenses incurred by him in attending as such witness."

It further appears that said bank advanced to petitioner the full amount of his expenses, and obtained an assignment of his claim therefor. Upon refusal of respondent to draw his warrant for the amount of such expenses, as directed in said court order, this proceeding was commenced.

It is admitted that no subpoena was ever issued or served upon petitioner, and also that no affidavit was made pursuant to the provisions of section 1330 of the Penal Code to require the attendance of said witness. Said section 1330 in this respect provides that—

"No person is obliged to attend as a witness before a court * * * out of the county where the witness resides * * * unless the judge of the court in which the offense is triable * * * or a judge of the superior court, upon affidavit of the district attorney or prosecutor, * * * stating that he believes the evidence of the witness is material, and his attendance at the * * * trial necessary, shall indorse on the subpoena an order for the attendance of the witness."

The claim of petitioner for expenses is based primarily upon the following code section:

"When a person attends before a magistrate, grand jury, or court, as a witness in a criminal case, upon a subpoena or in pursuance of an undertaking, and it appears that he has come from a place outside of the county, or that he is poor and unable to pay the expenses of such attendance, the court, at its discretion, if the attendance of the witness be upon a trial, by an order upon its minutes, or, in any other case, the judge, at his discretion, by a written order, may direct the county auditor to draw his warrant upon the county treasurer in favor of witness for a reasonable sum, to be specified in the order, for the necessary expenses of the witness." Pen. Code, sec. 1329.

In connection with that section might be read a portion of section 4300g of the Political Code, although probably not material, because that section has not been cited by counsel on either side. It is as follows:

"Witness' fees, except as in this title otherwise provided: For each day's actual attendance, when legally required to attend upon the superior court, per day, two dollars in civil cases and one dollar and fifty cents in criminal cases. Mileage actually traveled, one way only, per mile, ten cents; provided, however, that in criminal cases such per diem and mileage shall only be allowed upon a showing to the court, by the witness, that the same are necessary for the expenses of the witness in attending, and the court shall determine the necessity for the same, and may disallow any fees to a witness unnecessarily subpoenaed. * * *

[1] Petitioner contends that, inasmuch as that portion of said section 1329 of the Penal Code declares that the court may allow the payment of the reasonable and necessary expenses of a witness, when "it appears that he has come from a place outside of the county," a witness who has come from any point "outside of the county," whether from another county in the state, or from another state, or another country, or from across the seas, is entitled to an allowance for expenses, at the discretion of the court in which the action is tried. It will be noted, however, that at the beginning of said section a qualifying clause is employed which apparently constitutes the foundation for the exercise of the court's power to allow witness' expenses in the cases therein provided. It reads:

"When a person attends before a magistrate, grand jury, or court, as a witness in a criminal case, upon a subpoena or in pursuance of an undertaking, and it appears that he has come from a place outside of the county, * * *

—the court, in its discretion, may make certain allowances for expenses. (Emphasis ours.)

[2] It will also be observed that said qualifying clause is used conjunctively, and it so connected with the remainder of said section that it necessarily limits the operation of said section to those persons who attend as witnesses "upon a subpoena or in pursuance of an undertaking." Applying said qualifying clause to the facts of the instant proceeding, petitioner is clearly not entitled to an allowance for expenses for the reason that, although he came from outside of the county, he did not attend before the court "upon a subpoena or in pursuance of an undertaking," having come voluntarily from the state of New York, wherein, it is conceded, the process of subpoena issued by a court in this state has no territorial force or effect. Therefore, unless the plain language of said qualifying clause is wholly ignored, and the remainder of said section be given universal application to all persons attending as witnesses, whether they attend in response to subpoenas or undertakings or otherwise, the contention of petitioner cannot be sustained. Of course, under well-settled rules of statutory construction, we may not disregard any part of the code section.

"A statute should always be so construed, if reasonably possible, as to give each part thereof the meaning and effect which, from the act as a whole appears to have been intended." In re Reineger, 184 Cal. 97, 193 P. 81; Barber v. Galloway (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 34.

We conclude, therefore, that the provisions of said section 1329 by which the court is granted authority to make allowances for expenses of witnesses apply only to such witnesses as the court may legally require to attend, and that, since the case of petitioner does not fall within that class, the provisions of said section are unavailing to him.

[3] Petitioner makes the further contention that, inasmuch as a defendant in a criminal action is entitled to be confronted with the witnesses against him, it becomes a matter of public policy to encourage the attendance of the state's witnesses from foreign jurisdictions, when their testimony is essential to the enforcement of criminal laws; that, therefore, independent of statutory authority, and aside from the question of whether valid service of a subpoena may be made, if a person, in response to the request made by the court, voluntarily and in good faith, goes from a jurisdiction wherein the process of such court is ineffective to the place of trial to testify for the prosecution, he is entitled to be compensated for the reasonable expenses incurred by him in so doing. In support of such contention petitioner cites the cases of Climie v. Appanoose Co., 125 Iowa, 292, 101 N. W. 98; Westfall v. Madison Co., 62 Iowa, 427, 17 N. W. 614; Dutcher v. Justice, 38 Ga. 214; Albany v. Derby, 30 Vt. 718.

The wisdom of the policy declared in the authorities just cited cannot be denied, but the Legislature of this state has provided a law to meet just such emergencies by the enactment of subdivision 2 of section 4307 of the Political Code, which is as follows:

"County Charges. The following are county charges: 1. Charges incurred against the county by virtue of any of the provisions of this act. 2. The traveling and other personal expenses of the district attorney, incurred in criminal cases arising in the county, and in civil actions and proceeding in which the county is interested, and all other expenses necessarily incurred by him in the detection of crime and prosecution of criminal cases, and in civil actions and proceedings and all other matters in which the county is interested." (Emphasis ours.)

It would therefore seem clear that petitioner may not be denied reimbursement for the reasonable and necessary expenses incurred by him in attending as a witness in said criminal action, provided the method prescribed by law for the payment of those expenses be followed.

In view of the conclusion reached upon the main questions involved herein, it is not necessary to discuss or decide the other points urged by respondent in opposition to the granting of the petition herein. The alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged, and the peremptory writ prayed for is denied.

ATWOOD v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA
ICE CO. (Civ. 5286.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 26, 1925.)

Appeal and error — 1011(1).

Appellate court may not disturb findings made on conflicting evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warner, Judge.

Action by Leon A. Atwood against the Southern California Ice Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 218 P. 283, 63 Cal. App. 343.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McNabb & Hodge, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages alleged to have been incurred while plaintiff's apples were in storage in the defendant's warehouse. The defendant answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

In response to allegations contained in the pleadings the trial court found that the defendant is a California corporation, having its principal place of business at San Bernardino, Cal.; that as a corporation the defendant is engaged in conducting a cold storage warehouse; that during the months of October and November, 1919, plaintiff delivered to defendant at its cold storage warehouse in the city of San Bernardino, Cal., 12,000 boxes of apples, a portion of which constituted the 120,000 pounds of apples described in plaintiff's amended complaint; that all of said apples so delivered to defendant by plaintiff were delivered for the purpose of having defendant keep said apples in cold storage until such time as the plaintiff sold the same; that at the time of the delivery of said apples by plaintiff to defendant all of said apples were in good condition; that the defendant accepted said apples and all of them a being in good condition and piled said boxes containing all of said apples in its said warehouse in the usual and customary manner for storage; that defendant, negligently and carelessly, and without exercising ordinary care in conducting and maintaining its said warehouse in which said apples were stored, permitted and allowed said warehouse to become infested with large numbers of rats, and during all the time said apples were stored in said warehouse defendant, negligently, and without exercising ordinary care, maintained said warehouse in said condition and allowed large numbers of rats to infest said warehouse, and to run upon, over, and across said apples, and to eat holes in large numbers of them, which caused the juice and pulp of the apples so eaten into by said rats to run down, over, and upon others of said apples belonging to plaintiff, etc.

The appellant makes three points. It claims (1) that it was not negligent; (2) that the apples were infested with mice when brought into the warehouse; and (3) that the defendant at all time exercised that degree of reasonable care that a warehouseman under the circumstances was in law bound to exercise. It does not claim that the respondent was guilty of any act which prevented the appellant from having a fair trial, and it does not claim that the trial court made any ruling at any time which prevented the appellant from producing its entire defense. Turning to the three points which the appellant makes, it is sufficient to state that there was much evidence introduced for and against each of the propositions stated by the appellant. The most that we can say in its behalf is that the evidence was conflicting, but in that regard we are not to be understood as intimating that the evidence did not preponderate in behalf of the respondent. Under well-established rules, in the face of such a record, an appellate court may not disturb the findings made by the trial court.

The appellant earnestly contends that under the law a warehouseman is not an insurer. Neither in the trial court nor in this court do we understand the respondent to make a contrary contention. We find nothing in the record indicating that the trial court so ruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHAMLIAN et al. v. WELLS et al.
(Sac. 3638.)

1. Pleading ⚡129(2)—Special denial of unlawful retention of possession held an admission that possession was retained.

In action for use and occupancy of realty, a special denial by defendant that he unlawfully retained possession of land is an admission that he retained possession and appropriated rents, issues, and profits; the only issue being lawfulness of such appropriation and possession.

2. Judgment ⚡695—Principal held bound by judgment against agent where he had notice thereof.

Where an undisclosed principal was in possession of premises through his agent and received proceeds of sale of crops, the principal is bound by the judgment against agent for possession of land, though not a party thereto, since notice to agent of action is notice to principal.

3. Judgment ⚡695—Judgment against agent binding on principal when agent notified.

A judgment against an agent is binding on his principal when notice comes to agent while he is acting for his principal in the very transaction in controversy.

4. Principal and agent ⚡177(1)—Knowledge of agent held knowledge of principal.

Knowledge of agent in the course of his agency is knowledge of principal, and when knowledge of agent is ascertained the constructive notice to principal is conclusive.

5. Principal and agent ⚡145(1)—Undisclosed principal benefiting by agent's possession liable to owner.

An undisclosed principal reaping the benefits of acts of his agent in unlawful possession of premises cannot avoid responsibility to owner thereof.

6. Principal and agent ⚡145(1)—Undisclosed principal held liable for acts of agent within scope of authority.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 2330, 2338, an undisclosed principal is liable for acts of his agent, performed or committed within scope of agent's authority.

7. Crops ⚡2—Party harvesting crops while owner is out of possession is entitled to crops.

Party entering on land and harvesting crops on his own account is entitled to such crops under rule that owner of land has no right to crops raised thereon by one not in privity with him and severed while he is out of possession.

8. Crops ⚡2—Party severing crops liable to owner for value of use and possession of land.

Party not in privity with owner, raising and harvesting crops while owner was out of possession, is liable to owner for damages, the measure of which is value of use and possession of land while in possession.

9. Principal and agent ⚡171(1)—Principal retaining profits under same liability as agent for latter's possession of land.

Where owner was entitled to value of use and possession of land while occupied by agent of another, the principal, under Civ. Code, § 2330, is liable to owner where he retains the fruits of his agent's acts.

10. Use and occupation ⚡6—Allegation of contract for premises held not to change cause of action for use and occupation.

In action for value of use and occupation of premises unlawfully possessed by defendants, allegation as to contract with one of defendants shown to have been terminated held not to change cause of action, but to be regarded as matter of inducement or evidence.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action for value of use and occupancy of certain real property by Arthur T. Shamlian and another against Charles Wells and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

N. Lindsay South, of Fresno, and Bradley & Bradley, of Visalia, for appellants.

E. A. Bagby, of Oakland, E. I. Feemster and Feemster & Cleary, all of Visalia, for respondents.

SHENK, J. At all times involved herein the plaintiffs were the owners of a 27-acre tract of producing vineyard land in the county of Tulare. On January 28, 1922, they brought this action against the defendants for the value of the use and possession of said land from February 10 to October 8, 1921. Judgment was rendered in their favor for the sum of $1,800.50. Notice of appeal was served and filed on behalf of all of the defendants, but the appeal is not prosecuted by the defendants Charles Wells and Harry Faith. The appeal of the defendant C. L. Caine is therefore the only matter here for determination.

It is alleged in the complaint that prior to the 10th day of February, 1921, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement to sell the said land to Wells and that he took possession on August 21, 1920; that the defendant Wells and the defendants Faith and Caine, as assigns, continued in possession of the said premises by virtue of said agreement until the 10th day of February, 1921, upon which last-mentioned date the said agreement was terminated; that thereafter all the right, title, and interest of the defendants in and to said premises and to the possession thereof were terminated; that demand for possession was made but was refused; that the defendants remained in possession during the period of the controversy, harvested the crops, appropriated the same to their own use; and that the value of the rents, issues, and profits for said period was the sum of $3,000.

[1] The defendant Caine answered separately, denying generally the allegations of the complaint, but specially denying that he unlawfully retained possession of said land during the period in question and harvested the crops thereon. The denial last referred to must be taken as an admission that the defendant Caine had and retained such possession, harvested the crops and appropriated the proceeds from the sale thereof to his own use. The only issue raised by said denial was as to the lawfulness of such appropriation and possession.

The court found that the allegations of the complaint were true; that Caine claimed possession by virtue of a purchase from Faith, prior to February 10, 1921, of the crop for the year 1921, with the incidental right of possession and removal of the crop; and that whatever rights Caine or any of the defendants had in the premises had been terminated on the 10th day of February, 1921.

[2] As proof of the allegation of the complaint that the alleged agreement had been terminated as to all of the defendants, the respondents offered in evidence a final judgment in an action in said court wherein Charles Wells and Steves Zahar were the defendants and wherein it was determined that the original contract with Wells was terminated on the 10th day of February, 1921; that on that day all of the right of the defendants in and to the said premises and the possession thereof had ceased; and that on that date the plaintiffs were entitled to the possession of said land. Caine objected to the introduction of said judgment in evidence on the ground that he was not a party to said action. The court overruled the objection. He now contends that the said ruling was error and that without said judgment there was no evidence before the court which would sustain a finding that the said contract had been terminated. It was in evidence, however, without conflict, that during the period in question, and for some time prior to the commencement of the action in which said judgment was entered, Caine, as an undisclosed principal, was in possession of said premises through his agent, the said Steves Zahar, one of the defendants in said action; that the said agent Zahar was in actual physical possession during said time, cared for the land, and harvested the crop; and that he (the appellant) received and appropriated to his own use the proceeds from the sale of said crop. The Wells contract contained a provision that no assignment thereof should be made unless the assignee should agree in writing to be bound by the terms of the agreement in the same manner as the original contracting party was bound. Neither Faith nor Caine complied with this provision of the contract, nor did they otherwise become bound to the plaintiffs in writing under said contract. It appears that the respondents did not know at the time they commenced their action against Wells and Zahar that Caine was in possession through his agent and interested in the crop, consequently they did not make him a party. It also appears that Zahar was made a party defendant because he was actually in possession of the premises prior to and at the time of the commencement of said action. It is undisputed that he was so in possession and continued in such possession and harvested the crop solely as the agent of Caine. It would necessarily follow that Zahar had no right of possession apart from the right of possession of Caine, his undisclosed principal. It must be conceded that the said judgment was admissible in evidence as against Wells, for he was a party defendant in said action and was bound thereby. Zahar was a party defendant and was also bound. It is suggested by the plaintiffs that Caine, because of his relationship with Zahar, was likewise bound, on the theory that a judgment is binding between the parties and all persons who are represented by them and claim under them or who are in privity with them. See Satterlee v. Bliss, 36 Cal. 489; Estate of Clark, 190 Cal. 354, 360, 212 P. 622; 15 Cal. Jur. 97.

[3, 4] It has been held that under some circumstances a judgment against an agent is binding on his principal. Bridges v. McAlister, 106 Ky. 791, 51 S. W. 603, 45 L. R. A. 800, 90 Am. St. Rep. 267, and note; Jacob v. Town of Oyster Bay, 109 App. Div. 630, 96 N. Y. S. 626. The circumstances justifying such a holding would seem to be present when notice comes to the agent while he is acting for his principal in the very transaction in controversy. The general rule is well settled that the knowledge of the agent in the course of his agency is the knowledge of the principal. 1 Cal. Jur. 846, and cases cited. It rests on the assumption that the agent will communicate to his principal all information acquired in the course of his agency, and when the knowledge of the agent is ascertained the constructive notice to the principal is conclusive. 1 Cal. Jur. 853, and cases cited. In this case the knowledge of and notice to Zahar of his relationship with Caine and of the pendency of said action was established and may not be disputed. The rule would seem to be especially applicable when, as here, the principal is undisclosed. Caine was not a party of record to the contract of purchase, and when he was secretly in possession of the premises through his agent he should not, under the circumstances here shown, be heard to say that notice to his agent in said action was not notice to him.

[5-7] The appellant is then relegated to the position of an undisclosed principal who has reaped the benefit of the acts of his agent unlawfully in possession and is seeking to avoid responsibility to the owner. It is a familiar rule that an undisclosed principal is liable for the acts of his agent performed or committed within the scope of the agent's authority. Civ. Code, § 2338; 1 Cal. Jur. 838, 839, and cases cited. Section 2330 of the Civil Code provides:

"An agent represents his principal for all purposes within the scope of his actual or ostensible authority, and all the rights and liabilities which would accrue to the agent from transactions within such limit, if they had been entered into on his own account, accrue to the principal."

[8, 9] If Zahar had entered upon said land and harvested the crop on his own account, he would have been entitled to the harvested crop, for it is well settled that the owner of land has no right or title to crops raised on the land by one not in privity with him and severed while he is out of possession. Rector v. Lewis, 46 Cal. App. 168, 188 P. 1018; Betha v. Jeffres, 126 Ark. 194, 189 S. W. 666, L. R. A. 1918A, 549, 552, and note; 8 R. C. L. 366; 8 Cal. Jur. 688. But coincident with his right to retain the severed crops is his liability to the owner for damages, the measure of which is the value of the use and possession of the land while he was in possession. Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412, citing Page v. Fowler, 37 Cal. 100; Groome v. Almstead, 101 Cal. 425, 35 P. 1021; Johnston v. Fish, 105 Cal. 420, 38 P. 979, 45 Am. St. Rep. 53; Rector v. Lewis, supra, 168; 8 Cal. Jur. 689. Since this liability would have been imposed upon Zahar if he had been acting in his own behalf, the same liability accrued to Caine, his principal, pursuant to said section 2330 of the Civil Code, and having retained the fruits of his agent's acts he will not now be heard to say that liability on account of such acts has not accrued to him. The judgment of the trial court was therefore correct in assessing the damages against the appellant at the value of the use and possession of the premises during the period in question.

[10] The appellant contends that the cause of action set out in the complaint is predicated upon the rights of the parties under the original contract with Wells; that the proof was offered on that theory, and that the findings and judgment of the court are based upon another theory, to wit, a recovery by way of damages for the value of the use and possession of said land; wherefore, it is urged, the findings and conclusions and judgment are outside of the issues raised by the pleadings and not supported by the evidence. The form of the pleadings lends some support to the contention, but they are also susceptible to the construction contended for by the plaintiffs. It is true that the complaint alleges the execution of the original contract with Wells, but it does not proceed on the theory that the plaintiffs are foreclosing the interests of said defendants in and to the said property and contract. On the contrary, the complaint alleges that the contract had been terminated prior to the period in question and that the defendants unlawfully retained possession, harvested the crop and appropriated the same to their own use. The allegations concerning the execution of the contract may properly be considered as matters of inducement or evidentiary. They do not affect the theory of the plaintiffs' cause of action, viz., that the plaintiffs were the owners and entitled to possession; that the defendants were unlawfully in possession; that they harvested the crop and appropriated the same to their own use and became liable to the plaintiffs for mesne profits. An inspection of the record discloses that the evidence was abundantly sufficient to support the findings and judgment on that theory.

The appellant makes the further contention that there was no proof of a demand made on him for possession at any time during the period in question. He does not support his contention that demand was necessary with any citation of authority, but assuming that demand was necessary under the circumstances here shown there was ample proof that the plaintiffs sought in many ways and at different times during said period to obtain possession, even going to the extent of endeavoring forcibly to take possession, but that their efforts were resisted with force in the interest of and on behalf of the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

Hagop DANIELIAN, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Charles WELLS, Harry Faith, and C. L. Caine, Defendants and Appellants. (Sac. 3639.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 30, 1925.)

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

N. Lindsay South, of Fresno, and Bradley & Bradley, of Visalia, for appellants.

E. A. Bagby, of Oakland, and E. I. Feemster, of Visalia, for respondent.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants the value of the use and possession of a 27-acre tract of producing vineyard land located in the county of Tulare. Judgment went for the plaintiff against the defendants in the sum of $2,262. Notice of appeal was filed on behalf of all of the defendants, but said appeal as to Charles Wells and Harry Faith has been abandoned. The appeal of C. L. Caine is the only one presented for determination. The plaintiff's land adjoins the 27-acre tract of land owned and described by the plaintiffs in the case of Shamlian v. Wells (Sac. No. 3638) 242 P. 483, this day decided. On this appeal it is stipulated that the facts in this case are distinguishable from the facts in that case only as to the amount of the judgment, and no point is made that the amount of the judgment was not properly ascertained. On the authority of that case the judgment is affirmed.

1. Automobiles ⚡63—Statute extends jurisdiction of Railroad Commission to private carrier operating as transportation company as defined by it.

Amendment of Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, § 1(c), by St. 1919, p. 458, § 2, defining Transportation Company, held intended to extend jurisdiction of Railroad Commission to private carriers when engaged in the business of a transportation company as there defined, and to subject such private carriers to the burdens, obligations, and limitations imposed by the act.

2. Automobiles ⚡59—State may withhold use of highway from private carrier.

The power and right of the state to withhold, in its discretion, use of its public highways by a common carrier, which is a privilege and not a right, rests not on the fact that it is a common carrier, which subjects it only to regulation, and not to prohibition, but on the fact that it is making a private use of the highways, making them its place of business, and so applies as well to private carriers.

3. Constitutional law ⚡241—Classification of private carriers, as distinguished from those carrying their own goods, as transportation companies, held to have natural or inherent basis, and so not lacking in uniformity.

Classification by Auto Stage and Truck Act, § 1(c), as amended by St. 1919, p. 458, § 2, of private carriers, as distinguished from those carrying their own goods, as transportation companies, subject to jurisdiction of Railroad Commission, has a natural or inherent basis, so that statute is not lacking in uniformity.

4. Automobiles ⚡73—Constitutional law ⚡62—Arbitrary discretion not given Railroad Commission by Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act.

Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, § 1(c), as amended by St. 1919, p. 458, § 2, is not unconstitutional as vesting arbitrary discretion in the Railroad Commission; its discretion being controlled and guided by the relation of the facts found by it to the public convenience and necessity.

5. Automobiles ⚡84—Railroad Commission's finding as to operation by carrier between fixed termini, or over regular route, reviewable.

Railroad Commission's finding that carrier is operating between fixed termini, or over regular route, is subject to review, though Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, § 1(c), as amended by St. 1919, p. 458, § 2, provides that it shall be final, the fact being necessary to its jurisdiction; but it is enough that there is some substantial evidence to support it.

6. Automobiles ⚡83—Commission's finding that private carrier was operating between fixed termini and over regular route held supported by evidence.

Railroad Commission's finding that private carrier was operating over highways between fixed termini, or over regular route, necessary to constitute it a transportation company, subject to commission's jurisdiction, held supported by evidence; it being immaterial, under the statute, that there were departures from the termini and route, whether periodic or irregular.

Shenk, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by Henry E. Holmes and others for certiorari to review a decision and order of the Railroad Commission of California. Decision and order affirmed, and writ discharged.

Thelen & Marrin, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Gwyn H. Baker, of San Francisco, for respondent Highway Transit Co.

Walter H. Robinson, of San Francisco, for respondent S. B. McLenegan & Son.

Carl I. Wheat and W. M. Taylor, both of San Francisco, for other respondents.

MYERS, C. J. Review to annul a decision and order of the respondent Railroad Commission. The decision sought to be reviewed was the outcome of a proceeding before the commission wherein the respondents Highway Transport Company and S. B. McLenegan & Son, both "certified" common carriers of freight by motor truck between San Francisco and San Jose and intermediate points, filed complaint alleging that the petitioners herein were operating motor trucks without having obtained a certificate of public convenience and necessity to do so for the transportation of freight for hire over the public highways between San Francisco and San Jose and intermediate points along and over the same routes and roads over which the complainants were operating; that such operations were in violation of law, were in direct competition with the complainants, and resulted in injury and damage to them. The defendants therein, petitioners here, filed an answer denying the allegations of the complaint, and setting up as a separate defense that defendants were the owners of certain automobile trucks which they leased to a number of "selected" shippers of freight for use by said shippers in the distribution of merchandise between San Francisco and such points in San Mateo and Santa Clara counties as from time to time served the convenience and necessity of said shippers.

The answer further denied that the defendants were common carriers; that they operated between fixed termini, or over a regular route; that they were operating in violation of law; and that they were subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. Upon the issues thus joined the Railroad Commission, after due notice, and after a full and extended hearing, rendered its decision and order now before this court for review, wherein it was found that the defendants, petitioners herein, were operating as a transportation company as that term is defined in section 1 (c) of chapter 213, Statutes of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 330), as amended (St. 1919, p. 458, § 2), and that they were engaged in the operation of motor trucks over the public highways for compensation, over a regular route and between fixed termini, namely, "San Francisco to San Jose and intermediate points." The commission thereupon made its order directing the defendants to cease and thereafter to desist from any and all such transportation unless and until they should secure a certificate of public convenience and necessity therefor. The defendants, after the denial of their petition for a rehearing of said order and decision, instituted the present proceedings in this court for a writ of review to annul the same.

[1, 2] Petitioners were engaged in operating 3 motor trucks in the transportation of merchandise consisting principally of drugs, drug sundries, and groceries from wholesale houses in San Francisco to retail dealers in San Jose and at other points in Santa Clara and San Mateo counties, which points, for the most part, are intermediate points between San Francisco and San Jose. Petitioners operated under separate contracts with the several shippers, 23 in number; each contract being entered into severally by petitioners as one party and by one of the shippers as the other party thereto. These contracts were substantially alike in their terms (except as to minor variations not deemed pertinent to the present inquiry). By each of these contracts the petitioners purported to lease their trucks to the shipper for use by the latter in transporting its merchandise from San Francisco to points in Santa Clara and San Mateo counties at an agreed rental of $19.50 per truck per day.

It is further provided that, if on any day only a portion of the capacity of any truck is used for such transportation, the rental shall be such proportion of said rental of $19.50 as is represented by the ratio which the capacity of the truck actually utilized in the transportation of the lessee's merchandise bears to the total agreed capacity of the truck, and, further, that the minimum rental in connection with any transportation shall be based on one-thirtieth of the capacity of the truck. It is apparent from the other provisions of these "leases," and from the manner in which they were performed by the parties, that they are nothing more than contracts for the transportation of merchandise for compensation at the rate of 32½ cents per 100 pounds, subject to a minimum charge of 65 cents per shipment. The commission so found and its finding is abundantly supported, if not compelled, by the evidence. The commission did not expressly find upon the issue as to whether or not the petitioners were operating as common carriers, which was alleged in the complaint and denied in the answer. The finding is:

That the petitioners "are operating a transportation company as that term is defined in section 1(c) of chapter 213 of the Statutes of 1917 and amendments thereto; that they are engaged in the operation of auto trucks over the public highways for compensation, over a regular route and between fixed termini, namely, San Francisco to San Jose and intermediate points. * * *

Petitioners contend that this finding must be taken by us as a negative finding upon the allegation that they were operating as common carriers, and we are inclined to agree with this contention. The carrier respondents strongly insist that under the rule which requires the construction of findings so as to support the judgment we should construe this as a finding that petitioners were in fact operating as common carriers and that such finding is amply supported by the evidence herein. It may be that the evidence herein would sustain such a finding if it had been made by the commission. As to that we express no opinion. We are of the opinion that the present is not a proper case for the application of the rule invoked by the carrier respondents. A careful reading of the entire decision of the commission, of which the quoted finding forms but a part, makes it clear that the commission did not intend to find as a fact that petitioners were operating as common carriers. On the contrary, the commission took the view that petitioners were subject to its jurisdiction under the other facts and circumstances found herein, regardless of the question whether they were operating as common carriers or as private carriers, and in accordance with that view it deliberately and intentionally omitted to find upon this question. If, therefore, we should conclude that the operation of petitioners as common carriers is a fact essential to the jurisdiction of the commission over them, it would be our duty to annul this decision and order.

This precise question was involved in the recent case of Frost v. Railroad Commission (Cal. Sup.) 240 P. 26, which was decided by us adversely to petitioners' contentions herein. That case must be regarded as controlling with respect to this phase of the present inquiry, and the respective counsel for the petitioners and for the Railroad Commission so concede. Counsel for petitioners argue most earnestly that our decision in the Frost Case is erroneous, and should be promptly overruled. We have given careful consideration to these arguments, and are not disposed to depart from our views as expressed in that case. The gist of our conclusion in that case may be briefly stated as follows: The Legislature by the 1919 amendment to the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act plainly intended and attempted to extend the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission to private carriers when engaged in the business of transportation companies as there defined and to subject such private carriers to the burdens, obligations, and limitations imposed by that act. The question, then, is whether the state has the power to impose such burdens and limitations upon private carriers when using the public highways for the transaction of their business, or whether its power in this behalf is limited in its application to public carriers. It is now universally recognized that the state does possess such power with respect to common carriers using the public highways for the transaction of their business in the transportation of persons or property for hire. That rule is stated as follows by the Supreme Court of the United States:

"A citizen may have, under the Fourteenth Amendment, the right to travel and transport his property upon them [the public highways] by auto vehicle, but he has no right to make the highways his place of business by using them as a common carrier for hire. Such use is a privilege which may be granted or withheld by the state in its discretion, without violating either the due process clause or the equal protection clause." Buck v. Kykendall, 267 U. S. 307, 45 S. Ct. 324, 69 L. Ed. 623, 38 A. L. R. 286. (Italics added.)

Petitioners emphasize the words which we have italicized and insist that this rule is limited in its application to common carriers. We think it is equally applicable to all persons who seek to make a special and private use of the public highways by transacting their private business thereon and that it applies with equal force to private carriers who engage in the business of transportation for hire upon the public highways. The reason for the rule which authorizes the state to prohibit the private use of the highways by such carriers is not that they are common carriers; it is that they are making a private use of the public highways, which are owned and paid for by the public, and which are open alike to all persons.

It is true that common carriers are subject to regulation by the state because the fact that they are engaged in public service causes their business to be affected with public interests, and thus justifies the regulation thereof by public authority. But this is not, as it seems to us, the reason for the existence of the rule above quoted. The circumstance that they are public carriers would subject them to regulation, but it would not subject their business to complete prohibition, it being a business which is not inherently unlawful or wrongful; but it is universally conceded that the state does have the power and the right to completely prohibit the use of its public highways by a common carrier. This must rest not upon the fact that he is a common carrier, but upon the fact he is making a private use of the public highways. This conclusion is not based, as petitioners assert, upon the power of the state to regulate the use of its highways. It is based upon the power of the state to prohibit the private use of its highways or in its discretion to grant the privilege of such private use upon such conditions as it may see fit to impose. By the statute here in question the state says in effect to the citizen:

"I will grant you the special privilege of using my highways for your private business upon condition that you in turn submit yourself and your property to such regulations as I impose. I will not compel you to submit to these regulations, but, if you are not willing to do so, I shall not grant you this special privilege."

A conclusion somewhat analogous to this is presented in the case of Producers' Transportation Co. v. Railroad Commission, 176 Cal. 499, 169 P. 59, relied upon by petitioners herein. It was there held that a state has no power by mere legislative fiat, nor even by such fiat embodied in its Constitution, to transmute a private carrier into a common carrier. With that conclusion we are in entire accord; but it was also there held that, if a private carrier exercises the right of eminent domain in aid of his transportation business, he will be deemed thereby to have dedicated his transportation system to a public use and to have thereby become a public carrier.

The circumstance that the right of eminent domain is a right of sovereignty which is inherent in the state does not seem to us of particular importance. The important fact, as it seems to us, is that the right of eminent domain is not possessed by individuals as a matter of right. When the state offers to grant this right to an individual, it is as to him a special privilege. If the state offers this privilege to him upon expressed conditions, he will be deemed, if he exercises the right, to have accepted the offer and to have agreed to the conditions. He is under no compulsion to submit to the conditions. If he does not submit to the conditions, he cannot exercise the privilege. If he does exercise the privilege, he will be deemed to have voluntarily agreed to the conditions. Herein lies the distinction between the present case and the case of Michigan Public Utilities Comm. v. Duke, 266 U. S. 570, 45 S. Ct. 191, 69 L. Ed. 445, 36 A. L. R. 1105. Counsel for petitioners direct our attention to the fact that the reasoning adopted by us in the Frost Case and adhered to herein was urged upon the Supreme Court of the United States in the Duke Case and was by that court rejected. We agree that it was properly rejected in that case because it was not tenable under the facts of that case. It could not be said that, by continuing in the transportation of property for hire after the enactment of the Michigan Public Utilities Act (Pub. Acts 1923, No. 209), Duke had voluntarily elected to dedicate his property to a public use, because Duke had no opportunity for an election. He had no choice but to continue in the transportation of property after the enactment of the statute. He was under compulsion so to do because of his contracts which were in existence and subsisting at the time of its enactment. Therefore, to hold the statute applicable to him would be to say in effect that the state had the power to transmute him from a private carrier into a public carrier nolens volens, and this we agree it could not do. This is what we had in mind when we said in this connection in the Frost Case, "To give it effect in its application to his situation would have been to impair the obligation of those contracts." We intended thereby to point out that the only liberty of choice offered by the Michigan statute in its application to Duke was a Hobson's choice between dedicating his property to the public on the one hand and breaching his contracts on the other. We did not intend thereby to intimate that the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Duke Case was rested in part upon the impairment of the contracts provision of the federal Constitution. It clearly was not.

In the present case the petitioners did not enter into the transportation business until long after the enactment of the statute here in question. We find here no such obstacle as there was in the Duke Case in the way of the conclusion that by so doing petitioners must be deemed to have voluntarily elected to submit themselves to the conditions imposed by the statute. We do not agree with petitioners that the Washington decisions cited by us in the Frost Case have all been overruled by the later decisions of that court in Davis v. Metcalf, 131 Wash. 141, 229 P. 2. They were not expressly overruled therein. On the contrary, they are cited with apparent approval. It must be conceded, however, that the implications of some of the language used in the opinion in that case appear to be in conflict with our conclusions in the Frost Case and herein. That case, however, did not involve the question of the power of the Railroad Commission to make an order in respect of a private carrier such as is here under review. That case arose as a suit in equity by a certified carrier to procure an injunction restraining an uncertified carrier from transporting goods for compensation over a regular route in competition with the plaintiff. The trial court denied the injunction and the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. It does not necessarily follow from anything said or decided in that case that if the Railroad Commission of that state had, after a hearing, made an order requiring the defendant to desist from further transportation over the highways until he obtained a certificate of public convenience and necessity, such order would have been annulled by the court. That question has not yet been litigated in the state of Washington so far as we are advised. The recent Utah case of State v. Nelson, 238 P. 237, is, we think, distinguished from the present case by the differences in the Utah Statute. The grant of jurisdiction to the commission in that statute is:

"To supervise and regulate every public utility in this state as defined in this title. * * *"

The term "public utility" is defined to include:

"Every * * * automobile corporation * * * where the service is performed for or the commodity delivered to the public or any portion thereof."

The term "common carrier" is defined to include:

"Every * * * automobile corporation * * * operating for public service within this state; and every person or corporation * * * engaged in the transportation of persons or property for public service over regular routes between points within this state." (Italics added.)

The section of the Utah statute providing for the issuance of certificates of public convenience and necessity, while it does not expressly so provide, nevertheless indicates by clear implication the legislative intent that it shall be applicable only to public utilities as above defined. The Utah court held correctly, as we think, that the intent of the Utah statute was to limit the regulatory powers of the Railroad Commission to common carriers and other public utilities. Having reached this conclusion, the language in its opinion which is relied upon by petitioners herein must, as it seems to us, be regarded as obiter. We agree with petitioners that the case of Hissem v. Guran (Ohio) 146 N. E. 808, is in conflict with our conclusion in the Frost Case herein. It may be noted, however, that the reasoning which has impelled us to our conclusion does not appear to have been suggested to or at all considered by that court. We are disposed to adhere to that conclusion, notwithstanding the absence of any direct authority to support it.

[3] If the foregoing conclusion is sound, it is, as it seems to us, a sufficient answer to all of petitioners' contentions based upon the guaranties of the federal Constitution, with the possible exception of the contention that the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act as amended and as construed by us denies to petitioners the equal protection of the law. Petitioners' first point under this contention is disposed of by our decision in the case of Franchise Motor Freight Ass'n v. Seavey, (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 1000. Petitioners seemingly take the position that there is no legitimate basis for a classification and distinction between private carriers engaged in the business of transporting freight over the public highways on the one hand and private individuals engaged in other lines of business transporting their own freight over the public highways as an incident to such business on the other hand. Petitioners propound the following question:

"What reasonable ground of distinction is there between a private carrier engaged in the business of transporting his own freight over the public highway between two points and another private carrier who is engaged in the transportation of the same class of freight between the same points at the same time over the same highway; the only distinction being that the freight transported by the latter belongs to his neighbor or some other third party instead of to himself?"

The facts assumed in this question are self-contradictory. One who transports merely his own freight over the highway is not a carrier, private or otherwise. He may be a farmer or a manufacturer or a merchant or what not, but the business in which he is engaged is not the business of transportation. He is not a carrier unless he engages in the business of transportation of the persons or property of others for compensation. One, who transports merely his own goods, is of necessity engaged in some business other than transportation, and the transportation of such goods is no more than an incident to such business. So, also, one, who transports the goods of another as a servant or agent of such other, is not engaged in the business of transportation, but in so doing is engaged in the business of his master or principal, whatever that business may be. But one, who engages as an independent calling in the transportation of goods for another or for others under contract and for compensation, is engaged in the business of transportation and is a carrier. The true question in this behalf is, therefore, Is there a natural or inherent basis for a classification and distinction between those who engage in the business of transportation of the property of others for compensation over the public highways, thus making a private use of those highways, and those on the other hand who are engaged in other lines of business and who use the highways in the transportation of their goods merely as an incident to such business, for which purpose the highways are open alike to all? This question seems to us to answer itself. It is too well settled to require citation of authority that a statute is not lacking in uniformity if it operates alike upon all those comprised within a class defined therein which is based upon some natural, inherent, or constitutional ground of classification.

[4] We find no merit in the suggestion that the act is unconstitutional in that it vests an arbitrary discretion in the Railroad Commission. The discretion of the commission is not arbitrary, but is controlled and guided by the relation of the facts found by it to the public convenience and necessity. Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 600, 213 P. 983, and cases cited.

[5, 6] The final contention necessary to be considered herein is that the finding of the commission to the effect that petitioners were operating between fixed termini and over a regular route is unsustained by the evidence. The statute defines the words "between fixed termini or over a regular route" to mean:

"The termini or route between or over which any corporation or person * * * usually or ordinarily operate any automobile, jitney, bus, auto truck, stage or auto stage, even though there may be departures from said termini or route, whether such departures be periodic or irregular."

It also provides that this shall be a question of fact and that the finding of the commission thereon shall be final and shall not be subject to review. We agree with petitioners that the finding is, however, subject to review, notwithstanding the last-mentioned provision of the statute, for the reason that the fact in question is one which is essential to the jurisdiction of the commission. Such review, however, cannot extend beyond the inquiry as to whether or not there is some substantial evidence to support the finding. If there is, the finding must be sustained, no matter how much evidence there may be in conflict therewith. In this connection it is to be noted, however, that it is not necessary that the evidence shall sustain both of the findings of the commission; namely, that petitioners were operating between fixed termini and that they were operating over a regular route. The statute is in the disjunctive and it is sufficient in this connection to sustain the jurisdiction of the commission if there was substantial evidence to support either of these findings. The decision of the commission contains a fair résumé of the evidence upon this question, and we quote therefrom as follows:

"Defendants contend that they are not operating between fixed termini nor over any regular route, because they have had no depot at any point in San Mateo or Santa Clara counties, nor have they a telephone at such points; that deliveries are made either to store or sidewalk; that there is no point in any city or town in San Mateo or Santa Clara counties which constitutes a terminus, since the destination of trucks is determined entirely by the load which the 'lessees' of the particular truck happen to offer for transportation on that particular trip; and that there are no cities or towns in San Mateo or Santa Clara counties to which any trucks regularly go on all trips.

"It is true that each and every truck operated down the Peninsula by defendants does not stop for pick-up or delivery of merchandise at each and every point along the highway, San Francisco to San Jose, inclusive, and that on occasions the trucks have gone off the highway for several miles to make deliveries to points such as the County Poor Farm back of Belmont, camp No. 4 on the Skyline boulevard, Chadwick and Sykes' camp 3 miles east of Redwood City, etc. The evidence, however, does show that there is only one main highway known as the Peninsula highway over which the trucks of the defendants usually or ordinarily operate; that defendants' drivers are instructed during fair weather to use what is known as the Bay Shore highway out of San Francisco to its connection with the main Peninsula highway at San Bruno and in rainy weather to use the Mission road through Colma to San Bruno. From San Bruno there is but a single route through Burlingame, San Mateo, Belmont, Redwood City, Menlo Park, Palo Alto, and other intermediate points, to San Jose. This main state highway is usually and ordinarily used with the exception of the infrequent occasions upon which, as mentioned above, a truck carries merchandise destined to points somewhat off the highway.

"In connection with Defendants' Exhibit No. 12, entitled 'Some routes used by H. E. and P. W. Holmes,' P. W. Holmes testified that no two of such routes were alike. Route No. 3 names Redwood City only; No. 5, Burlingame-Redwood City; No. 12, Redwood City-Burlingame. These three routes, however, when taken in connection with San Francisco as a northern terminus, are identical in every respect. Transposing the names of communities does not differentiate as to route over which the trucks travel, but merely shows a difference in the routing of particular deliveries. In fact, this entire exhibit in the main substantiates the contention of complainants that defendants' trucks do usually and ordinarily operate over a regular route or between fixed termini as represented by manifests therein named.

"Defendants further contend that they have no fixed termini, due to the fact that the manifests submitted in the evidence covering the month of January, 1924, show a different southerly terminus on different trips. Analysis of this evidence shows that, during the 30-day period above mentioned, San Jose or a point immediately adjacent to the city limits of San Jose, such as Alum Rock, Meridian road, etc., appears as the most southerly terminus upon 20 occasions; the most southerly destination on other occasions being some point along what is known as the main Peninsula highway, San Francisco, to San Jose, such as Redwood City, which appears some 7 times, or Palo Alto, which appears some 5 times.

"Certainly if a truck carries no merchandise for delivery upon a specified trip which would necessitate it going the entire length of its route, and has no call for a pick-up on the north-bound trip, it would in any case turn back after making its most southerly delivery, and if this commission should hold that the law contemplated this class of operation as not being over a regular route no truck operator in the state could be held to fall within the provisions of the state regulation, due to the fact that one or more of his trucks on infrequent occasions might not cover the entire route usually or ordinarily served by him."

In addition to the foregoing, it may be noted that at the hearing before the commission petitioners introduced an exhibit consisting of a schedule showing the points of all deliveries made by them during the second week of each of the months of December, 1923, and January, February, and March, 1924, in connection with which they produced testimony that the deliveries during those weeks were fairly typical of all of their operations. The schedule shows all of the deliveries made by petitioners on 23 working days comprising those weeks and it appears therefrom that upon every one of those days petitioners made deliveries from San Francisco to San Jose and to intermediate points. Under the statute it is immaterial that there were departures from the termini and from the route, "whether such departures be periodic or irregular." We are satisfied that the finding of the commission is sustained by the evidence, and, if it were conceded that the evidence would equally sustain a contrary finding, that circumstance would be immaterial.

The decision and order of the commission are affirmed, and the writ discharged.

We concur: LAWLOR, J.; RICHARDS, J.; WASTE, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LENNON, J.

SHENK, J. I dissent. I cannot agree with the reasoning and conclusion of the prevailing opinion. It appears that the petitioners had applied to the commission for a certificate of public convenience and necessity. By that application they impliedly consented to subject themselves to the jurisdiction of the commission and to comply with the conditions which the law and the commission might impose. Included in those conditions under section 4 of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act would be that the commission should have the power to fix their rates, regulate their service, and in general provide that the applicant operate as a common carrier in the event that the certificate be issued. The application, however, was denied. Such action was within the power of the commission under section 6 of the act, which provides that the commission may grant or deny such a certificate "with or without * * * hearing."

The petitioners established themselves as a private carrier. The respondent certificated carriers filed a complaint against them before the commission, alleging that the petitioners were a transportation company as defined by the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, and as such were operating in direct competition with the complainants and were injuring and damaging their business. The petitioners were summoned before the commission and in an answer filed by them they denied that they were a transportation company as defined by the act. After notice and an extended hearing, the commission found that the petitioners were a transportation company operating as a private carrier and issued an injunction directing them "to cease and hereafter to desist from any and all such transportation unless and until they have secured from this commission a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require the resumption or continuance thereof." The effect of the decision and order of the commission is to put the petitioners out of business, for it enjoins them from operating "unless and until" they obtain a certificate and on application the commission denies the certificate.

Under sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution and the decisions of this court, the commission has jurisdiction only of the regulation and control of public utilities and matters which are germane to such regulation and control. This is conceded in the prevailing opinion, but it is held, following the Frost Case, that the regulation of such a private carrier is so germane because forsooth the private carrier is in competition with the public carrier. This conclusion in my opinion is not supported either by reason or authority. If that conclusion be sound, the result would be that the commission may now require a truck owner, engaged exclusively in the business of operating his truck for transportation of freight on the public highways under contract with the sole owner of a chain of stores, to apply for a certificate of public convenience and necessity or go out of business and by denying his application put him out of business.

To pursue the subject still further, it would logically follow that the commission could be endowed by the Legislature under the present constitutional grant with the power to say that no one may use the public highways for the transportation of his own goods because by so doing he would take from the certificated operator a revenue which the latter might otherwise receive. By the same reasoning the Legislature could vest the commission with power to prohibit the use of private passenger automobiles operating on the public highway because such use would be in competition with regulated common carriers of passengers with possible destruction of the business of the latter. Such a result may not be contemplated as within the power of the state, and more particularly within the constitutional powers of the Railroad Commission as defined and limited by this court.

Nor is the action of the commission authorized by the Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, p. 115) or the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act. The power of the commission to entertain complaints under the Public Utilities Act, under sections 60 and 61a, is with reference to "any act or thing done or omitted to be done by any public utility." Section 7 of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act provides that in all respects in which the Railroad Commission "has power and authority under the Constitution of this state or this act" complaints may be filed with the commission and disposed of "in the manner, under the conditions and subject to the limitations and with the effect specified in the Public Utilities Act." In Motor Transit Co. v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 573, at page 578, 209 P. 586, 588, this court said:

"By specific reference to the Public Utilities Act the commission is given power to hear and determine complaints against transportation companies in exactly the same manner and to the same extent as it has of complaints against other public utilities. This power is conferred by section 7 of the 'Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act.' * * * It obviously follows that sections 60 and 61 (a) of the Public Utilities Act, as originally enacted and still in force, which prescribe the power of the commission to hear and determine complaints against public utilities, make [mark] and measure the power of the commission to proceed in the instant case."

Said section is not merely procedural. It vests power in the commission to entertain complaints and to take action thereon. The restrictions and limitations specified in the section are that, for the purpose of procedure, the terms of the Public Utilities Act shall apply.

If the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act purports to vest in the commission jurisdiction over private carriers, in my opinion it is to that extent contrary to the Constitution. Such a conclusion would not deprive the commission of the power to entertain complaints against transportation companies which are common carriers in fact, but are seeking to avoid the requirements of the act by masquerading as private carriers. If the petitioners had been found to be a common carrier in fact, the commission would have had jurisdiction over them and could have properly exercised its authority in prohibiting their operations. But when the commission found the petitioners to be a private carrier, and it did so find, the jurisdiction of the commission over them was at an end. It seems to me that the prevailing opinion has misconceived the real purpose and object of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act. The opinion fails to distinguish between regulation looking to safety and the conservation of the highways and the regulation of persons by whom the highways may be used. As to regulations concerning safety and the conservation of the highways, they must be uniform and apply equally as between those similarly situated and may comprehend all uses both public and private.

The Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1913, p. 639) is a familiar example of such regulation.

But such an act necessarily prescribed a uniform course of conduct to which all must conform and when its requirements are met must be available to all. Use of the highways under such an act may be regulated, but not prohibited, with certain exceptions not material here. Concerning the regulation of the persons who may use the public highways, it is unquestionably true that the state may not only regulate but may prohibit the use thereof by persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the business of a common carrier. It may grant the privilege to one carrier and deny it to another. It may regulate the charges and service of a common carrier and it may prevent other common carriers from competing with a privileged carrier. Such is the purpose of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act. In other words, the purpose of the regulatory provision here in question is to prevent, in the public interest, ruinous competition as between concerns engaged in a like public business. With reference to a similar act in the state of Washington the Supreme Court of the United States in Buck v. Kuykendall, 267 U. S. 307, 45 S. Ct. 324, 69 L. Ed. 623, 38 A. L. R. 286, said:

"Its primary purpose is not regulation with a view to safety or to conservation of the highways, but the prohibition of competition. It determines, not the manner of use, but the persons by whom the highways may be used."

In determining the persons by whom the highways may be used, the state has no power, in my judgment, under the guise of prohibiting competition, to deny to its citizens the right to use the public highways for their own private purposes, whether for business or for pleasure. But assuming that it has that right, and particularly the right to prohibit a private business use of the highways, as announced by the opinion, it would necessarily be true that such regulatory prohibitions must be uniform and apply to all similarly situated and be enforced through the medium of a state agency duly constituted for that purpose. But in this case a state agency, whose judicial powers extend only to the regulation and control of public utilities and matters properly germane thereto, proceeds to hale before it a concern using the highways for its own private purposes, its private rights are adjudicated, it is found to be engaged in a private business, and it is put out of business because, forsooth, its private business diminishes the revenues of a certified common carrier. That the commission acted judicially in determining, after notice and hearing and on evidence, the status of the defendants before it, and in issuing the injunction, cannot be denied. That the commission may act judicially when legally authorized so to do is likewise beyond question. Its authority to act in that capacity, however, cannot be determined alone from a consideration of the amendment to the statute in 1919. Such a grant of power must come from the Constitution or from some act of the Legislature which is constitutionally authorized.

It is not contended, as indeed it may not be, that the commission has direct grant from the Constitution to regulate private business. True, this court compelled the commission to assume jurisdiction of transportation companies prior to any legislative enactment on the subject (Western Association, etc., R. R. v. Railroad Comm., 173 Cal. 802, 162 P. 391, 1 A. L. R. 1455), but the transportation companies before the commission in the proceeding involved in that case, and over which the commission was required to take jurisdiction, were admittedly common carriers, and, as such, public utilities within the definition of section 23, article 12, of the Constitution. The whole purpose of that section and of the preceding section 22 in re-establishing the Railroad Commission and endowing it with extensive powers was to regulate and control public utilities privately owned (City of Pasadena v. Railroad Comm., 183 Cal. 526, 534, 192 P. 25, 10 A. L. R. 1425), and it is settled by the decisions of this court beyond question that such additional powers as the Legislature may confer upon the commission must be "germane to the subject of regulation and control of public utilities." Pacific T. & T. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 P. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822; City of Pasadena v. Railroad Comm., supra; Motor Transit Co. v. Railroad Comm. 189 Cal. 573, 209 P. 586. The commission recognizes that such is the rule, but contends:

"That the regulation of the type of carriage here in question is, because of its power to destroy regulated carriage, most cognate and germane to the subject of the regulation and control of public utilities [carriers]."

I deny that the commission has power to suppress and destroy a private business because such private business may be in competition with the business of the common carrier. This is, indeed, a curious, but nevertheless, an effective, method of taking private property for public use without compensation. Furthermore, if the question of competition be the test and the elimination of competition be germane to the subject of regulation and control of the public utility, it is difficult to conceive why it is necessary to consider the use of the public highways in connection with such competition, for, if the power to suppress competition be possessed by the commission, it may be exercised against the outlawed competitor, whether he operate on the public highways or elsewhere. If the suppression of competition alone does not make such regulation germane to the subject of regulation and control of public utilities, then it cannot be made so germane under the guise of regulating the use of the public highways. We are here dealing with public and private concerns which use the public highways in their business, but the fact that they are so using them, in so far as competition is concerned, is a mere circumstance.

The prevailing opinion concedes that the conclusions reached are without direct precedent. By reference to the laws and decisions of other states, it is found that Michigan, Ohio, Utah, and Washington have statutes similar to our Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act. The courts of last resort of those states, in construing their statutory provisions, have uniformly reached a conclusion opposed to the prevailing opinion. Hissem v. Guran et al. (Ohio) 146 N. E. 808; Davis & Banker v. Metcalf, 131 Wash. 141, 229 P. 2; State v. Nelson (Utah) 238 P. 237. The declaration of the Supreme Court of the United States in Michigan Public Utilities Commission v. Duke, 266 U. S. 570, 45 S. Ct. 191, 69 L. Ed. 445, 36 A. L. R. 1105, is directly in point. In that case Duke had employed 75 men and 47 motor trucks as a private carrier under three private contracts for the transportation of automobile bodies from Detroit to Toledo. Under the Public Utilities Act of Michigan, which concededly is essentially similar to our own Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, it was sought to subject Duke to regulation as a common carrier. The court said:

"Moreover, it is beyond the power of the state by legislative fiat to convert property used exclusively in the business of a private carrier into a public utility, or to make the owner a public carrier, for that would be taking private property for public use without just compensation, which no state can do consistently with the due process of law clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Producers' Transportation Co. v. Railroad Comm., 251 U. S. 228, 230 [40 S. Ct. 131, 64 L. Ed. 239]; Wolff Co. v. Industrial Court, 262 U. S. 522, 535 [43 S. Ct. 630, 67 L. Ed. 1103, 27 A. L. R. 1280]. On the facts above referred to, it is clear that, if enforced against him, the act would deprive plaintiff of his property in violation of that clause of the Constitution."

The prevailing opinion attempts to distinguish that case from the one at bar on the ground that Duke's contracts were outstanding at the time the Michigan statute took effect and for that reason the statute was not applicable to him. The Supreme Court of the United States did not base its decision on the impairment of contract clause, but on the Fourteenth Amendment. Such, in my opinion, should be the conclusion reached in this case; that is to say, it should be decided that the petitioners, by reason of the act of the commission, have been deprived of their property without due process of law, have been denied the equal protection of the law, and their private property has been taken for public use without just or any compensation. The order of the Railroad Commission should be annulled.

75 Cal. App. 57

GLENN-COLUSA IRR. DIST. v. PAULSON. and two companion cases. (Civ. 2979.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 3, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1925.)

1. Waters and water courses ⚡254—Rights accruing to service of water furnished by public utility held subject to state regulation.

Any rights accruing to service of water after adoption of Constitution, if water is furnished by public utility, is controlled by Const. art. 14, § 1, declaring distribution of water by public utility subject to state regulation, regardless of Civ. Code, § 552, as to perpetual easement of one furnished water.

2. Waters and water courses ⚡254—Water right of consumer served by public utility merely right of service subject to regulation.

The right of a water consumer is simply a right of service so long as public utility controls instrumentality rendering service, and the exercise of such right does not create an ownership or easement in the water such as is contemplated by Civ. Code, § 552, but is a service subject to regulation and control of state.

3. Waters and water courses ⚡254—Railroad Commission held authorized to discontinue insolvent public utility distributing water and permit transfer of property to irrigation district.

Where public utility distributing water for irrigation purposes was hopelessly insolvent, held, that, in view of Public Utilities Act, Railroad Commission had authority to discontinue functions of public utility and permit transfer of its property to an irrigation district.

4. Waters and water courses ⚡254—Landowners interested in application before Railroad Commission to transfer property of public utility distributing water held entitled to petition for rehearing and modification, and on denial thereof to apply to Supreme Court for writ of review.

Where landowners sufficiently showed themselves to be parties in interest in application to Railroad Commission by public utility distributing water to discontinue its functions and transfer its properties to irrigation district, such landowners had right to petition for rehearing before Railroad Commission or for modification, and on denial of such petition for rehearing to apply to Supreme Court for writ of review.

5. Public service commissions ⚡27—Superior court without power to alter or modify determination of Railroad Commission.

The superior court possesses no power to alter or modify a determination of the Railroad Commission, since, under Public Utilities Act, § 67, such power rests in Supreme Court alone.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨254—Order of commission, though erroneous, cannot be annulled by superior court.

Even though order by Railroad Commission discontinuing functions of public utility distributing water for irrigation purposes and permitting transfer of its properties to an irrigation district is erroneous, under Public Utilities Act, § 67, superior court could not annul or set aside such order, as Supreme Court only has power to make such correction.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨254—Railroad Commission held authorized to permit transfer of property of public utility distributing water to irrigation district and to regulate use of water.

Under Const. art. 14, § 1, the Railroad Commission, in discontinuing functions of public utility distributing water and permitting transfer of its properties to an irrigation district, was authorized to determine how the services of water should be controlled or supplied and to direct users of water to place themselves in position where use and control of water would be under jurisdiction of some district, and also to provide that those who theretofore had benefit of service of public utility should be received within territorial limits of irrigation district as tracts of land, on equal footing with land already included in district.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; C. J. Luttrell, Judge.

Action by the Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District against John Paulson to enjoin interference with the Irrigation District, consolidated for trial with action by said Irrigation District against B. G. Kline and another, and that of Edna L. Knight against said Irrigation District. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Rankin, of Willows, for appellant.

Hankins & Hankins, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. In this proceeding three cases are involved, to wit, one bearing the above title, one Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District v. B. G. Kline and Minnie E. Kline, superior court action, No. 3300, and Edna L. Knight v. Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District, superior court action, No. 3435. It is stipulated that all three cases should be tried as one in the superior court upon the testimony introduced in the case of Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District v. John Paulson, that separate judgments should be entered in each action, that the appeals herein should be combined, one transcript being used for the three appeals; and that, when judgment is entered in the case of District v. Paulson, a like judgment should follow in the other cases. This action was begun by the respondent irrigation district to enjoin the appellant Paulson from interfering with the ditches owned by the respondent district; also to restrain him from diverting water therefrom. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The transcript shows that the appellant owns land situate within the flow of that certain canal known as and called the Central Canal, which canal was used for a considerable period of time in conveying water to a certain area of land known as and called the Central irrigation district. The appellant purchased his land prior to the 1st day of October, 1913, and from that date, up to and including the season of 1921, received water for irrigation purposes from the Central Canal, and used the same in the irrigation of the lands owned by him. At the trial it was stipulated that the recital of facts set forth in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Byington v. Sac., etc., Co., 170 Cal. 124, 148 P. 791, should be admitted as testimony to be considered in the case as competent evidence of the facts therein set forth. The same stipulation was entered into concerning the recital of facts in the case of Rogers v. Sac., etc., Co., decision No. 2483, case No. 597, and Sac. Realty Company v. Sac. Valley West Side Canal Company, No. 673, both reported in volume 7, pages 133 and 153, Opinions and Orders of the Railroad Commission. The statement of facts set forth in the Byington Case, supra, is very lengthy, and therefore we epitomize the same as follows: The Central irrigation district was organized in November, 1887, and contained about 156,000 acres of land situate in the counties of Glenn and Colusa. This district did some construction work, but made no appropriation of water, and never conducted any water through any of its canals or ditch system. In 1897, in an action begun by the district, it was held that the Central irrigation district was not legally formed. 117 Cal. 382, 49 P. 354. Thereafter one Byron Beckwith, Sr., in connection with two men, one named Sheldon and one named Schuyler, on or about January, 1903, obtained a lease for a period of 50 years from the Central irrigation district to Sheldon of all the Central Canal's properties and rights connected therewith. This lease did not convey any water rights, as the Central irrigation district does not appear to have possessed any at that date. Litigation ensued among these three persons, but not relevant to anything we are considering in this action. In February, 1903, Sheldon, Schuyler, and others incorporated the Central Canal & Irrigation Company, and posted notices of appropriation of water in practically the same places that Beckwith, Sr., hereinbefore named, had previously posted notices. In 1904 Sheldon assigned the lease held by him to the Central Canal & Irrigation Company. This company, it appears, did considerable work upon the canals involved in this action, and extended the same to the Sacramento river. In 1906 the Central Canal & Irrigation Company obtained from Congress the right to divert and appropriate 900 second feet of water from the Sacramento river, and in 1907 diverted some water so appropriated. In 1909 J. S. and W. S. Kuhn acquired the outstanding bonds of the Central irrigation district, and also the capital stock of the Central Canal & Irrigation Company, and proceeded to organize the Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company, and also organized another company known as the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company. The first named company was to handle the sale of land, and the latter company was to handle the distribution of water. The lease hereinbefore referred to was in 1909 transferred to the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company. This company, the transcript shows, went into the hands of a receiver in 1915, and thereafter the property herein named went into decay, distribution of water was unsatisfactory, and, in order to conserve the properties, and maintain an irrigation system whereby the waters flowing through the Central Canal might be utilized, the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district was organized under the provisions of the Wright-Bridgeford Irrigation Act of the state of California (St. 1897, p. 254). This district, prior to the institution of the actions now pending, had become the owner of all the irrigation properties herein referred to and of the water, water rights, and privileges connected therewith. Prior to, and coincident with, the acquisition of said properties by the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district, application was made by the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal & Irrigation Company and the receiver thereof to the Railroad Commission of the state of California for permission to transfer all of the properties herein referred to to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district, and to be thereupon and thereafter relieved from all its obligations as a public utility. At the hearing before the Railroad Commission on the application of the West Side Canal & Irrigation Company for the transfer of its properties to the district and to be relieved of all public utility obligations, the appellant in this case and the appellants in the two companion cases appeared and protested against the granting of such permission. The application of the Sacramento Valley West Side Irrigation Company was granted, and on or about the 30th day of June, 1921, the Railroad Commission in said matter made and entered the following order:

"Application having been filed herein for the approval by this commission of the proposed transfer by the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company, a corporation, and Alger Fast, the receiver thereof, and other parties in interest, of certain properties comprising the public utility irrigation system described in said application, to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district and others, free and clear of public utility obligations, protests thereto having been filed by certain users under said system, a public hearing having been held, testimony taken and other evidence received and the matter submitted, it is hereby ordered:

"(1) Authorization is hereby granted for the sales and transfers by the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company, a corporation, and Alger Fast, receiver thereof, and other persons beneficially interested, to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district and other transferees, of the respective properties to be transferred as set forth and described in said application, and the forms of conveyances attached to said application are hereby approved.

"(2) Approval and authorization of this commission is hereby granted for the discontinuance and termination of service as a public utility by the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company, a corporation, and Alger Fast, receiver thereof, in the sale and distribution of water for compensation to the public by means of the properties, or any portion thereof, the sales and transfers of which are hereby authorized, upon the filing with this commission by said Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company and Alger Fast, receiver thereof, of a certified statement showing that said sales and transfers authorized herein have been consummated.

"(3) Approval and authorization by this commission is hereby granted for the withdrawal from public service by the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district as to all properties herein authorized to be transferred to said district, and as to all territory heretofore served by means thereof, subject, however, to the following conditions:

"(a) Any landowner, user, or consumer heretofore supplied by means of such properties, or any portion thereof, shall be entitled to receive water therefrom at the same rates and upon the same terms of service as heretofore until January 1, 1922.

"(b) If at any time prior to January 1, 1922, any landowner, user, or consumer formerly supplied by that portion of the public utility system herein authorized to be transferred to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district shall have made application to said Glenn-Colusa irrigation district to have his land included therein, and such application is denied, this order, in so far as it authorizes the withdrawal from public service by said district of said property herein authorized to be transferred to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district, shall be null and void.

"(4) Approval and authorization is hereby granted by this commission for the withdrawal from public service by Jacinto irrigation district, the directors of Jacinto irrigation district, the directors of Glenn-Colusa irrigation district, and Merle B. Moon, as to all property herein authorized to be transferred to said Jacinto irrigation district, the directors of Jacinto irrigation district, the directors of Glenn-Colusa irrigation district, and Merle B. Moon, and as to all territory heretofore served by said properties.

"The effective date of this order, as to authorization of the proposed transfer of properties, is hereby fixed as of June 30, 1921. As to the authorization herein granted for the discontinuance of service as a public utility, or withdrawal from public service, as to any part of the territory herein referred to, the effective date is hereby designated as July 15, 1921.

"The foregoing opinion and order are hereby approved and ordered filed as the opinion and order of the Railroad Commission of the state of California.

"Dated at San Francisco, Cal., this 30th day of June, 1921."

The following facts also appear to be practically admitted: That the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company was at the time of the transfer of its properties and prior thereto a public utility, subject to the control of the Railroad Commission; that the lands of the appellant had been served with water by such public utility until the time of the order of the Railroad Commission ending the public service obligations of the said canal company; that the lands of the appellant are situated within the flow of waters carried to the Central Canal owned by the respondent district; that the lands of the appellant are not within the confines of the irrigation district, but that the lands of the several appellants are either surrounded by or adjacent to the lands comprising the district, and may properly be included therein; that the appellants have not availed themselves of the opportunity to petition for or have their lands included within the confines of the plaintiff irrigation district; that the appellants have demanded service of water as theretofore rendered them by the Sacramento West Side Canal & Irrigation Company, and tendered payment therefor to the district in sums corresponding with the rates charged for such services by the West Side Canal Company; that, after the expiration of the time mentioned in the order of the Railroad Commission for the inclusion of the lands of the appellants within the district, the district refused, and still refuses to deliver water for irrigation purposes to the appellants upon any lands owned by them situated outside of the area comprising the irrigation district. This refusal is based upon the order of the Railroad Commission, and also upon the action of Jenison v. Redfield, 149 Cal. 500, 87 P. 62, wherein the Supreme Court considers the purposes for which an irrigation district is formed, and holds, in substance, that the purpose for which the district is formed is to furnish water for irrigation only to the lands comprising the district, and that the authority of such a district to furnish water outside of its territorial limits does not exist. The appellant, relying upon section 552, Civil Code, and the Byington Case, supra, insists that the order of the Railroad Commission, in so far as it directs the lands of the appellants in the three actions referred to herein be included within the irrigation district, is void, and that the transfer of the properties belonging to the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district could only be made subject to the perpetual right or easement of the appellants to have their lands served with water for irrigation purposes in the same manner and in the same way that said lands had been served prior to the discontinuance of the canal company. The Byington Case, however, while saying, among other things, that the lands lying within the Central irrigation district constituted the primary territory for the irrigation of which the waters of the respective streams mentioned in the opinion had been appropriated, does not decide the questions presented in this case. In the Byington Case the court was called upon to decide whether water could be taken away from lands lying within the primary territory referred to as the territory for the irrigation of which the waters had been appropriated and conveyed to other parcels of land and those parcels of land given a preferential right, and answered this question in the following language:

"The fundamental and all-important proposition, then, is this, that a public service water company which is appropriating water under the Constitution of 1879, for purposes of rental, distribution and sale, cannot confer upon a consumer any preferential right to the use of any part of its water."

[1] The court was of the opinion that the plaintiff in that case had the right to prevent the defendants from subverting water intended for public use to private and extra-territorial purposes. No question of the termination of the public utility functions of the canal company were involved, and no transfer of its properties, but simply a subversion or misuse of waters controlled by the defendant was settled by the judgment of the court. Section 552, Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"Whenever any corporation, organized under the laws of this state, furnishes water to irrigate lands which said corporation has sold, the right to the flow and use of said water is and shall remain a perpetual easement to the land so sold, at such rates and terms as may be established by said corporation in pursuance of law. And whenever any person who is cultivating land on the line and within the flow of any ditch owned by such corporation, has been furnished water by it with which to irrigate his land, such person shall be entitled to the continued use of said water, upon the same terms as those who have purchased their land of the corporation,"

—we think must be read as applying to situations and conditions not affected by section 1 of article 14 of the state Constitution, which specifies that the use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner prescribed by law, etc. The section of the Civil Code was adopted in 1872; the section of the Constitution referred to is a part of the state Constitution of 1879.

Any rights accruing to the service of water after the adoption of the Constitution, if the water is furnished by a public utility, is therefore controlled by section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution, irrespective of the provisions of section 552, Civil Code. In the case of Turner v. East Side Canal, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 103, 142 P. 69, the court held:

"Under section 552 of the Civil Code, the owner of land lying on the line and within the flow of the canal of a company furnishing water for irrigation, who has been furnished water from such canal for the irrigation of his land, is entitled to have the supply of water continued upon the established rates and terms."

The Turner Case, although decided in 1914, did not involve any questions calling for the application of the statutory provisions reserving to the state regulation and control of such waters. Again, in the case of Butte County W. U. Assn. v. Railroad Com., 185 Cal. 218, 196 P. 265, the concurring opinion of Justice Shaw, relied upon by the appellant, must be read in the light of the facts there presented for consideration. The language called to our attention is:

"I think it is clear, both from the Civil Code (section 552), from our decisions on the subject, and from considerations of sound public policy and justice, that such consumers [customers within the district for the service of whom waters have been appropriated] would have a right to insist on the continuance of the supply to their lands, that such right would be paramount to that of consumers in any newly formed district." etc.

"I am of the opinion that if the company had thus disposed of this entire supply, it would have amounted to a dedication of that quantity of water to public use for irrigation exclusively upon the lands described in the several contracts, and that neither the company nor the Railroad Commission could enlarge the dedication or expand the territory entitled thereto, so as to give to other lands an equal right to receive water out of that one thousand second-feet in common with the lands described in such contracts. The land so described would be entitled to preference in such use and other lands could rightfully receive water only from the surplus remaining after the rightful users had taken the quantity they had respectively contracted for so far as it was required for beneficial uses on their lands"—citing a number of cases.

The right of the Railroad Commission to permit the discontinuance of service by a public utility was not involved in the Butte County Case. It was simply a question of whether the supply of water owned and furnished was adequate to permit of an additional area of arid lands being brought within the territory to be served by the water company. Under such circumstances, there would be no conflict between the provisions of section 552, Civil Code, and section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution, and the requirement of section 552, Civil Code, read with the interpretation that, so long as the company continued to furnish water, landowners coming within the terms of that section were entitled to have their service continued and remain unimpaired by any attempt of the company to spread its waters over a territory larger than its supply would warrant. In the case of Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 93 P. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359, the distinction which we are making was partly drawn. It is there said, quoting from the syllabus:

"If the water right of the water company making the contract was in private ownership and use when the Constitution of 1879 was adopted, it could not have the effect to dedicate its property to public use without the consent, express or implied, of its owners. But, if it were otherwise, the constitutional provision as to the public use of water supplied for irrigation is not intended to prevent a landowner from acquiring and attaching to his land a right to the permanent use of water for its irrigation, subject only to the condition that the state may regulate and control the use."

This latter statement, in and of itself, furnishes some ground for the contention of the appellant. The first clause of the syllabus, however, as we have said, draws the distinction which, we think, must be made. In Leavitt v. Lassen Irrigation Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 P. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, the court limits the language used in the Bachman Case, supra, and holds that—

It "must be construed in the light of the facts there presented. The court was there considering the claim of a water company to the right to collect rates in excess of those fixed by a contract made with its predecessor, its claim being in part founded on the theory that by a foreclosure sale it had acquired the water and distributing system free from that contract. The opinion, in the main, goes upon the theory that the water in control of the company was not subject to a public use, and upon that theory it was held that the contract to furnish water to Bachman's land attached the water right to it as an appurtenance, with the right to receive water from the previous owner of the system and its successors at the contract rates."

The opinion in the Leavitt Case was concurred in by Justice Shaw, who wrote the opinion of the court in the Bachman Case. In the case of Danley v. Merced Irrigation Dist., 66 Cal. App. 97, 226 P. 847, 854, this court referred to sections 552 and 662, Civil Code, in relation to the acquiring of the right to the continued use of water, but in that case no questions arising under the Constitution were involved. The only question involved was the power of the irrigation district to enter into an agreement with the holders of contracts for the payment to them of a certain sum annually, and not whether the waters and water rights there being dealt with were or were not subject to the control and regulation of the state, by and through the agency of the Railroad Commission, and the rights mentioned in these sections of the Civil Code were referred to as rights or interests which the contracts did not purport to convey. The cases dealing with the subject directly make a distinction between water rights when acquired from a private concern possessed by a landowner and when the water is obtained from a public utility. In the latter case, the rule followed is clearly stated in the case of Asher v. Hutchinson Water, Light & Power Co., 66 Kan. 496, 71 P. 813, 61 L. R. A. 52, where the Supreme Court of Kansas says:

"An individual can acquire no vested right as against the public in the continued service of a public utility. Such a doctrine, once admitted, would destroy the convenience as a public utility. It would then become hampered, and subject to the control of the individual, and made to subserve such interests, to the detriment of the public welfare."

[2] That case had to do with the removal of water mains belonging to a public utility, which had been ordered removed by a municipality having the authority so to do. A private individual, whose service would be cut off by such removal, sought an injunction to restrain such removal. The injunction was denied. In Day v. Tacoma Ry. & Power Co., 80 Wash. 161, 141 P. 347, L. R. A. 1915B, 547, the Supreme Court of Washington quotes with approval the language of the Supreme Court of Kansas, and cites in addition a large number of cases wherein it is held that a public utility may be regulated or permitted to change its service, as in that case the change of the location of a line of railway, even though it left the property of some individuals, who had located along the line of the abandoned right of way practically worthless. In the case of Phelps v. Logan Natural Gas & Fuel Co., 101 Ohio St. 144, 128 N. E. 58, the rule announced by the Supreme Court of Kansas is followed by the Supreme Court of Ohio. In Bryan v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 244 F. 650, 157 C. C. A. 98, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States for the Eighth Circuit reviews a large number of cases, and follows the rule before stated. The Bryan Case involved the permission granted to a railroad to abandon its line for some 20 odd miles and to establish a new line. The Supreme Court of this state, in Leavitt v. Lassen Irrigation Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 P. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, heretofore referred to, holds, in substance, that no private estate can be created in property devoted to a public use, and a consumer of water cannot have a water right in the sense of a private freehold interest in the real estate of the distributing company; that his right is simply a right of service. This, of course, carries with it the right to that service so long as the public utility controls the instrumentality rendering the service. The exercise and enjoyment of such right of service does not create an easement such as is contemplated by section 552, Civil Code, but is a service rendered by a public utility subject to the regulation and control of the state in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

We are thus brought to the question as to the extent of regulation and control that may be exercised by the state through the agency of the Railroad Commission. If the cases which we have cited announce the correct doctrine that one served by a public utility only possesses a right of service in common with the class or status of those who are served by such public agency, we have no rights of property being dealt with taken away, limited, suspended, or destroyed. It is simply a question of the method of procedure through which that service may be continued, if continued, or, if abandoned, under what conditions it may be abandoned. The Public Utilities Act (St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 18), explicitly gives the Railroad Commission authority to determine whether the public utility may or may not discontinue its service. In the case of Limoneira Co. v. Railroad Commission, 174 Cal. 232, 162 P. 1033, the Supreme Court, in deciding a question relative to water rates, for water furnished by a public utility, held that the Railroad Commission had power to modify and practically annul the contract rates which had theretofore been agreed upon between the company and the consumer, and also that upon the sale of the water system to a public utility, which was devoted wholly to a public use, there could be no reservation of a private right of ownership as to a part of the property so devoted to public use. It is also held that the power to change the rates did not conflict with the federal Constitution in so far as it prohibits the impairment of contracts. This case takes up and considers at length the powers of the Railroad Commission in controlling public utilities engaged in the distribution of water, and concludes with the statement that—

"In view of the provisions of our Constitution and the Public Utilities Act, and our decisions thereunder, we do not see how it can be doubted that the Railroad Commission had the power to determine for the purposes of the exercise of its jurisdiction to regulate a public utility by the fixing of rates, subject to such power of review as is possessed by this court, all questions of fact essential to the proper exercise of that jurisdiction."

While not expressly involved in this case, and not directly deciding that question, we think it authority in support of the doctrine that the only right which a customer has, under such circumstances, is the right of service, and not any ownership or easement in the water furnished by the public utility, because, if there were an ownership in the water itself, it would amount to the taking of property without compensation, and so be an unconstitutional exercise of power.

[3] The record in this case is sufficient to show that the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal & Irrigation Company was hopelessly insolvent, and that it was a case of either abandonment of the enterprise or a transfer of its properties to some irrigation system or company possessing the power to continue operations and distribution of water. The West Side Company was losing money, and was in a position to take advantage of the doctrine laid down in the case of Lyon & Hoag v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 145, 190 P. 795, 11 A. L. R. 249, where it is said that the Railroad Commission has no power to compel the continued operation of a public utility at a loss. To the same effect is the case of Brooks-Scanlon Co. v. R. R. Comm., 251 U. S. 396, 40 S. Ct. 183, 64 L. Ed. 323.

In making its decision relative to the discontinuance of its public utility functions by the West Side Canal Company and the permitting of a transfer of its properties to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district, the Railroad Commission was confronted with the fact that the irrigation district was not a public utility subject to the regulations and control of the Railroad Commission (see City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 526, 192 P. 25, 10 A. L. R. 1425), and therefore was under the necessity of making its orders conditional, as in that way only could the use of the water for irrigation purposes, as formerly furnished by the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company, be insured.

We think, from what has already been said, that the authority of the Railroad Commission to regulate and control the distribution of properties of the public utility known as the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company, as well as the uses and conditions to be attached to the use of the water furnished by that public utility, has been satisfactorily shown, and therefore there remains but one further question to be considered.

[4-7] The appellant in this case, and the appellants in the two companion cases, voluntarily became parties before the Railroad Commission in its hearing upon the application of the canal company to discontinue its public utility functions and transfer its properties to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district, and, while their appearance at that hearing was not accompanied with all the formalities which sometimes characterize such appearances, they sufficiently showed themselves to be parties in interest, and therefore had a right to petition for a rehearing before the Railroad Commission, or for a modification, and also of petitioning for a modification of that order, so far as it affects the conditions under which water services should be continued, and upon the denial of such petition for rehearing, to apply to the Supreme Court for a writ of review. Under section 67 of the Public Utilities Act, no court of this state, except the Supreme Court, possesses any jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any order or decision of the commission, and, under the section of the Constitution relating to the powers of the Railroad Commission, it expressly provides that no other limitations or provisions can affect the powers given to the Railroad Commission. The superior court, therefore, possesses no power to alter or modify the determination of the Railroad Commission. Marin Municipal W. Dist. v. North Coast, 178 Cal. 324, 173 P. 473; Pac. T. & T. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 P. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822. In People v. Hadley, 66 Cal. App. 370, 226 P. 836, the District Court of Appeal for the Second District of this state had occasion to examine this question, and in the opinion in that case the authorities are fully cited to the point that the Supreme Court only possesses power to review the decisions of the Railroad Commission. We quote therefrom the following, which we think applicable to this case:

"It must therefore be accepted as the settled law of this state that no court other than the Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any decision or order of the Railroad Commission. Even though the order by the Railroad Commission be palpably erroneous in point of law, until some order by the Supreme Court may be issued to the contrary, the original order of the Commission must stand as a proper and legal order in the premises."

Consequently, in this case, even though it may appear that the order of the Railroad Commission were erroneous, it would not authorize the annulment or setting aside of such order; the Supreme Court only having power to make such corrections. We think, however, that section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution fully covers this case, wherein the public use is reserved to the regulation and control of the state in the manner prescribed by law. These words, we think, fully authorized the Railroad Commission to determine how the water, or the service thereof involved, should be controlled or supplied, and to direct that the user of the water should place himself in a position where the control and use of the water would be under the jurisdiction of some district or agency authorized to fix rates and collect such reasonable compensation for the service as would defray the expenses thereof, properly chargeable to the lands owned by the appellants, and that it is also within the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, in permitting the purchase of the properties of the public utility about to go out of existence, to provide that those who had therefore had the benefit of the service of that public utility should be received within the territorial limits of the irrigation district as tracts of land, so far as the lands were concerned, and the owners thereof, upon an equal footing with the lands already included in the district and the rights and privileges possessed by the owners thereof.

The judgments of the trial court are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Edward C. Eddie against the New York Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles J. Kelly, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This action was tried on a stipulation of facts to recover on a policy of life insurance issued by the defendant company to Charlotte F. Eddie, deceased. Judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

By the terms of the policy the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff, who was the beneficiary therein, the sum of $5,000 upon proof of the death of the insured. The policy called for the payment of annual premiums of $159.55 each on the 23d day of February of each year in advance. The policy contained the usual nonforfeiture clause providing that, in case of default of any premium payment, the cash surrender value of the policy, including dividends accrued, if any, should be applied as a premium upon paid-up nonparticipating insurance in accordance with the schedule fixed in the policy, and also provided that within three months after default the insured might at her option receive either the cash surrender value or paid-up insurance. Annual premiums on the policy were paid for the first two years in cash. The premium due February 3, 1916, was not paid, but in lieu thereof a lien note for the full amount was executed by the insured and delivered to the defendant. On February 23, 1917, another annual premium became due, as well as interest on this lien note of February 23, 1916. At the same time there became due the insured by way of dividends on the policy the sum of $26.95. The insured was unable to pay the premium for the fourth year, and an agreement was thereupon executed between the insurer and the insured which is commonly referred to as the "blue note." This note was for the sum of $111, and was made payable on August 23, 1917. The note recited that it was accepted by the insurer at the request of the maker, together with $48.55 in cash paid by the insured, and that this was all done on the express agreement between the parties; that, although no part of the premium due on February 23, 1917, had been paid, the insurance under the policy shall be continued in force until midnight of August 23, 1917; that, if this note is paid on or before the time it becomes due, such payment, together with the cash mentioned, will be accepted as payment of the premium due February 23, 1917, but that, if the note is not so paid, it shall thereupon automatically cease to be a claim against the maker, the insurer shall retain the cash as part compensation for the rights and privileges granted by the extension of the policy, and all rights of the insured shall then be the same as if no part of said premium had been paid, except only that the time within which the insured may make a choice of benefits after the lapse is extended for three months after the due date of the note, but no longer. The insured failed to pay the note, or any part of it, and failed to pay any of the premiums due upon the policy covered by the note, and neither the insured nor any one in her behalf within three months after August 23, 1917, or in fact at any time, made any choice of benefits after the lapse of the policy as provided therein. The insured died on the 5th day of November, 1917, and immediately thereafter demand was made upon the defendant by the beneficiary for full payment of the policy.

The complaint alleged the facts concerning the issue of the policy, the payment of the annual premiums thereon, and the execution of the two notes hereinbefore referred to. It was also alleged on information and belief that on the 23d day of February, 1917, the cash surrender value of the policy, less the indebtedness due the insurer, and including the dividend due the insured, was sufficient to purchase extended insurance for the period of 434 days from February 23, 1917; that is, to and including May 1, 1918. This allegation of the complaint was denied, and the court found that it was not true that the cash surrender value of the policy on February 23, 1917, was sufficient to purchase extended insurance for any period of time, and it was found that it was not true that by the use of any dividend due the insured, or by any other means extended insurance was purchased, or that the insured was entitled to extend her insurance after February 23, 1917, for any period or in any amount whatsoever.

The case depends upon this finding: If it were true, as alleged in the complaint, that the policy had on February 23, 1917, a cash surrender value sufficient to call for paid-up insurance for a period beyond the date of the death of the insured, there would be some reason in the argument of appellant that the parties were not competent to enter into the contract of February 23, 1917, whereby this right on the part of the insured was abrogated in consideration of the acceptance by the insurer of the so-called blue note. This would be so because of the provisions of section 450 of the Civil Code, which section, after providing for the inclusion of automatic nonforfeiture clauses in policies of insurance, provides that no agreement between the insurer and the insured shall be sufficient to waive any of those provisions. But the difficulty with appellant's case is that, although he alleged facts which would seem to bring him within the purview of the section of the Civil Code, he failed to prove the allegations of his complaint, and the trial court held that those allegations were not true. On this appeal our attention has not been directed to any evidence in support of the allegations of the complaint or contrary to the finding made by the trial court. Such being the case, we are, of course, bound by that finding. In argument the appellant insists that on February 23, 1917, after deducting all indebtedness due the company, the policy had a net cash surrender value of $30.45, and that in accordance with the stipulation of the parties the net single premium for the purchase of nonparticipating extended insurance was at the rate of $4 per month. The appellant then contends that the insured was therefore entitled to paid-up nonparticipating insurance for the period of 231 days. To support this contention appellant argues that the period of default should be fixed at August 23, 1917, rather than February 23d of the same year, and on that basis argues that the extended insurance covered a period beyond the death of the deceased. There are two errors in the argument of appellant which are apparent: First, it is wholly out of accord with the allegations of the complaint and the findings of the trial court; and, second, the date of default or lapse of the policy was on February 23d rather than August 23d.

The legal effect of a note such as that executed on February 23, 1917, has frequently been before the courts of this country, and it has uniformly been held that such notes do not work an extension of the time when the extended insurance would automatically start after a lapse, but that such notes are merely accommodations to the insured, to be construed in accordance with their terms that, if the insured fails to pay within the time designated in the note, the policy shall be deemed to have lapsed at the time of the forfeiture. Underwood v. Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co., 177 N. C. 327, 98 S. E. 832, 835; White v. New York Life Ins. Co., 200 Mass. 510, 513, 86 N. E. 928, 929; Robnett v. Cotton States Life Ins. Co., 148 Ark. 199, 230 S. W. 257, 259, 260; Bogue v. New York Life Ins. Co., 103 Neb. 568, 173 N. W. 591, 592. In White v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra, a blue note similar to the one here under consideration was executed on August 19, 1906, the date when the annual premium was due. It recited the payment of part of the premium in cash, and provided for an extension of the insurance providing that the note was paid prior to February 19, 1907, and also provided that, if not so paid, it should not be a charge against the maker, and that all rights under the policy should automatically cease. The note was not paid on its due date, and some time thereafter the insured died. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in holding that the parties were bound by the terms of the blue note, said that the cash payment was to be treated as a consideration for the privilege which the insured enjoyed, and that "the rights of both parties in reference to the policy were precisely the same as if this note had never been given, and the payment in cash had never been made."

[1, 2] The only answer which the appellant makes to the authorities cited is that they are not in harmony with the provisions of section 450, Civil Code. But in this respect we are not able to agree with the appellant. The section provides that every policy of life insurance upon the life of a resident of this state and delivered within the state shall make certain provisions for automatic nonforfeiture, and declares that any agreement tending to waive such provisions shall be invalid. The blue note in question is not such an agreement. The policy contained all the requirements covered by the Code section. The rights of the insured thereunder were not affected by the execution of the blue note. If this note had not been executed, the policy would have terminated on February 23, 1917, and any surrender value which it might have would then accrue to the insured. By the execution of the blue note the insured was merely given an extension of time within which she might have paid the premiums to continue the policy in force. She was wholly competent, however, to contract with the company that, if she would not perform her part of the contract, the note would not be an enforceable obligation against her, and that in that event the rights of both parties under the insurance policy should be the same as if the note had not been executed. Manifestly these rights, so far as the insured was concerned, were to exercise the option to make a choice of the benefits covered by the policy in the event of a lapse. Not only by the terms of the policy itself but by the agreement of the parties expressed in the blue note the lapse of the policy was fixed as of February 23, 1917. Underwood v. Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co., supra, and White v. New Lork Life Ins. Co., supra. If, as appellant contends, the policy had a surrender value of $30.45, which would have entitled the insured to 231 days of paid-up insurance, that period, reckoned from February 23, 1917, expired before the death of the insured. The blue note did not, therefore, curtail any of the rights or guaranties given the insured by the statute.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Louis W. Mechler was convicted of bribery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Carr, of Oakland, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant and one Villa were indicted on the charge of "asking and receiving bribes." Pen. Code, § 68. The defendant, Mechler, was tried, and the jury brought in a verdict of guilty "of felony, to wit, a violation of section 68 of the Penal Code of the State of California, as charged in the indictment." The defendant moved for a new trial, but his motion was denied. Thereupon judgment was pronounced against him, and he has appealed from the order denying his motion for a new trial and from the judgment of conviction.

At the time of his arraignment the defendant demurred to the indictment; the demurrer was overruled; and at this time the defendant urges that ruling as error. The charging part of the indictment was as follows:

"That the said Henry S. Villa and Louis W. Mechler, on or about the 27th day of April, A. D. 1924, and prior to the time of filing this indictment, at the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, State of California, did unlawfully, willfully, feloniously, and corruptly ask, receive, and agree to receive from persons, to wit, George W. O'Connor and Charles F. Smith, a bribe, to wit, the sum of $100 in lawful money of the United States of America, of the value of $100 in gold coin of the United States of America, upon the agreement and understanding between the said Henry S. Villa, Louis W. Mechler, George W. O'Connor, and Charles F. Smith that the said Henry S. Villa and Louis W. Mechler and each of them would not arrest nor cause the arrest of the said George W. O'Connor and Charles F. Smith, nor either of them, for violations of the California Motor Vehicle Act and an act of the Legislature of the State of California (Stats. 1921, c. 80) entitled, 'An act to enforce the provisions of article eighteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States; prohibiting all acts or omissions prohibited by the Volstead Act; imposing duties on courts, prosecuting attorneys, sheriffs and other officers, and extending their jurisdiction, and providing for the disposition of fines and forfeitures' which had been theretofore, on said 27th day of April, A. D. 1924, committed by said George W. O'Connor and Charles F. Smith in the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California."

[1] The appellant contends that the demurrer should have been sustained because the indictment does not allege: (1) That George W. O'Connor and Charles F. Smith committed violations of the California Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517); nor (2) what those violations were; nor (3) the manner in which they committed violations of the California Motor Vehicle Act. The appellant further contends that the indictment was uncertain because it did not specify the foregoing matters. The appellant cites and relies on People v. Ward, 110 Cal. 369 (42 P. 894), and quotes the first syllabus. The citation is not in point. The third paragraph on page 373 (42 P. 895) is more nearly in point. An authority that rules the point directly against the appellant is People v. Markham, 64 Cal. 157, 30 P. 620, 49 Am. Rep. 700. In that case the court upheld an indictment as being sufficient which charged the asking of a bribe "upon an understanding and agreement that he [the defendant] would not arrest persons engaged in violating section 330 of the Penal Code of the state of California, nor would he arrest persons engaged in violating the gaming ordinance of the said city of San Jose, contrary to the form of the statute," etc., The reason for the rule is stated by the court at page 161 (30 P. 622) in the following language:

"The matter, cause, or proceeding must be one which may come before him, that is, comes within his jurisdiction, or which may be brought before the officer, or which may be pending at the time of the corrupt promise. The Legislature, I think, did not intend that the prosecution should depend upon the fact whether the officer actually had it in his power to carry out the corrupt agreement before the indictment was exhibited. It is sufficient, I think, that the subject-matter upon which the bribe was to operate existed, and could legally be brought before the officer in his official capacity. The offense consists, in contemplation of the statute, in poisoning and corrupting the fountain of justice, and although the particular deleterious consequence designed to be effected by the parties has not ensued, the state, nevertheless, has an officer corrupted, and society has lost all protection for its rights, so far as the administration of the law by him is concerned."

See, also, People v. Lips, 59 Cal. App. 381, 390, 211 P. 22; 9 C. J. p. 409, § 10.

We think that the indictment was not vulnerable to any of the attacks made thereon.

[2] In his brief the appellant cites numerous rulings on the admission or exclusion of evidence as being errors. We have examined each one, and find no merit in any of the assignments except as we have noted below. When Mr. Smith, the prosecuting witness, was on the stand as a part of the cross-examination, the attorney for the appellant propounded to him a question, and the following proceedings were had:

"Mr. Carr: Isn't it a fact that in the first trial of this case held in this court in July, 1924, you were a witness and testified, and that you testified that at the time you arrived at your brother-in-law's home at 10 a. m. on Excelsior avenue and never left there until 2:30 in the afternoon?"

"Mr. Snook: Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and tends to impeach the witness on collateral and irrelevant matter."

"The Court: Objection sustained."

"Mr. Carr: You did testify in the first trial of this case on the 8th of July, 1924, that you remained at your brother-in-law's house from 10 a. m. until 2 or 2:30 in the p. m. without leaving?"

"Mr. Snook: The same objection."

"The Court: The same ruling."

"Mr. Carr: Did you leave your brother-in-law's house after you arrived there at 10:30 a. m. until 2 or 2:30 in the afternoon?"

"Mr. Snook: Objected to as asked and answered."

"The Court: He may answer. A. Yes."

[3] Any error in sustaining the objection to the first question and second question was cured by the ruling made on the objection to the third question. In another place the appellant contends that it was error on the part of the trial court to admit in evidence the alleged statement of Mechler, because no proper foundation had been laid for its admission, and on the further ground that at that time the corpus delicti had not been established. The statement referred to was a written statement of questions propounded by the chief of police and answers made by the defendant. The secretary of the chief of police was sworn as a witness, and testified that he was present at the interview and took down the questions and answers in shorthand. Before the secretary started to read the appellant made an objection that the statement "is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and no proper foundation laid." The appellant did not call to the attention of the trial court, and has not called to the attention of this court, any particulars wherein the foundation had not been laid. Before these proceedings were had the witness Smith and the witness O'Connor and other witnesses had delineated in detail the occurrences on the 27th day of April, 1924. Mechler's statement to the chief of police was made on April 30th. In the same manner that Mechler's statement was taken a statement was also taken from Villa. After the chief of police had taken down each statement, he read Mechler's statement to Villa and Villa's statement to Mechler. At the time of the trial, having laid the foregoing foundation, the statement made by Villa which had been read to the appellant was offered in evidence. The whole statement was not read, as the prosecution conceded a part was immaterial. The part claimed to be material being offered, the appellant objected to it as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The objection was overruled. After the statement had been read to Mechler, the witness was asked what Mechler said, if anything. The trial court did not err in its rulings. Codé Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 3. The appellant cites and relies on People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 648, 653, 44 P. 312. The facts before the court in the Oldham Case are readily distinguishable from the facts in this case.

[4] In presenting its case to the jury the prosecution had introduced evidence to the effect that Mechler and Villa had formed a conspiracy and were acting as conspirators in committing the offenses alleged in the indictment. Among other instructions, the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"If a conspiracy has been shown to exist, every act and declaration of each member of the conspiracy in pursuance of the original concerted plan and with reference to the common object is in contemplation of the law the act and declaration of them all and each of them, and it makes no difference at what time one comes into a conspiracy, for everyone who does enter into such a common purpose and design is deemed in law a party to every act which may afterward be done by any of the others in furtherance of such common design."

At this time the appellant contends that the foregoing instruction was erroneous; that it was not applicable to the case on trial; and was calculated to confuse and mislead the jury. The appellant does not specify wherein the instruction was vulnerable to any one of those attacks. We think the point is without merit.

[5] The appellant contends that the district attorney was guilty of improper conduct in arguing the case to the jury. That point involved a consideration of the following facts: Mr. Smith had testified that between 3 and 4 p. m. on April 27, 1924, that he, Mr. O'Connor and two women were stopped while driving an automobile along Park boulevard. The defendant, Mechler, stopped them. Another officer, Villa, was near by. Mechler motioned the party over to the curb. They approached the curb, and stopped. Thereupon a conversation was held between the men and the officers, between the men and the women passengers, and between the officers and the women passengers. All were apparently assembled about the car at least part of the time. As to what each one saw and as to what each one heard at that particular time it may be conceded was not expressly developed in the testimony. While arguing, the deputy district attorney, referring in part to the words expressly used by the witnesses and in part to the inferences and presumptions that could be drawn therefrom, stated:

"Mr. Crosby: In the meantime Officer Villa (and I think his acts were just as contemptible as this other man's), Officer Villa saw the suit case in the back of the car, and asked what was in it, and O'Connor said there were some of his things in it, and Villa had heard of the previous conversation between the ladies and Mechler—

"Mr. Carr: I assign that as a misstatement, because there is nothing in the record that Villa heard any part of the conversation that occurred between Mechler and the women. I assign it as a misstatement of the evidence.

"The Court: Proceed."

Appellant now complains because the trial court did not admonish the district attorney. It was no proper time to admonish him. The interruption by the appellant was not justified by the record. Two other interruptions immediately following stand on the same basis. In another place the district attorney had stated that Mechler made out an arrest tag. The attorney for the appellant challenged the statement as not being supported by the record. The trial court stated to the jury that the statement had not been testified to. The deputy district attorney acknowledged his mistake, and proceeded. Certainly there was no occasion for admonishing the district attorney under such circumstances.

[6] In his brief the appellant made assignments of error, but did not print excerpts from the transcript showing the facts; nor did he stop to argue the point and to cite any authority supporting the contention. Such matters have not been specifically treated by us and we will assume, under such circumstances, that the contention has been abandoned. Estate of Randall, 194 Cal. 725, 230 P. 445; People v. Singh, 182 Cal. 457, 480, 188 P. 987. We find no error in the record. The judgment and order are affirmed.

3. Criminal law ☞1172(6)—Judgment not reversed because instructions embraced matters not pertinent, unless prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Joseph Rivera and Adolph Rivera were convicted of manslaughter, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Chauncey Gardner, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendants were convicted of the crime of manslaughter, and they appeal from the judgment, as well as from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The usual conflicts appeared in the evidence; but, relying upon the right of the jury to justly discriminate as to the testimony given by the several witnesses in the case, the jury was warranted in basing its verdict upon the following facts:

Ralph Carnevale and his brother, Carlo Carnevale, were the owners of a certain restaurant. The defendants, one of whom being a police officer, and the other a deputy sheriff, in company with two other men, one of whom also being a police officer, at about the hour of 12 o'clock at night, went to the restaurant belonging to the Carnevale brothers for the purpose of obtaining some refreshments. Neither of the defendants, nor either of their companions, was in uniform. On arriving at the restaurant it was found to be closed to the public for further business on that night, although some of the patrons thereof were still being served. After some delay the party was admitted into the restaurant, whereupon, according to the testimony of some of the witnesses, two of the members of the party proceeded to look into each of the several booths located in the rear of the restaurant, and to smile at some of the ladies who were seated therein. One of the members of the party demanded that he be served with a "trago," which is interpreted to mean a drink of intoxicating liquor, and, on being told that nothing of that sort was dispensed in the restaurant, remarked that he wanted it by "force." No violence nor threat of any sort, however, other than the implied threat contained in the statement made by one of the defendants that if necessary he would use violence to obtain that which he sought, was offered by any member of the party toward either of the proprietors of the restaurant, or to any person therein. Cigarets were purchased by and a cup of coffee ordered for each member of the party, which was served to them by Ralph Carnevale, one of the proprietors of the restaurant. He, however, was apparently suspicious of the good intentions of the defendants and their party, and on three separate occasions directed one of his employees to telephone to the police station for the "flying squadron." The employee having failed to carry out such direction of his employer, Ralph Carnevale sprang over the counter which separated him from his unwelcome guests, and, flourishing a revolver, ordered them to throw up their hands and to vacate the premises. Defendant Adolph Rivera and his brother police officer did as they were thus ordered. The defendant Joseph Rivera, however, refused to comply with the order made upon him to throw up his hands or to leave the restaurant, although Ralph Carnevale was very close to him and toward the close of the incident had the muzzle of his pistol pressed against Joe Rivera's body. While the two men were thus engaged, Carlo Carnevale came forward in the restaurant and, seizing the defendant Joseph Rivera by the coat collar, shoved him out of the door of the restaurant onto the sidewalk and immediately closed the door. The two Carnevale brothers then faced about and started to walk toward the rear of the restaurant, whereupon the two defendants began shooting at the two Carnevale brothers, which fire was by them returned. The result of the episode was that Carlo Carnevale was killed.

[1, 2] Appellants contend that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. Considering as true only the evidence favorable to the theory of self-defense which was advanced by the defendants, it is possible that appellants' contention might be sustained. But, as heretofore stated, there was much evidence contrary to such defense. Following the rules of law applicable to the credit to be attached to the testimony given by the several witnesses, the jury had the right either to believe or to disbelieve the whole or any part of the testimony given in behalf of the defendants. Judging from the verdict, it is apparent that the jury considered as proven beyond a reasonable doubt a state of facts in accordance with those heretofore set forth, in which event the verdict was supported by the law and the evidence. Defendants' contention as to the insufficiency of the evidence, therefore, cannot be sustained.

It is urged by the appellants that the trial court committed prejudicial error in giving to the jury each of two certain instructions as follows:

"Whenever an assault is brought upon a person by his own procurement, or under an appearance of hostility which he himself creates, with a view of having his adversary act upon it, and he so acts and is killed, the plea of self-defense under such circumstances is unavailing."

"The court instructs the jury that the acts which a defendant may do and justify under a plea of self-defense depend primarily upon his own conduct, and, secondarily, upon the conduct of the deceased. There is no fixed rule applicable to every case, though certain general principles, well established, stand forth as guides for the action of men and measures for the jury's determination of their deportment. You are instructed that self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through his fraud, contrivance, or fault, to create a real or apparent necessity for killing."

Appellants concede that each of such instructions states well-recognized principles of law; but it is contended that there was no evidence upon which either of said instructions could be based and as a consequence that the giving thereof could but have had the effect of confusing and misleading the jury to the great prejudice of the substantial rights of the defendants.

The only evidence to which attention has been directed which would indicate that the claimed assault made by the proprietors of the restaurant upon the defendants was brought about intentionally and through the procurement of the defendants is that two of the members of the defendants' party went through the restaurant, looked into each of the booths thereof, smiled at some of the lady patrons seated therein, and that upon being refused a drink of intoxicating liquor one of the defendants stated that he wanted it by "force." Some other evidence was received regarding the boisterous conduct of the defendants and some of the members of their party. All those things, however, occurred before the members of the party had become seated in the front part of the restaurant and where they were apparently engaged in smoking cigarets and drinking coffee. Assuming, however, that no sufficient evidence existed upon which to predicate either of the criticized instructions and consequently that the giving of them was unnecessary and improper, the question of their harmful effect upon the rights of the defendants remains to be considered.

[3, 4] Many authorities are cited by appellants to the effect that the giving of instructions upon matters not pertinent to the issues constitutes error, even though such instructions contain correct statements of the law; but the point to be determined is whether such instructions were really prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendants. If they were not, it naturally follows that a reversal of the judgment should not be had. The general effect of the two instructions of which complaint is made is that one may not assume any false position toward another or deliberately pick a quarrel with him for the purpose of causing him to do something which, under ordinary circumstances, might furnish a legal excuse for killing him, and by so doing, after killing the person thus incited, to have available the plea of self-defense.

The defendants were charged with the commission of the crime of murder. They admitted that the killing was done by them, or by one of them, but claimed that it was done in self-defense. No complaint is made that the defendants were not afforded a full and fair opportunity to make their defense, nor that, upon the defense as presented, the jury was not properly instructed on all phases of the law applicable thereto. In such circumstances, it was for the jury to determine under the law as given to it by the court whether, the facts considered, the defendants were justified in taking the life of the person who was killed. The defense did not at all depend upon whether the defendants had deliberately started the quarrel with the design of forcing a deadly issue. Practically the entire case of the defendants was based upon what physical position was occupied by the defendants, and especially by the one who was the last to be ejected from the restaurant, with relation to the situation of the two restaurant keepers at the time the shooting took place. Manifestly, if both the defendants were outside the building, the door of the restaurant being closed, and the two restaurant keepers were walking away from and with their backs toward the door of the restaurant, no legal excuse was presented for offering them violence of any sort. On the other hand, if, at the time the shooting took place, one of the defendants was being menaced by a revolver in the hands of one of the restaurant keepers, while at the same time his brother was actually assaulting such defendant, it is possible that (additional circumstances being also present) the other defendant would have been justified in offering the resistance which the evidence shows was done.

The defense which was urged by the defendants depended for its success upon proof of such circumstances as would justify a reasonable man in the belief that his life was in danger or that great bodily injury would result from the encounter. No part of such defense, either in the facts upon which it rested or in the law applicable thereto, was in any wise invaded or infringed upon by either of the instructions which it may be assumed touched upon facts not shown by the evidence and the declared law based upon such assumption. While the literal effect of the two instructions under consideration is that if certain designated facts appear in the evidence, under such circumstances the plea of self-defense is unavailing, there is no intimation that such a plea is denied as to other situations shown by the evidence, or especially as to the facts claimed to exist by the defendants at the time the shooting occurred. To the contrary, the language of the two instructions, while not expressly so declaring, would certainly indicate that the limitation was intended to apply solely to a possible situation as therein suggested. In addition thereto, one of the general instructions given to the jury expressly announces that—

"If any instruction is applicable only if a particular situation or state of facts exists, and if you find that no such situation or state of facts exists, then you should not take such instructions into consideration in your deliberations."

Perhaps the facts, under the circumstances shown to exist immediately preceding the action on the part of Ralph Carnevale in ordering the defendants from his place of business, were not such as reasonably would have created the suspicion that the defendants were intent upon committing the crime of robbery; but, if robbery had been the motive of the defendants and their companions in entering the restaurant, it is clear that a plea of self-defense would not have been available to the defendants. Had the court seen fit to so instruct the jury, such an instruction would not have prejudiced the rights of the defendants as to the facts which in fact they attempted to prove in their defense, and which, had they been proven to the satisfaction of the jury, would have constituted a complete defense to the charge.

And so it is with reference to the assumed exigency attempted to be set forth in either of the two instructions under consideration. Admitted that no facts were before the court upon which either of them could rest, the effect of either or their combined effect was but to attract the attention of the jury to a condition which had no existence and to state an abstract principle of law as deducible therefrom. The criticized instructions are just so much surplusage in the case. They are of no more consequence than had they been directed to any defense other than that of self-defense, or if they were entirely irrelevant to any issue in the case. Their effect did not detract from the force of either the facts or the law relied upon by the defendants in presenting their defense. The case of People v. Glover, 141 Cal. 233, 74 P. 745, is illustrative of the point, and it is there ruled (syllabus) that—

"An instruction that the plea of self-defense is not available where a person seeks a quarrel with the design of creating a real or apparent necessity for killing, correctly states the law, and is not erroneous, whether it is applicable or inapplicable to the evidence."

No prejudicial error appearing, it is ordered that the judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial be and they are affirmed.

2. Sodomy $\S$ 6—Evidence of accomplice held corroborated.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 365(1)—Indecent pictures shown complaining witness before offense was committed held part thereof.

In prosecution for violation of Pen. Code, $\S$ 288a, where accused showed pictures to complaining witness just preceding commission of crime, held such pictures were so closely associated with preparation for crime that they became part of offense and were admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

P. V. Knowles was convicted of a violation of Pen. Code, § 288a, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ashley H. Conrad and Louis Oneal, of San Jose, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and L. B. Browne, of San Francisco, for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried and convicted on an information, charging him with a violation of section 288a of the Penal Code, which defines the crime commonly known as sex perversion. From the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed on a record prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The defendant was a teacher in the public schools of Alameda county. The complaining witness was a high school student of the age of 16 years. This boy, accompanied by a fellow student of the same age, went to the defendant's apartment some time in the month of August, 1924. They were there entertained by the defendant, who showed them indecent and suggestive pictures and instruments used to prevent conception. The defendant explained the use of these instruments, and then urged the two boys to commit the act defined in the Code section cited. One of the boys refused and went to another room, where he played a piano, while the defendant and the complaining witness undressed and remained together for a period of half an hour.

[2] The chief attack on the judgment is that the evidence is insufficient, because the testimony of the complaining witness, he being an accomplice, was not corroborated as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code. The testimony of the complaining witness, detailing the story of the crime, is complete, and leaves no room for uncertainty. It is corroborated in every detail except as to the actual commission of the act itself. This is all that is required under the Code section. People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 473, 229 P. 40.

[3] Appellant suggests that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the pictures which were found in appellant's possession, and which he had displayed to the boys just preceding the commission of the crime. These pictures were so closely connected with the preparations for the commission of the crime that they became a part of the offense itself, and were properly received in evidence.

Though we have not recited the evidence at length, we have read the record with care, and are satisfied that the appellant was fairly tried and convicted. He did not take the witness stand in his own defense, but rested on the testimony of his associates as to his previous good reputation. On the evidence, which was before it, the jury could not have justly returned a different verdict. Judgment and order affirmed.

At the time of the entering into the contract relative to the sale of the said rice, the sum of $4,000 was paid on account thereof. During the course of delivery $10,000 additional was paid, and on or about March 10th, upon final delivery of all of the rice, the balance of the purchase price, amounting to $6,472.79, was paid. It also appears from the transcript that, at the time of the making of the agreement concerning the sale of the rice, the plaintiff also sold to the defendants certain barley stored in a warehouse for the sum of $2,858.34, and received payment therefor immediately, and on said date turned over and delivered to the defendants a warehouse receipt for the portion so sold. After the transactions above referred to had been had, it appears that a portion of the rice had been graded and delivered f. o. b. on the cars at Proberta, assigned to the defendants, but at 12 o'clock noon on the first Monday in March there still remained in the plaintiff's barn 313 tons of rice, unpaid for, ungraded, and undelivered. Under these circumstances, the assessor of the county of Tehama assessed the said 313 tons to the plaintiff and collected from the plaintiff on account of such assessment the sum of $303.61. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover said amount from the defendants, basing his action on the claim that the title to the rice vested in the defendants immediately on the 15th day of February, 1922. The plaintiff obtained judgment, and from this judgment the defendants appeal.

It appears from the transcript that Mr. Erle Gans, president of the Bank of Tehama County, conducted all the negotiations on the part of the plaintiff and George B. Champlin on the part of the defendants. The Bank of Tehama County, of which Mr. Gans was president, was then holding a chattel mortgage on the crop of rice and barley grown and owned by the plaintiff. The rice in question was all raised by the plaintiff in the year 1921 and stored in a barn situate on the ranch where it was raised. Prior to the sale of the rice a sample thereof was furnished by the plaintiff to George B. Champlin, the agent of the defendants, who communicated with the defendants, and was authorized by them to purchase the rice at the price stated, subject to grading, delivered f. o. b. cars at Proberta. It is agreed by both parties that the sale was made as per the terms herein stated. Three hundred sacks of the rice in the barn were to be retained by the plaintiff for seeding purposes. The testimony of Mr. Gans, who conducted the negotiations for the plaintiff, is as follows:

"We had a crop mortgage on that rice and desired to sell it. We had negotiated with Mr. Champlin, among different ones, for the sale of the rice. Mr. Champlin was acting for Thomas, Stephens & Mattei. After some dickering around, Mr. Champlin agreed on—Mr. Champlin and myself agreed on a price, and Mr. Champlin brought a draft for $4,000 on account—drew a draft for that amount on account, and we considered the sale made. As near as my recollection serves me, it was 2.41 per 100 pounds. The quantity of rice was somewhere in the neighborhood of 6,000 bags, more or less. The payment of the $4,000 was made February 15th. That is the date of the sale or contract. At the same time we sold some barley. I do not remember the number of sacks. The amount paid for the barley was $2,858.34. It was paid in a separate draft from the $4,000. The barley was completely paid for. I delivered the warehouse receipts to Mr. Champlin. On March 8th, $10,000 more was paid on account of the rice. On March 10th, final payment was made. The rice was to be delivered as soon as could be, taking into consideration the condition of the weather.

"Q. Can you recall anything else that was said, either by you or by Mr. Waneer or Mr. Champlin, in the matter of those negotiations and in closing the deal? A. Well, there was very little said as to the matter, except in arriving at the price, and Mr. Waneer's statement that there might be a delay in getting the stuff to the railroad.

"Q. What was said at the time as to the payments on the price, if anything? A. I do not recall that there was anything said about it.

"Q. But the sum of $4,000 was paid there at the time the transaction was had, on the sale and purchase price? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I understood you to say that Mr. Waneer was to deliver this rice to Proberta. That was, I suppose, f. o. b., was it not—that he was to deliver it at his cost? A. Well, there was no particular discussion about that, as I recall.

"Q. Was he to deliver it, as I understand your testimony, to Proberta? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was anything said as to delivery to Proberta being at his own expense, or on account of someone else, or was that discussed at all? A. I don't recall that it was.

"Q. Was the rice to be graded? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What does grading mean? A. All I can tell you about it is that a sampler stands there, takes some out, looks at it, and passes it, or he does not pass it.

"Q. If he does pass it, what does he do with it? A. Sets it aside.

"Q. Rejects it? A. Sometimes it is taken later at a different price.

"Q. Was anything said in the conversation when this sale and purchase was made about paying for this rice at a price other than 2.41? A. Not that I recall."

The testimony of George B. Champlin in relation to the purchase of the rice was substantially to the same effect. It is as follows:

"The deal was finally closed in my office. They were offering this rice for sale. They had been in to see me on one or two occasions, and finally the price agreed on was 2.41 f. o. b. cars Proberta, subject to grade."

This witness also testified that "subject to grading" meant that the pile of rice was to be torn down and the different sacks sampled, the buyer to take the sacks containing rice equal in grade to the sample, with the privilege of rejecting sacks containing rice not equal to the sample. It further appears from the transcript that a grader by the name of McClure was employed, who graded the rice so piled in different piles, and rejected somewhere in the neighborhood of 100 sacks thereof. The witness McClure testified that, in practice, the rejected rice ran all the way from 1 to 60 per cent. of the quantity of rice graded, depending upon whether the rice had been damaged by rain prior to harvesting, and also whether it had been protected from damage by rains after being harvested and stored; that in the instant case only a small percentage of the sacks were damaged by moisture; also that, where the rejected rice was of merchantable quality, it was usually disposed of upon subsequent contracts of sale at a lower price, but, in the case at bar, none of the rejected rice was afterwards taken.

The testimony further shows that a $15,000 policy of insurance was taken out by the bank in the name of the plaintiff upon the rice, made payable to the mortgagee bank, and that this policy was not assigned to the defendants, but retained by the bank until final delivery and payment of the rice had been made, when the policy was canceled. The transcript does not show any testimony that anything was said by any of the parties indicating an intent to immediately pass title to the property. All there is in the transcript is the statement of the witness Gans, expressed in these words: "And we considered the sale made."

On the part of the appellants it is contended that, until the rice had been graded and segregated or set aside, there was no identification of the property, and it could not be determined until after grading just what rice the buyer would take, and also, further, that title would not vest in the buyer until it was delivered f. o. b. cars at Proberta. On the part of the plaintiff and respondent, it is insisted that the transaction in question is governed by section 1140, Civil Code, which reads:

"The title to personal property, sold or exchanged, passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, and the thing itself is identified, whether it is separated from other things or not."

The agreement between the parties was oral, and, as we have said, there is no testimony one way or the other that the parties agreed upon a "present transfer" of the title. The parties agreed upon a price, agreed upon what was to be done, and $4,000 was paid on account. The complaint in the case, after setting forth certain formal matters, alleged:

The purchase of the rice for the agreed price of $2.41 per 100 pounds; that at the time of the sale and purchase defendants paid to plaintiff on account of said sale the sum of $4,000; "that said parties then and there agreed upon the present transfer of said rice from said plaintiff to said defendants and the said rice was then and there identified and the title to the said rice then and there passed from said plaintiff to said defendants; * * * that it was then and there agreed between said plaintiff and said defendants, through their said agent, George B. Champlin, that said plaintiff was to deliver the said rice to said defendants f. o. b. at the railroad and in the cars, at Proberta, in said county of Tehama, at such dates as the weather conditions would permit; that said plaintiff commenced to deliver said rice and proceeded in the delivery of said rice, all in accordance with said conditions of sale and purchase, and the said rice was accepted and received by said defendants and the full amount of said purchase price was paid therefor."

Then follow allegations as to the assessment of taxes, as heretofore stated, demand upon the defendants for reimbursement, and refusal on the part of the defendants to pay to plaintiff the amount of said taxes.

The court made the following findings:

"(1) That all of the allegations of the complaint are true; (2) that before, or at the time of, the said sale and purchase of said rice, said plaintiff furnished to said defendants, by and through their said agent, George B. Champlin, samples of said rice, and that said defendants had and reserved the right to sample any or all of said rice at the time of or before the delivery to and acceptance of the same by them, and that they had and reserved the right to reject any of said rice which did not come up to the samples furnished to them as aforesaid."

It is contended by the appellants that, under the negotiations hereinbefore set forth, all that the defendants agreed to buy was that portion of the rice in the pile belonging to the plaintiff, and then situated in his barn, equal to the sample presented; that, while it is true that the particular pile or piles from which the rice equal to the sample is to be taken is identified, the purchaser, buying subject to grading, does not buy unconditionally; that the very fact that the rice is all subject to grading shows that the sale was conditional or executory.

It is further argued that, until the rice is graded and segregated, it cannot be ascertained what rice, or how much rice, the purchaser may take, or will be required to take, under the terms of the contract; that the agreement is not to purchase all the rice, but simply all the rice in the pile that may be found equal to the sample, when the sacks of rice are torn down from the piles and sampled; that the purchaser, under such a contract, retains the title, and, as found by the court in this case, retained the right to reject all rice in the various sacks not equal to the sample; that such a sale is entirely different from a case where a group of articles, a stack of hay, or other fixed commodity, is sold at fixed rates, the buyer agreeing to take the whole lot, or whole quantity, without any right of rejection, regardless of quality or quantity, and leaving nothing to be done but to list, weigh, or measure the articles for the purpose of arriving at the total price or amount of money to be paid; that, in the case at bar, the identification of the rice sold consists in the grading, i. e., in segregating the good rice from the inferior rice in order to determine the quantity to be taken and paid for by the defendants under the terms of their purchase.

[1, 2] The rule, as stated in Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 P. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199—

"seems well settled that the question as to whether the title has passed is one as to the intention of the parties. And such intention is, as a matter of course, to be gathered from the language of the parties, considered in the light of all the circumstances of the case. But in the absence of anything showing a contrary intent, there are certain circumstances which have a controlling force."

In Williston on Sales, vol. 1, § 262 (2d Ed.), as to whether title has passed, the rule is stated:

"The question is essentially one of fact; and though if the whole contract of the parties is reduced to writing this question is determined by the court, as also if the facts are so clear as to justify but one conclusion, yet the inquiry is always one of fact, subject only to the rules of presumption for the ascertainment of intention given in the following section. In a doubtful case the question is appropriate for the jury; evidence being admitted which is calculated to show the intention of both parties as indicated to each other. Not too great stress must be laid upon the use of the words 'sell' or 'buy,' or 'sold' or 'bought,' by the parties. These words are constantly used as meaning or including contract to sell or contract to buy."

The same author in the same volume, § 269, says, further, on the subject of inspection:

"Where, however, inspection involves more than such examination as may be necessary to see if the goods are such as are described in the contract, for instance where the buyer may exercise choice or judgment in taking or rejecting part or the whole, it would seem as if there were quite as much reason for presuming the transfer of the property did not take place until after inspection as where weighing or measuring is necessary to fix the price"—citing Gilman v. Hill, 36 N. H. 311; Outwater v. Dodge, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 85; Pike v. Vaughn, 39 Wis. 499.

In Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., supra, the court in commenting upon section 1140, Civil Code, on the subject of identification, says:

"This section does not dispense with identification. On the contrary, it requires it. It only dispenses with segregation when the property is otherwise identified. Therefore, where the identification consists in the segregation, weighing, or measuring, they are still necessary."

That case involved the purchase of apricots to be grown for five succeeding seasons at so much a pound, the apricots to be delivered f. o. b. Haywards, quantity not less than 75 tons and not exceeding 200 tons per annum. It was there held that the title had not passed.

In the case of Turner, Kuhn & Fraser, Inc., v. Jones, 61 Cal. App. 732, 215 P. 1033, in considering the question as to whether the title had passed to a certain number of bales of cotton, this court, in the first district thereof, says:

"In discussing this subject Mr. Benjamin in his work on Sales in substance states that it not infrequently happens that parties fail to express their intentions as to when property, the subject of a sale, shall pass, or that they manifest them so imperfectly as to leave it doubtful what they really mean, if indeed they have any definite intentions, for the reason that the question was not brought up to them. In such cases courts have adopted the construction that when there has been no clear manifestation of intention the presumption of law is that the contract is an actual sale if the specific thing is agreed upon and is ready for immediate delivery, but that the contract is only executory when the goods have not been specified, or if, when specified, something remains to be done to put them in a deliverable shape, or to ascertain the price. In the former case there is no reason for imputing to the parties any intention to suspend the transfer of the property, inasmuch as the thing and the price have been mutually assented to and nothing remains to be done. In the latter case, when something is to be done to the goods, it is to be presumed that the parties intended to make the transfer of the property dependent upon the performance of the things yet to be done, as a condition precedent. Of course, these presumptions yield to proof of a contrary intent. Benjamin on Sales, §§ 308, 312."

[3] The intention of the parties is to be gathered from the language and the contract considered in the light of all the circumstances, but, if nothing is said in the contract, whether the contract be oral or written, expressing the intention of the parties, whether the title passed in presenti is to be determined "from all the circumstances," the acts to be performed by the respective parties, if any, and the rules of law applicable thereto.

[4] In Mechem on Sales, vol. 1, § 522, where goods are to be measured, weighed, or tested to ascertain the kind or quality of goods the buyer is to accept, the rule as to when title passes is thus stated:

"There are still other cases, not often clearly distinguished, in which the weighing, measuring, testing, and the like is to be done neither to ascertain the price nor the identity of the goods alone, but also to determine whether the particular goods in question, apparently of the kind agreed upon, are really of the kind and quality which the buyer is bound to accept. Thus, though the parties are contracting with reference to specific chattels, for example a number of bales of cotton, but, by the contract, the cotton is thereafter to be sampled by both parties to ascertain if it conforms to a sample which was the basis of the dealing, the title will not pass until that act is done; and the fact that the cotton is yet to be weighed in order to ascertain the price furnishes simply another reason leading to the same result."

If the goods had been identified, the mere fact that they are to be weighed in order to ascertain the price does not offer any reason for concluding that the title has not passed. The distinction is made when it is necessary to sample the goods to determine their quality and so ascertain and identify the goods as well as the quantity of the goods that the buyer is bound to accept under his contract, in which case it is here held that the title would not pass until the quality of the goods had been ascertained and segregation made thereof between the goods of the quality bargained for and those of an inferior grade. The same author, in section 520 of volume 1, expresses the rule as we have just stated. In the recent case of Idaho Products Co. v. Bales, 36 Idaho, 800, 214 P. 206, the Supreme Court of Idaho passed upon a contract for the sale of hay, the substantive portion of which is as follows:

"That the grower has this day sold to the buyer all of his strictly No. 1, merchantable alfalfa hay, consisting of approximately 200 tons, now in stack or growing on that certain premises described as Old Conner ranch and of which hay the grower has the sole ownership and control; it being expressly understood and agreed that the grower is to harvest and stack the said hay at the proper time and in the proper manner, and that the said hay is to be delivered to the buyer in stack on said premises, or to the baler on the said premises, as the buyer may direct."

The court, in construing the contract, and to ascertain whether the title had passed, quoted section 501 of Mechem on Sales as follows:

"Where, though the specific goods are in a deliverable condition, there still remains some act like measuring, weighing, or testing in order to determine the price, where the price is to depend upon the quantity or quality of the goods, the title usually will not pass in the absence of evidence of an intention to the contrary until this act is done."

It is added:

"It therefore remained within the power of the buyer to refuse to accept the hay as strictly

No. 1, merchantable alfalfa hay, in the event the same did not fall within that grade as established by the department of agriculture. By this contract the buyer contracted for no other grade of hay than was strictly No. 1, merchantable hay.

"If we are correct in the construction given to the terms of the contract, there was no acceptance by the buyer of the hay until it was graded. There being no acceptance of the hay unconditionally, the title to the same did not pass when the contract was signed, and the same was therefore an executory and not an executed contract for the sale of the hay. Not only is this true, but the hay was not delivered for the reason that the buyer did not direct that the hay should be delivered in the stack or to the baler, and it is clear to our minds that it was not within the intention of the parties that there should be a delivery."

It will be observed that in this case the hay was to be graded. In the instant case the rice was to be graded. It was held in the Idaho case that the title to the hay did not pass until it was graded. It would seem that the same rule would hold here that the title to the rice would not pass until it was graded. The quantity to be purchased in both cases depended upon the quality. In neither case was the purchase unconditional. In both cases there appears no acceptance until after grading and in both cases the right to reject all goods not of a specified quality appeared in the contract.

In Cornell v. Clark, 104 N. Y. 451, 10 N. E. 888, a case involving the purchase and sale of railroad ties, where the contract provided for the delivery of the ties monthly, "and the balance to be paid after inspection and classification of the ties, and 'when they were taken and used,'" it was held that the title to the ties did not pass by the delivery, but only after inspection and ascertainment of quality.

In McFadden v. Henderson, 128 Ala. 221, 29 So. 640, the Supreme Court of Alabama had before it a contract for the purchase of 1,500 bales of cotton at a price therein specified, to be all of a certain quality; the offer to purchase being in the following words: We "offer six seven-eighths f. o. b. round, nothing below middling, subject to reweights." The court, in ascertaining whether title had passed, held as follows:

"The general rule to determine whether a contract of sale is executed or executory is, 'If anything remains to be done by either party to the transaction before delivery, as, for example, to determine the price, quantity, or identity of the thing sold, the title does not vest in the purchaser, and the contract is merely executory. If the sale is complete, and the goods perish without the fault of the seller, the purchaser is bound to pay the agreed price.'

"In this case, the number of bales out of the lot of 1,500 that were sold was not determined, for the number that would class low middlings and under, and how many were unmerchantable as being 'sandy, seedy, or false packed,' was unascertained, and could not have been known until the cotton was turned out and classed, which remained, under the terms of sale, to be done, and which was never done. The sale was, therefore, executory and not executed."

In the case of Longsdorff v. Meyers, 171 Mo. App. 255, 157 S. W. 85, in construing a contract of sale for apples that were to be graded in order to determine the quantity to be taken and the price to be paid, the court held as follows:

"It is the law, as shown by citations in plaintiff's brief, that, if a given quantity of personal property which constitutes a part of a larger mass of exactly the same kind and quality (as, for instance, wheat in an elevator) is sold, the title to the quantity sold will pass, though it has not been separated from the mass. Brownfield v. Johnson, 128 Pa. 254, 18 A. 543, 6 L. R. A. 48; Nash v. Brewster, 39 Minn. 530, 41 N. W. 105, 2 L. R. A. 409. And so replevin may be had for one's part of such property. Kaufmann v. Schilling, 58 Mo. 218. But it is said in the first of these cases that, if 'the property is sold as part of a mass made up of units of unequal quality or value, * * * selection is essential to an execution of the contract'; that is, the passing of title. The same, in effect, is said in the other case. If we apply these cases to the facts as stated by plaintiff himself, he fails in his case, for defendants were not to take a part of a larger mass of exactly like kind. They were to select a part of a larger mass of unequal quality, and, until selection, the title did not pass."

In the case at bar the defendants were not to select a part of a larger mass where the whole mass was of an equal quality, but they were to take that portion thereof which was of a particular quality and reject and set aside and refuse acceptance of all that portion of the mass which was not of a uniform quality, or of a quality below the sample fixing the standard by which the quality of rice was to be determined, and so fix the quantity which the purchaser was bound to accept and pay for.

In Sempel v. Northern Hardwood Lumber Co., 142 Iowa, 586, 121 N. W. 23, the Supreme Court of Iowa, in considering a contract for the sale and purchase of certain logs of certain dimensions and quality, said:

"Broadly speaking, the question when the title to personal property sold is to pass depends upon the intention of the parties, and, when there is any dispute as to the terms and material circumstances of the agreement, it is a question for the jury; but, where there is no material conflict in the evidence or the terms of the agreement are admitted, the intent of the parties is ordinarily for the court."

And, further:

"In the absence of a proved intent otherwise, a sale is not complete and title does not pass so long as anything remains to be done between the parties. The article must be designated and its identity ascertained, and, if it be a part of a greater mass, it must be set apart, or, if sold by weight or measure, the quantity must be ascertained by the usual standards."

In this case, the quality of the logs was to be determined, their size, etc. The court held that the title had not passed until these acts had been performed, and the judgment of the lower court was therefore reversed. This case cites a number of other cases where the same conclusions are reached.

In the case of Fiddymont v. Johnson, 18 Cal. App. 339, 123 P. 342, the sale was of the baled hay in two barns belonging to the plaintiff at a fixed price per ton. There nothing was to be done, but to weigh the hay, as it was all baled and unconditionally sold. It was properly held that the title passed. In the case of Gianelli v. Globe Grain & Milling Co., 48 Cal. App. 103, 191 P. 720, the hay was all baled, piled in one pile, identified, $6,000 was paid on account, and the insurance on the hay was transferred from the seller to the buyer. The real controversy in that case was over the meaning of the words "f. o. b."; it being claimed by the appellant that the title did not pass until the hay had been delivered f. o. b., cars or at warehouse. This court held that as the property was fully identified the circumstances of the transaction and the agreement evidenced an intent to pass title presently, and that the meaning of the words "f. o. b.," in that case, simply meant that the seller was to deliver the hay at his costs.

In Anderson v. Crisp, 5 Wash. 178, 31 P. 638, 18 L. R. A. 419, the court had before it an agreement for the sale of bricks in a kiln. The rule is there stated as follows:

"Where a vendee had bargained and paid for a quantity of 'merchantable brick,' which brick were to be sorted from a kiln by the vendee, such a sale does not pass the title of the brick to the vendee; it being impossible to determine, before a segregation, not only what particular brick were sold, but what relative portions of the kiln were sold."

The court, in its opinion, makes a clear distinction between cases where a part of a mass of property is sold, which is all of one quality, and cases where the property sold and to be accepted depends upon the quality. In referring to the case of Kimberly v. Patchin, 19 N. Y. 330, 75 Am. Dec. 334, a case having to do with the sale of part of a mass of property of one quality, the Washington court says:

"There it was held, upon a sale of a specific quantity of grain, that its separation from a mass indistinguishable in quality or value, in which it is included, is not necessary to pass the title, when the intention to do so is otherwise clearly manifested. In that case it will be noticed that the goods were indistinguishable in quality or value, and it was upon that particular state of facts that the argument of the court was based. 'It is,' said the court, 'a rule asserted in many legal authorities, but which may be quite as fitly called a rule of reason and logic as of law, that in order to [be] an executed sale, so as to transfer a title from one party to the other, the thing sold must be ascertained. This is a self-evident truth, when applied to those subjects of property which are distinguishable by their physical attributes from all other things, and therefore are capable of exact identification.' * * * But it must be admitted that if all the property in the mass is not of equal value something more does remain to be done. Thus, in the case at bar, another element is injected into the contract, and there is a question of relative values to be yet determined. The appellants did not buy a portion of an indistinguishable mass, where all the component parts were of equal value; but their contract called for 162,000 merchantable brick, and the evidence was that the brick that were deemed unmerchantable were thrown aside and not counted in when they came to haul them. So that it is impossible to determine, before the segregation of the brick, not only what particular brick were sold, but what relative portions of the kiln were sold."

The holding of the Washington court was that, until the brick had been segregated to determine their merchantable quality, title did not pass.

In the case of McLaughlin v. Piatti, 27 Cal. 451, the agreement of sale related to 500 head of cattle out of a herd containing many more, the court said:

"It is a fundamental principle pervading everywhere the doctrine of the sales of chattels that, if goods be sold (while mingled with others) by number, weight, or measure, the sale is incomplete, and the title continues with the seller until the bargained property is separated and identified. * * * In the case under consideration, it could not be said with certainty that any particular 500 head of cattle belonged to Baker, or the plaintiff as his assignee, until a severance of that number from the herd from which they were to be taken."

In the case of Wong Foo v. Southern Pacific Co., 41 Cal. App. 42, 181 P. 823, the agreement read:

"Hop Sing hereby sells to Rourke Company * * * 810 fancy spuds at $1.30 per sack, * * * being that certain lot in ground at Donlon Island, * * * to be delivered f. o. b. bank and shipped to Stockton on or before Monday, next week, 1915, unless otherwise directed by Rourke Company. Must be new sacks, full, open-mouthed, contents properly graded and sorted and * * * to average 116 lbs. to sack."

"In consideration I hereby acknowledge receipt of * * * $1 in part payment of above sale; balance to be paid after receipt of goods in good merchantable condition as above mentioned. It is understood that arrival of goods at Stockton in good condition, as provided above, shall be considered as the time and place for the consummation of this sale."

It was there said:

"These provisions of the agreement were for the purpose of permitting the Rourke Company either to elect to purchase the potatoes if they came up to the required standards, or to reject the same if they failed to measure up thereto. The agreement, therefore, amounted to no more than an executory contract of sale; the title to the property remaining in the vendor."

The court in this case in its findings found that the allegations of the complaint were true, which included the allegation that the rice was identified and that title to said rice passed from the plaintiff to the defendants at the time of the negotiations, to wit, February 15, 1922; but the court also found that the defendants had the right to reject all the rice not equal to the sample, and that the rice was to be graded, which finding brings the case within the rule set forth in the authorities hereinbefore cited that, when it is necessary to grade the property in order to determine what portion thereof passed under the contract and must be accepted by the buyer, title thereto remains in the seller until the segregation and grading has taken place. As we have said, the testimony in this case is silent upon the question of when the title passed, and therefore that question must be determined in the light of the authorities setting forth the rule to be applied and followed in such cases. We do not think it necessary to a determination of this case to discuss that portion of the contract which provides that the rice was to be delivered f. o. b. cars at Proberta station. The fact that the rice to be taken was unsegregated and its quality had to be determined to fix the amount to which the price agreed to be paid should attach and the quantity to be accepted remained undetermined is decisive herein. The judgment of the trial court is reversed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

YOUNG v. FLICKINGER. (Civ. 4099.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 10, 1925.)

Sales 91—Contract held to give purchaser right to reject any part of quantity ordered; "shipment;" "order."

Under contract for sale of two cars of coconut meal, providing that purchaser's rejection "of the whole or part of the shipment will cancel the contract, in proportion, without claim for loss or damage," the purchaser, after accepting and paying for first car, was entitled to cancel his order for the second without liability for breach of contract; the word "shipment" being used as equivalent of "order."

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by R. Young against M. P. Flickinger. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Clafin & Lambert, of Bakersfield, and Fred L. Dreher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff's assignor by reason of defendant's refusal to accept and pay for a carload of coconut meal purchased by defendant. Plaintiff, who was nonsuited in the court below, appeals from the judgment of nonsuit. The appeal turns upon the construction of the written contract for the sale of the meal. The firm of Lewis-Simas-Jones Company, a copartnership, has its principal place of business at San Francisco. Defendant's place of business is in Bakersfield. On May 29, 1920, at Bakersfield, defendant and the copartnership executed a contract which reads:

"Bakersfield, Cal., May 29, 1920.

"Lewis-Simas-Jones Co., 429 Davis Street, San Francisco, confirms sale to M. P. Flickinger on the following terms and conditions:

"Commodity: Cocoanut, new sacks.

"Amount: 2 cars Net Wt.

"Price: $47.00 per ton, f. o. b. San Francisco.

"Quantity:

"Shipment: Oct., 1920, and Dec., 1920.

"Subject to change 2 weeks' notice.

"Payment: 30 days' acceptance.

"Sellers are not responsible for delays or defaults for shipment of the whole or part thereof, arising from strikes, car shortage, wars, revolutions, loss or damage in transit, or any other contingencies beyond their control. Rejection on your part of the whole or part of the shipment will cancel the contract, in proportion, without claim for loss or damage. This contract is not assignable.

"Lewis-Simas-Jones Co.,

"By Fitch."

"Accepted: M. P. Flickinger."

On October 4, 1920, Lewis-Simas-Jones Company shipped the first of the two carloads to defendant, who accepted that carload and paid for it according to the terms of his contract. On November 24, 1920, defendant notified Lewis-Simas-Jones Company that he would not accept the remaining carload, which, under the terms of the contract, was to be shipped, i. e., delivered, to the railroad carrier f. o. b. at San Francisco, in the month of December following. Because of the receipt of this notice, Lewis-Simas-Jones Company made no attempt to ship or to deliver or to tender the second carload, but, claiming to have a cause of action against defendant for breach of the contract on his part, that firm assigned its claim for damages to plaintiff, who later brought this action. The trial court held that the notice given by defendant on November 24, 1920, that he would not accept the second carload was justified by that clause of the contract which reads: "Rejection on your [defendant's] part of the whole or part of the shipment will cancel the contract, in proportion, without claim for loss or damage." It is contended by appellant that by this clause respondent was given no greater right than that of rejecting the whole or a part of the shipment after it had actually been made, and that therefore respondent's notice amounted to an anticipatory breach of his contract.

It is evident that the right given to respondent to reject the shipment, or any part of it, was intended to be much more inclusive than a mere right to reject because of the unsoundness or unmerchantability of the meal. The commodity was inaccessible to an examination by respondent at the time when the contract was entered into. There was therefore an implied warranty on the part of appellant's assignor that the meal, when delivered, should be sound and merchantable. Civ. Code, § 1771. Respondent therefore, quite apart from any right expressly conferred upon him by the contract, would have had the right to reject the whole or any part of the shipment if, upon delivery, it proved to be unsound or unmerchantable. Obviously the contract must have been intended to clothe respondent with a more comprehensive right of rejection than that which the law would have recognized in him had the written instrument been silent upon the subject. It would seem, therefore, that it was the intention of the parties to confer upon respondent the right to reject the whole or any part of the shipment for any bona fide reason whatever. For example, respondent's inability to realize profits on resales, by reason of declining market prices, might constitute a valid ground for the rejection of the shipment. Not only was respondent's right of rejection thus comprehensive, but it also involved the right to "cancel" the contract to the extent that it calls for the rejected shipment or the rejected portion thereof. That is to say, respondent had the right, not merely to reject the shipment or any part thereof, but to do away with the contract to the extent that it calls for the quantity of meal embraced within the rejected shipment or rejected portion thereof. This is precisely what the contract says. It declares that the rejection of the whole or any part of the shipment "will cancel the contract, in proportion." By the rejection of the shipment, or a portion thereof, the contract is canceled pro tanto—canceled in proportion to the amount of meal rejected. As to such rejected amount, the contract is as completely annulled as if it had never been. To "cancel" a contract means to abrogate so much of it as remains unperformed. It differs from "rescission," which means to restore the parties to their former position. The one refers to the state of things at the time of the cancellation; the other to the state of things existing when the contract was made. "The word 'cancel,'" says the court in Winton v. Spring, 18 Cal. 451, "applied to the agreement, under the circumstances, means no more than 'doing away with' an existing agreement upon the terms and with the consequences mentioned in the writing."

But, says appellant, even if the clause in question does recognize a right to reject the shipment for any cause whatever, thereby canceling the contract, or canceling it pro tanto, respondent must wait until the shipment has actually been made ere he can exercise his right to reject it or a part of it. Wherefore it is claimed that the notice that the second carload would not be accepted, given, as it was, before the arrival of the time for shipping that carload, was a breach of respondent's contract to purchase two carloads of meal. This argument is plausible, but by no means convincing. It is true that in its primary sense the verb "reject," as its derivation indicates (re, back or again, and jacere, to throw), means to cast from one; to throw away; to discard. See Webster's Dictionary. It also is true that, in conformity with this root meaning of the verb, the noun "rejection" has been defined as a failure to accept; the repudiation of an offer. 34 Cyc. 1036. This being the primary meaning, there doubtless would have been ground for holding that the word "rejection" meant the refusal to accept the shipment after it had been started on its journey, or after it had been tendered for acceptance, if that word had stood in isolation in the contract, or if it would have been proper to consider it apart from the situation and evident purpose of the parties. But here the word does not stand in isolation; and it is evident that the parties intended that the right to reject should include more than is ordinarily connoted by the word "rejection." The right which is given to respondent by this contract is not merely a right to reject the shipment or any part thereof. It includes the further right to cancel the contract itself in so far as it calls for the quantity of meal which respondent elects to reject. Moreover, respondent, as we have shown, could exercise his right of rejection and his right to cancel the contract pro tanto for any and every valid reason. If, then, he was determined to exercise the right, and the circumstances warranted its exercise, what could it boot either party to wait until the shipment had been made, and the expense of delivering the meal to the carrier had been incurred, before respondent exercised his right to reject the shipment and to cancel the contract therefor? Surely it was not within the contemplation of the parties that so vain a thing should be done, if, when it had been done, it would have to be undone at the expense of the shipper; and undone it would have to be if respondent delayed exercising his undoubted right of rejection and cancellation until after the shipment had been made.

It is for these reasons that the writer of this opinion concludes that respondent was well within his right when he gave notice on November 24, 1920, that he would not accept the second carload of meal. It follows, therefore, that the motion for nonsuit was properly granted.

The judgment is affirmed.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment, but I think the conclusion should be reached upon reasoning different from that which appears in the opinion of the presiding justice. The crucial sentence of the contract, in the light of the question before us, reads: "Rejection on your part of the whole or part of the shipment will cancel the contract, in proportion, without claim for loss or damage." I think the parties intended the word "shipment" as the equivalent of the word "order," and that the sentence should be read accordingly. The word "shipment" has a well-understood ordinary meaning, there is no doubt, but I think it is sufficiently elastic to be employed as a synonym for the word "order." That the parties to the contract intended so to wrench the word they used from its usual significance is plain to me upon several considerations. Surely there was here but one order, split for convenience into two parts by the language: "Shipment: Oct. 1920, and Dec. 1920." There having been but one order the parties must have had that order—the entire order—in mind when they employed in the crucial sentence the expression "the shipment." If they had intended the word last mentioned in its ordinary sense, they would have written "a shipment," or "either shipment," or "any shipment."

Further, the contract throughout bears inherent evidence of having been formulated by the filling out of a stock form, but this fact particularly appears from the manner in which, at the left margin of the instrument, the following words appear, each standing in column below its predecessor: "Commodity," "Amount," "Price," "Quantity," "Shipment," and "Payment." It will be observed that nothing was written after "Quantity," as that expression stands in the margin. This circumstance alone is sufficient to stamp the instrument as one made by filling out a stock form. Considering the paper as one so drawn, we inspect more narrowly the language: "Shipment: Oct. 1920, and Dec. 1920." Suppose respondent had purchased but one carload of coconut meal, or that the two carloads actually bought were intended to have been "shipped" at one and the same time. The form employed by the seller would then have been filled thus: "Shipment: Oct. 1920," if we may assume that to have been the time agreed upon. Under such circumstances there can be no doubt that the word "shipment," where it appears in the crucial sentence of the contract, would have been the equivalent of the word "order." I cannot perceive that it should have a different meaning, as the actual instrument stands, merely because two dates were inserted after the expression "Shipment" where it appears in column in the margin.

Finally, the contract is more logical if the crucial sentence be read: "Rejection on your part of the whole or part of the order will cancel the contract, in proportion, without claim for loss or damage." This argument interlocks with that above advanced concerning the use by the parties of the word "the" before the word "shipment." Not only, taking the entire phraseology of the contract, does the word "order" fit perfectly the word "the," but the agreement in its entirety seems more consonant with sense if the word "order" be read in the place of the word "shipment." As there was but one order, I can see no good reason for so reading the crucial sentence of the contract as if its terms were to be effective twice—first, to the first carload; second, to the second carload. Such a construction of the sentence is based upon a slavish submission to what, it must be confessed, is the usual and ordinary meaning of the word "shipment." The shackles of such a submission are broken if we attribute to the word the meaning above suggested. It cannot be said that it does not readily lend itself to that meaning. I am convinced that the parties so intended it.

If we so read the crucial sentence of the contract the sole point advanced by appellant at once falls to the ground. The point is stated thus in the opinion of the presiding justice: "It is contended by appellant that by this clause"—what I have termed the crucial sentence of the contract—"respondent was given no greater right than that of rejecting the whole or a part of the shipment after it had actually been made, and that therefore respondent's notice amounted to an anticipatory breach of his contract." With the construction which I would place upon the crucial sentence, this contention is disposed of without the necessity of argument. With that contention respondent's rejection of the coconut meal came in the midst of the attempted delivery to him of the full quantity called for by the contract. The fact that it came before the making of the second shipment, taking that word now in its usual and ordinary sense, becomes an utterly immaterial circumstance.

CONELAND WATER CO. v. NICKALLS.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 16, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 11, 1926.)

1. Parties $\S$ 7(2)—Water company, agent and trustee for land company, is trustee of express trust, and may sue without joining land company.

If water company is agent and trustee of land company who owns all its capital stock, then water company is trustee of an express trust, and, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 369, is authorized to sue without joining the beneficiary, for adjudication of rights and duties under contract to furnish water for irrigation.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1036(3)—Rights of defendant not prejudiced by denial of motion to make land company, owning all stock of water company, party to suit to establish rights under water contract.

In action by water company to establish rights and duties under contract to furnish water for irrigation, defendant was not prejudiced by denial of motion to make land company, who owned all capital stock of water corporation, party, since both companies are bound by acts of either.

3. Reformation of instruments $\S$ 36(2)—Party seeking reformation must allege intended meaning and intended legal consequences.

While under Civ. Code, $\S$ 3401, in reforming a written instrument, the court is not confined to inquiry as to what language was intended to be, as it is limited to inquiry as to intended meaning and intended legal consequences, they must be alleged.

4. Evidence $\S$ 441(1)—Written contract, certain in terms, cannot be modified by contemporaneous oral agreement in conflict therewith.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1856, Civ. Code, $\S$ 1625, a written contract which is certain in its terms cannot be modified by contemporaneous oral agreement in direct conflict therewith.

5. Contracts $\hookrightarrow$ 170(1)—Conduct will be looked to in aid of construction only in relation to contracts which are uncertain or of doubtful construction on face.

It is only in relation to contracts that are uncertain or of doubtful construction on their face that conduct is to be looked to in aid of construction, and, where terms are plain and certain, court will be guided by language used.

6. Vendor and purchaser $\hookrightarrow$ 37(1)—Purchaser not justified in relying on advertising booklet in conflict with terms of contract.

Purchaser of land was not justified in relying upon statement in advertising booklet that company guaranteed certain amount of water, where by simple arithmetical computation he could have determined discrepancy between such amount and amount called for in contract.

7. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 441(8)—Vendor not estopped from standing upon terms of written contract by oral promises and representations.

In absence of fraud or mistake, vendor was not estopped to stand upon terms of written instrument, describing amount of water purchaser was entitled to for irrigation purposes by oral promises and representations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by the Coneland Water Company against Thomas R. Nickalls. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

Richard C. Harrison and Albert E. Chandler, both of San Francisco, and W. P. Johnson, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action for an adjudication of its rights and duties under its contract with defendant to furnish him water for the irrigation of his land, consisting of 20 acres. The contract, executed September 29, 1908, is attached to the complaint and made a part thereof. It has been held that the plaintiff is not a public utility and is not subject to the rate-fixing jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. McCullagh v. Railroad Commission, 190 Cal. 13, 210 P. 264. The parts of the contract material to the questions arising on this appeal are as follows:

"The party of the first part agrees to furnish to the party of the second part not exceeding at any time four inches of water during the irrigating season of the year. * * * An inch of water is understood to mean 14,000 gallons in 24 hours."

The complaint contains the usual averments in actions for declaratory relief. It is alleged therein that the defendant claims to be entitled to the use of a greater quantity of water than that specified in the contract, and that such claim is without right. The defendant filed an answer and a cross-complaint, the plaintiff's demurrers to which were sustained by the court. The defendant thereafter filed an amended answer and cross-complaint, to which the plaintiff demurred, and the court sustained the demurrers without leave to amend. A trial was thereafter had, the defendant not appearing, and judgment was entered establishing the rights of the parties in accordance with the terms of the contract. This appeal is from the judgment so entered. The amended answer and cross-complaint cover 33 pages of the printed transcript, and are therefore too long to be set out at length. The issues raised by the answer and cross-complaint will be stated separately in connection with the discussion thereof.

[1, 2] The answer alleges that the Los Molinos Land Company at all times mentioned therein was and is now the owner of all the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation, and that plaintiff at all times has been and is now "the agent and trustee of Los Molinos Land Company, holding for it the naked legal title to said properties." The defendant moved the court for an order making the Los Molinos Land Company a party to the action. The motion was denied, and appellant assigns the ruling as error. If the allegations of the answer and cross-complaint are true, the plaintiff is a trustee of an express trust of which the Los Molinos Land Company is the beneficiary. In matters relating to the trust, the plaintiff was authorized to sue without joining with it the beneficiary. Code Civ. Proc. § 369. The defendant had the right to set up in his answer or cross-complaint any defense or cause of action relating to the trust property which he could have set up against the Los Molinos Land Company. Kelley-Clarke Co. v. Leslie, 61 Cal. App. 559, 215 P. 699. His rights, therefore, were not prejudiced by the denial of his motion to make that company a party. Since, if the allegations of the answer are true, both the Los Molinos Land Company and the plaintiff are bound by the acts of either, the word "plaintiff" will be used to designate both or either of them.

It appears from the answer that, at the time the defendant purchased the land in question from plaintiff, it was not under irrigation, but was "raw and semiarid" land, of "little value without irrigation"; that defendant agreed to purchase said land and pay $100 an acre for the same with a water right; that J. D. Sherwood was fully authorized to represent plaintiff; that in September, 1908, the defendant tendered the full purchase price of the land to Sherwood; that Sherwood thereupon offered to deliver to defendant a deed to the land and the contract alleged in the complaint; that the defendant "had no knowledge of irrigation and no knowledge or experience as to the quantity of water necessary to properly irrigate lands in the Sacramento valley or elsewhere, and had no means of acquiring such knowledge, and so informed said Sherwood at the time, and further informed said Sherwood that defendant would not sign said water right agreement or purchase said lands unless the same conveyed an adequate water right"; that "thereupon it was represented to defendant by said Sherwood * * * that one-fifth of one miner's inch of water per acre per season was believed by said water company and said land company to be an adequate water right for said lands for the growing and maturing of any and all crops which said land was adapted to produce; that said companies were not as yet fully informed as (to) the quantity of water per acre which was actually necessary to irrigate the lands they were colonizing, including defendant's lands, but that, if said quantity of water would prove to be insufficient to properly irrigate said lands, as aforesaid, said companies would deliver to defendant and to all of their colonists such additional quantity of water, without additional charge or expense to defendant, as should be proved by demonstration and practice to be necessary to properly irrigate his said lands, and that it was the intention of said companies to convey to defendant and to all of their colonists an adequate and sufficient quantity of water to properly irrigate their lands; that, if defendant accepted said deed and executed and accepted said water right agreement, the quantity of water he would be entitled to receive, and would receive thereunder, would be the quantity of water actually required to benefit said tracts of land;" that defendant believed said representations to be true, "and believed that one-fifth of one miner's inch of water * * * was a sufficient quantity of water to beneficially irrigate his said lands, and, in reliance upon said representations, executed and accepted said water right agreement, and paid the full purchase price for said lands"; that "through the mutual mistake of the parties thereto, and said land company, said water right agreement does not truly express the intention of the parties in this, that plaintiff and defendant and said Los Molinos Land Company, at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed and water right agreement, * * * believed that 4 inches of water during the irrigating season of the year was an abundance of water to beneficially irrigate said 20 acres of land * * * and all crops which said land was adapted to grow, including crops of alfalfa, whereas said quantity of water is not sufficient" therefor; that "8 inches of water delivered during the irrigating season of the year is the smallest quantity of water which will properly or beneficially irrigate said 20 acres of land, and defendant alleges that 8 inches of water instead of 4 inches of water during the irrigating season of the year is the quantity of water which plaintiff and said land company have annually delivered to defendant, and which defendant has annually used in irrigating said land prior to April 1, 1923, and said quantity of water has been demanded by and delivered to defendant as of right for the 14 years next preceding the year 1923, in accordance with the true intent and meaning of said water right agreement"; that "defendant did not discover said mistake until subsequent to April 1, 1923, and could not with reasonable diligence sooner have discovered the same"; that "said Los Molinos Land Company and Coneland Water Company have uniformly interpreted said water right agreement during the 14 years last past in accordance with the mutual understanding and agreement between defendant and said Los Molinos Land Company and Coneland Water Company at the time of the purchase of said land, as aforesaid"; that the land company and the water company "have uniformly and for more than 15 years last past placed a similar interpretation upon all the water right agreements issued by them to purchasers of lands from said land company, and have delivered the quantity of water required for the beneficial and proper irrigation of said lands to the owners thereof as a matter of right, * * * and have uniformly and generally represented to purchasers and prospective purchasers and to the general public by means of letters, advertisements in newspapers, and printed matter prepared by them, that a full and complete water right was conveyed with every parcel of land sold."

[3, 4] Appellant contends that the foregoing alleged facts show such a mutual mistake of the parties as to entitle him to a judgment reforming the contract by substituting 8 inches of water for the 4 inches specified therein. It is not alleged that anything was embodied in or omitted from the contract through mistake or that any term thereof was intended or understood to mean anything different from the plain meaning of the terms used. Appellant relies upon the case of F. P. Cutting Co. v. Petersen, 164 Cal. 44, 49, 127 P. 163, 165, wherein it is said:

"The fact that no word was inserted which the parties did not intend to insert and none omitted which they did intend to insert or supposed had been inserted, does not prevent the application of the rule, nor make it any the less a case of mistake."

The contract involved in that case contained the following provision:

"The above prices guaranteed against the California Fruit Canneries Association opening printed prices for the season of 1908."

Contrary to the expectation of the parties and its prior practice, the association did not print the opening prices which it thereafter established for the season of 1908. It clearly appeared at the trial that the provision quoted was intended to refer to the general market prices to be fixed by the association, and that the word "printed" was used to exclude occasional or special prices as a standard. In that case it was alleged that such provision was inserted in the contract with the intention that the "guaranty should protect this defendant against any prices which might be made on said goods by said California Fruit Canneries Association for said season of 1908." The answer in this case contains no similar allegation. The parties had in mind that 4 inches of water might be insufficient to properly irrigate the land, because it was orally agreed that more water would be supplied if necessary.

"In revising a written instrument, the court may inquire what the instrument was intended to mean, and what were intended to be its legal consequences, and is not confined to the inquiry what the language of the instrument was intended to be." Civ. Code, § 3401.

The last clause in the section was not intended to neutralize the other provisions thereof, but, while the court is not confined in such a case "to the inquiry, what the language of the instrument was intended to be," it is limited to the inquiry, "what the instrument was intended to mean, and what were intended to be its legal consequences," and a party seeking a reformation of the instrument must so allege. National Bank v. Exchange Nat. Bank, 186 Cal. 172, 181, 199 P. 1; Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 542, 166 P. 808; Horton v. Winbiger, 175 Cal. 149, 154, 165 P. 423; Auerbach v. Healy, 174 Cal. 60, 161 P. 1157. The foregoing allegations show no more than an oral agreement which was not embodied or intended to be inserted in the written contract executed by the parties. A written contract which is certain in its terms cannot be modified by a contemporaneous oral agreement in direct conflict therewith. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Civ. Code, § 1625; Pacific States Securities Co. v. Steiner, 192 Cal. 376, 220 P. 304.

[5] The answer alleges that for 14 years the plaintiff has supplied the defendant with "the quantity of water required for the beneficial and proper irrigation" of his land. Appellant says:

"There are many cases holding, in substance, that when the terms of a contract are in dispute the practical interpretation placed thereon by the parties before the controversy arose is controlling."

"It is only in relation to contracts that are uncertain, or of doubtful construction on their face, that conduct is to be looked to in aid of construction. Where the terms are plain and certain, the court will be guided by the language used and construe the intention of the parties to have been in accordance with their agreement." 6 Cal. Jur. 306; Jameson v. Chanslor-Canfield M. Oil Co., 176 Cal. 1, 8, 167 P. 369.

In the second count of the answer and in the cross-complaint, the foregoing facts and those to follow are pleaded as an estoppel. It is alleged therein that, at the time of the execution of the contract, the plaintiff "represented that said water right agreement was intended to convey to defendant the quantity of water required by his said lands for the beneficial irrigation thereof, and that the specifying of a definite quantity of water therein was really done to prevent colonists upon said company's lands from taking advantage of said land company and demanding and using more water than necessary, to the injury of other colonists on said lands"; that "plaintiff and said land company further represented that they had an abundance of water for all of their lands and a full and adequate water right was sold with every parcel of land sold by them, including the lands sold to defendant"; that "defendant would not have purchased said lands had he known he was not securing a water right sufficient to beneficially irrigate the same"; that "defendant prepared his said lands and planted the same to alfalfa at great expense upon the advice of Los Molinos Land Company"; that "defendant has made valuable and extensive improvements on said lands, in reliance upon the representations of plaintiff and Los Molinos Land Company that said water right agreement conveyed an adequate water right"; that "during the year 1912 defendant moved upon said lands and has made his home thereon ever since, and has made improvements thereon of the value of $4,000, and has leveled and checked and sowed about 18 acres thereof to alfalfa, and has planted and grown valuable fruit trees and shade trees thereon"; that "a short time prior to the time defendant moved upon and personally began to farm said lands said Los Molinos Land Company represented to defendant, in a printed booklet issued by it and delivered to defendant, as follows:

"All the Water You Want.

"Is there plenty of water for irrigation? All you can use in the dryest season. We guarantee to cover every acre 38 inches deep during the year. In addition there is 25 inches of annual rainfall, making 63 inches of water available for the land altogether, or over 5 acre feet.

"Has the company enough water to supply 38 inches of water to each settler? We have almost exclusive water rights on the Los Molinos river and additional water rights on Antelope creek. Measurements taken by the government on these streams for several years during the lowest flowage show that we have a great abundance of water for all our land.

"Is the water measured out for the landowner and must he give notice when he desires to use it? The company reserves the right to measure the water so as to protect everybody. If one user took ten times his share, some one else might be short. Notice is also necessary, if the company requires it. In practice, everybody is using all the water he wants whenever he wants it."

It is further alleged that "38 inches of water per acre per year are equivalent to two-fifths of one miner's inch per acre, or 8 inches of water delivered during the irrigating season of the year"; and that "defendant did not discover until subsequent to April 1, 1923, that said pamphlet specified a greater quantity of water than that provided in said water right agreement."

[6] By a simple arithmetical computation, the defendant, who alleges that he "had followed contracting and building as a business," could have ascertained that a constant flow of 4 inches of water, or 56,000 gallons a day, for a year, would equal in quantity a depth of about 38 inches of water over all of his land, or half that quantity if the flow continued for but 6 months. The defendant, therefore, was not "permissibly" ignorant of the discrepancy between the booklet and the contract, if it may be said that there is a discrepancy. Having a convenient and ready means of ascertaining the truth, the defendant was not justified in relying upon the statement contained in the booklet. 10 Cal. Jur. 636; Wood v. Blaney, 107 Cal. 291, 295, 40 P. 428; Champion v. Woods, 79 Cal. 17, 20, 21 P. 534, 12 Am. St. Rep. 126; Faulkner v. Bank of Italy (Cal. App.) 231 P. 380, 383; Robbins v. Law, 48 Cal. App. 555, 562, 192 P. 118.

[7] In each alleged defense in the answer, and in each cause of action attempted to be stated in the cross-complaint, it is alleged that at the time the contract was executed the plaintiff stated, through its representative, that it did not know but believed that the quantity of water mentioned in the agreement was sufficient to properly irrigate defendant's land, but that, if it should prove insufficient, the plaintiff would furnish such quantity as might be necessary, and that plaintiff subsequently represented that it would furnish all the water that was required. Such promises and representations are in direct conflict with the written agreement to furnish "not exceeding at any time 4 inches of water." Since the defendant knew the terms of his contract, he was not justified in relying upon promises and representations in necessary conflict with the express provisions thereof. To hold that such promises and representations estop plaintiff from standing upon the certain terms of the written contract, in the absence of fraud or of mistake as to the meaning thereof, would be to vary the terms of the written agreement by parol evidence.

Without giving any consideration in the decision of this case to the facts stated in McCullagh v. Railroad Commission, supra, it is deemed proper to state, in justice to plaintiff, that such facts explain the reasons which actuated plaintiff in supplying defendant and others with more water than it had agreed to furnish. It therein appears that from the time the Railroad Commission was established in 1911 to October, 1922, when the McCullagh Case was decided, the plaintiff acted upon the assumption that it was a public utility and subject to the regulation and control of the commission in the distribution of water and the rates it was entitled to collect therefor, and that the commission so held. In the McCullagh Case it was decided that the plaintiff is not a public utility, but is bound by its contracts with the users of water. The plaintiff thereafter appears to have proceeded upon the theory that, being itself so bound, the water users were likewise bound by the terms of their contracts with it.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO
v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SAN MATEO COUNTY et al. (S. F. 11774.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 28, 1925.)

1. New trial ⇨163(1)—New trial may lawfully be granted only by order of court.

A new trial may lawfully be granted only by an order of court, as distinguished from an order of a judge.

2. New trial ⇨163(1)—Elements essential to lawful rendition of order of court for new trial stated.

To constitute lawful rendition of an order of court for a new trial, there must be an application therefor by a motion or otherwise, in a pending action or proceeding, addressed to a court having jurisdiction of parties and subject-matter thereof, on notice to adverse party, or equivalent thereof, unless notice is waived, and hearing thereon in open court, or an opportunity for such hearing, at which both parties are, or have been, afforded an opportunity to be present and heard.

3. New trial ⇨163(1) — Order granting new trial may be rendered in open court or by filing of order with clerk, signed by judge.

When all elements antecedent to an order granting a new trial have been duly performed, and issue after a hearing thereon duly had has been submitted to court for decision, court's order may be rendered, either by a pronouncement in open court, or by filing with clerk of a written order of court signed by judge.

4. New trial ⇨163(1)—Filing with clerk constitutes rendition of order granting new trial.

Where order granting new trial is made by filing with clerk a written order of court, signed by judge, it is the filing which constitutes rendition thereof.

5. Judgment ⇨218—May be rendered notwithstanding act of signing was performed by judge in another county than that in which action was pending.

Where an action has been duly tried and submitted to court for decision, its judgment therein may be rendered by filing in action of written findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment, authenticated by signature of trial judge, notwithstanding act of signing same was performed by judge in another county than that in which action was pending.

6. New trial ⇨163(1) — Rendition of order granting new trial by mail from judge presiding in another county held lawful.

Where all elements antecedent to an order for new trial had been duly performed, and issue after a hearing thereon had been submitted to court for its decision, rendition within statutory time for deciding motion by presiding judge, who regularly presided in another county, while in such county, by mailing to clerk of superior court in which action was tried a written order granting motion, signed by himself as judge of such court, clerk, within time required by Code Civ. Proc. § 660, having filed such order and entered in minutes of court a notation that motion was granted, held lawful.

Application for a writ of prohibition by the United Railroads of San Francisco against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Mateo and another. Writ denied.

Wm. M. Abbott and K. W. Cannon, both of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City (Ivores R. Dains, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

Hugo D. Newhouse and Russell P. Tyler, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, C. J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondents from proceeding with the trial of a civil action which purports to be pending before the respondent court. There is no dispute as to the facts. The sole controversy herein relates to the legal conclusions incident thereto. A trial was had in the respondent court of the action of G. L. Wilkinson, as adm., etc., plaintiff, v. United Railroads of San Francisco, a corporation, defendant, resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant. Thereafter an order was made granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, from which order the defendant prosecuted an appeal. After several hearings upon appeal both in the District Court of Appeal and in this court, a decision and judgment was finally rendered by this court affirming the order granting the new trial. Wilkinson v. United Railroads, 232 P. 131. Upon the going down of the remittitur the plaintiff in said action regularly moved the court to have the action again set for trial, which motion was opposed by the defendant therein, petitioner herein, upon the ground that the order which purported to grant the motion for a new trial was utterly void for the reason that it was not made in open court. After a hearing upon that motion and the objections thereto, the trial court announced that it would overrule the objections and would proceed to set the cause for retrial, and thereupon the defendant petitioned this court for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the trial court from taking any further proceedings in said action. The essential facts upon which this petition is predicated may be outlined as follows: The trial of the action in the superior court in and for the county of San Mateo was had before Hon. John L. Hudner, judge of the superior court in and for the county of San Benito, who presided therein upon the request of the resident judge of the superior court of San Mateo county. After the return of the verdict and rendition of judgment thereon in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff regularly and within due time moved for a new trial. This motion was argued and submitted in open court in San Mateo county before Judge Hudner, presiding as the judge of said court. The motion, having been fully argued in open court, was submitted for consideration and decision, and Judge Hudner thereupon returned to his home in San Benito county. Thereafter and within the statutory time for deciding the motion, Judge Hudner, while in San Benito county, mailed to the clerk of the superior court in and for the county of San Mateo a written order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, signed by himself as judge of said court, together with a letter requesting that the said order be filed. The clerk thereupon and within the statutory time for the decision of said motion filed said order, and entered in the minutes of the court a notation thereof as follows:

(Title of Court and Cause.) "May 4, 1922. Present: Hon. Jno. L. Hudner, Judge.

"The hearing on the motion for a new trial of the above-entitled cause having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and now the court, having considered the same and being fully advised, renders the following decision:

"Motion for new trial granted. Opinion filed. "Recorded May 9, 1922."

This is the order from which the appeal was prosecuted which resulted in the affirmance thereof as hereinbefore related.

[1, 2] It is the contention of the petitioner that an order granting a new trial is one which cannot be made by a judge at chambers, but can be made only by the court; that under the facts hereof the court failed to take any action upon the motion for new trial, and that the purported order granting the same, not having been made in open court, is utterly void and of no effect for any purpose, from which it follows that no validity could be imparted thereto by the decision of this court purporting to affirm the same. In support of this contention petitioner relies chiefly upon the cases of Shepherd v. Superior Court, 54 Cal. App. 673, 202 P. 466, and Finkle v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 234 P. 432. We are of the opinion that each of those cases was correctly decided upon the facts involved therein, but, as to the points necessary to be decided and actually decided therein, neither is authority for petitioner's contention herein. In the Shepherd Case the power of the court to grant the motion under the limitations of section 660, Code of Civil Procedure, expired at noon on Saturday, April 2. Between 3 and 4 o'clock on the afternoon of that day, the trial judge telephoned from his residence to his courtroom clerk, who was then at his own home, to enter an order granting the motion for a new trial. This order was not entered by the clerk until the following Monday morning, April 5. We agree with the conclusion of the Court of Appeal in that case that a new trial can be granted only by an order of court, and that no such order was made therein until after the power of the court to make it had expired by reason of the statutory limitation. In the Finkle Case the action had been tried in the superior court of San Bernardino county before Hon. J. A. Smith, judge of the superior court of Calaveras county, presiding therein. The motion for new trial having been duly made, argued, and submitted in the superior court for San Bernardino county, thereafter Judge Smith at Calaveras county signed a written order, purporting to grant the new trial, on May 5, which was the last day allowed by the statute for acting upon the motion. This order was mailed by Judge Smith to the county clerk of San Bernardino county, but was not received or filed by the latter until May 7, which was two days after the power to grant the motion had expired. The court of appeal correctly held that the motion for new trial had not been granted within the time allowed by law, and must be deemed to have been denied by force of the statute. There is no question but that a new trial may lawfully be granted only by an order of court as distinguished from an order of a judge, or, as we say, an order "at chambers." It may perhaps be doubted that there is any fundamental distinction between these two other than this: That an order of court may lawfully be made only upon notice, whereas an order at chambers may be made ex parte. Without attempting to decide this question, it will be appropriate to consider what elements are essential to the lawful rendition of an order of court. It may be conceded that there must be an application therefor, by motion or otherwise, in a pending action or proceeding, addressed to a court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter thereof, upon notice to the adverse party or the equivalent thereof (unless notice is waived), and a hearing thereon in open court (or at least an opportunity for such hearing), at which both parties are or have been accorded an opportunity to be present and to be heard. All of these elements were admittedly present in the matter of the granting of the motion for new trial herein. The action was pending in the respondent court, which had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, the notice of intention to move for a new trial was duly and regularly served and filed within the time prescribed by law, the motion was brought on for hearing pursuant to due and sufficient notice thereof, the hearing thereof was had in open court, both parties being present thereat, the merits of the motion were fully argued, pro and con, and the matter submitted to the court for its decision. It remains to consider what physical acts were necessary to be done in order to constitute the rendition of an order of court upon that motion under those circumstances.

[3-6] While petitioner's counsel have not said so in so many words, the conclusion is implicit in their argument that, in order to render a lawful order of court granting or denying the motion for new trial under those circumstances, it was necessary for the respondent judge to betake himself to the courtroom in which the hearing had been had and there mount the bench and formally and audibly pronounce an order granting the motion for a new trial, and that by no other method could such an order be lawfully rendered. We do not subscribe to this view. We are of the opinion that, when all of the elements antecedent to such an order have been duly performed, and when the issue after a hearing thereon duly had has been submitted to the court for its decision, the order of the court thereon may be rendered in either one of two ways: (1) By the pronouncement thereof in open court in the manner above suggested; or (2) by the filing with the clerk in the action of a written order of court signed by the judge. Of course, when the latter method is followed, the signing of the order by the judge does not constitute its rendition; neither does the act of sending it or mailing it to the clerk. It is the filing of the written order, authenticated by the signature of the judge, which constitutes the rendition thereof. It follows that in the Finkle Case, supra, the order purporting to grant the new trial was not rendered until after the power of the court to act thereon had expired. In the Shepherd Case, supra, an order granting a new trial was never rendered. The matter still remained "in the breast of the court" when its power to act thereon expired by statutory limitation. It has been an unbroken rule of decision in this state for nearly 50 years past that, where an action has been duly tried and submitted to the court for decision, the judgment of the court therein may be rendered by the filing in the action of written findings of fact, conclusions of law and judgment, authenticated by the signature of the trial judge, notwithstanding the act of signing the same was performed by the judge in another county than that in which the action was pending. Comstock Q. M. Co. v. Superior Court, 57 Cal. 625; Walter v. Merced Academy Ass'n, 126 Cal. 582, 59 P. 136; Estudillo v. Security Loan, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 66, 109 P. 884. See, also, In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 221, 16 P. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146; Baker v. Brickell, 102 Cal. 620, 623, 36 P. 950; Powell v. Mohr, (Cal. App.) 230 P. 27; and Hamblin v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 233 P. 337.

We perceive no distinction and no basis for a distinction in this behalf between the rendition of a judgment and the rendition of an order of court. The precise question here presented was involved in the case of Martin v. Superior Court (S. F. 11535), decided by us without opinion on March 9, 1925. That was an application for a writ of certiorari to review and annul an order of the superior court of the county of Mono purporting to grant a new trial of an action pending in that court. The order purporting to grant the new trial was signed by the trial judge while in the city and county of San Francisco and forwarded by mail to the clerk of the superior court of Mono county. It was filed by the latter within the time limited by Code of Civil Procedure, 660, and the petitioner therein contended that it was void for the same reasons which are urged in behalf of the petitioner herein. We were of the opinion that the filing in the action of the order signed by the trial judge granting the new trial constituted a lawful rendition of such order as an order of court, and for this reason we denied the application for the writ.

The conclusion which we have reached renders it unnecessary to give further consideration to respondents' contentions that petitioner should not be permitted to impeach the record upon this collateral attack; that the validity of the order, being a matter involved in and which could have been litigated upon the appeal, is res adjudicata; and that the petitioner had and still has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

The alternative writ heretofore issued herein is discharged and the application for a peremptory writ denied.

I. Negligence — 83—Elements of doctrine of "last clear chance," stated.

To invoke doctrine of "last clear chance," plaintiff must have been put in a dangerous situation as a result of her own negligence, from which she could not escape by exercise of ordinary care, and defendant, being aware of plaintiff's dangerous situation and her inability to escape therefrom, must have had a clear chance of avoiding injury by exercise of ordinary care, and failed to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Last Clear Chance.]

2. Negligence ⚡83—Physical impossibility to escape from danger not necessary in doctrine of last clear chance.

To apply doctrine of last clear chance, it is not necessary that plaintiff show physical impossibility of escaping from threatened danger; it being sufficient if plaintiff was wholly unaware of danger and hence unable to escape, but on becoming aware of danger plaintiff must thereafter exercise ordinary care to protect herself.

3. Negligence ⚡83—Test of last clear chance stated.

The test of last clear opportunity of avoiding the accident is whether, when both plaintiff and defendant have been guilty of negligence causing accident, the plaintiff has ceased to have any power to prevent it and defendant still retains the power of preventing it by exercise of ordinary care.

4. Street railroads ⚡117(35)—Negligence under doctrine of last clear chance held for jury.

In action for injury from being struck by street car, whether plaintiff was in such a situation, after becoming aware of threatened danger, that she could not by exercise of ordinary care have escaped, and whether motorman knew of plaintiff's situation and could have avoided accident by exercise of ordinary care but negligently failed to do so, were questions for jury.

5. Appeal and error ⚡1002—Conflict of evidence resolved in favor of prevailing party and not disturbed on appeal.

Verdict for plaintiff in personal injury action impliedly resolves conflict in evidence in plaintiff's favor, which conclusion cannot be disturbed by Supreme Court.

6. Street railroads ⚡114(19)—Evidence held to show railroad failed to avail itself of last clear chance to avoid injuring pedestrian.

In action for damages by plaintiff, a woman 67 years old and deaf, struck by street car on congested street, evidence held to sustain verdict for plaintiff on theory that defendant failed to avail itself of last clear chance to avoid injuring plaintiff.

7. Street railroads ⚡103(2)—Pedestrian being negligently in path of car held not to justify motorman in waiting until last moment before endeavoring to avoid accident.

In action by pedestrian for damages from being struck by street car, the mere fact that plaintiff was negligently in path of on-coming car did not justify defendant's motorman in waiting until last moment before endeavoring to avoid accident, but, being aware of plaintiff's position, it was incumbent on motorman to exert all reasonable means to avoid striking plaintiff.

8. Street railroads ⚡114(19)—Evidence held to show pedestrian used reasonable care to escape threatened danger.

In action by pedestrian for damages from being struck by street car, evidence held sufficient to support implied finding that plaintiff exercised such reasonable care to extricate herself on becoming aware of threatened danger as was required under the circumstances.

9. Street railroads ⚡114(19)—Evidence held to show motorman could have avoided accident by promptness in applying brakes.

In action for damages from being struck by street car, evidence held to show that motorman could have avoided accident after knowledge of plaintiff's danger by reasonable promptness in applying brakes.

10. Street railroads ⚡114(19)—Evidence held to show motorman's knowledge of pedestrian's peril.

In action by pedestrian for damages from being struck by street car, evidence held to warrant inference that defendant's motorman knew of plaintiff's perilous position, making doctrine of last clear chance applicable.

11. Witnesses ⚡211(2)—Refusal of physician to testify as to patient's infirmities held proper, in absence of waiver of patient's privilege.

Where physician testified that his patient was physically unable to attend court as a witness to lay foundation for introduction of witness' deposition, it was not error to sustain refusal by physician to testify as to his patient's infirmities, in absence of express or implied waiver of privilege by patient under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4.

12. Witnesses ⚡219(4)—Immunity of physician from examination as to infirmities of patient held to be personal privilege of patient.

Immunity of physician from being examined in civil action as to information acquired in attending patient, granted by Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, is a personal privilege given to patient which no one, except in certain specified cases, has right to waive for him.

13. Witnesses ⚡208(2)—Rule of privilege between physician and patient applies, though patient is not a party to action in which disclosure is sought.

Privilege of patient to have his physician exempt from examination as to information acquired while attending patient applies, though patient is not party to action in which a disclosure is sought and is not present to object.

14. Witnesses ⚡219(5)—Deposition by patient held not to waive privilege of not having physician examined as to his infirmities.

Where physician testified that his patient was physically unable to be a witness at the trial, deposition by patient did not thereby waive his privilege, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, not to have physician examined as to patient's infirmities.

15. Evidence ⚡539½(2) — On showing that witness' knowledge was ample to testify to opinion as to distance in which car could be stopped, question as to degree of his knowledge goes to weight, not admissibility.

Where witness showed ample knowledge of street grade and street car to entitle his opinion as to distance in which street car could be stopped to go to the jury, question of degree of his knowledge goes to weight, not admissibility, of his evidence.

16. Appeal and error ⇨971(2)—Evidence ⇨546—Qualification of witness as expert for trial court; if no abuse of discretion, ruling as to qualification of expert not disturbed on appeal.

The qualification of a witness to testify as an expert is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, and, where there is no showing of a manifest abuse of such discretion, ruling of court will not be disturbed on appeal.

17. Damages ⇨132(9)—$15,000 damages for loss of foot held not excessive.

$15,000 damages awarded to woman 67 years old for loss of foot run over by street car held not excessive.

18. Damages ⇨96—Measurement of damages left to jury.

Court will not establish any precise rule for measurement of damages in actions for personal injuries, but will leave measurement to sound sense and fair judgment of jury.

19. Appeal and error ⇨1004(1)—Verdict not disturbed because excessive, unless not result of cool, dispassionate discretion of jury.

A verdict will not be disturbed because excessive unless the amount of damages is obviously so disproportionate to the injury as to justify the conclusion that the verdict is not result of the cool, dispassionate discretion of jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Sarah M. Darling against the Pacific Electric Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and E. E. Morris, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. In this action the plaintiff, Sarah M. Darling, secured a judgment for damages for personal injuries in the sum of $15,000. The complaint charged the defendant generally with the negligent operation of its electric car, in consequence of which the plaintiff was permanently injured. Defendant answered, denying its own alleged negligence, and interposed as a separate defense the alleged negligence of the plaintiff as one of the proximate contributing causes of the accident.

It appears from the record before us that the plaintiff, Mrs. Darling, was struck by one of the defendant's electric cars on Brand boulevard, between Wilson and Broadway streets, in the city of Glendale. The car ran over plaintiff's left foot, which was so badly crushed as to render amputation necessary. The width of Brand boulevard is 100 feet. It extends north and south, being intersected by Wilson street on the north and by Broadway street on the south. There is a slight downgrade from Wilson street to Broadway street. The defendant operates its electric cars on double tracks on this thoroughfare, the north-bound cars using the easterly tracks and the south-bound cars using the westerly tracks. The rails of the respective tracks are approximately five feet apart and the tracks are some ten feet apart, leaving intervening a narrow strip of land, wherein are embedded trolley poles, set at about 150 feet apart. The entire boulevard, including the said narrow strip of land, is paved. The location of the accident is in the heart of the business section of Glendale, and, during busy times, the boulevard is subjected to heavy vehicular traffic. It was customary in this portion of Glendale for automobiles to park diagonally to the curbing, and on the day of the accident both sides of the boulevard, on the block between Wilson and Broadway streets, were lined with parked automobiles. The accident occurred on a Saturday noon approximately in the middle of the block of said boulevard. The vehicular traffic was very heavy, as was usual on Saturdays, necessitating, at times, the running of automobiles along the car tracks in order to advance beyond other automobiles moving more slowly. The plaintiff, prior to the accident, had taken her place on the westerly curb of Brand boulevard, near the middle of the block, preparatory to crossing the boulevard. She stepped off the curb and made her way across the boulevard in a southeasterly direction, toward the opposite side thereof. Succeeding in reaching the south-bound car track without encountering any considerable difficulty, Mrs. Darling remained there for a moment, as her direct course across the boulevard from then on was impeded by the heavy traffic moving north on the east side thereof. The street car at this time was a short distance beyond the intersection of Wilson street and Brand boulevard, between 175 and 200 feet from the plaintiff. The car did not stop at this intersection, but continued going due south at a rate of speed between 10 and 12 miles an hour. While crossing the intersection and until within a short distance of the plaintiff, the motorman continuously and vigorously rang the bell of the car.

The trial court instructed the jury that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law and submitted the case to them pursuant to appropriate instructions upon the sole issue of the last clear chance. A general verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was entered thereon for the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals.

In support of the appeal the defendant urges four grounds, viz.: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict; (2) that the trial court erred in restricting the cross-examination of a witness for the plaintiff; (3) that the trial court erred in overruling the motion to strike from the record the testimony of another witness for the plaintiff; (4) that the verdict was excessive.

[1-3] Upon the first ground appellant urges that there is no evidence justifying the application of the doctrine of last clear chance, inasmuch as it is claimed the plaintiff was proximately negligent down to the time of the accident. The elements of the doctrine of last clear chance, which must be present in any given case in order to warrant the invocation of that doctrine, are these: (1) That the plaintiff has been negligent; (2) that as a result thereof she was present in a situation of danger from which she could not escape by the exercise of ordinary care; (3) that the defendant was aware of her dangerous situation and realized, or ought to have realized, her inability to escape therefrom; (4) that the defendant then had a clear chance to avoid injuring her by the exercise of ordinary care; (5) that the defendant failed to avoid the accident by the use of ordinary care. It is not required of the plaintiff to show that her inability to escape from the threatened danger was a physical impossibility. The doctrine applies equally if she be wholly unaware of her danger and for that reason unable to escape it. Whenever she becomes aware of the danger, however, she must thereafter exercise ordinary care for her protection. Meeks v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 56 Cal. 513, 519, 38 Am. Rep. 67; Everett v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 115 Cal. 105, 127, 43 P. 207, 46 P. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350; Harrington v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 514, 522, 74 P. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85; Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709; Basham v. Southern Pacific Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 P. 359; Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 218 P. 36. The test of the last clear opportunity of avoiding the accident is whether, when both plaintiff and defendant have been guilty of negligence causing the accident, the plaintiff has ceased to have any power to prevent it and the defendant still retains the power of preventing it by the exercise of ordinary care.

[4-6] There are, then, upon this phase of the case, two questions, viz.: (1) Whether or not there was any evidence showing or tending to show that the plaintiff was in such a situation, after she became aware of the threatened danger, from which she could not by the exercise of ordinary care have extricated herself; (2) whether or not there was any evidence showing or tending to show that the motorman had actual knowledge of her situation and could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the accident but negligently failed to do so. It is not disputed that both of these queries were, admittedly, in view of the situation revealed by the evidence adduced on the entire case, questions of fact for the determination of the jury. Cunningham v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 561, 47 P. 452; Wood v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 172 Cal. 15, 155 P. 68; Lawrence v. Goodwill, 44 Cal. App. 440, 186 P. 781; Unger v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Rys., 61 Cal. App. 125, 214 P. 510. While there is a sharp conflict in the evidence concerning the circumstances immediately preceding the accident and down to the very time of the accident, the verdict of the jury having impliedly resolved that conflict in favor of the plaintiff, we are precluded from disturbing their conclusion. Upon the triers of fact rests the responsibility to reconcile, if possible, any apparent conflict, whether the same arises upon the entire case or in the testimony of a single witness, and to effectuate all the evidence, when the nature of the case will admit of such a disposition; or if the conflict is irreconcilable, to place their own value on the contradictory evidence. A consideration of all the evidence in the instant case leads us to conclude that there was some substantial evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff upon the theory that the defendant failed to avail itself of the last clear chance to avoid injuring the plaintiff. Thus it was shown in evidence that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was 67 years of age and was then and had been for many years prior thereto almost stone deaf. The place of the accident was in a busy downtown business section, and, at the time of the accident, the automotive traffic was very heavy. The automobiles, parked diagonally to the curbing, lined both sides of the boulevard on the block in question. This tended to lessen, to some extent, the street space for the moving traffic, necessitating, at intervals, as the evidence indicates, the use of the car tracks and the intervening space between the respective car tracks. The use of this narrow strip was not precluded to vehicles, because the trolley poles thereon were some distance apart, and this permitted the hasty drivers to swerve into the strip in order to advance beyond the slower drivers, and then to cut in ahead of them without danger of an impact with one of the trolley poles.

[7] Standing in his proper place in the front of the car, with no obstruction on the track to conceal what was thereon, the motorman had a clear view of the plaintiff while more than 200 feet away from her. Although he was ringing the bell "furiously," it failed to elicit any perceptible response from the plaintiff. She, meanwhile, was walking down the track in the direct path of the approaching car, indicating that she was unaware of the threatened danger. During all the time that the car was approaching she did not at any time leave the track for a place of safety. It was not until the car was within a distance estimated variously from 35 to 50 feet from her that the realization of the impending peril was first brought home to her. Instinctively turning around, she saw for the first time the on-coming car to her rear. At this time, according to the testimony introduced by the plaintiff, there was heavy traffic on the west side of the track, south-bound, and there was traffic on the east side of the track, north-bound. Some of the automobiles were using the north-bound car track. One automobile, having cut in ahead of another automobile, was running upon the narrow strip between the tracks immediately opposite the plaintiff. Thus confronted with an imminent peril to her rear and with moving vehicles on both sides barring her exit from her perilous situation, the plaintiff turned to the west, hesitated for a moment—seeing her escape in that direction impossible—and then turned completely around and attempted to make her escape by going to the east side onto the narrow strip of land between the tracks. The hesitation, the palpable inability of the plaintiff to determine upon a final course of action, must have conveyed to the motorman the thought that the plaintiff would not immediately get off the track. Seeing the plaintiff in this obvious bewildered condition, as her actions clearly manifested, seeing her making ineffectual efforts to extricate herself from her precarious predicament, the motorman should have, it is apparent, as a reasonable man under the circumstances, realized that the plaintiff would not be able to escape from the on-coming car. Thus informed of the impending peril and well-nigh inevitable consequences of his continued running of the car at the same rate of speed, the motorman made no effort to slacken the speed of nor to stop the car, but continued at the same speed, apparently hazarding the possibility that the plaintiff would be able to extricate herself before the car would be upon her. It was only when the car was within some 10 feet of the plaintiff that the motorman, doubtlessly awakening to the inevitability of the accident, applied the brakes of the car, within a distance which the car could not be stopped, going at its then rate of speed, under any circumstances. The mere fact that the plaintiff was negligently in the path of the on-coming car did not justify the motorman in waiting until the very last moment before endeavoring to avoid the accident. Obviously aware of the plaintiff's position, it was incumbent on him to exert all reasonable means within his power to avoid running down the plaintiff.

"Persons cannot be recklessly or wantonly run down on a railroad track, however negligent themselves, where the circumstances are such as to convey to the mind of a reasonable man a question as to whether they will be able to get out of the way." Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 P. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85.

[8-10] It is readily conceded, as the appellant argues, that the plaintiff was obliged to exercise ordinary care to extricate herself from the perilous predicament in which she found herself as the result of her own negligence. Considering all the circumstances immediately surrounding the accident, it seems to us that there is sufficient evidence upon which to predicate the implied finding that she did exercise such reasonable care to extricate herself, after she became aware of the threatened danger, as was required under the circumstances. While the plaintiff did not immediately walk from the track with calm decision, yet she endeavored to the best of her ability to escape; but, due to circumstances beyond her control, her efforts were ineffectual. Realizing, as he must have done, the situation of the plaintiff, it must have appeared to the motorman, as it would have appeared to any ordinarily prudent person, that unless the speed of the car was slackened or the car altogether stopped an accident would inevitably ensue. This raises the question whether, if the brakes had been applied with reasonable promptness, the accident could have been avoided. The answer to this question is to be found in the fact shown in evidence that a very slight slowing down of the car would have given Mrs. Darling sufficient time to escape. She was struck by the protruding fender of the car only after she had almost cleared herself from the on-coming car. A second or two more and she would have reached a place of safety. Appellant asserts, however, that there is no positive evidence that the motorman operating defendant's electric car had actual knowledge of the plaintiff's perilous position, and, in the absence thereof, there is no room for the application of the doctrine of last clear chance. There is substantial, uncontradicted evidence, however, that the motorman had a clear view of the track for a considerable distance ahead. Between the car and the plaintiff there was nothing on the track to distract him. His vigorous ringing of the car bell, in connection with those circumstances, is a clear indication that he was attempting to warn the plaintiff of the approach of the car. Any other inference would be clearly unwarranted by the evidence. That the ringing of the bell was not to warn the witness Mrs. Tarbell of the approach of the car is made manifest by the fact that she was never on the track and gave no indication, as far as the record shows, that she was about to precipitate herself into a position of danger. Moreover, in addition thereto, the motorman continued ringing the bell, apparently, with the same force after he had passed the point where Mrs. Tarbell was standing.

[11] Dr. Harold P. Hare was called by the plaintiff for the purpose of testifying that another witness, A. M. Minnock, was physically unable to be present in court. This was for the purpose of laying a foundation for the introduction of Minnock's deposition, taken some time prior thereto. It is unquestioned that the relation of physician and patient had been established as a matter of law. The physician, after testifying generally on direct examination that Minnock could not be present in court, was interrogated by counsel for the appellant, who endeavored to elicit the exact nature of the patient's infirmities. Upon his own motion the physician refused to testify in this behalf upon the ground that to do so would be to violate a professional confidence. The court sustained the witness in his refusal to testify, and in so doing no error was committed.

Section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, in part:

"There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore, a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: * * * (4) A licensed physician or surgeon cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient, which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient. * * *

[12, 13] This is a personal privilege given to the patient, and on one, except in certain specified cases, has the right to waive the same for him. Estate of Flint, 100 Cal. 391, 34 P. 863; Freel v. Market St. Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 40, 31 P. 730; Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 P. 1019; Lissak v. Crocker Estate Co., 119 Cal. 442, 445, 171 P. 638; Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 182, 64 P. 294; McClenahan v. Keyes, 188 Cal. 574, 206 P. 454. This rule of privilege applies although the patient is not a party to the action in which a disclosure is sought and is not present to object. Matter of Myer, 184 N. Y. 54, 58, 76 N. E. 920, 6 Ann. Cas. 26; Sparer v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 185 App. Div. 861, 173 N. Y. S. 673. There was no express or implied waiver of this privilege by the patient in the instant case, and, in the absence thereof, the physician was clearly within his rights in refusing to testify concerning a matter which could not be divulged without a breach of professional confidence.

In support of its contention in this behalf appellant relies upon the case of In re Mullin, 110 Cal. 252, 42 P. 645. That case is not in point. It is clearly distinguishable from the instant case. In the Mullin Case the question of privilege arose over the testimony of a physician who had attended the deceased testator professionally during his last illness and, in addition thereto, was a subscribing witness to the will in controversy. The physician was permitted, over objection, to testify concerning the condition of and the nature of the affliction of his deceased patient. On appeal it was contended that the admission of this testimony in evidence was in violation of the privilege accorded by section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In reference thereto the court said:

"* * * These objections are not to be upheld. In making his attending physician a subscribing witness to his will the deceased did exactly what he effected in the case of his attorney at law—waived the privilege and invited a full and proper examination of the matters and facts upon which their lips would otherwise have been sealed."

[14] Appellant argues, however, that in giving his deposition Minnock, the patient, waived the privilege accorded by section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure the same as the testator did in the Mullin Case in making his physician a subscribing witness to his will. The rule enunciated in the Mullin Case, however, cannot be extended to embrace such a situation as is presented in the instant case. In the case of a will the subscribing witnesses are necessary to the attestation of the same, and in making a privileged person a subscribing witness the testator must be deemed to have actually waived the privilege, for it is incumbent upon such witness to testify, if called upon, in order to prove the will, concerning the soundness of the mind of the testator. In the instant case, however, the physician was called as a witness only for the purpose of explaining the absence of the person whose deposition was sought to be offered in evidence. He did not testify, nor did he attempt to testify, concerning the person's competency to make such deposition. The instant case, therefore, cannot be said to be controlled by the Mullin Case, and in the absence of a waiver by the patient it cannot be said that the trial court improperly restricted the cross-examination of the witness with reference to privileged matter.

[15] There is no merit in the contention that the trial court erred in refusing to strike from the record the testimony of the witness George T. Marshall. This motion to strike was based upon the theory that the witness was not shown to have had sufficient knowledge as to the weight and structure of the defendant's car or as to the grade of the street to entitle him to testify. Marshall testified that he had been employed for many years as a motorman for various street car corporations, including the defendant corporation; that he was familiar with the type of car which struck the plaintiff; and that he was familiar with the place of the accident. He stated, in addition thereto, in response to a hypothetical question, that the car could be stopped within about 20 feet, if it were going at the rate of 10 miles an hour. If the car were going at the rate of 12 miles an hour he said: There would not be much difference at that speed." Marshall further testified that—

"If there was a 1 per cent. grade (on Brand boulevard between Wilson street and Broadway street), that would require very little more distance to stop, at that speed the car was supposed to be traveling. * * *

Defendant introduced evidence—the testimony of its civil engineer—that the grade

VITAGRAPH, Inc., v. LIBERTY THEATRES
CO. OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(S. F. 11731.)

was approximately 1.115 per cent. Appellant asserts, therefore, that the testimony of Marshall rested upon a false assumption, as the testimony of the civil engineer "if uncontradicted * * * was binding upon the court and jury," and that therefore Marshall's conclusion as to distance should have been stricken out. It is obvious that this objection went rather to the weight of the witness' testimony than to his ability to testify. If the witness disclosed an ample knowledge of the subject to entitle his opinion to go to the jury, the question of the degree of his knowledge goes more to the weight of the evidence than to its admissibility. Howland v. Oakland, etc., Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 513, 42 P. 983.

[16] The qualification of a witness to testify as an expert is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, and where there is no showing of a manifest abuse of such discretion the ruling of that court will not be disturbed upon appeal. Union C. Co. v. Madera, etc., Irr. Co., 179 Cal. 774, 178 P. 957; Kinsey v. Pac. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 178 Cal. 153, 172 P. 1098.

[17-19] The amount of damages awarded by the jury to the plaintiff was not so large or so disproportionate as to be palpably the result of prejudice and passion. While the plaintiff was not engaged in any gainful occupation, yet the permanent loss of her limb, the excruciating pain she suffered, and the decreased capacity to move around, were, doubtless, the inducing causes in leading the jury to award the stated amount of damages, rather than, as appellant contends, sympathy. We do not think that the sum awarded as damages for the permanent loss of the plaintiff's limb was excessive in that it can be said that the award was clearly the result of passion and prejudice. Courts have repeatedly refrained from attempting to establish any precise rule for the measurement of damages in actions for personal injuries, but, rather from necessity, leave the measurement to the sound sense and fair judgment of the jury. A verdict, therefore, "will not be disturbed because excessive, 'unless the amount of damages is obviously so disproportionate to the injury proved as to justify the conclusion that the verdict is not the result of the cool and dispassionate discretion of the jury.'" Morgan v. S. P. Co., 95 Cal. 501, 30 P. 601; Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 513; Rystinski v. Cent. Cal. T. Co., 175 Cal. 336, 165 P. 952; Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Ry., 110 Cal. 286, 42 P. 822, 1063; Meek v. Pacific Elec. Co., 175 Cal. 53, 164 P. 1117; Bisinger v. Sac. Lodge No. 6, 187 Cal. 578, 203 P. 768.

1. Contracts —41—Defendant could not insist on strictest proof of due execution of contract for rental of photo plays.

Where both parties to contract for rental and exhibition of photo plays recognized and acted under contract in part performance thereof, and defendant received and retained some of benefits accruing to it thereunder, it could not insist on strictest proof of contract's due execution by plaintiff.

2. Damages —62(3)—Plaintiff required to minimize damage, where threatened by injury as result of tort or breach of contract by another.

Where injury or damage to plaintiff's property is threatened as a result of tort or breach of contract by another, plaintiff must use reasonable care and diligence to protect his property against threatened loss or injury, and for failure to do so he will not be permitted to charge defendant for loss or injury which was due to his own neglect.

3. Damages —163(2)—Defendant has burden of proving any mitigation of damages for tort or breach of contract.

Under rule requiring injured party to minimize damages threatened as a result of tort or breach of contract by another, burden of proof is on defendant to prove facts in mitigation of damages.

4. Damages —163(2), 189—Plaintiff established prima facie case entitling it to recover, as damages, amount defendant agreed to pay for photo plays; burden on defendant to prove facts in mitigation of damages.

Plaintiff proving contract for rental and exhibition of photo plays and part performance thereof, and defendant's refusal to pay therefor, established a prima facie case entitling it to recover, as damages, in view of Civ. Code, § 3302, amount which defendant agreed to pay for such films, and burden of proof was then on defendant to prove facts in mitigation of such damages.

5. Damages —184—Defendant did not sustain burden of proving facts in mitigation of damages for breach of contract for rental of photo plays.

In action for damages for breach of contract for rental and exhibition of photo plays, defendant held not to have sustained burden of proving facts in mitigation of plaintiff's damages.

6. Damages —184—Evidence held to sustain finding that plaintiff could not have leased photo plays refused by defendant.

In action for damages for breach of contract for rental and exhibition of photo plays, evidence held to sustain finding that plaintiff, by exercise of reasonable care, could not have leased or sublet to others pictures, or any part thereof, which were refused by defendant.

7. Evidence ☞98—Finding on issue against party on whom rests burden of proof, where no evidence produced thereon.

Where no evidence is produced on an issue, finding thereon must be against party on whom rests burden of proof.

8. Contracts ☞329—Action for breach of contract to rent photo plays held premature as to those films not delivered to defendant.

Action for breach of contract for rental and exhibition of photo plays held premature as to those films which had not been delivered or tendered to defendant, and which, under contract, no payment thereon had become due from it.

9. Damages ☞159(6)—Plaintiff not entitled to recover damages for anticipatory breach of contract to rent and exhibit photo plays.

Complaint, pleading full performance by plaintiff, held not sufficient to permit recovery of damages for anticipatory breach of contract to rent and exhibit photo plays as to those films not delivered or tendered to defendant under contract; measure of damages recoverable therefor being governed by Civ. Code, § 3300.

10. Damages ☞124(4)—Measure for damages for anticipatory breach of contract to rent photo plays stated.

Action for damages for anticipatory breach of contract to rent and exhibit photo plays, under Civ. Code, § 3300, would proceed upon theory that contract had been abandoned, and measure of recovery would be difference between amount agreed to be paid by defendants and value to plaintiff of license and use of films covered by contract.

11. Contracts ☞10(1)—Contract for exhibition of photo plays not lacking in mutuality because plaintiff might terminate it on happening of certain contingencies.

Contract for rental and exhibition of photo plays held not lacking in mutuality, so as to be unenforceable, because of contingencies on happening of any one of which plaintiff was authorized to terminate agreement, where each of such contingencies was predicated on a happening beyond control of plaintiff.

12. Contracts ☞10(1)—Want of mutuality no defense to an executed contract.

Want of mutuality is never a defense to an executed contract.

13. Contracts ☞10(1)—Any want of mutuality in contract for rental and exhibition of photo plays held cured.

Any want of mutuality in contract for rental and exhibition of photo plays held cured as to films delivered to defendant by performance of contract by plaintiff.

14. Appeal and error ☞177(8)—Supreme Court required to reverse and remand cause, though no occasion for retrial of any issues of fact therein.

Although there was no occasion apparent for retrial of any issues of fact in cause tried below, Supreme Court, on appeal, was required to reverse and remand cause, where additional findings were necessary, since it cannot make findings of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Vitagraph, Inc., against the Liberty Theatres Company of California and others. Action dismissed as to other defendants. From the judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for appellant.

Milton A. Nathan, of San Francisco (Edward Schary, of Fresno, of counsel), for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. Plaintiff, a distributor of photo plays, entered into a contract with defendant, an exhibitor of such plays, whereby plaintiff agreed to deliver to defendant the films of six certain photo plays to be thereafter produced, and to license defendant to exhibit each of them in turn for a period of one week, and defendant agreed to pay therefor the sum of $300 for each such picture, payable one week in advance of the exhibition thereof. These payments were evidently to be made for the license to exhibit these photo plays, together with the loan and use of the films for that purpose. Defendant accepted, used, and paid for the first two photo plays which were produced and delivered to it, but refused to accept the third and fourth, and, when the films thereof were sent to defendant, it returned them to plaintiff, without exhibiting them, and notified plaintiff that it would not accept the remaining two photo plays provided for in the contract. Thereupon plaintiff brought this action to recover $1,200 damages for the breach of the contract, being $300 each for the third and fourth films, which had been tendered and refused, and $300 each for the fifth and sixth films, which had not been tendered at the time the action was commenced. At the trial the action was dismissed as to all defendants other than the Liberty Theatres Company of California, a corporation, and plaintiff recovered judgment against this defendant for the full amount sued for, except that it was not awarded interest upon the principal sum thereof as prayed for in its complaint. The defendant appeals from the judgment and urges as grounds for reversal: First, that there was no proof that the contract sued upon was ever executed, either by the respondent or by the appellant; second, that no effort was made by the respondent to minimize its loss or damage after the alleged breach of the contract sued upon; third, that the contract sued upon is lacking in mutuality and is therefore unenforceable; and, fourth, that the judgment is excessive.

[1] The contract, which was in writing, purported by its terms to be entered into by and between the respondent, as party of the first part, and the appellant, as party of the second part. It was signed in behalf of respondent by its salesman and countersigned by its branch manager, and also countersigned by the manager of its sales promotion department. It was signed also by the president and general manager of the appellant corporation, and was evidently a transaction in the ordinary course of appellant's business. It was not signed in the corporate name of appellant, however, but its president and general manager merely affixed his own signature thereto as "Exhibitor." It may be conceded that the evidence is insufficient to directly establish antecedent authorization for the execution of this contract by the respective corporations, and also that the purported execution thereof is technically defective. On the other hand, the evidence shows that both parties recognized the contract as being in existence and acted under it for a period of several months. Each of the parties performed the contract according to its terms up to the time of the delivery of the third film, which was nearly eight months after the date of signing of the contract. Both parties having recognized and acted under the contract in the part performance thereof, the appellant, having received and retained some of the benefits accruing to it thereunder, is in no position to insist upon the strictest proof of its due execution. Reedy v. Smith, 42 Cal. 245; Bloom v. Hazzard, 104 Cal. 310, 37 P. 1037; Sparks v. Mauk, 170 Cal. 122, 148 P. 926.

[2] Under its second point appellant contends that, when it breached the contract by refusing to accept and pay for the films, it then became respondent's duty to make every effort to lease those films to some other exhibitor and to obtain as much rental as possible therefor; that the measure of respondent's damages would be limited to the amount of the difference between the amount of rental which could have been thus obtained and the amount which the appellant had agreed to pay; and that the respondent, having failed to produce any evidence upon this subject, is not entitled to recover any damages whatsoever. Appellant invokes the rule sometimes referred to as the duty of minimizing damages. It is a recognized rule of law that, in a case where inquiry or damage to a plaintiff's property is threatened as the result of a tort or breach of contract by another, the duty rests upon the plaintiff to use reasonable care and diligence to protect his property against such threatened loss or injury, and, if he fails to do so, he will not be permitted to charge the defendant for that portion of his loss or injury which was due to plaintiff's own neglect in this behalf. This rule has been repeatedly recognized and applied in this state, as well as elsewhere. For example, in Mabb v. Stewart, 147 Cal. 413, 81 P. 1073, where the defendant wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of water which was required for the irrigation of her orchard, the plaintiff stood by and permitted her trees to die for want of water, when she could easily have procured the necessary water elsewhere at a relatively small expense, and this court held that it was her duty under such circumstances to minimize her damage by procuring the water elsewhere, and thus to save her trees, and that her recovery was limited to the amount which it would have cost her to do so. The real basis of this conclusion is that the loss of the trees was the proximate result, not of the defendant's original wrong, but of plaintiff's subsequent neglect.

[3-7] In the case of Alaska Salmon Co. v. Standard Box Co., 158 Cal. 567, 112 P. 454, the defendant had contracted to furnish the plaintiff with boxes for the packing of its fish product. The boxes furnished were not up to the standard of the contract, but plaintiff accepted and used them and thereafter brought action for damages. Defendant contended that by the acceptance and use of the boxes plaintiff estopped itself to recover damages, but this court pointed out that it was the duty of the plaintiff to use the boxes under the circumstances in order to minimize the damages, because to do otherwise would have resulted in the loss of its fish product, and would thus have enormously increased the damage. In that connection this court said:

"A plaintiff, where a defendant has violated his contract, is charged with the general duty of doing every reasonable thing to minimize his own loss, and thus reduce the damages for which defendant has become liable by his breach."

So, also, in the case of Ash v. Soo Sing Lung, 177 Cal. 356, 170 P. 843, plaintiff had sold his crop of fruit on the trees to defendant, who agreed to prop the limbs, so as to prevent them from breaking under the weight of the fruit. Defendant having failed to do so, it was held that the duty rested upon the plaintiff, after knowledge of defendant's breach, to use ordinary care and diligence to protect his trees from further injury, and that, if he failed to do so, he could not charge the defendant with such portion of the loss as resulted proximately from his own subsequent neglect. No case has been called to our attention wherein this rule as to the duty to minimize the damages has been applied to a situation in which the defendant's breach of duty consisted solely of the failure or refusal to pay a liquidated sum of money when due, and it may, perhaps, be doubted that the rule is applicable to such a case. It would seem that the situation of the respondent is in this respect analogous to that of a lessor whose lessee has repudiated the lease and given notice that he will not perform it. It is held in such case that the lessor may elect to stand upon his contract and may recover the full rent for the term, when it has become due, in accordance with the terms of the contract, or he may elect to treat the contract as abandoned and relet the premises to another tenant, in which event he can recover as damages only the difference between the rent he was to receive and the rent actually received from the subsequent tenant. Respinl v. Porta, 89 Cal. 464, 26 P. 967, 23 Am. St. Rep. 488; Bradbury v. Higginson, 162 Cal. 602, 123 P. 797. If this analogy is sound, it follows that the respondent herein had a right to stand upon its contract and to recover the full amount which had become due thereunder in accordance with its terms. Civ. Code, § 3302. Assuming, however, the applicability to the present case of the rule which requires an injured party to minimize the damages, the appellant is not benefited thereby herein, at least in respect of the amount awarded on account of the third and fourth photo plays. The cases which recognize and give application to this rule uniformly hold that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to prove the facts in mitigation of damages. Crosby v. Plummer, 111 Me. 355, 89 A. 145; Milage v. Woodward, 186 N. Y. 252, 78 N. E. 873; Tradesman Co. v. Superior Mfg. Co., 147 Mich. 702, 111 N. W. 343, 112 N. W. 708; Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 1, 10, 16, 96 P. 884; Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 802, 106 P. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154; 1 Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) p. 447; 17 Cor. Jur. 1025. When respondent proved the contract, the performance thereof by the delivery of the third and fourth films, and appellant's refusal to pay therefor, it established at least a prima facie case entitling it to recover as damages the amount which appellant had agreed to pay for those films. Alderson v. Houston, supra, at page 10 (96 P. 884). It was then for the appellant to prove facts in mitigation of those damages, and this it did not do. It is generally held to be the duty of the defendant to plead the facts in mitigation of damages if he would rely thereon, and this the appellant did not do. The trial court did, nevertheless, make a finding:

"That said plaintiff, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, could not have leased or sublet or hired to others the pictures, or any part thereof, which were refused by said defendant. * * *

Appellant asserts that this finding is unsupported by the evidence. There is some slight evidence to sustain it. One of the witnesses testified that when the films were rejected by appellant it was then too late to arrange with any other exhibitor for their exhibition, but if there was no evidence whatever upon this issue the finding would still be sustained by the evidence, under the rule that where no evidence is produced upon an issue the finding thereon must be against the party upon whom rests the burden of proof.

[8-10] As to the fifth and sixth photo plays, we are of the opinion that this action is premature, and that the respondent is not entitled to recover therefor herein. At the time this action was commenced those films had not been delivered or tendered to the defendant and under the terms of the contract no payment therefor had become due from the defendant. Respondent points out that before the commencement of the action appellant notified it that it would not accept or pay for the remaining films, and respondent suggests that its complaint herein is sufficient to state a good cause of action for an anticipatory breach of contract. Roehm v. Hoerst, 178 U. S. 1, 20 S. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953; Select Pictures Corp. v. Australasian Films (D. C.) 260 F. 296. It may be doubted that an action for damages for an anticipatory breach will lie in a case where there are executory covenants unperformed on the part of the plaintiff which are precedent to those which have been repudiated by the defendant, the performance of which has not been prevented by the defendant. Bradbury v. Higginson, supra, at page 609 (123 P. 797). As this question has not been briefed or argued herein, we shall not undertake to pass upon it. Assuming that under the circumstances of the present case an action would lie to recover damages as for an anticipatory breach with respect to the fifth and sixth pictures, the measure of the damages recoverable therefor would be governed by section 3300 of the Civil Code, and we are of the opinion that respondent's pleading and proof is insufficient to sustain an award under that section. Such an action would proceed upon the theory that the contract had been abandoned, and the measure of recovery would be the difference between the amount agreed to be paid by defendant and the value to the plaintiff of the license and use of the films covered by the contract. There was neither allegation nor proof directed to this issue with relation to the fifth and sixth photo plays. Neither was there, with respect to these, any allegation or proof of the readiness or ability of the plaintiff to perform. The complaint was framed upon the theory that the plaintiff had fully performed the entire contract. The trial court so found, but this finding, in its relation to the last two photo plays is contrary to the evidence. We find no merit in appellant's suggestion that the contract herein should be construed as providing for the leasing or licensing of but three films instead of six.

[11-13] In support of its contention that the contract is so lacking in mutuality as to be unenforceable, appellant points to a long list of contingencies specified in the contract upon the happening of any one of which the respondent is authorized to terminate the agreement. Appellant asserts that because of these provisions the contract "is so one-sided that to all intents and purposes the respondent had the right under its terms to terminate the agreement at its option, while no such right or privilege was granted to the distributor." If this were the fact, we are cited to no authority which would support the conclusion that the contract is thereby rendered void; but it is not the fact. Each of the contingencies upon the happening of which the respondent has the right to terminate the agreement is predicated on a happening beyond the control of the respondent. Moreover, want of mutuality is never a defense as to an executed contract, and, even though the contract herein were utterly one-sided, the want of mutuality was cured in so far as the third and fourth films are concerned by the performance of the contract on the part of the respondent.

[14] It follows from what has been said that the respondent is entitled to recover herein the amount agreed to be paid for the third and fourth photo plays, while, as to the fifth and sixth, the action herein is premature. While there is no occasion apparent for a retrial of any of the issues of fact herein, this court cannot make findings of fact, and must therefore remand the cause. Upon the going down of the remittitur, the trial court may revise its findings of fact and conclusions of law in accordance with the conclusions herein expressed, either upon the evidence heretofore received herein or upon such further evidence as it may see fit to receive.

NEHER v. KAUFFMAN et al. (L. A. 8442.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 28, 1925.)

1. Escrows ⇨4—Contract for sale of property construed to require deed of conveyance to be delivered into escrow for use of purchaser on payment of money required by contract.

Contract for sale of property, in view of escrow agreement and practical construction by the parties, held to evince an intention that deed of conveyance was to be delivered, not to purchaser directly, but into escrow, to be there held and used for his benefit upon payment by him into escrow of money which he was required to pay at time specified in contract.

2. Escrows ⇨4—Execution and acknowledgment of deed of conveyance held sufficient performance by vendors of contract for sale of property.

Under contract for sale of property, by which deed of conveyance was to be delivered into escrow, to be there held for purchaser, held that execution and acknowledgment of deed of conveyance by vendors, and delivery into escrow, constituted sufficient performance by vendors in so far as delivery of deed was concerned.

3. Appeal and error ⇨204(2), 237(2)—Error in receiving incompetent testimony held not to require reversal, where no objection or motion to strike out.

Error in admitting incompetent testimony of plaintiff that he had done everything to complete contract for sale of property that he was required to do, as involving a conclusion, held not to require a reversal, where testimony was received without objection, and there was no motion to strike it out.

4. Quieting title ⇨44(4) — Evidence held to sustain finding of performance of contract for sale of property in so far as it concerned delivery of deed.

Evidence held to sustain finding of performance of contract for sale of property by vendor, in so far as it concerned delivery of deed.

5. Escrows ⇨5—Vendors' agreement in contract for sale of property to furnish a guaranty of title held not a concurrent covenant.

Where, in a contract for sale of property, deed of conveyance was to be delivered into escrow for use of purchaser upon payment of money required by contract, vendors' agreement to furnish a guaranty of title held not a concurrent covenant, where escrow instructions provided that guaranty of title should show title to be vested in escrow, which could not be done until deed had been filed for record, and until money had been paid by purchasers.

6. Escrows ⇨5—Escrow instructions in contract for sale of property were to be regarded as part of original contract.

In contract for sale of property, escrow instructions, providing that deed of conveyance was to be delivered into escrow and there held for purchaser's use upon payment of money required by contract, which were signed on same day and as part of same transaction, were to be regarded as part of contract between parties; it being immaterial whether they were merely supplemental, or whether they constituted a subsequent contract in writing, modifying original contract.

7. Contracts ⇨237(2), 238(1)—Written contract may be modified by later written contract; covenants and agreements of one party thereto furnish sufficient consideration.

A contract in writing may be modified by later contract in writing, and covenants and agreements of one party thereto furnish a sufficient consideration to support promises and agreements of other party thereto.

8. Appeal and error ⇨931(1)—Reviewing tribunal required on appeal to construe evidence to support judgment.

Reviewing court is required on appeal to construe evidence to support judgment, to accept as true that evidence which tends to sustain findings and judgment, unless it is inherently incredible, and to reject as untrue evidence which conflicts therewith.

9. Appeal and error ⇨994(3)—Trial court exclusive judge of credibility of witnesses.

Trial court was exclusive judge of credibility of witnesses.

10. Vendor and purchaser ⇨95(1)—Refusal to grant defendants equitable relief from forfeiture of contract for sale of property held not error.

Failure to grant defendants equitable relief from forfeiture of contract for sale of property, under Civ. Code, § 3275, held not error, where plaintiff did not lull defendants into any false sense of security, and defendants did not rely on, or were not misled by, anything claimed to have been said or done by plaintiff, and, even if plaintiff had waived part of payment required by contract, defendants would not have been able to pay remaining part on date required, or any substantial portion thereof.

11. Evidence ⇨413—Evidence of conversations between parties prior to making of written contract of sale held properly excluded.

Court did not err in excluding evidence of conversations between parties prior to making of written contract for sale of property, where it was not claimed that such conversations would aid in solving any ambiguity in contract, and it did not appear that they would have been material to any issue before court.

12. Appeal and error ⇨1056(2)—Any error in excluding evidence of parol agreement in contract for sale of property held not prejudicial.

Any error in excluding testimony of parol agreement, by which plaintiff would waive part of purchase price in contract for sale of property, held not prejudicial, where agreement, if made, was negated and supplanted by written contract providing for postponement of time of payment of purchase price.

13. Witnesses ⇨236(1)—Questions asked witness on direct examination held properly excluded as being too broad.

Questions asked a witness on direct examination, as to why he had not paid sum required by contract for sale of property within time specified in contract, held properly excluded as being too broad.

14. Evidence ⇨151(1)—Purchaser's testimony as to belief in and reliance on vendor's promise held competent.

Testimony of purchaser in contract for sale of property, that he believed in and relied on alleged promise of vendor that he would waive payment of part of purchase price, was competent.

15. Appeal and error ⇨1058(2)—Any error in excluding testimony not prejudicial in view of later testimony.

Any error in excluding testimony of purchaser, in contract for sale of property, as to his belief and reliance on promise of vendor to waive payment of part of purchase price, held not prejudicial, where purchaser's later testimony substantially covered testimony excluded.

16. Quieting title ⇨42 — Amendment to answer in suit to quiet title held not to constitute a defense, or to entitle defendants to equitable relief.

In suit to quiet title to premises as against cloud created by recordation of contract for sale thereof, amendment attempting to excuse defendants' breach by alleging that they were misled and lulled into a false sense of security by plaintiff's promises, held not to constitute a defense or to entitle defendants to equitable relief from forfeiture, where it did not appear that plaintiff said or did anything which would have a tendency to mislead defendants to their injury, or upon which they would have been justified in relying.

17. Pleading ⇨236(1)—Allowance or disallowance of amendments during course of trial discretionary with trial court.

Allowance or disallowance of amendments to pleadings during course of trial is a matter resting largely in discretion of trial court.

18. Pleading ⇨238(4)—That minute entry of order denying application for second amendment to answer during trial was not made until after conclusion thereof held not erroneous.

Where, during course of trial, defendants asked leave to file a second amendment to their answer, and court did not grant request at the time, nor did defendants insist upon a ruling thereon, that minute entry of order denying application was not made until after conclusion of trial held not erroneous, especially where defendants never prepared or tendered for filing any proposed amendment.

19. Appeal and error ⇨931(1)—Duty of reviewing court to construe conflicting findings so that they will harmonize.

It is duty of a reviewing court to construe findings susceptible of construction which eliminates conflict so that they will harmonize, though they are also susceptible of a construction which results in a conflict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Otto H. Neher against Milton Kauffman and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Woodruff & Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Tanner, Odell & Taft and Lawler & Degnan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, quieting his title to the premises described in the complaint as against a cloud created by the recordation of a copy of a contract for the sale of the premises executed by the plaintiff to the defendant Kauffman, attached to which was an assignment thereof from Kauffman to defendant Newton and an assignment from Newton to defendant Caldwell. The complaint is in the customary short form of a complaint to quiet title. It alleges ownership and possession of the described premises in the plaintiff, that the defendants claim some interest or estate therein, and that such claim is without right. The answer admits the ownership and possession of the plaintiff in and to the premises, and admits the defendants' claim and interest therein; denies that such claim is without right; alleges that it arises under and by virtue of the contract of sale above referred to, and alleges further:

"That heretofore these answering defendants have offered to purchase said premises in accordance with the terms of said contract, and have offered to pay to the said plaintiff all sums of money due to him in accordance with the terms of said contract upon a transfer of said premises and the furnishing of a guaranty certificate of title, as provided for in said contract, but that said plaintiff has failed and refused to accept said offer, and has failed and refused to transfer and convey said premises or furnish a guaranty certificate of title, as provided for by said contract. That these defendants are able, ready, and willing to carry out and perform each and all of the terms, covenants, conditions, and agreements of said contract to be kept and performed by the purchaser, but said plaintiff wrongfully and unlawfully refuses to comply with any of the terms thereof."

On the opening day of the trial the defendants were permitted, over the objection of the plaintiff, to file an amendment to their answer, wherein they alleged:

"That subsequent to the making of said agreement dated December 11, 1923, and prior to the 15th day of February, 1924, the plaintiff so dealt and negotiated with said defendant Milton Kauffman as to cause him to believe that said defendant would not be required to pay more than the sum of $50,000 on the 15th day of February, 1924, and so as to lull said defendant into a false sense of security and to depend upon the plans which said defendant was making to pay said sum of $50,000 only by the 15th day of February, 1924, with the knowledge and approval of said plaintiff; * * * that plaintiff never gave any notice to said defendant, on or prior to February 15, 1924, that plaintiff intended to stand strictly upon the terms of said contract or attempt to enforce the forfeiture clause therein contained, or declare forfeited the sum of $10,000 paid by said defendant under said agreement, for failure merely on the part of said defendant to pay the sum of $100,000 on the 15th day of February, 1924, and that on the other hand said defendant was led to believe by the acts and conduct of the plaintiff as aforesaid that said defendant would be allowed to pay the sum of $50,000 by February 15, 1924, and keep said agreement in force and effect; that, by reason of the facts and circumstances, hereinbefore mentioned and alleged, it is inequitable for the plaintiff to enforce a forfeiture under said agreement, and said plaintiff is estopped to claim or assert a forfeiture under said agreement, or to terminate the rights or interests of the defendants, or any of them, under said agreement."

The court found that the contract of December 11 was entered into as alleged in the answer; that it was modified in certain respects by escrow instructions executed by the parties January 4, 1924, and by a supplemental agreement of January 12, 1924; that the plaintiff duly performed on his part all the conditions of said agreement as so modified, but that the defendants had wholly failed to pay the sums required to be paid by them, or any part thereof, other than the sum of $10,000, which was paid at the time of the execution of the contract of December 11, as a result of which they had forfeited all interest in or to the premises in question; and that they are not entitled to any relief from such forfeiture. The contract of December 11 was in the following terms:

"Know all men by these presents: That Otto H. Neher for valuable consideration this 11th day of December, 1923, agrees to sell to Milton Kauffman, and the said Milton Kauffman agrees to buy from Otto H. Neher, the following described real property: [Description.]

"Total purchase price $460,000, payable as follows: $10,000 cash, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged; $50,000 on or before January 15, 1924, payable to Otto H. Neher outside of escrow; $50,000 on or before February 15, 1924, without interest, payable to Title Insurance & Trust Company; $350,000 mortgage as set forth in escrow instructions with Title Insurance & Trust Company, No. 713329, buyer agrees to assume interest to accrue on said mortgage from December 15, 1923. Rents, taxes, and insurance to be prorated to December 15, 1923. Buyer to pay for escrow fee, and internal revenue stamps on mortgage note, above those provided in escrow No. 713329 T. I. & Tr. Co. Seller to furnish guaranty of title from Title Insurance & Trust Company, showing title free from incumbrances, except second half of taxes, 1923-24. Tax year to begin July 1, 1923, subject also to restrictions and conditions as may be of record. Seller to assign lease (now of record) on property to the buyer.

"Time is of the essence of this contract, and, should the buyer fail to comply with the terms hereof, then the seller shall be released from all obligations in law and equity, to convey said property, and the buyer shall forfeit all right thereto and to all moneys theretofore paid under this contract.

Otto H. Neher.

"Milton Kauffman."

On January 4, 1924, the plaintiff and the defendant Kauffman signed and delivered escrow instructions to the Title Insurance & Trust Company for the evident purpose of carrying out the contract of December 11, 1923. These instructions consist of two separate instruments, one signed by the plaintiff, and the other signed by the defendant Kauffman, but they both bear the same date the same title and escrow number. They match one another as to their terms and conditions (with one exception to be hereafter noted), and their contractual terms and conditions are in precise accord with those specified in the contract of December 11, with the following exception, namely: The contract of December 11 does not specify to whom the deed of conveyance is to be made nor in whom the guaranty of title to be furnished by seller shall show the title to be vested, whereas the escrow instructions provide that the deed of conveyance shall be made to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, and that the guaranty of title shall show the title to be vested in such grantee. January 12, 1924, the parties entered into a supplemental agreement in writing, whereby the plaintiff extended the time for the payment of the first $50,000 provided for in the contract and in the escrow instructions from January 15 to February 15, and in consideration thereof the defendant Kauffman agreed to employ the plaintiff to prepare the plans and supervise the construction of a building to be erected upon the premises involved in the transaction. Other than the $10,000 which was paid upon the signing of the contract of December 11 nothing was ever paid by the defendants, either to the plaintiff, or into the escrow. The contract of December 11 was not acknowledged or certified so as to entitle it to be recorded, but on February 15, 1924, defendant Kauffman executed an assignment to defendant Newton of all his right, title, and interest in, to, and under the contract of December 11, 1923, and in, to, and under the escrow of January 4, 1924. To this assignment was attached a copy of the contract of December 11, and the assignment, with the copy attached, having been acknowledged and certified by a notary public, was then filed for record. Upon the following day a similar assignment from Newton to Caldwell was executed, acknowledged, and recorded. Thereupon, and on February 16, 1924, plaintiff asserted a forfeiture by defendants of their rights under the contract, and thereafter brought this action to clear his title of the cloud created by the recordation.

Appellants contend (1) that the vendor failed to perform or tender performance of conditions precedent to or concurrent with performance by the purchaser, and the attempted forfeiture was unauthorized and unavailing; (2) that the findings relative to the terms and conditions of the contract and the performance thereof by plaintiff are not supported by the evidence; (3) that under the showing made in this case it is extremely harsh and inequitable to enforce a forfeiture, and that the vendee and his assigns should be granted relief therefrom under Civil Code, § 3275; and (4) that the court erred in its rulings as to the admission of evidence.

[1-7] It is conceded herein that the vendor cannot successfully claim a forfeiture because of default of the vendee, unless he (the vendor) has performed or offered to perform those conditions upon his part which are precedent to or concurrent with the performance as to which the vendee is claimed to be in default. There is no merit, however, in appellants' contention that the contract of December 11 should be construed as requiring the delivery of a deed of conveyance on December 15, 1923, merely because this was the date specified for the prorating of rent, taxes, and insurance. The contract is not fairly susceptible of such a construction, and, if it were, the conduct of the respective parties is conclusive that they did not so construe, understand, or intend it. There is more reason in appellants' contention that, under the contract of December 11 they are entitled to a deed and a guaranty of title upon the payment of $100,000, and, these conditions being concurrent, the vendor could not put them in default except by tendering performance. If the contract of December 11 were the only writing between the parties, it might be difficult to avoid the conclusion here contended for by appellants, except for the fact that it appears quite clearly from the terms of this contract itself that the parties intended its performance to be consummated through and by means of an escrow. It is provided therein that the first $50,000 is to be paid to plaintiff "outside of escrow"; that the second $50,000 is to be paid to Title Insurance & Trust Company (obviously in escrow); that the buyer is "to pay for escrow fee." When these provisions of the contract are given consideration, in the light of the practical construction placed thereon by the parties in going into escrow with the Title Insurance & Trust Company shortly thereafter for the carrying out of the contract, the intention of the parties is apparent that the deed of conveyance was to be delivered, not to the defendant directly, but was to be delivered into escrow, to be there held and used for his benefit, upon the payment by him into escrow of the money which he was required to pay at the time specified in the contract. It is in evidence that in connection with the escrow a deed of conveyance was prepared by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, was executed by the plaintiff and by his wife as grantors, was acknowledged by them before a notary public, and certified by him and delivered in escrow, where it remained until February 16, when the papers were withdrawn by the plaintiff. This, under the circumstances, was sufficient performance in so far as the delivery of the deed is concerned. Gethin v. Walker, 59 Cal. 502.

It is true that the deed itself was not produced in evidence, the plaintiff testifying that he had made a search for it and was unable to find it. Neither was there any direct evidence as to its contents, other than the fact that the Title Insurance & Trust Company was named therein as grantee. The plaintiff did testify, however, in answer to a question of counsel for defendants as to what he had delivered in escrow, that he had handed in "everything to complete the deal, everything I was required to do." It may be conceded that this testimony was incompetent as involving a conclusion of the witness. It was received without objection, however, and there was no motion to strike it out. There is no evidence in contradiction of it, and there is no suggestion anywhere in the evidence that the nonpayment of the money was due to any claimed defect of title or other failure of performance on the part of plaintiff. It was due solely to the inability of the defendants to raise the money. It cannot be said, therefore, that the finding of performance, in so far as it concerned the delivery of the deed, is unsupported by the evidence. We are unable to conclude that plaintiff's agreement to furnish a guaranty of title was, under the circumstances of this case, a concurrent covenant. It was provided in the escrow instructions signed by the defendant, as well as in those signed by the plaintiff, that the guaranty of title should show the title to be vested in the grantee, the Title Insurance & Trust Company. This could not be done until the deed had been filed for record, and this in turn could not be done until the money had been paid by the defendants. These conclusions render it unnecessary to discuss the point made by the respondent that the defendants, by notifying the plaintiff on February 13 of their inability to perform the contract, relieved him of the obligation to perform or offer to perform on his part. We find no merit in appellants' contention that the court erred in admitting the escrow instructions in evidence, and that these instructions were incompetent to affect the correlative rights and obligations of the parties. These instructions, having been signed on the same day and as a part of the same transaction, are to be read and considered together. When so read and considered, if they contain all of the necessary constituent elements to make a contract, they are to be regarded as a contract in writing between the parties. Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 229 P. 327. It is immaterial whether the escrow instructions herein be regarded as merely supplemental to, and by way of performance of, the contract of December 11, or whether they be regarded as a subsequent contract in writing, modifying the terms of the prior contract. A contract in writing may be modified by a later contract in writing, and the covenants and agreements of one party thereto furnish a sufficient consideration to support the promises and agreements of the other party thereto.

The contention that the instructions herein do not match is predicated upon the circumstance that the plaintiff's instructions contained a provision that, "if you are unable to comply with these instructions within the time specified [2/15/24], said instrument shall be returned to me on my written demand." Defendant's instructions contained a clause providing that, "if you are unable to comply with these instructions by 2/4/24, said money and instrument shall thereafter be returned to me on my written demand." From a reading of defendant's instructions, in the light of the contract of December 11, to which it obviously relates, it is readily inferable that the insertion of the date "2/4/24" was due to a clerical mispision, and that it was intended to insert the date "2/15/24." When, in addition thereto, we read plaintiff's instruction, which is undeniably a part of the same transaction, this inference is the more probable, and we have no doubt that this was the conclusion reached by the trial court.

It follows from what we have said that the court did not err in denying defendants' motion for a nonsuit.

[8-10] Appellant's contention that the trial court should have granted them equitable relief from the forfeiture under the provisions of section 3275 of the Civil Code is predicated upon the allegations of the amendment to their answer and the evidence offered in support thereof. The trial judge expressed himself as of the opinion that the amendment did not state facts sufficient to entitle the defendants to any relief, but nevertheless he permitted the amendment to be filed, and he admitted substantially all of the competent evidence which was offered thereunder by the defendants. The respondent confidently asserts that, if we should give the utmost effect in favor of the defendants to the evidence produced by the upon this issue, it would be insufficient to justify the court in granting the relief sought by them. But that question is not before us. It is the duty of a reviewing court upon appeal to construe the evidence so as to support the judgment, to accept as true that evidence which tends to sustain the findings and judgment (unless it is inherently incredible), and to reject as untrue the evidence which conflicts therewith. Substantially all of the material facts testified to in behalf of defendants in support of their claim for equitable relief were either directly contradicted by the testimony of the plaintiff himself or were inferentially contradicted by the testimony of other witnesses produced by him. The trial court was the exclusive judge of the credibility of these witnesses. If we accept as true the testimony of the plaintiff and his witnesses, we must conclude that the plaintiff did not say or do anything to cause the defendants to believe that they would not be required to pay more than $50,000 on February 15, or to lull them into any false sense of security; that the defendants did not rely upon anything so claimed to have been said or done by the plaintiff, and were not misled thereby, and, furthermore, that, even if the plaintiff had waived the payment of $50,000 on February 15, the defendants would not have been able to pay the remaining $50,000 to be paid on that date, or any substantial portion thereof. In such state of fact there was no error in denying the equitable relief prayed for.

[11-13] It does not appear that the court erred in excluding evidence of the conversations between the parties prior to the making of the contract of December 11. It was not claimed that such conversations would aid in solving any ambiguity or uncertainty in the written contract, and it was not shown to the trial judge, nor has it been made to appear to us, that they would have been material to any issue before the court. If it be assumed that the court erred in excluding testimony as to conversations between the parties subsequent to December 11 and prior to January 12, still it does not appear that appellants could have been prejudiced thereby. The defendant Kauffman was permitted to testify that, at a conversation on January 12, immediately after the signing of the written agreement of that date, the plaintiff orally agreed and promised in effect that he would take an interest with the defendant in the purchase of the property to the extent of $50,000, pursuant to which he would "take care of" or waive the payment of so much of the purchase price. It may be inferred that, if he had been permitted to do so, the defendant would have testified that the plaintiff made a similar promise or parol agreement at a time prior to January 12, but it is difficult to conceive that the defendant's case could have been benefited by such testimony. If such a promise or parol agreement was made prior to January 12, it was negated and supplanted by the written contract executed on that date, which provided, not for the waiver of the payment of $50,000, but for the postponement of the time of payment thereof for a period of one month. The fact is, as evidenced by the finding, that the trial judge did not believe the defendant's testimony upon this subject, and we cannot conclude that his credibility would have been any greater had he been permitted to testify that the plaintiff made similar promises prior to January 12. There was no error in sustaining the objection to the question, "Why didn't you pay Mr. Neher the sum of $100,000 on or before February 15, 1924?" and other similar questions. The question upon direct examination was too broad, and would open the door to all sorts of incompetent and immaterial matters.

[14-18] Complaint is made that the defendant Kauffman was precluded from testifying that he believed in and relied upon the promise which he testified was made to him by the plaintiff on January 12. His testimony as to his own belief and his own reliance was undoubtedly competent. Objections were sustained to a number of questions directed to this point, some of them perhaps erroneously but the defendant was permitted to testify in effect that he depended upon that statement and promise of the plaintiff on January 12, and continued to depend upon it thereafter until February 7, at which time he commenced to doubt that the plaintiff intended to perform his promise. This testimony substantially covered the ground upon this point. All of the rulings upon the admission of evidence which are claimed to have been erroneous related to the special defense pleaded in the amendment to the answer which was filed at the commencement of the trial.

We are in accord with the opinion expressed by the trial judge that this amendment failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a defense or to entitle the defendants to equitable relief. Substantially all of the allegations thereof were no more than mere conclusions of the pleader. No facts were alleged therein from which it would appear that the plaintiff said anything or did anything which would have a tendency to mislead the defendants to their injury, or upon which they would have been justified in relying. During the course of the trial the defendants asked leave to file a second amendment to their answer. The court did not rule upon this request at the time, nor did defendants insist upon a ruling thereon. Some time after the conclusion of the trial a minute entry was made of an order denying this application. We find no error therein. The allowance or disallowance of amendments to pleadings during the course of a trial is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the trial court. Milliken v. Valencia, 47 Cal. App. 16, 189 P. 1049, and cases there cited. But, aside from this, no error can be predicated upon this ruling, for the reason that the defendants never prepared or tendered for filing any proposed amendment.

[19] It is contended that the court made conflicting findings of fact. It is true that the findings are susceptible of a construction which results in a conflict. But they are also susceptible of a construction which eliminates the conflict, and in such case it is the duty of the reviewing court to so construe them that they will harmonize.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LAWLOR, J.; WASTE, J.; SHENK, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LENNON, J.

MARTIN et al. v. HOLM et al. (L. A. 7724.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1925.

Petition for Modification Denied

Jan. 28, 1926.)

1. Evidence — 441(8)—Objection to evidence of representations of grantors as to restrictions properly sustained.

Since as between grantors and their grantees the deeds between them constituted the final and exclusive memorial of whatever intention may have existed, in action to establish and impose general plan of building restrictions, trial court properly sustained objections to testimony as to grantors' oral and written representations at time of and prior to sale of lots by the original owners.

2. Covenants — 69(2)—Building restrictions held, under facts, to be covenants running with land.

Where grantors agreed in sale of lots that subsequent deeds should contain building restrictions, and thereafter lots were sold containing either restrictions or reference thereto, or reference to recorded agreement, restrictive covenants referred to held, under facts, to run with land, and not personal to grantors.

3. Injunction ⇨128—Evidence held to show grantees took lots with notice that restrictions were intended for benefit of entire estate.

Where owners of land sold lots therefrom, and agreed with grantees that subsequent deeds should contain building restrictions, and thereafter sold lots by conveyance containing restrictions or reference to recorded agreement, and subsequently conveyed lots to their children by deeds which contain no restrictions, evidence held to show that children took estate with notice that restrictions were intended for benefit of the entire estate.

4. Covenants ⇨84—Building restrictions may be created on a division and conveyance in severalty to different grantees.

Building restrictions providing for location of residences on lot and minimum cost thereof are in the nature of reciprocal negative easements, and may be created on a division and conveyance in severalty to different grantees of an entire tract.

5. Injunction ⇨62(3)—Covenants to warrant equitable relief restriction need not be binding at law.

To warrant equitable relief in case of infraction of building restriction on entire tract of land, it is not essential that it should be binding at law, nor that any privity of estate should exist between the parties, jurisdiction attaching on ground that an action at law will not do complete justice in case where performance was contemplated by the parties.

6. Injunction ⇨62(1)—Restrictive covenants enforced, where subsequent purchaser takes with notice.

Personal covenants or agreements, bestowing benefits and imposing restrictions on use of land, may be enforced in equity, where a subsequent purchaser from covenantor takes with notice of an existing equitable claim or interest in favor of another.

7. Injunction ⇨62(1)—Equity in proper case enforces personal covenant or agreement relative to land.

Where a proper case is presented, equity will enforce a personal covenant or agreement relative to land as effectually as would a court of law had the covenant been one clearly running with the land.

8. Judgment ⇨681—Judgment in former suit held res adjudicata as to the validity of building restrictions.

Where some of defendants in former action to determine validity of building restrictions were plaintiffs in the instant action, and the remaining plaintiffs were successors in interest of former defendants, and defendants in present suit were children and grantees of plaintiffs in former suit, and the question of building restrictions was the same issue, judgment in former suit as to validity and force of building restrictions held res adjudicata.

9. Judgment ⇨682(1)—Defendants by notice of judgment took lots bound by building restrictions.

In suit to establish general plan of building restrictions, principal defendants, having notice of judgment in former action between their grantors and plaintiffs, held, under facts, to have taken lots bound by covenants concerning the land entered into by their grantor, question of such building restrictions having been the issue in the former action.

10. Lis pendens ⇨13—Judgment conclusive between parties and their successors in interest having notice of pendency of action.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1908, 1911, a judgment or order is, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, conclusive between the parties and their successors in interest by title subsequent to commencement of action, litigating for the same thing under the same title and in the same capacity, provided they have notice, actual or constructive, of pendency of action.

11. Judgment ⇨634—Estoppel by judgment, not limited to form of action, invoked when parties are in privity with parties to first action and same issue is presented.

Estoppel created by judgment of court of concurrent jurisdiction directly on a point is not limited to an action which is identical in form with the former action, or where same parties are plaintiff and defendant in each action, but may be invoked when in second action the parties are in privity with the parties to the first action, and the same issue is presented which was determined in former suit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by James R. Martin and others against Louisa Holm, executrix of the last will and testament of Ferdinand Holm, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Chandler P. Ward and Howard W. Wright, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, and H. E. Forster, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Plaintiffs brought this action to establish and impose a general plan of building restrictions upon certain lots owned in fee by the defendants, who are the children, and heirs and grantees, of the original owners of a subdivided tract of land, and who are erecting buildings for business purposes in an alleged strictly residential tract. Trial was had before the court sitting without a jury, and the parties entered into a written stipulation by which the essential facts are agreed upon. Judgment was entered for the defendants, and plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

In 1904 Ferdinand and Emma Holm, husband and wife, were the owners of a parcel of land, since subdivided, and now known as "Robert Marsh & Co.'s Western Heights tract in the city of Los Angeles." On January 26th of that year, but before any subdivision was had, the owners sold a portion of the land, now lots 12 and 13 in the tract, to James R. Martin. At the time, and as part of the transaction, an agreement was entered into which reads as follows:

"Know all men by these presents that we, Emma Holm and Ferdinand Holm, of the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, are held and firmly bound unto James R. Martin, of the same place, in the sum of $5,000.00 gold coin of the United States of America, to be paid to the said James R. Martin, his executors, administrators, assigns, for which payment well and truly to be made we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors and administrators, firmly by these presents, sealed with our seals and dated this 26th day of January, 1904.

"The condition of the above obligation is such that whereas, the said Emma Holm is the owner in fee simple of the following described real property situate, lying and being in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California: [Description of property.]

"Whereas, said Emma Holm and Ferdinand Holm, her husband, have sold and conveyed to James R. Martin a portion of the above-described real property [describing same], for the sum of $5,000, in hand paid by said James R. Martin.

"Whereas, as a further consideration of said sale, Emma Holm and Ferdinand Holm have agreed and do hereby agree to cause a subdivision to be made of the premises herein first above described, and duly record the map of such subdivision in the office of the county recorder of said county, to be known as the Western Heights tract, and conform in all respects to that plat of said premises attached hereto and made a part hereof, in which the premises conveyed to said James R. Martin and secondly herein described, shall be known to be lots 12 and 13 of such subdivision located at the northwest corner of Western avenue and Twentieth street, having a frontage of 156 feet on Western avenue, with a depth of 165 feet on Twentieth street.

"That all deeds conveying lots in said subdivision shall contain building restrictions providing that during the period of 30 years, no residence costing less than $4,000 shall be located on any lot facing on Washington street, Twentieth street, or Twenty-First street, and not less than $5,000 on any lot facing on Western avenue. That such dwellings shall face the street upon which said dwelling is erected and not otherwise, and shall not be placed at a less distance than 30 feet from the property line of said lots, and that no flats, hotels, rooming houses, lodging houses, stores or business houses of any nature or description shall ever be placed or erected upon any of said lots.

"Now the condition of this obligation is such that, if the above bounden Emma Holm and Ferdinand Holm, their heirs, executors and administrators shall and will cause said subdivision to be made and accepted and recorded, and shall and will observe the building restrictions, shall and will fill the said lots, and grade and gravel, curb and sidewalk said property within the time and in the manner herein set forth and provided, without cost or expense to the said James R. Martin, then this obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue.

Emma Holm,
"Ferdinand Holm,"

This agreement, which will be hereinafter referred to as the "Holm-Martin agreement," was recorded shortly after its execution in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. The tract was subdivided, and a map of the subdivision, but containing no matter by way of creating restrictions on the property, was duly filed and became of record. On the 27th of October, 1904, Emma Holm and Ferdinand Holm sold and conveyed to William Miles, Sr., since deceased, lots 16 and 17 of the tract. The deed to Miles, which was also duly recorded, contained the following stipulation:

"Provided, however, that this conveyance is made and accepted upon each of the following conditions, which shall apply to and be binding upon the grantee, his heirs, devisees, executors, administrators and assigns, namely: That said premises shall be used for residence purposes only; that no apartment house, double house, flat, lodging house, hotel, nor any building or structure whatever other than a first-class private residence of at least two stories in height with the customary outbuildings, including a private stable, shall be erected, placed or permitted on said premises, or any part thereof, that such residence shall cost and be fairly worth not less than $5,000, which residence shall not nor shall any porch or projection therefrom, except steps, be located less than 35 feet from the front line of said premises, and shall face the front line of said premises, namely, on Twentieth street; that no outbuilding or private stable shall be erected, placed, or permitted upon said premises at a distance of more than 30 feet from the rear line of said premises, nor until such a resident shall have been erected on said premises.

"Provided, that as to the grantor herein the breach of any of the foregoing conditions shall cause said premises to revert to the said grantors, their heirs and assigns, each of whom respectively shall have the right of immediate re-entry upon said premises in the event of any such breach; and as to the owner and the heirs, devisees, executors, administrators or assigns of any owner of any other lot or lots in said Western Heights above described, adjoining the above-described premises, the above-mentioned conditions shall operate as covenants running with the land, for the benefit of all such adjoining lots and owners of such adjoining lots in said tract, their heirs, devisees, executors, administrators or assigns, and the breach of any such covenant or the continuance of any such breach may be enjoined, abated, or remedied by appropriate proceedings by any or either of such owners, their heirs, devisees, executors, administrators, or assigns.

"Provided, also, that the breach of either of the foregoing conditions or any re-entry by reason of such breach shall not defeat or render invalidate the lien of any mortgage or deed of trust made in good faith for value as to said land, and any such residence, outbuilding, or private stable located as above provided, or any part thereof; provided, however, that the breach of either of said conditions or the continuance of any such breach may be enjoined, abated, or remedied by appropriate proceedings, and provided, also, that each of the foregoing conditions shall remain at all times in full force and effect as against any owner of said premises, or any part thereof, by reason of any breach thereof by any such owner, whether such ownership is acquired by purchase, foreclosure, devise, inheritance, or in any other manner.

"And it is further covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the parties of the first part will not and they hereby agree not to grant, sell, or convey any interest in or to any part or parcel of the Western Heights tract, as the same is delineated and shown upon a map thereof recorded in book 5, page 155, of Maps, in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, without inserting in the grant thereof each and every of the covenants and restrictions herein contained, and the parties of the first part further covenant and agree that any subsequent grant of any of the above-described property shall be subject to all covenants and restrictions herein contained.

"Provided, that all and each of the restrictions and conditions and covenants herein contained shall in all respects terminate and end, and be of no further effect, either legal or equitable, either on any property in said Western Heights, or on the parties hereto, their heirs, devisees, executors, administrators or assigns on and after January 1, A. D. 1944."

Subsequently, Ferdinand Holm and Emma Holm conveyed to various grantees many lots of the tract; the deed in each instance containing a reference to the "Miles deed form of restrictions," or setting forth the same in identical, or substantially identical, language. The deed to one lot contained the language: "Subject to building restrictions now of record." Deeds to other lots contained substantially the language of the "Miles deed form of restrictions," excepting as to the time of expiration of the restrictions. Another deed contained the language: "Subject to any existing incumbrance appearing of record." The deeds to other lots contained the following restrictions:

"This conveyance is made and accepted subject to the following conditions and restrictions, which shall bind the grantee, their heirs, devisees, executors, administrators, or successors, and in the event of the breach of any of the said conditions or restrictions said premises hereby conveyed shall revert to the grantor, its successors or assigns, each of whom respectively shall have the right to immediately re-enter upon said premises in the event of such breach. The said conditions and restrictions shall operate as covenants running with the land for the benefit of all adjoining lots and the owners of all such adjoining lots in said tract, their heirs, devisees, executors, administrators, successors or assigns; it being expressly understood that said condition and restrictions hereinafter contained shall in all respects terminate and end, and be of no further effect, either legal or equitable, after January 1, A. D. 1939, and that the breach of any of said conditions or restrictions, or any re-entry by reason of such breach, shall not defeat or render invalid the lien of any mortgage or deed of trust made in good faith for value as to said land.

"No apartment houses, double house, flat, lodging house, hotel, or any building or structure other than a first-class private residence to cost and be fairly worth not less than $7,000, and shall be located not less than 35 feet from the said front line of any lot, and only one residence shall be placed on a lot, and shall face the said front line thereof; namely, on Washington street.

"The said premises shall not be conveyed or transferred to any person or persons other than of the white or Caucasian race, nor shall any oil wells or machinery for conducting any business whatever be permitted thereon."

On the 6th day of September, 1910, Ferdinand Holm, in consideration of love and affection, conveyed to his wife, Emma Holm, lots 9, 10, and 11 of the Western Heights tract. The deed contained no restrictions, and made no reference to any restrictions as to the use of the property thereby conveyed. Emma Holm subsequently conveyed the three last-mentioned lots, in consideration of love and affection, to her three children, the defendants Adolph, Louisa, and Lillian S. Holm. This deed likewise contained no restrictions and no reference thereto.

After the tract was laid out and placed on the market, and prior to the commencement of this action, many residences were erected and improvements of great value were made. These residences and improvements complied with the requirements of the Holm-Martin agreement and the stipulations contained in the deed to Miles. They also conformed to and complied with all the requirements contained in the several deeds executed by Emma and Ferdinand Holm to the respective purchasers. The defendants Adolph Holm, Louisa Holm and Lillian S. Holm have, at various times since September, 1920, leased to parties, who are defendants here, certain portions of lots 10 and 11, and the lessees erected and maintained thereon certain buildings, in violation of, and contrary to, the purported restrictions. On the day of the filing of the complaint in this action the defendants had commenced the erection of another store building on lot 11, and at the date of the trial had completed and were maintaining it in violation of the restrictions. These buildings, to be used for business purposes, were erected over the written protest and objections of the various plaintiffs, served on the defendants, who, at the time of the service of the notice, and now, dispute the right of the plaintiffs to assert any such restrictions, and deny the validity thereof.

The foregoing facts present the basis for the actual controversy and dispute which has arisen between plaintiffs and defendants relating to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties to this action which reference to the alleged building restrictions in the Western Heights tract, and the obligation of the defendants to preserve and abide by and comply with the same. It is the contention of the defendants that the property in the tract is not burdened with building restrictions of any sort whatsoever.

[1] In support of their right to the relief prayed for, appellants rely, first, and in part, on estoppel, based on oral and written representations, made at the time of and prior to sales of lots by the original owners, to the effect that the entire Western Heights tract was restricted against business uses. As plaintiffs in the court below, they therefore attempted to show that, when the tract was subdivided and the lots were placed on sale, maps and literature were given to prospective purchasers, and to those who bought lots, which contained information concerning the character of the purported restrictions. The trial court very properly sustained the objection of the defendants to the admission of any such evidence. The original owners may have had a general plan of restriction in mind. They may have led the various grantees to believe that the alleged restrictions were executed as part of a general scheme; but it is not the intent of the grantors that governs in such cases. It is the joint intent of the grantors and their grantees. As between the grantors and each of their grantees, the deeds between them constitute the final and exclusive memorial of whatever intention may have existed. Berryman v. Hotel Savoy Co., 160 Cal. 559, 566, 117 P. 677, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 5; McBride v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 152, 156, 215 P. 678. In Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 185, 183 P. 945, 949, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Olney, said:

"This whole discussion may in fact be summed up in the simple statement that if the parties desire to create mutual rights in real property of the character of those claimed here [building restrictions] they must say so, and must say it in the only place where it can be given legal effect, namely, in the written instruments exchanged between them which constitute the final expression of their understanding."

[2] As further supporting their claim that all the lots in Western Heights tract are subject to the building restrictions, appellants rely upon the conditions set forth in the Holm-Martin agreement, and the terms and stipulations contained in the many deeds executed by Ferdinand and Emma Holm to purchasers of lots in the tract. It is not claimed by the appellants that the Holm-Martin agreement, in and of itself, effected a restriction upon any of the property owned by the Holms at the time of its execution.

They concede that, as between the parties thereto, it amounted to a mere personal covenant which did not run with the land, but argue that, because it was subsequently referred to in many, if not all, of the deeds from the Holms to other purchasers in the tract, it is important as an expression of the intention of the owners of the property with respect to the manner in which the tract should thereafter be subdivided and restricted. The contention that valid building restrictions, amounting to covenants running with the land, were created by the execution of the various deeds by Ferdinand and Emma Holm to the subsequent purchasers of lots in the tract presents the vital question raised by the appeal.

The respondents contend, and the trial court was apparently of the view, that the facts of this case brought it squarely within the facts and the rule applied in Werner v. Graham, supra. We do not think so. In that case the court said (page 183 [183 P. 949]):

"It is undoubted that when the owner of a subdivided tract conveys the various parcels in the tract by deeds containing appropriate language imposing restrictions on each parcel as part of a general plan of restrictions common to all the parcels and designed for their mutual benefit, mutual equitable servitudes are thereby created in favor of each parcel as against all the others. The agreement between the grantor and each grantee in such a case as expressed in the instruments between them is both that the parcel conveyed shall be subject to restrictions in accordance with the plan for the benefit of all the other parcels and also that all other parcels shall be subject to such restrictions for its benefit. In such a case the mutual servitudes spring into existence as between the first parcel conveyed and the balance of the parcels at the time of the first conveyance. As each conveyance follows, the burden and the benefit of the mutual restrictions imposed by preceding conveyances as between the particular parcel conveyed and those previously conveyed pass as an incident of the ownership of the parcel, and similar restrictions are created by the conveyance as between the lot conveyed and the lots still retained by the original owner. Of this character is Alderson v. Cutting, 163 Cal. 504, 126 P. 157, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1."

In the Alderson Case referred to, the tract had been platted by its owners for purposes of sale. The plaintiff and the defendant were purchasers of adjoining lots after the subdivision. All deeds made by the owners contained provisions relating to the location and kind of buildings which might be placed upon the lots. Each of the deeds also declared that the conditions stated should, as to each owner of any other lot in the tract, his heirs, successors, or assigns, operate as covenants running with the land for the benefit of such other lots, or their owners. The court held that the validity of the restrictions involved was not open to question, and that in case of their violation relief might be sought by the owner of any lot in the tract for the benefit of which the restrictions were imposed.

In the case now before us, and aside from the Holm-Martin agreement, we have the deed of the owners of the subdivided tract to Miles, incorporating most clearly and directly a general plan of building restrictions operating "as covenants running with the land, for the benefit of all such adjoining lots and owners of such adjoining lots in said tract, their heirs, devisees, executors, administrators or assigns." As indicative of the fact that the restrictions were intended to be covenants running with the land, and not merely conditions on which the conveyances were made, and that it was not intended that the original grantors, their heirs or assigns should alone have the right to act, it was further provided that—

"The breach of any such covenant or the continuance of any such breach may be enjoined, abated, or remedied by appropriate proceedings by any or either of such owners, their heirs, devisees, executors, administrators or assigns."

In further confirmation of the fact that the original grantors had in mind a general plan of building restrictions for the tract, and intended it for the benefit of all the lots, including their own, we find the personal covenant contained in the deeds that they will not convey any interest in any part or parcel of the Western Heights tract without inserting in the grant thereof the covenants and restrictions contained in the Miles deed, and the owners "covenant and agree that any subsequent grant of any of the * * * property shall be subject to all covenants and agreements herein contained." On the execution of this deed a mutual servitude sprang into existence between lots 16 and 17, conveyed to Miles, and the adjoining lots. As the various conveyances from the original owners followed, each, by appropriate reference or language, imposing the same restrictions as those contained in the Miles deed, the burden and the benefit of the mutual restrictions imposed by the preceding conveyances, as between the particular parcel conveyed and those previously conveyed, passed as an incident of the ownership of the particular parcel, and similar restrictions were created by the conveyances as between the parcel conveyed and the adjoining lots still owned by the original owners of the tract. Werner v. Graham, supra. See, also, note to Stevenson v. Spivey, 132 Va. 115, 110 S. E. 367, found in 21 A. L. R. 1276. We are, therefore, unable to agree with the conclusion of the trial court that the language contained in the deeds from the original grantors to their several grantees, other than the respondents, created only personal covenants, and not covenants running with the land, and have no force and effect. The phraseology of the covenant here in question indicates that it was for the benefit of the adjoining property. The deeds executed by the original owners of the tract in this case have not been brought here, but we think it follows, from the stipulated facts reflected in the findings as to what covenants and references to covenants already of record were contained in those instruments, that each purchaser from the owners was aware of the plan, and took with the understanding that all the deeds were to contain the covenant, and bought with that consideration in view. Furthermore, they had constructive notice of the Miles deed. These facts do not admit of the contention that the covenant was only for the advantage or benefit of the grantors, or that it was other than for the benefit of all the lands and each purchaser. De Gray v. Monmouth Beach, etc., Co., 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 340, 342, 24 A. 388. See, also, Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co., 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 A. 14.

[3, 4] The deed from Ferdinand Holm to his wife, Emma, of lots 9, 10, and 11 contained no restrictions, no reference to any, and none were contained or referred to in the deed from Emma Holm conveying the same property to her children, the respondents Adolph Holm, Lillian S. Holm, and Louisa Holm. The final and important question is, therefore, Are these lots which are the subject of this litigation burdened with the restrictions imposed by the general scheme laid out by the original owners for the improvement of the entire tract? The law is well settled that building restrictions of the character shown are in the nature of reciprocal negative easements, and may be created upon a division and conveyance in severalty to different grantees of an entire tract.

"Although some of the lots may have written restrictions imposed upon them and others not, if the general plan has been maintained from its inception, if it has been understood, accepted, relied on, and acted upon by all in interest, it is binding and enforceable on all interest. It goes with the land, and is equally binding on all purchasers with notice." Allen v. City of Detroit, 167 Mich. 464, 469, 133 N. W. 317, 319 (36 L. R. A. [N. S.] 890).

[5] But to warrant equitable relief in case of infraction of such restriction it is not essential that it should be binding at law, or that any privity of estate should exist between the parties. Jurisdiction attaches upon the ground that an action at law for damages will not do complete justice in cases in which it appears from the character and purpose of the contract that its performance was contemplated by the parties, and not merely damages for the breach. In such a case the complaint of the parties seeking to restrain the injurious breach of the restrictions is somewhat in the nature of a bill quia timet, in which equity acts to prevent a mischief rather than to redress it. Lewis v. Gollner, 129 N. Y. 227, 234, 29 N. E. 81, 26 Am. St. Rep. 516. In another case it was said:

"Upon this point, the better opinion would seem to be that such agreements [building restrictions] are valid, and capable of being enforced in equity against all those who take the estate with notice of them, although they may not be strictly speaking real covenants, so as to run with the land, or of a nature to create a technical qualification of the title conveyed by the deed. This opinion rests on the principle that, as in equity that which is agreed to be done shall be considered as performed, a purchaser of land, with notice of a right or interest in it, subsisting in another, is liable to the same extent and in the same manner as the person from whom he made the purchase, and is bound to do that which his vendor had agreed to perform." Whitney v. Union Railway Co., 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 359, 363 (71 Am. Dec. 715).

The rule is the same in this jurisdiction.

[6, 7] As was pointed out in McBride v. Freeman, supra, at page 155 (215 P. 678), there can be no doubt that even personal covenants or agreements bestowing benefits and imposing restrictions upon the use of land may be enforced in equity, where a subsequent purchaser from the covenantor takes with notice of an existing equitable claim or interest in favor of another. Where a proper case is presented, equity will enforce a personal covenant or agreement relative to land as effectually as would a court of law had the covenant been one clearly running with the land. Hunt v. Jones, 149 Cal. 297, 300, 86 P. 686, 688. In that case the court quoted from Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) §§ 688 and 689, viz.:

"The third, and, in its practical effects, by far the most important rule is, that a party taking with notice of an equity takes subject to that equity. The full meaning of this most just rule is, that the purchaser of an estate or interest, legal or equitable, even for a valuable consideration, with notice of an existing estate, interest, claim or right, or to some subject-matter, held by a third person, is liable in equity to the same extent and in the same manner as the person from whom he made the purchase; his conscience is equally bound with that of his vendor, and he acquires only what his vendor can honestly transfer. * * * A purchaser with notice of a prior contract to sell or lease takes subject to such contract, and is bound in the same manner as his vendor to carry it into execution. * * * On the same principle, if the owner of land enters into a covenant concerning the land, concerning its uses, subjecting it to easements or personal servitudes and the like, and the land is afterwards conveyed or sold to one who has notice of the covenants, the grantee or purchaser will take the premises bound by the covenant, and will be compelled in equity either to specifically execute it, or will be restrained from violating it; and it makes no difference whatever with respect to this liability in equity whether the covenant is or is not one which 'in law runs with the land.'"

See, also, Bryan v. Grosse, 155 Cal. 132, 135, 99 P. 499.

Holm may argue that, because of the absence of restrictions in their deed, or reference therein to a plan showing a general scheme of improvement, they took their estate without any notice, express or constructive, that the restrictions which are the subject of the present controversy were intended for the benefit of the entire estate. Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir, 136 Cal. 36, 50, 68 P. 308, 313. The evidence and the findings point convincingly to the fact that they had such notice of the covenants that they took their estate bound thereby, and should be restrained from violating them. They are the owners of but 3 out of the 53 lots into which the tract was subdivided by their father and mother. Before they acquired these lots from their mother, they knew that the property in the tract, including lots 9, 10, and 11, were burdened with the restrictions. While the trial court found that it was not true that the respondent children became the owners of the lots with either actual or personal knowledge of the existence of any agreement creating restrictions on the property, that finding is based solely on its construction of the provisions in the various deeds executed by the original owners of the tract, and its conclusion that the provisions in the various deeds to plaintiffs, or their grantors, were only personal covenants, and did not amount to covenants running with the land. The court did find, however, that the defendants became the owners of the lots with actual as well as constructive knowledge of the Holm-Martin agreement, and with constructive knowledge of the contents of the "Miles form of deed," and the contents of the deed. It also found that in the year 1914, which was before the respondents acquired any interest in lots 9, 10, and 11, Ferdinand and Emma Holm, then owning lots 9, 10, and 11, united with the owners of lots 1 to 8, inclusive, as plaintiffs in an action brought in the superior court of Los Angeles county (James v. Martin, No. B13343), the purpose of which was to remove restrictions and to quiet title of the plaintiffs against the claims of the defendants, many of whom are the plaintiffs here, that building restrictions had been imposed on all the lots in the tract by the Holm-Martin agreement, the Miles form of deed, and the subsequent deeds from Ferdinand and Emma Holm to their grantees. The defendants there answered setting up as a defense substantially the claims they now assert as plaintiffs in this action. Ferdinand Holm died, and this respondent Louisa Holm, his executrix, was substituted as a party plaintiff in the action in his stead. After due trial, the court found that each and every lot in the tract owned by the plaintiffs and defendants in the action, which included lots 9, 10, and 11 owned by Ferdinand and Emma Holm, were within the description set forth in the Holm-Martin agreement, and that many of the deeds contained "other, further, and different and more stringent provisions for building restrictions." Judgment was entered for the defendants, and no appeal was taken. This judgment was rendered before Emma Holm deeded lots 9, 10, and 11 to her children, and the trial court, in the present action, found that the respondents here, "Louisa, Adolph and Lillian S. Holm, each had actual knowledge of such judgment," which finding is supported by the evidence.

[8] Appellants contend that the judgment in James v. Martin, determined that lots 9, 10, and 11 are subject to the restrictions sought to be established in this case. The respondents concede that, if such effect is to be given to the judgment, the issue has become res adjudicata, and that this is so whether or not the judgment was based on an erroneous interpretation of the law, as no appeal was taken. They earnestly contend, however, that the issues tendered by the third amended complaint in James v. Martin, and by the matters set up in the answer thereto, were not the same as those presented in the controversy here. We are of opinion that the issues in the two cases are substantially the same. The pleadings and the findings in the former action establish practically the facts relied on by appellants here. The same agreement, the same deeds, and the same covenants were pleaded there, and found to exist as are pleaded and found to exist in the present action. Some of the defendants in the former action are plaintiffs here. The remaining plaintiffs here are the successors in interest of the former defendants by title subsequent. The principal defendants here are the respondent children of Ferdinand and Emma Holm, who were plaintiffs in the quiet title suit. The parties are here litigating the same issue; namely, the question of the building restrictions. The language of the judgment in James v. Martin is—"that the building restrictions as set forth in the third amended complaint and in the answers of the defendants * * * are binding upon the property therein described and are in full force and effect."

[9-11] It must follow, therefore, that by reason of the notice they had of the judgment in James v. Martin, the respondents, Adolph Holm, Louisa Holm and Lillian S. Holm, took lots 9, 10, and 11 bound by the covenants concerning the land entered into by their grantor. We are also of opinion that by reason of the judgment in the former suit the issue as to the validity and force of the building restrictions imposed on the lots in the Western Heights tract has become res adjudicata. A judgment or order is, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, conclusive between the parties and their successors in interest by title subsequent to the commencement of the action, litigating for the same thing under the same title and in the same capacity, provided they have notice, actual or constructive, of the pendency of the action. That is deemed to have been adjudicated in a former judgment which appears on its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1908, 1911. The validity and effect of the building restrictions here under consideration were actually and necessarily included in the judgment rendered in James v. Martin. The estoppel created by the judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon a point is not limited to an action which is identical in form with the former action, or where the same parties are plaintiff and defendant in each of the actions, but may be invoked whenever, in the second action, the parties are in privity with the parties to the first action, and the same issue is presented for determination which was determined in the former suit. Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 91, 93, 77 P. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66.

The judgment is reversed.

4. Prohibition ☞10(1)—Province of writ of prohibition is to arrest proceedings of inferior tribunal when without or in excess of jurisdiction.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, the sole province of writ of prohibition is to arrest proceedings of inferior tribunal or persons exercising judicial functions without or in excess of jurisdiction.

5. Appeal and error ⚡458(3) — Court may suspend operation of injunction, regardless of which party is plaintiff or defendant.

Superior court, in exercise of jurisdiction, may suspend operation of injunction until appeal is determined, regardless of which party is the plaintiff or the defendant, as equitable jurisdiction is the same in one case as in the other.

6. Trial ⚡400(1) — Court has jurisdiction to change conclusions of law to conform to decree intended to be entered.

Where court, after making findings of fact and conclusions of law granting injunction, decided to suspend operation of injunction, if essential to validity of decree intended to be entered that conclusions of law specify effective date of injunction as upon determination of appeal, court would have jurisdiction to change its conclusions of law accordingly, as under Code Civ. Proc. § 664, judgment or decree is ineffectual for any purpose until entered.

7. Judgment ⚡504(1), 518 — Prohibition ⚡11 — Inconsistency between conclusions of law and judgment may be remedied only by direct attack on judgment; erroneous judgment not subject to collateral attack by prohibition.

Any alleged inconsistency between conclusions of law and judgment may be remedied only by a direct attack on the judgment, and not by prohibition which is a collateral proceeding subject to rules governing collateral attack.

8. Injunction ⚡193 — Order staying injunction, made after entry of decree, becomes part thereof, and operates concurrently therewith.

Separate order made by court staying injunction after entry of decree in conformity with conclusions of law, while strictly not part of decree, would be in effect part thereof and operate concurrently therewith.

9. Appeal and error ⚡458(3) — Trial court considers question of maintaining status quo only as guide in exercise of its discretion.

Question of maintaining status quo of parties arises only in consideration by trial court of rules which should guide it in the exercise of its discretion, and does not go to jurisdiction of court to determine question one way or other.

10. Constitutional law ⚡316 — Eminent domain ⚡2(1) — Suspending operation of injunction pending appeal not violative of due process of law nor taking of property without adequate compensation.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1049, action is deemed pending until its final determination on appeal; hence suspending operation of injunction pending an appeal therefrom is not deprivation of property without due process of law and without adequate compensation, contrary to Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and Const. Cal. art. 1, § 14.

Application by the Tulare Irrigation District for a writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of California in and for Tulare County and Albert Lee Stephens, Judge. Writ denied.

W. R. Bailey and Farnsworth, McClure, Burke & Maddox, all of Visalia, H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, and Wheaton A. Gray, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Sloss & Ackerman, of San Francisco, W. G. Irving, of Riverside, and Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain respondent court and judge from making an order suspending a permanent injunction pending appeal.

It appears from the petition that, on July 15, 1916, an action was commenced in the superior court of Tulare county by some of the petitioners, but not by all of them, against the Lindsay-Strathmore irrigation district, the purpose of which was to obtain a permanent injunction restraining the defendant irrigation district from pumping water from a tract of land in Tulare county known as the Rancho de Kaweah, and from conveying said water away from said lands and away from the watershed of the Kaweah river for use in the irrigation of lands in the defendant district.

It was alleged in the complaint in said action that the Tulare irrigation district is a political subdivision and body corporate, organized and existing under and by virtue of the Irrigation Act of 1887 (Stats. 1887, p. 29); that the defendant Lindsay-Strathmore irrigation district is also a political subdivision and body corporate, organized and existing under and by virtue of the Irrigation Act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 254) and situated wholly within the county of Tulare, about 12 miles in a southerly and southeasterly direction from McKay Point, and embracing within its boundaries about 14,000 acres of land, divided into numerous private holdings; that from time immemorial the Kaweah river had flowed and does now flow from its source in the Sierra Nevada Mountains in the county of Tulare in a westerly direction to McKay Point, where it forks or divides, the northerly channel being known as the St. John's river, and the southerly channel as the Lower Kaweah river and Mill creek; that said river forms a distinct watershed on the western slope of said mountains until it reaches McKay Point; that from that point it spreads out through its numerous branches into what is known as the Kaweah delta, until it is many miles in width from north to south, and which comprises approximately 300,000 acres of land; that in this delta are located the cities of Visalia, Tulare, and other towns, and many hundreds of farms upon which are growing fruit trees, timber, alfalfa, and other agricultural crops, and upon which there are thousands of people and large numbers of live stock; that all of said farms and lands and people require the whole of the water of the Kaweah river, both surface and subterranean flow, for irrigation and domestic uses; that the underground flow is necessary to furnish a foundation for the surface water flowing in said river and its branches and the ditches and channels leading therefrom, and to hold up the underground water table beneath the surface of said lands in order to make the same productive; that the lowering of said water table or underground flow will gradually diminish the productive qualities of said lands; that the lands adjoining said delta, including the lands embraced within the boundaries of the Lindsay-Strathmore irrigation district, are higher than the lands in said delta, and are composed mostly of adobe and clay; that water will not readily seep through the same, and that the impervious condition thereof confines the surface and underground waters of said river to the said delta; that the Tulare irrigation district is the owner of the Tulare irrigation district canal leading out of the St. John's river; that some of the petitioning ditch owners are appropriators of water from the Lower Kaweah river, some are appropriators from both of said rivers, and that the petitioners, other than the ditch companies, are the owners of the lands riparian to either one or the other of said rivers; that all of said owners and appropriators were such prior to 1915, and have continuously used said water except as such use has been interfered with by the defendant district; that, within six months prior to the commencement of said action, the defendant district contracted to purchase and went into the possession of, and claimed to own, a tract of land known as the Rancho de Kaweah, comprising about 1,100 acres, and situated about 4 miles from McKay Point and lying on both sides of the Lower Kaweah river and within one-half mile from the St. John's river; that said Rancho de Kaweah overlies the underground body of water of said delta; that, immediately after the defendant district took possession of said Rancho de Kaweah, it bored 3 wells in different locations therein to a depth of 100 feet down into said underground body of water, and obtained a large quantity of water therefrom; that said wells were bored for the purpose of the irrigation of lands within the boundary of the defendant district and conducting the same outside of said watershed; that said defendant threatens to and will, if not restrained by the court, bore 37 more wells, and construct pumping plants thereon, for the purpose of pumping water from said wells for irrigation purposes on the lands of the district; that, if the defendant be permitted to bore said wells and construct said pumping plant and take said water, the water so taken will substantially diminish the quantity of water in said underground body of water otherwise available to the plaintiffs, to the irreparable injury and damage of the plaintiffs; that the defendant district has no right to take any of said waters away from said watershed or to diminish the surface or underground flow of said Kaweah river for the purpose of supplying the lands of the said district with water for irrigation or other uses.

It further appears from said petition that during the pendency of said action numerous other parties appeared as interveners and set forth their alleged rights substantially in the same form as the original plaintiffs in said action. The defendant in due time filed its answer to the complaint, and to the complaints in intervention, in which it put in issue generally and specifically the allegations of the complaint; denied that the underflow waters of the Kaweah river are necessary to supply water for the irrigation of the lands of the complainants; and alleged that, except immediately below the bed of said river and of said streams, there is no underflow thereof; denied that any part of the underflow waters of said river were necessary or available for use in irrigating the lands of the complainants; and alleged that, underlying the surface of the lands of the complainants and of said delta, is a broad body of diffused and percolating water, many miles in width, moving at right angles to the surface contours of said lands and at various depths beneath the surface of the same, which water does not constitute any portion of the underflow of said river or streams, and eventually drains into the trough of the valley, and is lost for any and all useful purposes; admitted that it owned the Rancho de Kaweah, and had bored 3 wells prior to the commencement of said action, and that it has subsequently bored 34 wells upon its said lands, and is pumping as much as 55 cubic feet of water per second from said wells; and alleged that, subsequent to the commencement of said action, it constructed its irrigation system at a cost to it of approximately $1,600,000, and has by means of said system caused the water pumped from said wells to be conveyed to lands within said district for the irrigation and domestic use of thousands of people living thereon, and that the aggregate amount of waters pumped from said wells was 13,500 acre feet during the season of 1918, and 14,800 acre feet during the season of 1919; denied that it had or will cause any injury or damage to the complainants in pumping the amount of water it has been pumping or any amount not in excess of 25,000 acre feet; denied that any water taken by it not in excess of 25,000 acre feet would substantially or at all diminish the quantity of water in the said underground body of water alleged to be available to the complainants. In the event that the court should find that the defendant, by reason of its said pumping operations, was causing any diminution in the amount of the water which would naturally flow in said streams, the defendant prayed that the court apportion said waters so that it may take the maximum of 25,000 acre feet, and it is alleged that water in that amount can be taken from the wells of the defendant and conveyed to the lands within defendant district without interfering with the rights of the complainants. It is further alleged that all of the lands embraced within the boundaries of the defendant district are susceptible of a high decree of cultivation, and that more than 14,000 acres thereof are susceptible of the cultivation and growth of oranges and other citrus fruits; that more than 9,000 acres thereof are planted to citrus fruits, and that more than 7,500 acres are now in bearing; that said citrus fruits cannot be grown or produced without irrigation; that there is no other source of supply of water for irrigation of said lands within said district other than the water produced by the pumping operations in and upon the said Rancho de Kaweah; that, if the defendant becomes unable to use said water by reason of an injunction in said action or otherwise, the trees, fruits, and vegetables growing on said lands will die, and all of said lands will become arid and waste.

The allegations and denials of the pleadings as above epitomized somewhat in detail show the extent of the issues involved in the litigation, and indicate the importance of the problem confronting the trial judge when called upon to exercise the discretion which the defendant irrigation district contends he may and should exercise in its favor.

One phase of this litigation has heretofore been before this court. Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 187 P. 1056. The decision in that matter, filed February 12, 1920, effected a mistrial. A retrial was commenced before the respondent judge on the 28th day of November, 1921. Evidence was taken comprising some 27,000 pages of typewritten transcript and many hundreds of exhibits. After argument, the cause was submitted for decision on the 8th day of February, 1924. On May 16, 1925, the respondent judge signed and filed his findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the plaintiffs. Before filing the same, he announced that such would be his decision, whereupon counsel for the defendant district on May 7, 1925, served and filed a notice of motion wherein it was recited that the defendant had been advised that the court intended to enter a decree enjoining the defendant from taking water from its wells on the Rancho de Kaweah; that in good faith it intended to perfect and prosecute an appeal from said judgment to this court; and that, if said judgment be enforced pending appeal, said appeal in any event would be of no avail; and notice was given that the defendant would move the said court, before the entry of said decree, for an order to be incorporated in said decree or made concurrently therewith suspending the operation of said injunction pending the appeal to this court. The said motion came on to be heard and was argued on May 15, 1925, the day before the findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed. On the following day, to wit, May 16th, the said findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed as aforesaid and the court took under advisement the motion of the defendant for an order staying the injunctive relief. Thereafter, on the 14th day of July, 1925, the respondent judge announced that it was his intention to grant said motion, and that the same would be granted on the 28th day of July following, whereupon this petition was filed on July 24, 1925, pursuant to which an alternative writ of prohibition was issued.

In the answer and return subsequently filed the respondent judge, among other things, alleges that certain of the petitioners, complainants in said action, were not parties thereto at the time of the commencement thereof; that they were made parties at later dates, to wit, some on the 14th day of June, 1920, some on the 20th of November, 1920, and the last one on the 15th day of January, 1921. It is further alleged that the construction of the plant and system of wells, pumps, pipe lines, canals, and other works constructed by the defendant district had been commenced and prosecuted to a considerable extent prior to the commencement of said action on July 15, 1916, and that said works were substantially completed by the defendant district during the year 1917, and were in full operation and use in the month of April, 1918, long before the first appearance of numerous parties plaintiff in said action whose names are set forth in said answer and return.

At the time of the commencement of said action, no application was made by the plaintiffs for a preliminary injunction, and no action was taken by the plaintiffs for injunctive relief until the 14th day of March, 1921, when application was made to the respondent court for a preliminary injunction restraining the defendant district from taking or diverting any of the underground waters underlying the Rancho de Kaweah or any of the surface waters of the Kaweah river as it passes through said rancho away from said lands at any time when there should be flowing in the Kaweah river at McKay Point not to exceed 1,140.7 cubic feet of water per second. Thereafter, on April 6, 1921, the said court made its order that the defendant should, pending the determination of said action, be permitted to operate its pumps on the Rancho de Kaweah, on condition that it restore to the channel of the Kaweah river, at all times when the flow of said river at McKay Point should be less than 1,144 cubic feet per second, such quantity of water, not to exceed 15 cubic feet per second, as added to that then flowing at McKay Point would equal 1,144 cubic feet per second, except that such restoration need not be made between the 15th day of November of each year and the 15th day of the following April, and that a preliminary injunction be issued, restraining the defendant from taking or diverting any underground water underlying the Rancho de Kaweah away from said lands, excepting at the times and in the manner above stated. Thereafter, on or about the 25th day of August, 1921, a preliminary injunction was issued by said court in accordance with said order, was served on the defendant, and has ever since been in full force and effect except as to a modification thereof favorable to the defendant, made on the 24th day of August, 1922.

It is further alleged in said answer and return that it is the intention of the respondent judge, unless prohibited from so doing by this court, to determine and grant the defendant's motion for a suspension of said injunction pending appeal, said order for suspension to be contained in the judgment hereafter to be entered in said action or to be made concurrently with the entry of said judgment, and to continue pending an appeal to this court, and that it is his intention in making such order to impose upon the defendant such terms and conditions as to him may seem just and equitable, and which terms and conditions will, in his opinion and judgment, provide adequate security for compensating the said complainants for any damage or loss they may suffer by reason of such operations by said defendant pending appeal, in the event that such judgment should be affirmed on appeal or the appeal therefrom be dismissed.

It is further alleged that, in the trial of said action, many complicated questions of law and of fact were involved, and were presented to the trial judge; that he has decided such issues of law and fact in accordance with his best judgment; that he is of the opinion and believes that the defendant district is advised by its counsel that it has good and meritorious grounds of appeal from the judgment to be entered against it, and that he believes the said district intends in good faith to prosecute such appeal; that he believes that a number of questions of law and fact, decided and found by him in his findings and conclusions on file, and material to said judgment, are novel, and that the said district should in justice and equity have an opportunity to test the correctness of said judgment by taking an appeal therefrom. The respondent judge further alleges that, after a careful consideration of all the evidence in the case, "if an injunction absolutely restraining defendant from taking water by means of wells and pumps from the Rancho de Kaweah, or otherwise, as directed by the conclusions of law filed in said action, and as intended to be incorporated in the decree to be made and entered in said action, shall be enforced pending an appeal by said defendant from such judgment, any appeal by said defendant from such judgment would be entirely nugatory and without value to said defendant."

It is further alleged that the lands within the defendant district require water for irrigation in order to make them productive or valuable for any purpose other than pasturage; that said lands are highly developed, the greater part thereof being planted to citrus trees which cannot be grown or maintained without sufficient water for irrigation; that said lands so planted to citrus trees, aggregating 9,000 acres or thereabouts, are of the value of $1,250 an acre, if supplied with sufficient water, but, without water for irrigation would be of not to exceed $50 an acre; that other lands within said district are planted to valuable crops which require irrigation; that there is no adequate supply of water within said district for the irrigation of said lands, and that there is no available supply elsewhere which could be developed and brought to said lands within many months, or at all, if such decree of injunction shall be enforced immediately and remain effective; that, if such injunction be put into force and effect pending an appeal from said judgment, the defendant district will, during the pendency of such appeal, be unable to supply adequate water within said district to irrigate the trees, plants, and crops growing thereon; that the citrus and other trees growing upon the irrigated part of said lands in said district will die and be destroyed, the majority of the lands within said district will become arid and waste, and the plant and system for the pumping and transporting of water from the Rancho de Kaweah to said district and for the distribution thereof to said lands within said district, constructed by the district at a cost of $1,600,000 or thereabouts, will be rendered useless and of little or no value.

It is further alleged that, if said injunction be put in force and effect during the pendency of said appeal, and the said district should succeed in obtaining a reversal of said judgment, such reversal would be utterly useless and without value or benefit to the appellant. It is also alleged that, from a consideration of all the evidence in the case, the respondent judge believes that the loss and inconvenience which would be suffered by the complainants in said action from the continuation of the pumping by the defendant during the pendency of said appeal under proper terms and conditions to be imposed as a part of any order suspending said injunction would be relatively small, as compared with the loss and damage to the district from the enforcement of such an injunction pending an appeal, and that such loss and damage to complainants for the period of the pendency of the appeal could be compensated in money, and the payment of such compensation could be adequately secured; that the respondent judge is informed and believes that a suspension of the operation of such injunction pending an appeal would not destroy any right of the complainants, or any of them, established or protected, or to be established or protected by the judgment so to be entered.

The petitioners contend that the respondent court is wholly without jurisdiction to make said order. The question therefore is: Has the superior court the power, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to suspend the operation of an injunction to which it has decided the plaintiff is entitled, pending an appeal from the judgment?

[1,2] It is conceded by all parties that there is no statutory authority in this state for the exercise of such power. It is also conceded that, where not prohibited by statute, the superior court, under section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, has all the jurisdiction in equity which was possessed by the English Courts of Chancery on July 4, 1776. Prior to 1772 the Courts of Chancery of England did not exercise the power to suspend proceedings in equity pending appeal, for the reason that the taking of the appeal had that effect. But since that time the contrary rule has prevailed. Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 150, 160, 3 S. Ct. 136, 27 L. Ed. 888. The modification of the rule was brought about by the exercise by the Chancery Courts of the power to enforce their judgments, orders, and decrees, or some portions thereof, notwithstanding the appeal. In 1807 a committee of the House of Lords was appointed to inquire into decrees in equity and reported:

"That according to very ancient practice in this House, appeals to this House were considered by the House as staying proceedings in the courts of equity, the orders, judgments, or decrees, of which had been called in question by such appeals, and that such practice in very remote times might obtain without much inconvenience in the administration of justice. The committee, however, finds, that for a very long course of years past the courts of equity have never forborne to proceed, notwithstanding appeals against their orders, decrees, or judgments, and with knowledge that such appeals had been lodged in this House, except in cases in which their judicial discretion has induced them, upon the application of parties interested, to stay or modify such proceedings on account of such appeals; and that such habitual practices of the courts of equity have frequently and repeatedly fallen within the knowledge and under the observation of this House, whilst the appeals were depending therein. The committee therefore conceive, that, according to the present practice of this House, appeals do not stay proceedings in such courts in the causes, in which the appeals are made; and that such causes may be proceeded on in the courts of equity, unless such courts should make order thereon to the contrary in causes in which they may be applied to for that purpose, or unless, in special cases, this House should interpose by special order; and the committee, attending to the nature of proceedings in courts of equity, and the numerous appeals, which in each cause may be lodged in this House against the orders and decrees of the court, and the effect, which the suspension by appeals of their proceedings must have, are of opinion, that the practice as now understood, cannot be departed from without introducing consequences the most oppressive to the suitors in courts of equity, and the utmost inconvenience in the administration of justice in such courts."

This report was agreed to by the House of Lords. Waldo v. Caley, Willan v. Willan, 16 Ves. 206, 216, 33 Eng. Reprint, 723. Lord Chancellor Eldon refers to the rule in the following language:

"Now, however, it is settled by the highest authority, that of the House of Lords itself, that an appeal from a court of equity to that House does not stay execution of the decree; but it is consistent with that regulation, that a special application may be made either to the House of Lords, or to the court below, with this observation: That it is much more expedient that the application should, if it can, be made to the House, than to the court below, as the order upon that occasion, may be the subject of appeal, and it is difficult to determine how far appeals may go." Hugeunin v. Baseley, 15 Ves. Jun. 180, 33 Eng. Rep. 723.

It therefore appears that "for a long course of years" prior to 1807 the English courts of chancery exercised the power to stay proceedings in equity pending appeal. The petitioner has cited no case or historical treatise, and we have discovered none, which holds or indicates that such power was not exercised as early as 1772, and we find no authority for holding that they did not possess that power more remotely, even though they did not exercise it. Indeed, as early as 1697 it is intimated in Horner v. Popham, 1 Eng. Reprint, 152, that on an appeal from the House of Lords to Parliament, the House of Lords would have authority to stay proceedings in equity pending appeal. In speaking of the English chancery practice, it is stated, in Daniel's Chancery Pleading and Practice (6th Am. Ed.) at page 1469, that an appeal does not stop or hinder any proceedings on the decree or order appealed from unless by special order of the court. It is further stated that the court will in some cases, upon special application of the appellant, suspend the proceedings under a decree pending an appeal.

The Earl of Halsbury, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain for nearly 20 years, says in his work on the Laws of England, vol. 17, p. 211, § 465, under the title "Injunction":

"An appeal does not operate as a stay of execution or of proceedings under the decision appealed from, except so far as the court appealed from or any judge thereof or the court of appeal may direct; and no intermediate act or proceeding will be invalidated except so far as the court appealed from directs. * * * If irreparable damage will be done to the appellant in the meantime, the operation of the injunction may be stayed on terms."

The purpose of the stay or postponement of the effective date of the injunction is to protect appellant from having his right of appeal rendered nugatory or merely nominal if he should succeed. Monkhouse v. Corporation of Bedford, 17 Vessey, Jr., 380, 34 Eng. Rep. 147; Walford v. Walford, L. R. 3 Ch. Appeals, 812; Polini v. Gray, 12 Ch. Div. 438. The last case cited was an equitable action to determine the rights of claimants to a fund. The plaintiffs failed in the court of first instance and prosecuted an appeal. They contended that, if they should ultimately succeed in the House of Lords, that success would be useless to them unless an interim order were made for preserving the fund. Assuming the contention to be correct, the court said:

"The question is whether this court has jurisdiction to prevent such a consequence. It appears to me on principle that the court ought to possess that jurisdiction, because the principle which underlies all orders for the preservation of property pending litigation is this, that the successful party in the litigation, that is, the ultimately successful party, is to reap the fruits of that litigation, and not obtain merely a barren success. That principle, as it appears to me, applies as much to the court of first instance before the first trial, and to the court of appeal before the second trial, as to the court of last instance before the hearing of the final appeal."

See, also, Attorney General v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, vol. 4, Ch. Appeals, 146; Attorney General v. Proprietors of the Bradford Canal, vol. 2, Equity Cases, 71; Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., 2 Ch. 388.

It has been generally held by the courts of the United States and by the courts of the several states where the matter is not controlled by statute that courts of equity possess the power here contended for by the respondents. In recognition of such power, the Supreme Court of the United States in 1878 promulgated the rule wherein it provided that:

"When an appeal from a final decree, in an equity suit, granting or dissolving an injunction, is allowed by a justice or a judge who took part in the decision of the cause, he may, in his discretion, at the time of such allowance, make an order suspending or modifying the injunction during the pendency of the appeal upon such terms as to bond or otherwise as he may consider proper for the security of the rights of the opposite party."

Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 150, 161, 3 S. Ct. 136, 27 L. Ed. 888.

The respondents have cited numerous other cases which support their contention. Quotations from them would appear to be superfluous. A citation of some of them will suffice. Leonard v. Ozark Land Co., 115 U. S. 465, 6

S. Ct. 127, 29 L. Ed. 445; In re Haberman Mfg. Co., Petitioner, 147 U. S. 525, 13 S. Ct. 527, 37 L. Ed. 266; American Strawboard Co. v. Indianapolis Water Co., 81 F. 423, 26 C. C. Dunn*, 18 Idaho, 450, 110 P. 258.

But the case of State ex rel. Burrows v. Superior Court, supra, is so directly in point both as to the law and the facts as to entitle it to particular notice. It was an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court of the state of Washington from entering an order suspending a prohibitory injunction pending an appeal to the Supreme Court. The plaintiffs in the pending action were the owners of an improved stock farm through which a navigable fresh-water river flowed. The defendants maintained a log boom on the river below the farm which at times obstructed the flow of the river so as to back up the water and cause the same to overflow the farm lands. The plaintiff brought an action to perpetually enjoin the defendant from maintaining the obstruction. After trial on the merits, the court announced its findings and conclusions in favor of the plaintiffs. Before findings and conclusion were signed and filed and before judgment was entered, the defendants applied to the trial court for an order suspending the injunction pending appeal. The trial judge announced that he would make such an order on terms, but delayed making it pending an application to the Supreme Court for the writ of prohibition. The findings of fact and conclusions of law and the decree were then signed and entered. It was conceded, as it is here conceded, that there was no statute authorizing the trial court to grant such a stay. It was contended by the respondent superior court, as it is urged by the respondents here, that independent of the statute, the trial court, by virtue of its equity jurisdiction, had inherent power to suspend the operation of the injunction pending the appeal. The court said:

"The power of the trial court in this respect is the question presented upon this hearing.

This court has repeatedly held that the trial court would not be required by mandate to order a stay or fix a bond which should operate to supersede a prohibitory injunction pending appeal, and that a statutory supersedeas could not stay such decree. [Citing cases.] * * * The trial court in this case is a court of general equity jurisdiction. * * * It has all the powers of the English Chancery Court, and may grant and enforce its decrees in such manner as the justice of the particular case requires. The power of suspending the operation of injunctive decrees has frequently been exercised by courts of general chancery jurisdiction. [Citing cases.] * * * We have no doubt of the inherent power of a court of original jurisdiction to grant a suspension of injunctive decrees pending appeal, where justice may require it, and where the status of the parties is not changed, providing such right is not taken away by statute. Our statute does not deny such power."

The writ of prohibition was denied.

In 22 Cyc., at page 970, under the title of "Injunctions," the writer says:

"The court may in its discretion suspend the operation of an injunction. It may in the very decree itself provide that the operation of the injunction shall be stayed for a certain length of time or until the happening of a condition, and it is within the discretion of the court to stay the operation of the decree pending an appeal therefrom, until the hearing of the appeal on the merits."

See, also, 32 C. J. 388; 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) note, p. 440 et seq., and cases cited.

[3] It must therefore be said that the Chancery Courts in England have from an early day exercised the power to suspend or stay injunctions until an appeal may be heard and determined. It must also be said that courts of equity in the United States, both state and federal, when uncontrolled by statute, have exercised the same power. It follows that the superior court in this state likewise possesses that power.

The petitioner contends that the case of United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 755, 151 P. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199, denies such power in the superior court, but such is not the case. In that proceeding it appeared that the superior court in an injunction suit pending before it had granted, on application of the plaintiff, a preliminary injunction pursuant to section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, restraining the defendant from performing certain acts during the pendency of the action. Thereafter and before the trial of the cause on its merits the defendant made application to that court for an order "staying the operation of the preliminary injunction" theretofore issued "until the final and full determination" of the cause. The plaintiff then filed a petition in this court for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from entertaining and passing upon the defendant's application. As stated in the opinion, the only question presented for determination by the court was this:

"In view of the provisions of our law, constitutional and statutory, has a superior court, which, by order duly and regularly made upon notice and hearing, has granted a temporary or provisional injunction absolutely restraining a defendant from the commission of certain acts during the pendency of the action, without reserving any right of revocation or modification, the power to subsequently make an order staying the operation of said injunction until the final determination of the cause, or until a contemplated appeal from said order has been heard and determined?"

The question was answered in the negative, and the court said:

"It is declared by our Civil Code that 'provisional injunctions are regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure' (Civ. Code § 3421). By sections 525 to and including 533 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in a title headed 'Provisional Remedies in Civil Actions,' there is provided a full and complete system of law and procedure as to granting, refusing, modifying and dissolving temporary injunctions. It is clearly and unequivocally provided therein in what cases such an injunction may be granted and in what cases it may not be granted. * * * From what we have said as to our statutory provisions on the subject of such injunctions [temporary injunctions], it is manifestly our opinion that they unequivocally have the effect of precluding any such exercise of power on the part of the trial court." (Italics added.)

It is strongly intimated in the above-quoted question which this court framed as the only one for determination, that, if the order for the preliminary injunction had contained a provision reserving to the court the right to revoke or modify the preliminary injunction which it was then ordering, such power could have been reserved. We do not decide that question, for it is not involved here, but the intimation fortifies the conclusion that the only theory upon which that case was decided was that, in view of our statutory provisions regulating and providing a "full and complete system of law and procedure as to granting, refusing, modifying and dissolving temporary injunctions," and without reserving to itself the right to revoke or modify such an injunction, the court's power in the premises had spent its force and been exhausted.

[4] Further with reference to the scope of our Code provisions relating to injunctions, it is said in 14 Cal. Jur. at pages 296 and 297:

"The Code provisions regulating injunctions do not curtail the general grant of equity power vested in the superior courts by the Constitution nor affect their general chancery power to preserve the fruits of a possibly successful litigation to appellants from an adverse judgment against them. It follows that the superior court has equitable jurisdiction at the time of rendering judgment for the defendant, either to continue in force a preliminary injunction so as to maintain the status quo of the subject-matter of the litigation pending an appeal, or to make an original injunction order at such time restraining the successful party pending such appeal from interfering with appellant's property, notwithstanding the right to a perpetual injunction, which was the primary object of the action, may be denied by the judgment itself."

This statement is supported by the citation of authorities in this state, but is based particularly on the leading case of City of Pasadena v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 781, 109 P. 620, 21 Ann. Cas. 1355. Both the petitioners and the respondents herein cite and rely on that case. The petitioners contend that the rule laid down there is exclusive, that is to say, that it sanctions the power of the superior court to enjoin the defendant pending an appeal where a permanent injunction is denied, but that it does not constitute, and impliedly denies, authority in the superior court to suspend the operation of a permanent injunction pending an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The respondents contend that there is no distinction in principle between staying the hand of the defendant in behalf of the plaintiff, when the court has decided that the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction, and staying the hand of the plaintiff in behalf of the defendant when the court has decided that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, and that in each case the power is referable to the same equitable jurisdiction of the trial court. We agree with the respondents that there is no distinction between the power exercised by the court in the Pasadena Case and the power which the respondents herein intend to exercise. Lord Justice Cotton said, in the case of Polini v. Gray, 12 L. R. Ch. Div., at page 446:

"I see no difference in principle between staying the distribution of a fund to which the court has held the plaintiff not to be entitled, and staying the execution of an order by which the court has decided that the plaintiff is entitled to a fund."

That there is no such distinction may be readily comprehended, if it be assumed that the parties to the action pending in the respondent court be reversed; in other words, let it be supposed that the Lindsay-Strathmore irrigation district, feeling itself aggrieved because of a threatened interference with its water supply on the part of the Tulare irrigation district, had brought an action for a permanent injunction to restrain the latter from interfering with the rights of the plaintiff, and, upon a trial on the merits, the court should have found that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction, and should dissolve a temporary injunction theretofore issued. In such a case it would readily be conceded, under the authority of the Pasadena Case, that the trial court would have jurisdiction to issue an injunction to restrain the defendant from a threatened interference with the plaintiff's rights pending appeal. The same result would be accomplished as is intended to be accomplished in the action now pending where the parties are reversed, namely, to preserve from destruction the property of the appellant pending final determination of the case on appeal. It should be remembered that we are here dealing with a question of jurisdiction, for it is the sole province of the writ of prohibition to arrest proceedings of an inferior tribunal or persons exercising judicial functions when without or in excess of jurisdiction. Code Civ. Proc. § 1102; 21 Cal. Jur. 583, and cases cited.

[5] It would appear self-evident that the question of jurisdiction would not depend upon which litigant happened to get into court first. There is therefore no doubt that the court may exercise its jurisdiction regardless of which party is the plaintiff or the defendant, and that the equitable jurisdiction is the same in the one case as in the other.

[6-8] To his findings of fact, the respondent judge appended his conclusions of law, wherein he decided that the complainants were "entitled to a judgment and decree of this court, determining their respective rights, as aforesaid, and to a perpetual injunction of this court forever enjoining and restraining the said defendant," etc., but, as above noted, no such judgment or decree has been entered. It is the contention of the petitioners herein that the signing of the decree in accordance with the findings and conclusions is merely a ministerial act, and that no decree may now be signed and entered except in strict conformity with said conclusions of law. In ordinary actions at law, it is, of course, the rule that the signature of the judge is not necessary to the validity of the judgment (14 Cal. Jur. 914, and cases cited), but "it has been the almost invariable custom in this state for decrees in equity to be so signed" (Byrne v. Hoag, 116 Cal. 1, 5, 47 P. 775). Ordinarily the judgment or decree is ineffectual for any purpose until entered. Section 664, Code Civ. Proc.; Consolidated Const. Co. v. Pac. Elec. R. Co., 184 Cal. 244, 193 P. 238; 14 Cal. Jur. 937. Until the decree is entered, it is merely a purpose in the breast of the court, and may be changed as the judge may determine. 14 Cal. Jur. 916. Indeed, at any time before the entry of the decree, the court may change its conclusions of law upon the facts that have been found. Condee v. Barton, 62 Cal. 1; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 489, 26 P. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491. If, therefore, it be essential to the validity of the decree intended to be entered by the respondent judge that the conclusions of law specify the effective date of the said injunction as upon the determination of the appeal favorable to the respondents, the court would have jurisdiction to change its conclusions of law accordingly, for no judgment or decree has yet been entered. But in our view of the matter such a change would be unnecessary, especially as affecting the result of the present proceeding, for two reasons: First, because any alleged inconsistency between the conclusions of law and the judgment may be remedied only by a direct attack on the judgment (Crim v. Kessing, supra), and not by prohibition which is a collateral proceeding, subject to the rules governing a collateral attack excepting in cases not material here (21 Cal. Jur. 604); and, secondly, if the said decree be entered in exact conformity with the conclusions of law, the court would have the power by a separate order, made concurrently with the entry of the decree, staying the injunction pending appeal, and such order, while strictly not a part of the decree, would be in effect a part thereof and operate concurrently therewith. City of Pasadena v. Superior Court, supra; United Railroads v. Superior Court, supra, 764.

[9] The petitioners further contend that the making of the contemplated order will not preserve the status quo of the subject-matter of the litigation, but will preserve a condition which the defendant district has deliberately created since the action was commenced. This contention is based on the fact that additional wells were bored on the Rancho de Kaweah, expensive improvements were constructed by the defendant district and vast improvement of land areas took place after the commencement of said litigation. The contention is also based on the rule that ordinarily when the status quo is referred to the status at the commencement of the action is in contemplation. The respondents insist that this rule should not be applied to the situation of the defendant district, for the reason that numerous parties complainant in said action were not parties thereto until long after the completion of the works by the defendant, and that the asserted rule should not operate to the benefit of those who were not in litigation with the defendant district until after the said works were completed. It is unnecessary to here solve that problem, for, assuming that the rule as contended for by petitioners is correct, it is not invariable as an examination of the authorities discloses. Concerning the rule that should apply in a proceeding identical with the present one, the Supreme Court of Washington said, in State ex rel. Burrows v. Superior Court, supra:

"Justice to litigants usually requires that the status of the parties at the time of the judgment should be maintained pending appeals."

See, also, Chester Traction Co. v. Philadelphia W. & B. R. Co., 174 Pa. 284, 34 A. 619.

This is especially true when no preliminary injunction was sought by the plaintiffs until some 5 years after the commencement of said action (Johnson v. Seabury & Johnson, 69 N. J. Eq. 696, 61 A. 5), since the legitimate function and purpose of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo until, upon final hearing, the court may grant full relief (Beach on Injunctions, § 112; Powhatan Coal & Coke Co. v. Ritz, Judge, 60 W. Va. 395, 56 S. E.

257, 9 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1225). Where statutes have been enacted, regulating or controlling the powers of the court concerning discretionary supersedeas on appeal in injunction proceedings it has been provided that "the status existing immediately before the entry of the judgment appealed from shall be maintained." Jones v. Walter (Ky.) 70 S. W. 191, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 878. We are in accord with the contention of respondents that the question of maintaining the status quo only arises in the consideration by the trial court of the rules which should guide it in the exercise of its discretion, and does not go to the jurisdiction of the court to determine the question one way or the other. Other rules may also be considered by the trial court. Counsel for petitioners state that, in the numerous cases examined by them with reference to the power of courts of equity to stay or suspend prohibitory injunctions pending appeal, they find that such power was exercised under one or the other of the following conditions, or for one or the other of the following purposes:

"(1) To preserve the status quo as it existed at the commencement of the action; (2) to preserve the subject of the litigation pending the appeal; (3) the stay was authorized by express statute."

It is thus impliedly conceded by petitioners that the preservation of the status quo as it existed at the commencement of the action is not the exclusive function of the order. The function of the contemplated order sought by respondents may therefore reasonably fall within the second purpose, viz. to preserve the subject of the litigation pending the appeal. While, strictly speaking, the subject of the litigation as disclosed by the allegations of the complaint in the pending action is the right of the defendant district to take water from the Rancho de Kaweah, but, under the allegations of the answer in said action, and the showing made by the answer and return herein, the subject of said litigation includes also the preservation from destruction of the extensive property and works of the defendant district and the valuable improvements on the lands within the district; just as in the Pasadena Case the subject of the litigation from the standpoint of the city was the naked right of the plaintiff in that action to maintain its telephone poles and wires in the streets of the city, but from the standpoint of the said defendants the preservation of its physical properties was also involved. From the trial court's standpoint, under such circumstances, the one right may not be considered apart from the other.

[10] Finally, it is contended by the petitioners that the making of the contemplated order will deprive them of their property without due process of law and without adequate compensation. Obviously there is no merit in this contention. The said action is still pending and will be deemed pending until its final determination on appeal. Section 1049, Code Civ. Proc. We, of course, express no opinion as to the merits of the appeal, but it may not be gainsaid that reversals do occur. For the purpose only of the consideration of this contention of the petitioners in this proceeding, it may be said that the asserted rights of the petitioners may never be established. If they do not finally prevail, it may not be said that they have presently such a vested right in the property in the litigation as may be protected under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and section 14 of article 1 of our Constitution, as against a valid order or judgment of the court finally deciding that their alleged claims are unfounded. This contention of the petitioners assumes that their rights have been finally adjudicated, which of course is a false premise, as such rights are still in litigation. A similar contention was made in State ex rel. Burrows v. Superior Court, supra, where it was held to be untenable. See, also, 15 Cal. Jur. 121, 122.

In his verified answer and return to the alternative writ herein, the respondent judge states, as above noted, that in making the contemplated order he intends to impose upon the defendant and appellant such terms and conditions as to him may seem just and equitable, and that such terms and conditions will, in his judgment, provide adequate security for compensating the complainants on account of any damage or loss which the latter may suffer by reason of the operations of the defendant district pending appeal, in the event the judgment be affirmed or the appeal dismissed, and that without the contemplated order any appeal by the defendant "would be entirely nugatory and without value" to said defendant. He arrives at these conclusions "after careful consideration of all the evidence in the case." Contemplating the results which he sets forth as attending the consequences of an immediately effective injunction, it may properly be said, as was said in the Pasadena Case, as page 795, 109 P. 626; "Common fairness and a sense of justice readily suggests" that, while the defendant in good faith is prosecuting its appeal, it "should be in some manner protected in having the subject-matter of the litigation preserved" until the appellate court can settle the controversy. The exercise of the power which the respondents propose to exercise is "incidental to the right of appeal," and the contemplated order may be deemed a part of the injunction itself. See American Trading Co. v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 770, 772, 222 P. 142. To recognize the constitutional right of the defendant to an appeal from the judgment, and at the same time to deny the right of the trial court, which it unquestionably possesses in the action pending before it, to prevent the appeal from becoming nugatory, would be in effect to deny the right of appeal.

It is unnecessary to pass upon other points raised by the parties in view of the conclusions herein expressed.

The peremptory writ is denied, and the proceeding is dismissed.

MAY v. HUNT, HATCH & CO. et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 21, 1925.)

1. Sales — 418(5)—Measure of damages for seller's breach when part payment made stated.

Where buyer paid part of purchase price, on seller's breach, buyer was entitled, under Civ. Code, § 3308, to recover excess of value of property to him over amount which would have been due seller had contract been fulfilled, and findings awarding buyer payment made in addition thereto was erroneous.

2. Sales — 418(1)—Interest not recoverable until time of entry of judgment, where amount of plaintiff's claim not ascertained until then.

As amount of buyer's claim for seller's breach of contract on which part payment had been made was not ascertained until judgment was entered, plaintiff's right to interest did not arise until then.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action for breach of contract by Chas. W. May against Hunt, Hatch & Co., a corporation, and another. From a judgment against it, Hunt, Hatch & Co. appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Fred Mansur, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George Beebe and J. Marion Wright, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The trial court awarded a judgment against the defendant corporation, based on a breach of contract to deliver four carloads of grapes which the plaintiff alleged he had bought from the defendant. From that judgment the defendant has appealed and has brought up the judgment roll. The appellant attacks the manner in which the judgment was made up, and also the amount of the judgment. We think that the attack is well founded, and that the judgment must be reversed.

In his complaint the plaintiff alleged that he bought from the defendant four carloads of Zinfandel grapes at $110 per ton, and that he paid down $1,000, and agreed to pay the balance of said purchase price on delivery of said grapes. The record does not disclose how many tons constituted a carload, nor what was the total amount of the purchase price.

The trial court made findings as follows:

"IV. By reason of the failure, neglect, and refusal of the defendant Hunt, Hatch & Co. to sell and deliver said grapes to plaintiff so agreed to be sold and delivered as aforesaid, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $1,320, same being the excess of the value of said grapes to plaintiff, which value is and was the value of $6,160, over the amount which would have been due to defendant under said contract if the same had been fulfilled, which amount was and is the sum of $4,840.

"V. That defendant Hunt, Hatch & Co. have failed and neglected to return to plaintiff the sum of $1,000 so paid by plaintiff on the purchase price of said grapes, as aforesaid, and has never returned or repaid same to plaintiff, and by failure to return same plaintiff has been damaged in the further sum of $1,000, with interest thereon from September 7, 1920."

[1] The plaintiff evidently omitted to carefully read the statute before framing his complaint, and thereafter allowed the trial court to frame its findings carrying out the same error. The statute defining the measure of damages to be followed in such a case is:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a seller's agreement to deliver personal property, the price of which has not been fully paid in advance, is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer, over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract, if it had been fulfilled." Civ. Code, § 3308.

When the plaintiff and defendant made the contract in suit and the plaintiff paid the defendant $1,000 on account, there remained "due to the seller under the contract, if it had been fulfilled," not the full purchase price, but the purchase price less $1,000. When this court reads the finding, "over the amount which would have been due to defendant under said contract if the same had been fulfilled, which amount was and is the sum of $4,840," this court sees that the finding as written exactly follows the wording of the statute, and this court must assume that the $1,000 had been deducted. If it had been deducted then it is patent as the appellant contends that, in finding No. V., the trial court erroneously allowed for the second time to the plaintiff the sum of $1,000. That being so, the appellant was clearly prejudiced to the extent of the $1,000.

[2] In making findings and preparing the judgment the parties seem to have had considerable trouble over the item of interest. When section 3308 of the Civil Code is properly construed, the question regarding interest on the initial payment is eliminated from the case. As the amount of the plaintiff's claim was not ascertained until the judgment was entered, plaintiff's right to interest did not arise till the time of the entry of judgment. American-Hawaiian, etc., Co. v. Butler, 17 Cal. App. 764, 121 P. 709.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to rewrite its findings, following section 3308 of the Civil Code as construed by this court, and to find the ultimate facts as they appear to the trial court in the light of the evidence that was heretofore introduced by the parties, and thereafter to enter judgment accordingly.

DILLON v. PRUDENTIAL INS. CO. OF AMERICA et al. (Civ. 5211.)

1. Automobiles ⇨244(4)—Finding driver was agent within scope of employment sustained.

Evidence held to sustain jury's findings that defendant automobile driver was agent of codefendant insurance company, and using automobile within scope of his employment, at time of collision with plaintiff's car.

2. Automobiles ⇨193(8)—Automobile held reasonable means for conveyance of insurance agent.

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision, automobile driven by defendant insurance agent, assigned district of over 200 square miles, and permitted by codefendant employer to select any reasonable means of traveling about, held reasonable means of conveyance.

3. Automobiles ⇨245(4)—Scope of employment of driver held for jury.

Whether defendant automobile driver was acting within scope of employment by codefendant insurance company at time of collision with plaintiff's car, and use of automobile in performance of his duties was reasonably contemplated, were questions of fact, jury's determination of which will not be disturbed, where submitted under appropriate and explicit instructions.

4. Automobiles ⇨194(2)—Insurance company's collector and solicitor held agent, not independent contractor.

One collecting insurance premiums, soliciting policies, etc., under detailed regulations from insurance company and agreement to give entire time between specified hours to carrying out its instructions, paid weekly salary, and subject to discharge at any time, held not an independent contractor, but an agent of such company, which was liable for injuries due to his negligent operation of automobile.

5. Automobiles ⇨193(8)—Insurance agent's use of automobile held authorized.

Where a district of over 200 square miles was assigned to insurance agent, some means of conveyance, such as automobile, with which damages sued for in action against him and insurance company were inflicted, was impliedly authorized.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1066—Superfluous instructions correctly stating law not prejudicial.

In action against automobile driver and his employer for damages caused by collision with plaintiff's car, superfluous instructions, correctly stating law of principal and agent, could not have prejudiced defendants.

7. Automobiles ⇨245(4)—Whether driver was employee or subcontractor held for jury.

Conflicting inferences from facts held to warrant submission to jury of question whether driver of automobile colliding with plaintiff's car was subcontractor or employee of codefendant insurance company.

8. Automobiles ⇨244(2)—Finding of negligence causing collision sustained.

Evidence held to justify finding that defendant negligently drove automobile colliding with plaintiff's car at street intersection.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Benjamin K. Knight, Judge.

Action by W. P. Dillon against the Prudential Insurance Company of America and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Philip M. Carey, of Oakland, and Elliott Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them for $10,000, in an action brought to recover for personal injuries to plaintiff and damage to his automobile, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant McDonald in operating his automobile while he was engaged upon the business of the other defendant, Prudential Insurance Company.

On behalf of the defendant and appellant Prudential Insurance Company it is urged that defendant McDonald was not such an agent or employee of his codefendant company at the time of the accident as to enable plaintiff to invoke the doctrine of respondeat superior; that McDonald was not acting as agent for the company at the time of the accident, because he was on his way to and had not reached the place of his employment; that the use of the automobile by McDonald was not within the scope of his employment. Those questions of fact were all submitted to the jury under most comprehensive instructions, and the jury has decided them in favor of the plaintiff. It only remains to us, upon appeal, to find in the record some substantial evidence justifying these findings.

[1] We shall set forth the facts which undoubtedly influenced the jury in reaching its conclusions and which sustain those conclusions. Defendant McDonald was working for the defendant company under a contract which required him to give his entire time to the business of the company. He was to work 8 hours each day, from 8 in the morning until 4 in the afternoon. His duties were to collect premiums due upon insurance, solicit new insurance, deliver policies issued by the company, attend meetings of agents, etc. His district extended from Alameda to Richmond and from Oakland to Hayward, Cal., an area of over 200 square miles. He was allowed to use any reasonable mode of conveyance in "covering" this territory. The company provided no means of conveyance, and exercised no control over the same, but its superintendent admitted that there was no objection to any reasonable means of conveyance which McDonald might employ. McDonald had been working for the company for 19 months previous to the accident. He was paid a regular weekly salary and a commission upon new business. The contract of employment between the defendants specified minutely the agent's duties; they are very numerous, and require much traveling about and contact with many persons every day. McDonald owned an automobile, which he had been driving for about 3 months before the accident. He stated that he had driven the car every day, and averaged about 100 miles a day with it. It is true he stated he did not use the automobile in his house-to-house canvass for the company, and it is obvious that this could not be done with convenience or satisfaction. However, his duties were not limited to such work, and the size of his district was such that it could not have been "covered" in a house-to-house canvass.

On the occasion of the accident, McDonald was going to Oakland to report at the office of the company there and attend a meeting of agents at about 9:30 o'clock in the morning. The accident occurred at the intersection of Pacific avenue and Ninth street, within the territory assigned to McDonald by the company. He stated that he passed over this intersection about 3 times a day; that on some days he might go over it 50 times in one day in his automobile; that he had a policy holder on each corner on each block there; that he had written the policies held by those persons and collected the premiums upon them. It is pertinent to remark here that the plaintiff testified that when he first saw McDonald's automobile it was standing opposite a little gate 75 south of the south side of Pacific avenue. At the time of the accident, McDonald had with him a satchel containing policies to be delivered to policy holders or to be returned to the company. These policies aggregated about $40,000 worth of insurance. An officer of the company had ridden in McDonald's automobile with him, although McDonald stated he had not done so in the course of the company's business. McDonald testified that the accident occurred in his territory, and that he traveled in that vicinity a great deal and took care of everything for the company in that region.

With these facts before us, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the cases cited by appellant upon the question of agency. Each case is decided upon its own peculiar facts, and is not helpful in a case presenting different facts. In the instant case the jury was instructed that, in determining whether a particular act is within the scope of a servant's employment, it should be determined whether or not the particular act was done in the transaction of the business in which the servant was employed, and, if it was, the servant was acting within the scope of the employment; that, in determining whether McDonald was acting within the course and scope of his employment for the company, the jury should take into consideration the nature of the employment, the nature of the business of the company, the hours of employment, the territory where the employment required him to be, and the duty, if any, which he was performing for the company at the time of the accident, and any and all circumstances disclosed by the evidence. The jury was further instructed that, in order to charge the insurance company, it was necessary for it to find that at the time of the accident McDonald was the agent of the company, was acting within the course and scope of his employment as such agent, and at that time was performing his duties in a manner necessary to his employment or in a manner reasonably contemplated by his employer. Repeatedly the court emphasized in its instructions to the jury that, in order to charge the insurance company, the jury must find that at the time of the alleged negligent act of McDonald he was performing his duties for the company in a manner necessary to the employment, or in a manner reasonably contemplated by the employer.

We think the jury was justified in concluding, as it did, that, at the time of the accident, McDonald was engaged in performing duties required by his contract of employment in a manner reasonably contemplated by the employer. The situation is distinguishable from one where the employee goes to work at a specified place at a specified time. Here McDonald was employed from 8 o'clock in the morning until 4 in the afternoon. His duties included numerous activities within a certain territory. He was not employed merely when he reached the Oakland office of the company for the meeting to be held at 9:30 o'clock that morning. He was employed to "cover" a specified territory, in which the accident happened, and to perform a multitude of duties therein. As a part of his duties, he was obliged to go to the meeting at the company's office. His duties were field duties. The place of his employment was within the territory comprising the cities of Alameda, Richmond, Berkeley, San Leandro, Oakland, and Hayward, Cal. The place of his employment was not at the office of the company. This distinguishes this case from the authorities dealing with situations where an employee was on his way to a restricted, definite, exclusive business office or place of employment.

[2] As to the reasonableness of the means of travel employed by the agent, certainly an automobile was a reasonable means of conveyance in a district as extended as that assigned to McDonald, and the superintendent of the insurance company testified that the agent was permitted to select his own means of traveling about, and that the company objected to no reasonable means. The case of Dishman v. Whitney, 121 Wash. 157, 209 P. 12, 29 A. L. R. 460, presents facts closely analogous to those in the instant case: An employer was held liable for injuries occasioned by its salesman in driving his automobile. The court stated the facts with reference to the use of the automobile as follows:

"At the time Whitney was employed, nothing was said about transportation, or the means by which he should get about the city to see prospective customers. After he had been employed for a time, the evidence shows, or at least a reasonable inference from the evidence is to the effect, that one of the managers of the company, under whose supervision Whitney came, knew that he was using an automobile in his business. No objections were made thereto, and it appears to have been perfectly satisfactory that Whitney should use the car, or any other mode of travel that he might elect."

[3] In the instant case the question whether or not the agent was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident, and the question whether or not it was reasonably contemplated that the agent should use an automobile in the performance of his duties, were questions of fact submitted to the jury under appropriate and explicit instructions, and with the determination of the jury upon these questions this court cannot interfere.

[4] It is contended by appellant insurance company that McDonald was not an agent, but an independent contractor. He was working under detailed regulations from his employer, and under an agreement to give his entire time between specified hours to carrying out the instructions of the company. He was paid a weekly salary, and could have been discharged at any time. In the case of Pearson v. Potter Co., 10 Cal. App. 245, 101 P. 681, it was said:

"The relation of master and servant exists whenever the employer retains the right to direct the manner in which the business shall be done, as well as the result to be accomplished; or, in other words, not only what shall be done, but how it shall be done."

The company's book of rules and regulations under which McDonald was working prescribed with the utmost detail his duties, his aims, his purposes, and the various results to be accomplished in the performance of the same. The case of Brown v. Industrial Accident Comm., 174 Cal. 457, 163 P. 664, seems closely in point. That case presented the question of whether a real estate salesman, engaged to sell property in a certain district, was an employee or independent contractor. It was held that he was an employee, and the determining factors there are largely present in the instant case. It was said:

"But Skidmore [the agent] did not contract to produce any particular result. The contract was fully performed on his part when he had devoted all his time to endeavoring to sell Brown's lots, irrespective of the number of sales, if any, which he might make. He could leave the service of the petitioner at any time without being charged with a breach of contract, and was liable to discharge as an employee. The results obtained, so far as Skidmore was concerned, were important merely as a means of ascertaining the amount of commissions he should receive, a circumstance which in itself does not create the relationship of an independent contractor. Cameron v. Pillsbury et al., 173 Cal. 83, 159 P. 149. Nor could he delegate others to carry out the terms of the contract. It called for his personal services. Even his commissions were not to be transferred or assigned without Brown's 'written consent and approval.'"

[5] The case of Lewis v. Natl. Cash Register Co., 84 N. J. Law, 598, 87 A. 345, is also helpful here. It holds that a salesman engaged in selling cash registers, under a contract to devote his entire time to that business, conform to the rules of the company, receive a percentage on sales, and pay his own expenses, was an employee and not an independent contractor. It was also held that, although not mentioned in the contract, the use of some means of conveyance was impliedly authorized, and that the selection of an automobile for this purpose was reasonable. Assuredly, in the instant case, some means of conveyance was impliedly authorized with the assignment of so large a district to McDonald. We think there is no merit in the position of the appellant Prudential Insurance Company upon this question.

[6, 7] It is contended that the court gave several instructions to the jury upon the question of principal and agent, which were inapplicable to the evidence, although correctly stating the law, and that these instructions tended to confuse the jury to the prejudice of appellants. We are unable to see how appellants could have been prejudiced by superfluous instructions correctly stating the law. Objection is also made to the action of the court in submitting to the jury the question of whether the relation of McDonald to the insurance company was that of employee or subcontractor. It is contended that it was a question of law for the court. We think there are conflicting inferences to be drawn from some of the facts bearing upon this question, and there were many circumstances which entered into the conclusion to be reached which made the question a proper one for the jury.

[8] The only other contention is that the evidence does not justify a finding that McDonald was negligent. McDonald's automobile struck the rear and left-hand running board of plaintiff's car, causing it to overturn. There was testimony that McDonald was driving very rapidly, and sounded no warning, and that he skidded about 30 feet after the collision. We need not go into the evidence fully. There was evidence to justify the verdict, and the trial judge so concluded in denying a motion for a new trial.

SCOUTEN v. HARDING et al. (Civ. 4035.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. Nov. 28, 1925.)

Trial 419—Granting motion for nonsuit, after defendant's evidence had supplied defect in case, held error.

Where plaintiff, in action for labor and material in fumigating orange orchard, stated he had fumigated all trees in orchard, and defendant's motion for nonsuit on ground that amount of labor and material was not shown was denied, after which she introduced testimony showing there were 1,152 trees in the orchard, and was examined by plaintiff under Code of Civ. Proc. § 2055, held error to sustain motion for nonsuit at conclusion of testimony, since defendant, by her evidence, had supplied defect in plaintiff's case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by F. R. Scouten against Hannah F. Harding and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

Wetherhorn, Hoyt & Jones, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ames & McFadden, of Anaheim, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought by plaintiff to recover the contract price of certain labor performed and material furnished by him in fumigating an orange orchard owned by the defendant Hannah F. Harding, wife of the defendant D. W. Harding. Throughout this opinion the wife will be referred to as the defendant.

It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby the former agreed to fumigate defendant's orange orchard in Orange county for the agreed price of 16 cents per tree and 75 cents per pound of liquid gas used in the process; that plaintiff fumigated 1,181 trees, and used 294½ pounds of liquid gas; that the agreed price for the labor thus performed (1,181 trees at 16 cents per tree) is $188.96, and that the agreed price for the material used (294½ pounds of liquid gas at 75 cents per pound) is $220.50, making a total of $409.46, no part of which has been paid. The answer, while admitting that defendant employed plaintiff to fumigate her orchard, denies that the contract was as alleged in the complaint or that plaintiff performed labor or furnished material as alleged by him, and alleges, as an affirmative defense, that the work was so negligently performed that defendant suffered damage to her orchard in a stated sum.

Much of the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses was stricken out by the court, but that which remained in the record shows that plaintiff, as a part of his case, proved by the manager of his business in Orange county, one George E. White, that in the month of July, 1920, he entered into an agreement with defendant whereby it was agreed that plaintiff should fumigate the orchard upon the terms and conditions alleged in the complaint. Plaintiff also proved by his foreman, one Eli Haskell, who had charge of the crew which did the work, that he and the men under him fumigated all of the trees in defendant's orchard. Haskell identified a certain chart, referred to by him as the "dope sheet," most of the entries upon which he testified were in his handwriting. These entries, however, are not self-explanatory; that is to say, only an expert familiar with the meaning of the notations on the chart could decipher them so as to tell how many trees were actually fumigated or how much liquid gas was actually used. Such explanatory evidence was introduced by plaintiff, but later was stricken out on motion of defendant. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground, among others, that there was no evidence showing the amount of liquid gas furnished or the amount of labor performed. The motion was denied, and defendant thereupon introduced the evidence of the man who had charge of her orchard at the time when the fumigating was done—one Albert E. Clark—who testified, among other things, that the orchard consisted of two adjacent groves; that in one of these groves there were 16 rows of orange trees of 17 trees to the row, and in the other grove 16 rows of orange trees of 54 trees to the row, or a total of 1,136 trees, and that, in addition, there was one row of 16 very young trees—making a total of 1,152 trees in the orchard. At the close of Clark's testimony plaintiff was permitted to reopen his case and to put in further testimony by his manager White, as well as the testimony of the defendant, whom plaintiff examined under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At the conclusion of this testimony defendant again moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that "plaintiff has not presented a prima facie case," and that "he has not proven the measure [sic] of damages." The motion was granted.

We shall not pause to consider appellant's objection that the motion for nonsuit fails to state any ground therefor. We are satisfied that, had the motion been entirely sufficient as to form, there nevertheless would have been no ground for a nonsuit of plaintiff's entire case.

It is a well-settled rule that where, after an improper denial of a motion for a nonsuit, the defendant introduces evidence which supplies the defect in plaintiff's case, the ground for any subsequent motion for a nonsuit is removed. Here the evidence introduced by appellant in support of his case showed that, through the manager of his business in Orange county, he had entered into a contract with respondent to fumigate the latter's orchard; that under the terms of this contract respondent was to pay appellant for his labor at the rate of 16 cents per tree; and that all the trees in respondent's orchard were actually fumigated by appellant's foreman and the crew of men working under him. To show the precise amount to which appellant was entitled for the labor thus performed by him, only one other factor remained to be proved, viz. the number of trees in the orchard. If the evidence deduced by appellant was deficient in this respect, the deficiency was supplied by respondent, whose witness Clark testified that there was a total of 1,152 trees in the orchard. Appellant, therefore, made out a prima facie case for at least $184.32, and this irrespective of whether the evidence was or was not sufficient to entitle him to recover a definite sum for the liquid gas used by him.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded, with instructions to retry all of the issues presented by the pleadings.

Ex parte O'CONNELL. (Civ. 1299.)

1. Divorce ⇨182—Power of court to punish for contempt pending appeal depended on whether injunction was mandatory or prohibitory.

If injunction in divorce proceeding restraining husband from entering parties' dwelling house was mandatory, court cannot punish as a contempt failure to comply with its terms pending appeal, but, if it was prohibitory, enforcement thereof was at all times within court's jurisdiction.

2. Divorce ⇨182—Injunction in divorce proceedings held mandatory, and husband not in contempt for violation thereof pending appeal.

Injunction pendente lite in divorce proceedings in so far as it restrained husband from occupying premises of which both parties had possession, was mandatory, and hence husband was not in contempt by continuing to occupy premises pending appeal.

3. Divorce ⇨182—Wife held not entitled to temporary exclusive possession of dwelling house because holding record title thereto.

In divorce proceeding, wife held not entitled to exclusive possession of dwelling house pending appeal from order enjoining husband from occupying it because she held deed from the husband, where such title had been placed in issue, and husband was holding joint possession of property under marital relation.

Application by Daniel O'Connell for a writ of habeas corpus, directed to the sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, to secure his release from a judgment of contempt of court. Writ granted.

M. H. Hernan, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Keyes & Erskine and R. M. J. Armstrong, all of San Francisco, for respondent Sheriff of City and County of San Francisco.

KNIGHT, J. The petitioner, Daniel O'Connell, by virtue of a writ of injunction issued in a divorce proceeding to which he was a party, was ordered excluded, during the pendency of said action, from the dwelling house theretofore occupied by him with his wife under the marital relation, and, for violating said injunction, was adjudged guilty of contempt of court and sentenced to pay a fine and to be imprisoned. He now seeks release on habeas corpus.

The circumstances leading up to the contempt proceedings are as follows: On June 2, 1923, petitioner, upon his cross-complaint, obtained an interlocutory judgment of divorce from Mrs. O'Connell, whereby the property in question was assigned to him as his sole and separate property. Later, by a decree in equity, rendered in a suit commenced by Mrs. O'Connell in June, 1925, said interlocutory judgment was annulled, upon the ground that said interlocutory judgment had been obtained through extrinsic fraud. Thereupon Mrs. O'Connell, upon notice to petitioner, applied for, and was granted, in the divorce proceeding, said writ of injunction, enjoining petitioner, during the pendency of said action, "from entering the dwelling house now occupied by the said plaintiff and know[n] and designated as No. 900 Balboa street in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and from living in said dwelling house during the pendency of said action, and from annoying or harassing the said plaintiff in any way during the pendency of said action, and from attempting to cause or causing or ordering or employing any person whatsoever to alter, repair, or do any work whatsoever on said dwelling during the pendency of said action." Petitioner perfected an appeal from the order granting said injunction, and filed a stay bond, but nevertheless was thereafter adjudged guilty of contempt for having continued in the occupation of the premises in violation of the injunction.

The matter of the decree entered in the suit in equity is important in the instant proceeding only for the purpose of establishing the nullification of the interlocutory judgment of divorce, and in this respect it may be conceded that said decree constitutes a self-executing judgment, requiring no further process of enforcement, and became effective immediately; that, until declared void or reversed on appeal, said decree rendered nugatory for all purposes said interlocutory judgment; and, furthermore, that the operation of said decree in equity, as such self-executing judgment, was not stayed by the appeal therefrom so as to revive, pending appeal, the force and effect of said interlocutory judgment or any of the rights granted thereunder. Tyler v. Presley, 72 Cal. 290, 13 P. 856; Estate of Crozier, 65 Cal. 332, 4 P. 109; Bateman v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 140, 72 P. 922; Foster v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 279, 47 P. 58.

[1] The controlling question presented for determination in this particular proceeding, however, relates to said writ of injunction, and not to said decree in equity. The question is whether said writ of injunction is mandatory or prohibitory in its nature and effect. If it be mandatory, its operation was stayed by appeal, and it was beyond the power of the court to punish as a contempt failure to comply with its mandatory terms pending appeal; but, if it be prohibitory, its operation could not be stayed by appeal, and the enforcement thereof was at all times within the jurisdiction of the court. Clute v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 15, 99 P. 362, 132 Am. St. Rep. 54; Mark v. Superior Court, 129

Cal. 1, 61 P. 436; Foster v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 279, 47 P. 58; Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 P. 580.

In the case of Clute v. Superior Court, supra, the board of directors of a hotel corporation voted to remove Clute from the office of treasurer and the position of manager, and, upon his refusal to turn over possession of the property of said company, including the books, keys, and money, commenced suit to compel him to do so. A temporary writ of injunction was obtained enjoining Clute from collecting and disbursing any money belonging to said company, also from representing himself as manager and treasurer, and "from interfering with, or directing, or attempting to direct or control, the employees of said corporation." Clute's answer to the complaint and the showing made by him in response to the application for the injunction put in issue the right of the persons seeking his removal to act as a board of directors. From the order granting said writ of injunction Clute took an appeal, and thereafter prevented an employee of said corporation from entering the hotel office and taking possession of the keys and books, for which he was adjudged guilty of contempt. Upon application by Clute for a writ of review the Supreme Court said:

"Upon the question whether that injunction was mandatory or purely prohibitory the present application depends. For it is thoroughly settled that, while an injunction which merely has the effect of preserving the subject of the litigation in statu quo is not suspended by an appeal (Merced Min. Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130; Heinlen v. Cross, 63 Cal. 44; Swift v. Shepard, 64 Cal. 423 [1 P. 493]; Dewey v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. 64, 22 P. 333; Rogers v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 183 [58 P. 452]), a mandatory injunction, i. e., one which compels affirmative action by the defendant, cannot be enforced pending a duly perfected appeal (Foster v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 279 [47 P. 58]; Mark v. Superior Court, 129 Cal. 1 [61 P. 436]; Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106 [43 P. 580]; Stewart v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. 543 [35 P. 156, 563].) If an injunction, though couched in terms of prohibition, is mandatory in effect, a proceeding by the court issuing it to punish a violation as a contempt is in the nature of process for the enforcement of the affirmative feature of the writ. It may be likened to an execution, and, if the enforcement of the injunction has been stayed by an appeal, a writ of supersedeas may properly be issued by the appellate court to arrest further action by the court below. Tyler v. Presley, 72 Cal. 290 (13 P. 856), and Dulin v. Pacific W. & C. Co., 98 Cal. 304 (33 P. 123), relied on by respondent, decide nothing in conflict with this view. Both cases dealt with judgments which were operative without any action by the court in which they had been rendered. All that was held was that supersedeas was not applicable to such self-executing judgments. At the hearing of the present application, all the allegations of the petition were admitted to be true. Upon the facts set forth we think it clear that the injunction in question was mandatory. If Clute was in the actual possession of the hotel and the personal property in it, an order punishing him for preventing another person from entering and taking charge of the books, keys, and other property could have no other purpose or effect than to compel him to turn over his possession to such other, or at least to surrender his theretofore exclusive possession."

Later on in the opinion, in discussing the claim made by Clute that the parties seeking to oust him were not the directors of said company, the court said:

"If his contention was correct, the effect of the order appealed from was to require the possession of the corporate property to be transferred from the corporation itself to strangers. The status of the parties, at the time the injunction was issued, was this: Clute, claiming to hold on behalf of the corporation, was resisting a right of entry claimed by persons who, as he asserted, had no authority from the corporation to take possession. An order turning over the control of the property from him to the other claimants would certainly, if executed, operate to change that status. The injunction was, therefore, mandatory in effect, and this regardless of the fact that, in law, the corporation rather than Clute, may be said to have been in possession. It is, therefore, unimportant that the court inserted in its order of commitment a finding that Clute was not in possession of the hotel or its contents. For the purpose of determining the effect of this injunction as mandatory or prohibitory, we must consider the result of an enforcement of the writ on the position of the defendant, as asserted in the court below. If the injunction compels him affirmatively to surrender a position which he holds, and which, upon the facts alleged by him, he is entitled to hold, it is mandatory."

These same legal principles are found in the case of Mark v. Superior Court, 129 Cal. 1, 61 P. 436, wherein some of the earlier cases upon this subject are reviewed, and it was there said:

"An injunction, though restrictive in form, if it have the effect to compel the performance of a substantive act, is mandatory and necessarily contemplates a change in the relative positions or rights of the parties from those existing at the time the injunction is granted or the decree is entered."

[2] In the instant case, upon the rendition of said decree in equity, the parties to said divorce proceeding, by operation of law as well as by the express declaration of said decree itself, were restored to the same position as if said interlocutory judgment had never been entered. In reference to the question of the ownership of said property said decree in equity specifically adjudged "that nothing herein shall be construed as an adjudication by the court of the title or ownership of the real property described in the complaint on file herein." It follows that the effect of said decree was merely to again place said divorce action at issue, Mrs. O'Con- nell claiming, in her pleadings therein, absolute ownership in said property by virtue of a deed to her from petitioner, and petitioner alleging in his pleadings that said property constituted a homestead, and that Mrs. O'Connell's title was merely that of a trustee; and both parties were in actual possession of said property. In that state of the record the plain effect of said injunction pendente lite, in relation to the occupancy of said premises was to oust petitioner from the possession which he theretofore held, and to compel him to turn over to the other party to the litigation, prior to final determination of their respective rights in said property, the sole and exclusive possession thereof. Manifestly, said injunction, in the respect noted, did not operate merely to preserve in statu quo the subject of the litigation, but went further to the extent of attempting to change the status of the parties in relation to the possession of the property in dispute. Therefore, in view of the authorities above cited, it must be held that, in so far as said injunction sought to exclude petitioner from said premises, it was mandatory in its effect, and consequently its operation was stayed by the appeal therefrom.

[3] The contention made on behalf of Mrs. O'Connell that she is entitled to the temporary exclusive possession of said premises on account of the fact that she holds record title thereto under a deed from petitioner is untenable, for the reason that the validity of her title under that deed has been placed in issue by petitioner's cross-complaint, and it is undisputed, as a matter of fact, that up to the time of the issuance of the order of exclusion he was holding joint possession of said property under the marital relation, and, therefore, entitled to retain such possession until the appeal from said order is determined. Clute v. Superior Court, supra. We are not unmindful that it has been held in this state that a wife in an ejectment suit may sue her husband to recover possession of property belonging to her separate estate and for damages for withholding the possession thereof. McDuff v. McDuff, 45 Cal. App. 53, 187 P. 37. But the suit here, out of which this injunction issued, is not one in ejectment based upon said deed, and, moreover, is readily distinguishable, by the facts, from the case last above cited, because in the decision in that case it is expressly stated that—

"At the time of the commencement of this action the house was not the family dwelling place. The parties were living separate and apart * * * the husband was not asserting his personal marital right of living in the family home [under section 157 of the Civil Code, which provides in part that neither the husband nor the wife can be excluded from the other's dwelling], but was holding possession of the wife's separate property adversely to her as the owner."

Furthermore, in the case last cited the question of the exclusion of the husband from the property pending trial and prior to final determination of the action was not involved. Whether or not, in view of the provision of said section 157 of the Civil Code above adverted to, the court in the instant proceeding may in any event, under the circumstances present, exclude petitioner from the dwelling house, prior to final determination of the action, is a question that is not before us in this proceeding; it being the subject of petitioner's appeal from the order granting said injunction.

The remaining features of said injunction, wherein petitioner was enjoined from harassing and annoying or otherwise interfering with the person of Mrs. O'Connell, and from making any alterations in said premises, are, we believe, purely prohibitive in their nature, and therefore self-executing, and not stayed by appeal. Those features become immaterial here, however, owing to the fact that the act for which petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt was his refusal to discontinue in the occupation of the premises, no point being made on behalf of Mrs. O'Connell of any other contemptuous act.

Having reached the conclusion that the appeal from the order granting said injunction pendente lite stayed the operation of that injunction in so far as it attempted to compel petitioner to surrender the possession theretofore held by him, it becomes unnecessary to consider the other points raised by petitioner in this proceeding.

The writ is granted, and the petitioner is discharged from custody.

DAVIS v. YOUNG et al. (Civ. 2957.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 27, 1925.)

Automobiles ⇐381—Agreement by conditional vendee held not to continue lien for repairs after surrender of possession by lienor.

Agreement by conditional vendee of truck with one making repairs, that he would either pay for repairs or return truck within a few days, did not, under Civ. Code, § 2913, continue lien given by section 3051, since it was not made with the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by H. H. Davis against Chas. C. Young and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Loren A. Butts, of Fresno, for appellant.
Edward Bickmore and R. R. Sischo, both of Merced, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff began this action in claim and delivery to recover possession of a certain Dodge truck. Judgment was entered for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals. The plaintiff in his motion for a new trial and also upon appeal, contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. The correctness of the judgment depends upon whether the defendants, at the time of the prosecution of this action, had a valid lien upon the truck in question for repairs made thereon, based upon the finding that such lien existed.

The evidence shows, and the court found as a matter of fact, that the plaintiff is, and at all the times mentioned in the complaint was, the owner of the truck involved in this action. The transcript further shows that the plaintiff while the owner of said truck entered into a conditional sales contract with one Jack Hirons. The conditional contract reserved and retained title in the conditional vendor until the truck should have been fully paid for. In the month of July, 1924, Mr. Hirons took the truck to the garage belonging to the defendants, or operated by the defendants, in the town of Los Banos, and there had certain repairs made upon the truck to the value of $207.25. The truck, after the repairs mentioned, was returned to the possession of the said Hirons, and, the contract to purchase not having been complied with, on or about the 16th day of August, 1924, the plaintiff took possession of the truck in question. Thereafter the truck was driven by a driver by the name of Beck. On or about the 20th day of August, 1924, the driver Beck drove said truck into the alley adjoining the garage operated by the defendants for the purpose of having some adjustment made to the carburetor on the truck. It further appears from the transcript that, after leaving the truck in the alley and requesting adjustment to be made as above mentioned, Mr. Beck went away and was gone a short period of time. Upon returning, he found that the truck had been driven into the garage belonging to the defendants; that nothing had been done about adjusting the carburetor, but was told by the defendants that they were going to hold possession of the truck. The testimony also shows that between the time the defendants did the work upon the truck at the request of Mr. Hirons, and before retaking possession thereof as just stated, a period of between three and four weeks elapsed, during which period the truck was being constantly used and driven on the highways between Fresno and Los Banos.

The defendants found their claim of lien upon sections 3051 and 2913 of the Civil Code, section 3051 providing that any one who makes repairs upon personal property at the request of the legal possessor thereof has a lien dependent upon possession for such repairs. Section 3051a of the Civil Code limits the amount of such lien to the sum of $100, unless previous notice by personal service or registered letter has been given to the holder of the legal title to the property. Section 2913 reads:

"The voluntary restoration of property to its owner by the holder of a lien thereon dependent upon possession extinguishes the lien as to such property, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, and extinguishes it, notwithstanding any such agreement, as to creditors of the owner and persons, subsequently acquiring a title to the property, or a lien thereon, in good faith, and for value."

There is no conflict in the testimony as to the fact that, after the repairs were made to the truck in question in the month of July, it was restored to the possession of Jack Hirons, and that the truck was thereafter used as above stated. In founding their claim upon section 2913 of the Civil Code, the defendants rely upon the testimony of Sischo and Watkins. The witness Sischo testified as follows:

"Q. Do you remember the occasion of the truck being taken away, after this new motor block was put in? A. Well, the morning before that, I think it was, the morning prior to Hirons taking the truck away, he came in and wanted to stand me off, wanted me to charge these parts and let him have the truck and charge the parts to him; I told him that Young had the truck back there, and I said, 'As far as I am concerned, I am going to have the money for these parts, I am going to be paid for these parts;' so he started back in the shop to see Young, and I went back there with him, and there was a conversation there between the three of us there; and he said he wanted time on the parts and for the labor, claiming he had no money, and wanted to take the truck. 'No,' I said, 'as far as I am concerned, I am going to have either the money or good security,' and then he went out of the place. * * * A. He said he did not have the money to pay for the repairs of the truck at this particular time, and so I told Mr. Young, 'As far as I am concerned, if you want to stand Mr. Hirons off for this truck, I will just charge the parts to you,' so Mr. Hirons told Cy that he

"Mr. Bickmore. Q. What do you mean by 'Cy'? A. Cy Young told him that he—Hirons said that he had a lot of soda water he wanted to deliver and in three or four days would get the money, would have it made in that time, by going around out in the country here with the soda; and he said, 'I have a lot of stuff to deliver, if I can deliver I can get the money and pay you,' and he said, 'If you let me have it for three or four days, I will get the money, and, if I do not, I will bring the truck back in any time that you say and turn the motor over to you;' and then Mr. Young agreed to let him have it, and I charged the parts direct to Mr. Young.

"Q. Do you know how much the sum total of these parts and the work amounted to that was charged on this motor? A. Something over $200.

"Q. You do not know the exact amount? A. No, sir; something over $200.

"The Court. That is Young's bill? A. For the parts and labor,

"Q. You say you did not see this man who preceded you on the stand, that day? A. No, sir; I did not. I was not there at the time the truck was taken out.

"Q. Was anything said between Young and Hirons as to what was to be done with the truck in case the bill was not paid? A. He said he was going around in the country and if he did not pay he would return it."

Following is the testimony of the witness Watkins:

"Q. Were you present at any conversation in the shop when Charles Young, known as Cy Young, and Hirons were present, and they had a conversation about the truck? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. And what was said between them with reference to this truck? A. Well, I was working on a Hudson right by the door, and they come back, and was standing right there near where I was working on the Hudson, and, of course, I did not hear everything that was said. I know that Hirons wanted his truck, and we had done little jobs on it before, but he wanted to take it away the same as he had done before and pay for it a few days afterwards, and I heard Mr. Sischo say, well, he wanted his money, he did not care what was done, and Mr. Hirons was working in the soda works, and I told him that he needed the car to make delivery of the soda through the country there, and he said that he would get the money from the soda and would come in and pay the bill or return the truck, and so they let him have the truck with the understanding that he could have at least three or four days until he got this stuff delivered and he would have the money and if not he would bring the truck back to them to keep until he got the money and paid the bill."

This testimony shows beyond any controversy that, whatever the effect of the agreement or conversation had with Mr. Hirons at the time of the delivery of the truck to him after the making of the repairs by the defendants, the delivery was not to the owner of the truck, and therefore section 2913, Civil Code, relied upon by respondents, has no application whatever. The record does not show that any notice was ever given to the owner, or that the plaintiff, the owner of the truck, had any knowledge or notice of the repair being made upon the truck, or that the defendants had any lien, or made any claim of lien upon the truck until on or about the 20th day of August, 1924, when they repossessed themselves of the truck, after the plaintiff had exercised his option in taking possession of the truck from the conditional purchaser, Jack Hirons, on account of Hirons's failure to make the payments specified to be made in the conditional sales contract. It will be noticed also that the conversation held by the two witnesses between Mr. Hirons and the defendants did not, and does not, purport to continue any lien, but at its best constitutes only a promise on the part of Hirons to pay for the repairs, and, if he did not pay for the repairs, to bring the truck back again, but, as said above, the effect of the conversation as to whether it does, or does not amount to a continuance of the lien is wholly immaterial, for the simple reason that it was not made with the owner of the truck. In the case of Goodman v. Cal. Trust Co., 62 Cal. App. 702, 217 P. 1078, this court, in the first appellate district, had presented to it for consideration a written agreement between a repairman and a conditional vendee, whereby the conditional vendee purported to transfer his interest in a certain automobile to the repairman, and it was argued that the agreement preserved the lien under section 2913 of the Civil Code. The court said:

"However, Green and Gohl permitted Brian to take the automobile out of their possession after he had signed an agreement transferring all his right, title, and interest in the same to them for their protection until the repair bill should be paid. We shall pass the question as to the sufficiency of this writing to retain the lien by evidencing an agreement of the parties that it should continue in effect, because, even though this writing be held sufficient to evidence such an intention upon the part of the parties thereto, nevertheless it would not have that effect as to the bank, the real defendant here. Section 2913, Civ. Code; Thourot v. Delahaya [Delahaye] Import Co., 69 Misc. Rep. 351, 125 N. Y. S. 827; Rehm v. Viall, 185 Ill. App. 425; McFarland v. Wheeler, 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 467. We may disregard, therefore, that writing."

The bank in that case was the real owner, and, as said by the court in that case, the agreement was not with the owner. It is true that the case we have referred to was really decided upon other grounds, but the quotation contains, we think, a correct statement of the law. "The lien having once been lost by surrender of possession cannot be revived by any subsequently reacquired possession." 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 28, and authorities there cited. The authorities there cited also show that delivery of possession is a surrender of the lien, unless limited by the section of the Code to which we have referred.

It is further argued by respondents that a conversation between counsel, had at the time of the trial, constituted a stipulation that judgment might be entered for the defendants for the amount claimed, irrespective of the provisions of section 3051a, Civil Code, in the event that a valid lien was established, but, owing to the unavoidable conclusion that no lien has been established in this case, we deem it unnecessary to discuss such conversation for the purpose of determining whether it did or did not amount to a stipulation.

Being of the opinion that the testimony is wholly insufficient to support the finding that the owner of the truck had agreed to a continuance of the lien, and that whatever conversation was had concerning the same was with a person who was not the owner of the truck, it follows that the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

FLETCHER v. LLOYD et al. (Civ. 5248.)

1. Trial 404(4)—Findings made held to imply general finding that two of three defendants were not negligent.

Findings that all allegations of complaint and answers of two defendants were true, except as specifically found otherwise, and that plaintiff's injury was caused by automobile driven by third defendant, held to imply general finding, not contradicted by other findings, that first two defendants were not negligent.

2. Appeal and error 1170(10)—Findings defective in form, but supported by evidence, held not reversible error.

That findings in favor of two of three defendants were defective held not prejudicial to plaintiff, and hence not reversible error, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, where there was abundant evidence to support them.

3. Appeal and error 1010(1)—Judgment on fact finding supported by any evidence not disturbed.

Judgment on finding for defendants and against plaintiff on issue of negligence may not be disturbed, if finding is supported by any evidence in record.

4. Automobiles 244(2)—Findings on issue of negligence of drivers of colliding automobiles injuring pedestrian held warranted by evidence.

In action for injuries to pedestrian struck by one of two colliding automobiles, evidence held to warrant finding that driver of automobile which struck plaintiff was negligent in passing other automobile, and that driver and owner of latter were not negligent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Annie K. Fletcher against Charles Lloyd, H. J. Rumsey, and another. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kimball Fletcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover a judgment compensating her for personal injuries sustained in an automobile accident. The defendants answered, and a trial was had before the trial judge sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings against one of the defendants and in favor of the other defendants. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment in favor of the defendants Charles Lloyd and H. J. Rumsey. The defendant W. F. Lloyd has appealed from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, but on application of the parties the appeal of W. F. Lloyd has been dismissed.

On the afternoon of the 19th day of August, 1920, the plaintiff stood on the south side of West Sixth street near the southeast corner of that street and Park View street, Los Angeles. While standing there she was struck and injured by an automobile approaching from the west. In her complaint, acting upon the theory that the accident to her arose by reason of a negligent collision of two or more automobiles in the street, the plaintiff included as defendants W. F. Lloyd, the owner and driver of the automobile that actually struck her, H. J. Rumsey, the driver of the other automobile, and Charles Lloyd, who owned that machine, but was not riding in it at the time of the accident. The trial court made findings purporting to be in favor of Charles Lloyd and H. J. Rumsey. The appellant attacks those findings as not being supported by the evidence, and claims that the findings should have been made in favor of the plaintiff. In making this attack the appellant claims that the form of the purported findings is such that they are not, as a matter of law, any findings. In the second place, the appellant contends that, if it be conceded that the purported findings are in legal effect findings, then and in that event they are not supported by the evidence. The fourth finding, in so far as pertinent, is as follows:

"That all of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true, except as herein specifically found otherwise; * * * that all of the allegations and denials of the answer of the defendant Charles Lloyd are true, except as herein specifically found otherwise; that all of the allegations and denials in the answer of the defendant H. J. Rumsey are true, except as herein specifically found otherwise."

The second finding is as follows:

"That on the 19th day of August, 1920, plaintiff was standing at or near the curb line on the southerly side of West Sixth street, city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, at a point between the intersections of Park View with said West Sixth street, that defendant W. F. Lloyd drove an automobile in an easterly direction upon said West Sixth street, recklessly, negligently, wantonly, and carelessly, and caused said automobile to collide with the automobile owned by the defendant Charles Lloyd, and said defendant W. F. Lloyd continued to operate said automobile recklessly, negligently, wantonly, and carelessly, and caused said automobile to strike the plaintiff without warning, and hurl said plaintiff violently to the ground, thereby causing plaintiff certain bodily injuries, to wit, two lacerated wounds on right leg, one lacerated wound on the left leg, a T fracture into the joint of the right tibia, a contusion upon the head, a slight concussion of the brain, and a sprained right wrist, and tore and destroyed the dress, petticoat, and stockings worn by the plaintiff, and that said accident and injuries were in no wise caused by any negligence, recklessness, or want of care on the part of plaintiff."

Other findings were addressed to the issues made by the complaint and the answer of the defendant Charles Lloyd and the defendant W. F. Lloyd and the defendant H. J. Rumsey.

The third paragraph of the first cause of action in plaintiff's complaint charged as follows:

"That on the 19th day of August, 1920, plaintiff was standing at or near the curb line on the southerly side of West Sixth street in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, at a point between the intersections of Park View street with said West Sixth street; that plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that the defendants Charles Lloyd and John Doe drove one automobile and the defendant W. F. Lloyd drove another automobile in an easterly direction upon said West Sixth street, so recklessly, negligently, wantonly, and carelessly as to cause said automobiles to collide, and said defendants, and each of them, continued to operate said automobiles so recklessly, negligently, wantonly, and carelessly as to cause one of the said automobiles to strike the plaintiff without warning, and hurl said plaintiff violently to the ground, causing the plaintiff the bodily injuries hereinafter described; that said accident was in no wise caused by any negligence, carelessness, or want of care on the part of plaintiff."

That cause of action deals with the personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff, and the second cause of action deals with the injuries to the plaintiff's wearing apparel. In the second cause of action the charging portion is framed in the same language. In his answer to the complaint Charles Lloyd pleaded:

"For answer to paragraph III, this defendant denies that either he or the defendant John Doe drove the automobile of this defendant, or that the automobile of this defendant was, at the time and place referred to in said paragraph, driven in any reckless or negligent manner, or in any wanton or careless manner, or so as to cause said or any automobile to collide with said or any automobile, or either automobile, or that this defendant or the defendant John Doe continued to or ever did operate the automobile of this defendant in so or any reckless or negligent or wanton or careless manner, or so as to cause the said automobiles, or either of them, or any other automobile to strike the plaintiff, either without warning or otherwise, or at all, or to hurl said plaintiff to the ground, or in any manner whatsoever, or causing plaintiff's bodily injuries, referred to in plaintiff's complaint, or otherwise; and this defendant further denies that said accident was not caused by an act of negligence and carelessness and want of care on the part of the plaintiff."

The same defense was interposed to the charge contained in the second count. In his answer to the first cause of action the defendant Rumsey pleaded as follows:

"This defendant, answering paragraph III of said complaint, denies that on or about the 19th day of August, 1920, or at any other time, that this defendant drove the automobile of Charles Lloyd therein referred to either recklessly or negligently, or that by reason of the driving of said car, or the manner of driving said car, said car was caused to collide with any other automobile, or that this defendant then or there, or at all, operated the automobile of said defendant Charles Lloyd, in any wanton or reckless or negligent or careless manner, or so as to cause one or either of said automobiles to strike the plaintiff, either violently or otherwise, or at all, or that the automobile of said Charles Lloyd, driven by this defendant, did strike the plaintiff, and denies that said accident was in no wise caused by the negligence of the plaintiff."

To the charging part contained in the second cause of action he pleaded the same defense.

[1] Not expressing any approval whatever of the form in which the findings are drawn, nevertheless we think that no serious difficulty is presented in ascertaining what was in the court's mind. In other words, that the findings clearly indicate the facts as found by the trial court. The trial court found:

"That all of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true, except as herein specifically found otherwise. * * *"

Then in finding No. 2 the court found specifically that the plaintiff's injury was caused by the automobile driven by W. F. Lloyd. As the plaintiff had alleged that her injury was caused by the joint negligence of W. F. Lloyd, Charles Lloyd, and H. J. Rumsey, we have a specific finding otherwise in so far as the acts of the last two defendants are concerned. Furthermore, as to each of those two defendants the trial court found:

"That all of the allegations and denials of the answer of the defendant — are true except as herein specifically found otherwise. * * *"

[2] As each of those defendants had entered a specific denial of any negligence, we turn again to the specific findings, and we look in vain for any finding to the effect that either of the last-named defendants was guilty of negligence. It follows that the trial court made a general finding that each of those two defendants was not negligent, and that there is nothing in the findings contradictory thereof. The appellant cites and relies upon Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 340; Goodnow v. Griswold, 68 Cal. 599, 9 P. 837;

O'Brien v. O'Brien, 124 Cal. 422, 57 P. 225. Conceding, without deciding, that before November 3, 1914, those authorities would support the point of this appellant, since the amendment to section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, on the date named, we think, under the facts of this case, which we have already stated, and the facts which will be stated in reference to the next point, that the contention of the appellant cannot be sustained. We are led to that conclusion because the error, if it was an error, was certainly not prejudicial to the appellant when the evidence is taken into consideration.

[3] The second contention made by the appellant is to the effect that, if we concede that the trial court has made a finding in legal form in favor of the respondents and against the plaintiff on the issue of negligence, nevertheless the case must be reversed because such finding is not supported by the evidence. Of course, if there is any evidence in the record which would support such a finding, then and in that event this court may not disturb the judgment. Therefore we will turn to and consider that portion of the evidence which was introduced to support the finding.

[4] The nature of the appellant's injuries was such that at the time of the trial she did not purport to give testimony as to how the accident occurred. Alice K. Mortimer accompanied the plaintiff at the time of the accident. Her deposition was taken and was introduced in evidence. The plaintiff called Mr. W. F. Lloyd and examined him as a witness under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure. If that were all the evidence in the case, it might be conceded that there was some evidence charging the respondents with responsibility to the plaintiff. But there was other evidence introduced. Mr. Tyler testified that immediately before the accident he had parked his car on the same side of the street some 50 feet west of where the plaintiff stood, and that he was in his car in the act of starting to move forward. He stated that before moving he looked back and saw a car coming from the rear. It was moving a mile and a half an hour. It was not as close to the curb as the witness' car. It was a Marmon car, and was occupied by one person. He further testified that the car was moving just a little out as if it was turning out to go around the witness, and that it was about 10 or 12 feet back. Continuing, the witness stated that, as the Marmon car passed, it collided with his car, and that in the same instant the car driven by W. F. Lloyd passed in front of both cars and up to the curb. The Marmon car merely hit the bumper or left rear fender or the aluminum on the running board of the witness' car. When the Marmon stopped, its front wheels were to the rear of the front wheels of Tyler's car. The defendant H. J.

Rumsey was the chauffeur of the defendant Charles Lloyd, and had left his employer's residence to go down town and bring his master home. He was called as a witness, and testified that from Sixth street and Rampart street he proceeded east on Sixth street at the rate of probably 10 miles an hour—just rolling along was all. As he approached Park View, he saw Mr. Tyler's car. Continuing, the witness testified:

"As I was passing or approaching that car from its rear, that is Tyler's car, the south line of my car was north of it. In other words, if I had gone straight ahead as I was traveling without changing my course north or south, I would have cleared Mr. Tyler's car a couple of feet—never go nearer a standing car. I just saw Mr. Tyler's car as I approached and passed it. I had not passed Mr. Tyler's car at the time of the collision. Prior to the time that I passed Park View avenue, and as I approached Mr. Tyler's car, I didn't change my direction either north or south. There was not any horn blown or other signal given of the approach of Mr. W. F. Lloyd's car from the rear that I heard. * * * I did not see Mr. W. F. Lloyd's car until he struck my car. The time I saw him he was right in front. When I saw Mr. Lloyd's car it was headed toward the curb."

Mr. W. F. Lloyd testified:

"I had been continuously moving easterly on Sixth street without stopping anywhere. I was right in the car tracks. I was going east on Sixth street, and, as I approached Park View avenue, I was going about 20 miles an hour, and I know that I was going about 20 miles because a car passed me that was going 25. * * * As I approached Park View I threw out my clutch to slow down, and there were two cars standing abreast of each other, as I remember it, and I approached these cars in the track so that I had a perfectly free way to pass, and just as I got past Park View avenue my steering wheel was taken right out of my hands, and I ran into the curb and knocked over Mrs. Fletcher. * * *"

From what we have stated it is patent that there was evidence from which the trial court could draw the conclusion that the defendant R. J. Rumsey and the defendant Charles Lloyd were guilty of no negligence whatsoever, and that the defendant W. F. Lloyd, in the act of passing the automobile of Charles Lloyd, committed the act so negligently that he collided with the front end of the Marmon car and knocked the Marmon car over against Mr. Tyler's car, and at the same time dashed forward obliquely to the curb. That theory finds further support in the physical facts testified to by the witnesses. Mr. R. D. Lloyd was riding with his father, Mr. W. F. Lloyd. Immediately after the impact he looked down and saw that the back part of the fender over the right front wheel on his father's car was ripped up and the running board was injured as though the car had had a collision with a telephone pole.

He also testified that he looked back at the Marmon car and the left side of the bumper was on the street ripped off. Mr. Rumsey testified that his left-hand fender was bent in toward the center of the car, but straight up as if you raised it up, and that the bumper in front was bent forward. It was bent out and round like it had been pulled around. The wheels were turned in; not scratched or broken. The fender was bent up probably a couple of inches. It will be noted that the foregoing physical facts square with the theory of the respondents. It will also be noted that they are not in harmony with the theory that the Marmon car hit the car driven by Mr. W. F. Lloyd.

Conceding that there is evidence in the case to support a different theory, nevertheless it must be granted that there was an abundance of evidence to support the findings made by the trial court in favor of the respondents.

The judgment is affirmed.

OLD HOMESTEAD BAKERY, Inc., v.
MARSH. (Civ. 2939.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 18, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 14, 1926.)

1. Statutes $\S$ 225 $\frac{1}{4}$ —Statutes imposing fees on electric motor vehicles and fuel tax are in "pari materia," to be construed together.

In determining whether Legislature in taxing motor vehicles has discriminated against electric-propelled motor vehicles, St. 1923, p. 517, $\S$ 77 (b), providing for a registration fee for electric motor vehicles, and St. 1923, p. 571, imposing a gas tax, are to be read together as "in pari materia," especially since they were passed at same session of the Legislature.

2. Statutes $\S$ 225—Revenue statutes particularly to be construed in pari materia.

Rule that statutes in pari materia should be construed together is particularly applicable to statutes relating to revenue and taxation on theory that all such statutes constitute one law.

3. Statutes $\S$ 225—Rule construing statute in pari materia one of interpretation and construction.

The office of the rule that statutes in pari materia should be construed together is that of interpretation and construction.

4. Statutes $\S$ 217, 225—Statute containing words of uncertain meaning to be construed with other statutes to determine legislative intent.

Where statute uses words of uncertain meaning, other statutes on same subject, or history of the legislation thereon, should be considered, if by so doing intent of the Legislature may be learned.

5. Statutes $\S$ 225—Statutes to be construed in pari materia to avoid unconstitutionality of statute standing alone.

Where statute contains no uncertain words, but, taken alone, would offend certain constitutional restrictions, then, if there be any other statutes in pari materia therewith, the several statutes should be construed together.

6. Automobiles $\S$ 29—Gas tax held in lieu of registration fees.

St. 1923, p. 571, imposing tax on gas used in gas-propelled motor vehicles, was intended to be in lieu of registration fees operators of such vehicles were theretofore required to pay.

7. Automobiles $\S$ 28—Statutes imposing registration fee on electric vehicles held not to discriminate against them.

St. 1923, p. 517, $\S$ 77 (b), imposing registration fee for electric motor vehicles when construed with St. 1923, p. 571, imposing tax on gas used in gas-propelled motor vehicles does not discriminate against electric motor vehicles.

8. Constitutional law $\S$ 47—Courts cannot go behind legislative acts on their face constitutional.

The courts cannot go behind legislative enactments which on their face are constitutional and by resort to evidence attempt to ascertain whether Legislature remained within constitutional restrictions.

9. Automobiles $\S$ 28—Constitutional law $\S$ 206(4), 241, 297—Statutes $\S$ 74(1)—Statutes imposing registration fee on electric vehicles held constitutional.

Additional registration fee or privilege tax, imposed by St. 1923, p. 517, $\S$ 77 (b), on electric motor vehicles used in transporting passengers for hire or property, in view of gas tax imposed by St. 1923, p. 571, is founded on a classification which does not conflict with Const. art. 1, $\S$ 11, providing that general laws shall have uniform operation, nor with Const. U. S. Amend. 14, prohibiting abridgment of privileges and immunities, deprivation of property without due process of law, or denial of equal protection of law.

10. Statutes $\S$ 68, 72—Law is general and uniform within Constitution, if operating uniformly on all persons similarly situated.

A law is general and uniform within Const. art. 1, $\S$ 11, if it operates uniformly on all persons standing in same relation to law in respect to the privileges and immunities conferred or acts prohibited.

11. Constitutional law $\S$ 208(1)—To make law free from discrimination there must be a classification founded on natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinctions.

To render a law not applicable to all the people free from fatal discrimination in favor or against certain members thereof, there must be a classification founded upon some natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinctions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Mandamus by the Old Homestead Bakery, Inc., to compel W. H. Marsh, as Chief of Division of Motor Vehicles of the Department of Finance of the State of California, to issue a certificate of registration of electric motor vehicle. From a judgment dismissing the proceeding, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Harding & Monroe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HART, J. It appears from the petition, filed originally in the court below, that the petitioner, a corporation, with its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, is engaged in the business of baking bread and certain kinds of confections, and that, in the delivery of its products to its customers, in said city and county, uses the motor vehicles propelled by electricity; that, on the 6th day of February, 1924, petitioner filed, in due legal form, an application for the registration of a certain motor vehicle so propelled, of which it was the legal owner, and which was designed to be used for the purposes above stated; that, accompanying said application, was "the certificate of a public weigher of the state of California, showing the weight of said vehicle, when unladen, to be 6,280 pounds." The petition proceeds:

"That since the date of the payment of the 1923 license tax on said electric motor vehicle, the unladen weight thereof had been increased by improvements made thereon from 5,940 pounds to 6,280 pounds, and that said respondent demanded an additional weight fee of $6.25 for the year 1923.

"That at the time of the presentation of said application to said respondent, this petitioner did tender to him, as such, in lawful money of the United States, the sum of $39.25, being and including:

"(1) The sum of $6.25 as and for the additional weight tax claimed for the year 1923, and (2) the sum of $3 required to be paid under subdivision (a) of section 77 of said act, and (3) the sum of $30 required to be paid as a weight tax under subdivision (c) of section 77 of said act, and this petitioner did thereupon request and demand that said respondent, out of said sum of $39.25 so tendered, accept and receive the sum of $33 as payment in full as and for the legal registration fees for said vehicle, for the year or 12 months expiring on the 31st day of January, 1925, and did request and demand that he register said vehicle and assign to it a number, and issue to this petitioner the certificates of registration and ownership provided for in section 41 of said act, and to furnish it with two number plates for said vehicle as provided by section 42 of said act.

"That said respondent did, at said time, refuse, and ever since has refused, to accept said sum of $33 so tendered to him as aforesaid, and did refuse, and ever since has refused, to accept said application and to register said vehicle and to assign to it a number, and to issue to petitioner the certificates provided for in section 41 of said act, and to furnish it with said number plates, except upon the payment of the additional sum or fee of $50 mentioned in subdivision (b) of said section 77 of said act as an additional registration fee 'to be paid for the registration of every electric motor vehicle designed and used for the transportation of passengers for hire, or for the transportation of property.'"

The prayer of the petition is for a writ of mandate directed to the respondent to compel him, upon the tender to him of the said sum of $39.25, to "accept, out of said sum, the sum of $33 as payment in full as and for the legal registration fee for said vehicle for the year or 12 months ending January 31, 1925," etc.

The respondent interposed a demurrer to the petition on the general ground, and the same was sustained and the proceedings for the writ dismissed. From the judgment entered upon said order the petitioner appeals upon the judgment roll alone.

The purpose of this proceeding is to obtain a judicial determination of the question whether the provision of the state Motor Vehicle Act authorizing the imposition of a registration fee of $50 for the registration of electric motor vehicles intended for use and used for the transportation of passengers for hire or the transportation of property is or is not, when measured by certain mandates of the state and federal Constitutions, a valid enactment. The position here of the petitioner is that it is in violation of the state Constitution, in that it imposes upon such motor vehicles a fee "in excess of that imposed upon any other automotive vehicles designed and used for the transportation of passengers for hire, or for the transportation of property," and is therefore discriminatory; that it is "based upon an unreasonable and arbitrary classification."

The provision to which the objections above stated are here interposed is in subdivision (b) of section 77 of the act of the Legislature of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 517 et seq.), the object of which, generally stated, is to regulate the use and operation of vehicles upon the public highways, and to provide for the registration and identification of motor vehicles, etc., and for the payment of registration fees therefor. Said subdivision reads:

"(b) A registration fee of ten dollars shall be paid for the registration of every electric passenger motor vehicle and a registration fee of fifty dollars shall be paid for the registration of every electric motor vehicle designed and used for the transportation of passengers for hire or for the transportation of property. Such fees shall be in addition to the fees specified in subdivision (a) of this section."

The preceding subdivision (a) provides for the payment of a registration fee of $3 for the registration of every motor vehicle, trailer or semitrailer, except for such as are by the act expressly exempted from the operation of said subdivision.

The act of 1923 was intended to supersede the statute of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 639), which provided, in elaborate detail, rules and regulations governing the use and operation of motor vehicles over and upon the public highways of the state. Under said act registration fees for all motor vehicles, regardless of the kind of power by which they were operated, were rated upon the basis of the horsepower of the vehicle, and therefore, the amount of such fee which was required to be paid was according to the horsepower of the vehicle. That act, with some amendments thereto by subsequent Legislatures, remained the law until the passage of the act of 1923 above mentioned. Among the several changes made in the act of 1913 was that by the Legislature of 1915 (Stats. 1915, pp. 397, 401), whereby motor vehicles operated by electricity were, as to registration fees, removed from the general class of motor vehicles and set off in a class by themselves, or, in other words, the electric motor vehicles were taken from the horse power basis for the charging of registration fees and the owners thereof required to pay for each such vehicle a flat registration fee of $5. The gas vehicles were still retained by said act in their original class for registration fee rating purposes; that is to say, they were still subject to the horse power system of rating the registration fees.

Of course, the purpose of the legislation exacting license taxes for motor vehicles operated over the public highways is to raise funds with which such highways may be improved and kept in repair in such manner as is suitable to the mode of transportation peculiar to motor vehicles. The theory of such a tax, particularly under present-day conditions as to the character of the highways required and the great expense in constructing and maintaining them, is, manifestly, that it is only just and proper that those who use the public highways, either for business purposes or for pleasure should bear the expense of keeping in repair those already improved and to contribute to the construction of new roads. And, unquestionably, it was and is the duty of the Legislature, in the framing of a system for the raising of revenue for that purpose, to adopt a basis therefor which would have the effect of equalizing, as nearly as may be practicable, the burden thus imposed upon motor vehicles or the owners and operators thereof, considering, of course, the particular use to which such vehicles are put, their weight, and such other elements as might properly enter into the determination of the probable effect, as to the matter of "wear and tear," the use of each of the various classes of motor vehicles would have upon the roads. The Legislature of 1913, and subsequent Legislatures until the Legislature of 1923, conceived, as we have seen, that the horsepower standard of rating registration fees would constitute a system which would bring about a just distribution among all classes of motor vehicles of the burden of raising the revenue necessary for road improvement and repair purposes. It may be that that system worked well for a just equalization of the burden imposed upon owners of motor vehicles to contribute to the improvement and maintenance of the public roads of the state. As to this, however, we express no definite opinion, nor is it necessary to do so here. Assuming, though, that the system established by the Legislature of 1913 at least equitably distributed the burden referred to, there was still another element in the establishment of a scheme for raising revenue for road purposes by a registration fee system, which it was necessary to take into account; namely: The raising of a sufficient aggregate annual sum for that purpose to meet the exigent requirements of modern highway improvement and maintenance. It is known, as a matter of current knowledge, that within the past few years automotive highway traffic has increased in volume in prodigious and, it may not inappropriately be added, in alarming proportions. The expense of maintaining the public highways from the greatly increased use and consequent wear and tear to which thus the highways now are and have been subjected has of necessity proportionately been increased, and, most naturally, if, under the horse power system of fixing registration fees, the greatly enhanced cost of improving and keeping in proper repair the highways could not be met, it would be requisite to contrive and establish some other scheme, founded upon a just and an intelligent basis, by which it could be done, and, at the same time, adjust the matter of the imposition of registration and other license fees or taxes in such manner or upon such a basis as would produce substantial equality among all owners or operators of motor vehicles, according to a proper classification thereof, in bearing the burden necessarily coincident with the work of improving and maintaining the public highways, or, in other words, to establish the registration and other fees imposed upon owners or operators of motor vehicles according to a plan which would prevent discrimination as against such vehicles of the same class or of any class. And it may well be assumed that the plan adopted into the act of 1913 for the raising of revenue for highway purposes by prescribing graduated registration fees to be paid by owners of gas-propelled motor vehicles and a flat fee for electric motor vehicles was finally found to be entirely inadequate to the raising of such revenue in an amount each year which would satisfy the increased and the still growing financial exactions of highway improvement and upkeep, since it is true that the Legislature of 1923 passed an act establishing an entirely new system for the raising of revenue for said purpose, so far as gas and other fuel cars are concerned, by requiring, practically, the owners or operators of all such cars to pay to the state, in addition to nominal registration fees, 2 cents per gallon for all gas consumed in the operation thereof. Stats. 1923, p. 571. It is true that the license tax of 2 cents per gallon on all fuel gas sold and distributed by those engaged in the business of selling the same for motor vehicle purposes is not a direct license tax upon those owning or using such vehicles; yet that the act operates indirectly to impose upon the owners or operators of such vehicles a tax of 2 cents on every gallon of gas that they purchase for use in propelling motor vehicles is, from the very nature and logic of the situation, indisputably true. This proposition irresistibly follows from the fact that taxes assessed against the goods and wares of the vendor thereof and by him paid are always included in so-called "overhead expenses," and, of course, constitute an element in the fixing of the market value of the goods, or, at all events, is an element of the cost of the goods to the consumer, and that the tax upon such gas provided by the act was intended by the Legislature to be substituted for and in lieu of the license tax on motor vehicles propelled by means of gas, and graded according to the horse power standard, as provided by the act of 1913, is plainly shown by the provisions or the language thereof. The first section of the act defines the meaning of a number of the terms used in the statute, such as "motor vehicle," "motor vehicle fuel," "service station," "distributor," etc.

The second section provides that every distributor, etc., of fuel gas, so engaged when the act goes into effect, and any person, etc., intending thereafter to become such distributor, etc., shall within a specified time register as such distributor with the state board of equalization, whereupon said board shall issue to such distributor a license, etc. Section 3 fixes the tax of 2 cents per gallon of fuel gas sold to every owner or operator of fuel gas motor vehicles, and provides that the payment thereof shall be to the state controller in quarterly installments. Section 6 provides that, within a certain period of time specified therein, every distributor of gas fuel shall file with the state board of equalization, within 20 days after the end of each quarter, a verified statement, in a certain prescribed form, showing, among other things, the total number of gallons of motor vehicle fuel, etc., sold and distributed within the state by such distributor. Failure by any distributor to file such statement entails, by virtue of the provisions of section 8, a certain penalty, which, with the tax, must be collected by the state controller, and, if the tax and penalty be not paid to that officer, then, upon his request, the Attorney General must institute and prosecute an action against the delinquent distributor to recover the taxes and all accrued penalties and interest.

The eleventh section provides that any person, firm, corporation, etc., who shall buy motor vehicle fuel for purposes other than in motor vehicles operated or intended to be operated upon public highways, and also those buying such gas to be used and used exclusively in motor vehicles employed in the transportation of rural free delivery mails, shall be reimbursed by the state in the amount of the tax on fuel gas as provided by said act, upon presenting to the state controller, in the form prescribed, a claim for the total amount so paid, all applications for such reimbursement to be filed with the controller within six months from the date of the purchase of such motor vehicle fuel.

Section 12 vests the state board of equalization with the right to make such examinations of the records of distributors as it may deem necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of the act. Section 13 provides that all license taxes collected by the state controller in pursuance of the provisions of said act shall be by that officer deposited in the state treasury and credited to the "motor vehicle fund," which the act expressly creates, and further provides that one-half of the net amount of all the moneys so received shall be paid to the counties of the state in certain designated proportions, and the same placed in "a special road improvement fund," and to be expended by the counties receiving them "exclusively in the construction and maintenance of roads, bridges, and culverts in each such county." The moneys remaining after the payment of the amount above indicated to the counties are appropriated by the act (section 12) to the "state highway maintenance fund," to be used exclusively in the maintenance, repair, reconstruction, etc., of state highways, and roads and highways in state parks. At the same session of the Legislature at which the act above considered was passed the act containing the provision (section 77) which constitutes the basis of the petitioner's grievance, as set forth in general language in its petition, was passed. Both acts were approved on the same day, to wit, on the 30th day of May, 1923. The act last referred to, as did the act of 1913, specifically, or with the required particularity, deals with motor vehicle traffic upon the public highways, prescribing rules regulating the use and operation of motor vehicles over and upon such highways and fixing penalties for the violation thereof. It does not, however, as in the case of motor vehicles propelled by electricity, provide for a flat registration fee of $50 for gas fuel motor vehicles used for the transportation of passengers or property, and thus the cause of the controversy here arises, and to which it is now timely to give consideration.

[1] The Attorney General, representing the respondent, insists that, to determine whether the Legislature, in providing for the raising of revenue for highway improvement purposes by imposing upon owners or other persons operating motor vehicles over and upon the highways of the state certain license fees or taxes, has or has not discriminated in favor of gas-propelled as against electric-propelled motor vehicles, the two statutes of 1923—the one dealing with automotive highway traffic and other matters pertaining to the use of motor vehicles, and the other levying a fuel gas tax of 2 cents per gallon, to be paid by all persons operating such vehicles propelled by gas—must be read and considered together as being in pari materia. This position is vigorously assailed by counsel for the petitioner. They assert that the doctrine of in pari materia, being a mere rule of construction, may appropriately be invoked only where there are two or more statutes dealing with cognate or interrelated subjects, and one contains words of such dubious or doubtful meaning as to make it uncertain what the Legislature intended to say by the use of such words; that in such case such statute may be read and considered with such other statute or statutes to ascertain the true meaning of such words or the intent of the Legislature in so using them. In other words, and in brief, the position of petitioner's counsel is that the application of the rule referred to is limited to the ascertainment of the meaning of ambiguous words in a particular statute of several dealing with the same general subject, and is not to be resorted to for the purpose of obtaining light upon the question whether it was the legislative intent that the several statutes should together constitute a single plan or scheme for the accomplishment of a particular object. To the contention thus stated we are unable to agree. We can think of no good reason which may stand as in support of it. To the contrary, we accept as expounding the sounder interpretation of the doctrine the following statement thereof in 36 Cyc. p. 1147:

"Statutes in pari materia are those which relate to the same person or thing, or to the same class of persons or things. In the construction of a particular statute, or in the interpretation of any of its provisions, all acts relating to the same subject, or having the same general purpose, should be read in connection with it, as together constituting one law. The endeavor should be made, by tracing the history of legislation on the subject, to ascertain the uniform and consistent purpose of the Legislature (italics ours), or to discover how the policy of the Legislature with reference to the subject-matter has been changed or modified from time to time. With this purpose in view therefore it is proper to consider, not only acts passed at the same session of the Legislature, but also acts passed at prior and subsequent sessions, and even those which have been repealed."

See, also, State ex rel. American Piano Co. v. Superior Court, 105 Wash. 676, 679, 178 P. 827, 828; Paltro v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 119 Wash. 101, 204 P. 1044, 1046; Ford v. Harbor Commissioners, 81 Cal. 19, 29, 22 P. 278; Irelan v. Colgan, 96 Cal. 413, 414, 415, 31 P. 294; German Sav. & Loan Society v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 120, 128, 69 P. 89, 70 P. 1067; 31 Corpus Juris, p. 358, and cases named in the footnotes.

Furthermore, "the rule that statutes in pari materia should be construed together applies with peculiar force to statutes passed at the same session of the Legislature; it is to be presumed that such acts are imbued with the same spirit and actuated by the same policy, and they are to be construed together as if parts of the same act. They should be so construed, if possible, as to harmonize, and force and effect should be given to the provisions of each." 36 Cyc. p. 1151.

[2] And particularly in the construction of statutes relating to revenue and taxation is the rule applicable and invariably invoked upon the theory that all such statutes constitute one law. People v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 306 Ill. 459, 138 N. E. 196; Commonwealth v. P. Lorillard Co., 129 Va. 74, 105 S. E. 683; State v. Covington, 35 S. C. 245, 14 S. E. 499.

[3-5] The case of Gleason v. Spray, 81 Cal. 217, 22 P. 551, 15 Am. St. Rep. 47, cited by petitioner as supporting his view of the scope of the rule of in pari materia as a canon of statutory construction, while stating that, in construing a certain section of the Civil Code which contained certain words whose meaning, as so used, was obscure, said section, to ascertain the meaning of the ambiguous words, should be considered with other sections of the Code relating to the same subject, does not hold that the rule of construction thus invoked is confined in its application merely to the ascertainment of the meaning of ambiguous words used in a statute. Nor do the cases of Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 P. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230; Conlin v. Supervisors, 99 Cal. 17, 33 P. 753, 21 L. R. A. 474, 37 Am. St. Rep. 17; and Los Angeles Co. F. C. Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 169 P. 1028, also cited by petitioner. Of course, the office of the rule is that of interpretation and of construction. If, in order properly to construe a statute, words used therein are of such dubious or uncertain meaning that the real legislative intent of the act cannot be determined, when it is considered by itself or alone, then, of course, other statutes or acts upon the same subject, or the history of the legislation thereon, may and should be considered if, by that course, the meaning of the words as intended by the Legislature may be learned, and, if so learned, thus open the way for a construction of the statute in accord with the intent at the bottom thereof. On the other hand, where a legislative act contains no uncertain or misleading words, but, taken alone, although the subject-matter thereof be within legislative cognizance, it would, nevertheless, offend certain restrictions or inhibitions of the state or federal Constitution, then, in that case, if there be any other statute or statutes in pari materia with such act, the several acts or statutes should be construed together as if they constitute but one law, if in so doing they harmonize in the achievement of the central purpose of their enactment and at the same time remain within the commands or inhibitions of the state and federal Constitutions.

[6-8] It is perfectly clear, as has been before stated, that the provisions themselves of the act of 1923 imposing a tax of 2 cents on every gallon of fuel gas, to be used in gas-propelled motor vehicles, show that the Legislature, ex industria, intended that that plan of imposing a privilege tax on those operating or causing to be operated such motor vehicles upon the highways of the state should be in lieu of the registration fee such persons were theretofore required to pay. We therefore hold that the two acts of 1923 under consideration, in so far as they provide, respectively, for a registration fee for electric motor vehicles and the excise or privilege tax on gas for gas-propelled motor vehicles were intended to constitute a single plan or scheme for compelling persons operating, or causing to be operated, motor vehicles upon the public highways of the state to pay a fee or a tax, according to the character of such vehicles as to the method of their propulsion, and that the two acts in that particular are in pari materia; that, in effect, they constitute one law. So considering the two acts, we can perceive no reason for holding that there is any discrimination in the matter of the privilege fee or tax which the operators of the two classes of motor vehicles are, respectively, required to pay. We cannot so declare from the face of the statutes. It may be that, in particular instances, the amount paid by the operators of gas-propelled motor vehicles used for the transportation of passengers or property in some years is and will be less than the flat fee required to be paid by operators of freight or passenger electric motor vehicles. On the other hand, it may be (and we doubt not that this is true) that in many instances the amount paid as the tax on fuel gas purchased and used by persons operating or causing to be operated gas-propelled passenger or freight motor vehicles is annually far in excess of the sum of $50, the amount of the registration fee exacted from those operating like electric motor vehicles. The problem is not one of easy solution. It is, however, a problem the solution of which is peculiarly and exclusively one of legislative cognizance, and an approximately fair and equitable adjustment of the whole matter is, perhaps, all that may or should reasonably be expected. The presumption is that the Legislature, in establishing the existing plan, fully investigated the facts upon which it acted in fixing a flat fee in the one case and a fuel gas tax in the other, and in placing the fee for electric motor vehicles used for freight or passenger transportation at $50, and the statutes themselves constitute a finding that the system established by those acts will bring, and has brought, about as near an equitable adjustment, as between the operators of the two classes of motor vehicles so used, of the amounts they should respectively pay for the privilege of using the highways as is practicable. Cooley's Const. Limitations, 187; Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 653, 27 P. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230. Of course, the courts cannot go behind legislative enactments which, upon their face, are in complete harmony with the Constitution, and, by a resort to evidence, attempt to ascertain whether the Legislature, in passing them, did or did not observe or remain within the restrictions which the Constitution has placed upon its power as a co-ordinate branch of the government, or has or has not properly performed the duty which is not only enjoined upon it by the Constitution but which its members by their oaths bound themselves properly to perform. Stevenson v. Colgan, supra.

The effect of the two statutes as to the fee or tax to be paid is necessarily to segregate the gas-propelled motor vehicles and the electric motor trucks used for the transportation of passengers for hire or of property into two classes. Counsel for petitioner in their opening brief concede the validity of the classification by subdivision (b) of section 77 of electric motor vehicles into those designed for the transportation of passengers for hire or for the transportation of property and those designed and used for other purposes as a basis for differentiating in the amount of the tax or fee to be exacted from the owners or operators of each of the classes of such motor vehicles, and further declare that they have no objection to make to the "weight tax" exacted by subdivision (c) of said section 77. But, as seen, they do contend that the imposition by subdivision (b) of an additional registration fee of $50 for electric motor vehicles used for the transportation of passengers for hire or of property is not within "a classification based on a difference which bears a just and proper relation to the object to be attained; namely, the 'laying of a tax charge in the nature of compensation for the damage done to the roads of the state by the driving of these machines over them, and properly based upon the amount of destruction caused by them,'" citing In re Schuler, 167 Cal. 282, 139 P. 685, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 706.

fixing of the privilege tax upon persons operating motor vehicles for the transportation of passengers for hire or of property according to the essential difference in the instrumentalities by which the two kinds of such vehicles so used are operated or propelled is founded upon a classification which has the effect of removing the statutes in question, in so far as they provide for such tax in the manner explained, from the interdiction of the following provision of the state Constitution: "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Article 1, § 11.

The distinction between gas fuel motor trucks or stages and electric motor trucks or stages is in the difference in the means by which the two kinds are operated. Indeed, the distinction in that particular becomes the more marked and palpable when it is considered that a privilege or excise tax based upon the quantity of fuel gas used in motor vehicles so propelled may be imposed upon persons operating or causing to be operated such motor vehicles upon the public highways of the state, while it is obviously impossible to impose such tax upon those likewise operating or causing to be operated electric motor vehicles or trucks; and it is that difference between the two classes of motor vehicles which of necessity gives rise to the distinction between those persons operating, or causing to be operated, gas fuel motor vehicles used for property or freight transportation and those operating or causing to be operated electric motor vehicles used for the same purpose, and, in the very nature of things, the two sets of persons thus described are segregated into distinct classes, namely: (1) Those operating gas fuel motor vehicles for the transportation of passengers for hire or property; (2) those operating electric motor vehicles for the same purpose.

[10, 11] It is established in this state that, within the contemplation of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution, a law is general and uniform in its operation if it operates uniformly upon "all persons standing in the same relation to the law, in respect to the privileges and immunities conferred by it, or the acts which it prohibits." City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 251, 27 P. 604, 607; Ex parte Smith and Keating, 38 Cal. 710; Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 366. True, to render a law general which cannot be made applicable to the entire body of the people free from fatal discriminatory provisions in favor of and, in a corresponding degree, against certain members thereof, there must be a classification of the people founded upon some "natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction." City of Pasadena v. Stimson, supra. In other words, a law cannot be general and uniform in its operation, within the meaning and intent of the constitutional provision above referred to "if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions, in the exercise of a common right, upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." Id.

Nothing could be clearer than that the automatic segregation by the acts in question of the persons operating fuel gas motor vehicles employed in the transportation of passengers for hire or the transportation of property and electric motor vehicles likewise used for the purpose of fixing a tax charge peculiarly appropriate to the character of such motor vehicles with respect to the means by which they are propelled, into different classes, involves a classification founded upon an intrinsic distinction arising from the essential difference in the agencies by which such motor vehicles are operated. The classification is as well grounded as is the classification made by one of the acts herein concerned as between electric motor vehicles used in the business of transporting passengers for hire or of property and electric motor vehicles used for other purposes, of which classification counsel for petitioner, as seen, voluntarily vouchsafe their approval. Indeed, the distinction upon which the classification herein is based is no less intrinsic or natural than that which exists or would exist as between those persons conducting a trucking or a freight or passenger business by means of motor vehicles fed with fuel gas or by electricity and those operating trucks or passenger stages solely by the aid of horses or mules. All persons belonging to either of the classes thus established stand in precisely the same relation to the law with respect to the burdens it imposes. There is, in other words, no discrimination as between any of the persons belonging to either class. All in each class stand upon an absolute equality in so far as are concerned the duties enjoined or the burdens imposed by the law.

Concluding the discussion, it is pertinent to observe that other states have adopted such a plan of classification for the imposition of a privilege tax upon those using the public highways by means of motor vehicles as the acts in question have established in California, and that, although attacked in the higher courts of such states upon every conceivable constitutional ground, the plan has been upheld. Among the sister states referred to are Ohio, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. In the case of Graves v. Jones et al., 2 O. C. A. (Ohio) 383, decided in February, 1914, the court, dealing with a statute which in principle makes such a classification as is involved in the acts in question here, used the following language, which is cogently pertinent in all respects to the case in hand:

"The uniformity clause of the Constitution does not prevent reasonable classification of the subjects of legislation. Motor vehicles are a just subject of classification in respect to the use of public highways as distinguished from horse-drawn vehicles. * * * This classification deals more especially with the necessity of police regulation. The burden of highway maintenance as between motor vehicles and horse-drawn vehicles is as clearly pronounced. * * * From the evidence we are advised that the basis of horse power rating adopted by the act is well recognized and has been employed by leading manufacturers, and while in the recent development of engine-making there may be some inaccuracy, still we think this basis is sufficiently definite to justify legislative adoption. The standard adopted is a formula. There is no delegation of power. The formula existing at the time of the enactment continues until changed by the Legislature. There is also sufficient reason for the flat-rate charges upon electrics. The electrics in general use are comparatively slow moving and of low horse power. While it may be true that electrics of high speed have been constructed, yet it is equally true that they are not in general use. Should they become so, it will be ample time for the Legislature to act."

From what has been said herein it is clear that that portion of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution prohibiting the making or enforcement of any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States or which shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denies to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, is not offended by the legislation in question.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

DOUGLAS v. PENSION BOARD OF CITY OF SACRAMENTO et al. (Civ. 3028.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 24, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨220(9)—Pension system should be administered to produce intended results.

No public officer or employee is entitled to pension as of right, but, when system for retirement pensions is adopted, it should be so administered as to bring about efficacious results intended.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨220(9)—Pension, based on "salary paid," determined by compensation during last year.

Under Sacramento City Charter, §§ 167-169, 171, basing pension on "salary paid," pension of employee regularly employed on per diem basis should be determined by compensation provided during last year of service for one working full time.

Application by John Douglas for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to the Pension Board of City of Sacramento and others, to compel the granting of a pension to petitioner. William Douglas, administrator of the estate of John Douglas, deceased petitioner, was substituted for petitioner. Writ granted.

Henry & Bedeau, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

R. L. Shinn, of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. Subsequent to the institution of this proceeding the petitioner passed out of life, and William Douglas, the duly appointed administrator of his estate, by stipulation of the respective counsel, has been substituted for and in the place of the deceased as petitioner herein.

The proceeding involves an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents the pension board, and the members thereof, of the city of Sacramento, to allow and grant to petitioner an annual pension of $646.34 as a retired employee of said city by virtue of certain provisions of the charter thereof. By said charter the city of Sacramento has established a system for the pensioning, upon specified terms and conditions, the employees thereof. Section 167 of said charter creates a pension board, consisting of the city manager and the members of the civil service board of said city. Section 168 provides:

"All employees of the City of Sacramento who have served the City continuously for twenty years in any capacity (italics ours), except as an elective officer or city manager shall be eligible to relief and pension."

Section 169 provides that all city employees shall be retired upon reaching the age of 70 years; that the board may retire and relieve from service any member of the police or fire department who has passed the age of 55 years, and any other employee of the city who has passed the age of 60 years, and who on examination by two regularly licensed physicians, selected by the board to conduct such examination, is found to be unfit for the performance of his duty, "shall receive an annual pension equal to one-half of the salary paid him one year prior to his retirement." Reference to other sections under the chapter relating to the pensioning of officers and employees of the city, except section 171, may be omitted herefrom as having no special concern with the problem submitted here for solution. The section last named, as petitioner contends, furnishes the source of his right to the amount of the pension to which he claims to be entitled as a retired employee of said city. It provides:

"Any city employee, who is eligible to relief and pension as defined by section 168 and who has become disabled, upon filing with the pension board a verified petition, setting forth the facts constituting such disability, and the cause thereof, accompanied by a certificate signed by the head of his department, and by two regularly licensed physicians in the employ of the city, designated by the board for that purpose, recommending his retirement upon a pension, on account of such disability, may be retired upon an annual pension equal to one-half of the salary paid him one year prior to his retirement, said pension to cease at his death. In case his disability shall cease, his pension shall cease, and he shall be restored to the service in the rank he occupied at the time of his retirement."

From the petition for the relief herein prayed for it appears that for more than 20 years immediately prior to the 20th day of August, 1921, the petitioner was continuously employed by the city of Sacramento in the street department thereof; that, after such continuous service of 20 years, and on said 20th day of August, 1921, the petitioner, on account of disability, was retired from such service; that, at the time he was so retired, and for more than 1 year immediately prior to his retirement, petitioner was paid as compensation for the service so performed by him for said city the sum of $4.13 per day, or the annual compensation of $1,292.69; that during the year next preceding the 20th day of August, 1921, on account of sickness, petitioner was unable to work for a period of approximately 3 months thereof, and that by reason thereof he actually received for the service so performed for the city the sum of $960.48; that respondents computed and determined the amount of annual pension to be paid to petitioner on the basis of the money actually received during or for said year, to wit, the sum of $960.48; that petitioner has often demanded of respondents that they allow him an annual pension of $646.34, which is equal to one-half of his annual salary or compensation ($1,292.69) during or for said year; and that they issue warrants therefor accordingly, but respondents "refused and still refuse to do so, claiming and contending that the petitioner is entitled only to an annual pension equal to one-half of the money he actually received during said year."

The respondents demurred to the petition on the general ground.

As the petition states, the respondents contend that the italicized language of section 171, to wit: "equal to one-half of the salary paid him one year prior to his retirement," means, and was intended to mean, that the basis of computation of the annual pension of an employee retiring after 20 years of service because of disability is the amount of money which has actually been paid to him by the city for the year prior to the date of his retirement. Per contra, the petitioner insists that the compensation is to be based upon the annual salary or the total amount he would have been entitled to receive had he put in every working day in the performance of the service assigned to him.

The language referred to is capable of different constructions, dependent, however, upon the connection in which it may be used. In certain conceivable connections it might properly be held to bear, or to have been intended to bear, the meaning ascribed to it by the city attorney, representing respondents. In other connections it might with equal propriety be construed to have been intended to carry the meaning which the petitioner claims for it. Thus it is clear that the question in such a situation would be, What meaning did the Legislature, if used in a statute, or of the parties, if used in a contract, or, as here, of the framers of the charter, if used in the organic law of a municipality, intend that the language should bear? And that intention must be ascertained by a consideration of the language in connection with the entire context of the measure or instrument, the consequences following a construction either way, and the object which it was designed that the instrument or measure was to attain. In other words, in such a case the question is one of intention, to be determined upon the considerations indicated, and that is the question before us which by a like process must be determined.

The effect of laws providing for the payment of retirement pensions to public officers or employees is to increase the compensations of such officers and employees, and they are so intended. This proposition has particular force as to public officers who perform services as such subsequent to the passage of the law granting such pensions. Whitehead v. Davie, 189 Cal. 715, 717, 209 P. 1008; Hammitt v. Gaynor (Sup.) 144 N. Y. S. 123; People v. Abbott, 274 Ill. 380, 113 N. E. 696, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 450; State v. Love, 89 Neb. 149, 131 N. W. 196, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 607, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 542. The considerations upon which a government adopts, as a part of its administrative policy, a system for the pensioning of those who have continuously, for a specified period of years, served the government in the performance of public civil duties, both as officers and employees, are, in a large measure, these: (1) To encourage those public officers or employees who have by experience or otherwise demonstrated peculiar fitness for the performance of the public services to which they have been assigned to continue in the service of the government and at all times faithfully discharge the duties involved in such service. The hope held out for future additional reward or compensation for their public services to that which they receive concurrently with the period during which they are actually and actively engaged in performing such services is conducive to uniform faithfulness to and efficiency in discharging the duties which their offices or employments have exacted. (2) To safeguard or insure such officers or employees against a possible condition of penury and want, when, after giving the best part of their lives both in point of time of service and ability to the service of the public, they are no longer able to perform, to the degree required, labor of any character or kind. A more just and humane consideration of the class or classes of persons for whom such a provision is made by a government can hardly be conceived. Indeed, the justness of a pension system for the benefit of those who, after long service, must be retired from old age or disability is now so far recognized that it has even become the uniform custom with private corporations to maintain a reasonably framed and well-regulated system of retirement pensions for the benefit of those of their employees who have been in their service continuously for a specified number of years, or to a time when by reason of their advanced age or physical disability they are no longer able, with the efficiency required, to perform the particular duties demanded by such service.

[1] While, of course, no public officer or employee is entitled as of right to be granted a pension, still, when a government has adopted a retirement pension system, it should be so administered as to bring about the efficacious results which it is intended to produce. It should not be so construed and administered as to confer its benefits upon those not actually entitled thereto, nor so that those so entitled should be denied their just rights thereunder.

[2] By the provisions of the charter of the city of Sacramento establishing a retirement pension system it was intended, of course, that every officer or employee of said city who has performed services for the city for the specified number of years, based either upon the age limit or disability, shall, upon his retirement, receive the compensation or pension specified in the instrument, and that intention should be carried out in all proper cases, and never set at naught in any particular instance, except it is plainly apparent that the conditions upon which pensions are to be granted do not exist.

That the petitioner's intestate was a "city employee," and "eligible to relief and pension, as defined by section 168" of the city charter, is admitted here, and it will be observed that, where the compensation of the city employee is fixed as by day's wages, as in the case of petitioner's intestate, section 171, for the purpose of computing and fixing his retirement pension, treats the compensation of such employee, in the annual aggregate thereof, as a yearly salary or compensation. This "salary" or compensation we are persuaded from the considerations to which we have above adverted, and others yet to be suggested, was intended by the framers of the charter, and by the people of the city of Sacramento in approving or ratifying the instrument, to constitute the criterion whereby the retirement pension of any employee of the city, whether his compensation is established upon a per diem basis or upon that of a yearly or monthly salary, is to be computed.

The language of section 171 of the charter, viz. "one-half of the salary paid him one year prior to his retirement," is, it is true, not as clear as it could have been made by the exercise of a little care. In fact, it might, with some show of reason, when considered alone, be held that it was intended that the basis for the computation of the pension in the case of any employee should be the aggregate sum he had been paid for the nineteenth year of his service. But we are of the opinion that, by the use of said language, it was the intention to say that every such employee, upon his retirement at the end of the twentieth year of continuous employment in the service of the city, should receive a pension in an amount equal to one-half of what his compensation would total in the last of the twentieth year of such employment, counting every working day in the year, and this whether he has or has not actually performed the service required in his employment every working day of such year. To be more explicit: The words "salary paid to him" in our opinion mean what the compensation which has been provided for the position or office or employment, whose duties he is required to perform, would amount to, computed upon the same basis as is a fixed or determinate yearly salary, limited, however, to the number of working days in the year. To give said language any other interpretation, or, it is perhaps better to say, to ascribe to it the meaning claimed for it by the respondents, would be to violate the spirit and frustrate, to the extent to which the section might thus be applied, the very design or the central purpose of the usual retirement pension schemes for civil public officers or employees, as above explained, since the effect of such an interpretation, if sanctioned, would, in many instances, inevitably lead to very unjust consequences. So far as anything to the contrary is disclosed by the record before us, the petitioner, as may, indeed, be the case as to any employee of the city, in every year of the 19 consecutive years immediately preceding the twentieth year of his employment in the service of the city put in every working day in the performance of the duties of his assignment, and yet, if the theory of respondents as to the meaning of section 171 of the charter is to be accepted, the result would be that, notwithstanding those 19 years of full and faithful service, the petitioner, having, during the twentieth year of such service, and while engaged in performing the duties thereof, suffered a disability which necessarily forced him to be absent from his employment for several weeks or several months, would be entitled, as for his retirement pension, to no greater an allowance than what one-half of the aggregate sum which had actually been paid him for services actually performed during said year would amount to. But it is said that, on the other hand, the law before us, if construed as the petitioner understands its meaning and intent, would, in conceivable cases, work unjustly as against the city, an instance of which would be where an employee, in each of the 19 years immediately preceding the twentieth year of his service, had not actually rendered services every working day, or for the full year. Such a situation is apt to arise during the course of long service by any person in any field of activity, and that consideration is to be assumed to be within the contemplation of any well-framed pension system for those employed to discharge civil duties for a government. In other words, in creating a pension system, a government or a private corporation do so with the expectation or anticipation that those for whose benefit such system has been established will, at some time during the long period of service which, under the system, entitles them to be retired on a pension, be unable to perform the duties of their employment, and, where special provision is not contained in the law establishing the system to the effect that all working days upon which those employees whose compensation is fixed and paid upon a per diem basis have not actually performed services shall be excluded from consideration in computing their retirement pension, it is then to be assumed that it was the intention to include such days as among those constituting the basis for such computation. There is no such provision in the charter of the city of Sacramento. Hence the fixing of the amount of the pension to which the petitioner's intestate is entitled upon the basis of all the working days of the twentieth year of his employment is only following the mandates of the law. There can be no unjustness or injustice in following the law either in letter or spirit. And the views thus expressed are supported by the consideration that the petitioner's intestate was, in all the years prior to the date at which he became eligible to retire upon a pension from disability, regularly employed for continuous service, and that the city, at all times while he was in its employment, where he was not actually performing the services required by his contract of employment as well as when engaged in performing those services, used or had control of his time. By this we intend to say that, so long as he was not discharged from the service of the city, or his absence from his employment was temporary only, he was, during such absence, as much an employee of the city as when actually he was engaged in performing services for the city, and it was upon the basis of his employment as so viewed that he is entitled to have his retirement pension fixed and allowed. Of course, we are not here holding that an employee of the city is entitled to be paid compensation by way of wages for those days during which he has performed no services. We can perceive no reason why he should. This declaration, though, is not inconsistent with the theory upon which we hold the retirement pension of such an employee should be fixed and allowed. The two propositions relate to different considerations. And it must be understood that, in the present discussion, we have in mind those employees only who are regularly employed for continuous service through the year, but who, from physical disability or other adventitious contingencies which may arise in the course of any employment, are not able to perform the services required of them every working day of the year, and not those employees, if any such there be, whose employments may be of such a nature that the performance of the services involved therein would be required for a brief period or at intervals only in each year, as to the eligibility of which class to pension benefits under the charter of Sacramento we have no opinion now to express.

Our conclusion is that the relief herein asked should be granted. Accordingly, the demurrer to the petition is overruled, and it is ordered that a writ of mandate be issued out of this court directed to respondents, commanding them to issue to the petitioner a warrant for the amount stated in the petition as the amount due him for the retirement pension of his intestate.

2. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1071(6) — Defendant not prejudiced by trial court's failure to make a finding which would have been against him under the evidence.

In suit for goods sold and delivered, trial court's failure to find that defendant failed to disclose fact he was acting as receiver in official capacity held not prejudicial to defendant, where, under the evidence, finding relative thereto would clearly have been against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Mead Clark against Clarence E. Baen and Ruby E. Whitney, as administratrix of the estate of George O. Whitney, deceased. Action dismissed as to defendant administratrix. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Clarence E. Baen appeals. Affirmed.

Marcel E. Cerf and C. H. Sooy, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Geary & Geary and W. F. Geary, all of Santa Rosa, for defendant Whitney.

Fred W. McConnell, of Healdsburg, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of \$435.50 for "lumber lath sold and delivered" to them by plaintiff. The action was dismissed as to the defendant administratrix. The defendant Baen filed an answer denying the allegations of the complaint and alleging, as an affirmative defense, that the International Brokerage Company, a Delaware corporation, doing business as California Grape Distributors, was adjudged a bankrupt by the federal court at Chicago, and that a receiver was there appointed to take charge of the bankrupt's estate; that the federal court at San Francisco appointed defendant ancillary receiver of the bankrupt's estate in California; that the bankrupt, prior to said adjudication, had carried on the business of "dehydration and drying of fruits and vegetables and of packing and shipping the same" at Santa Rosa, Cal.; that "at the time of the appointment of said defendant as ancillary receiver * * * the said bankrupt estate had remaining assets consisting of leasehold property and improvements on leasehold property consisting of drying and packing machinery, drying sheds, a warehouse, and other improvements attached to the leasehold and the business connected therewith"; that, under and by virtue of orders of the court, "said defendant as ancillary receiver was duly authorized to carry on business of the said named bankrupt in Santa Rosa and in California"; that the defendant did "as ancillary receiver, and not otherwise, carry on and conduct * * * the business of the said bankrupt in the city of Santa Rosa," and employed "George O. 1. Bankruptcy $\hookrightarrow$ 114(1) — Defendant, failing to disclose he was acting in official capacity as receiver, and assisting to conceal identity of principal, personally liable.

Where plaintiff seller, at time of sale and delivery to defendant's agent, did not know that defendant was acting as receiver or in other than individual capacity, and defendant failed to disclose such fact, and helped to conceal identity of his principal by permitting agent to conduct firm's business under misleading name, defendant could not deny his liability to plaintiff, misled thereby, on ground that he was acting for undisclosed principal, but was personally liable for goods.

ney in and about the conduct of the business of said bankrupt at Santa Rosa"; and that the merchandise described in the complaint was "sold and delivered to said bankrupt estate upon the order of said George O. Whitney."

The court found that the allegations of the complaint are true; that the defendant was appointed ancillary receiver as alleged in the answer; that the business of the bankrupt was as therein alleged; that the defendant was duly authorized to "continue the business of the International Brokerage Company for the balance of the drying season for the year 1921, at the plant of said International Brokerage Company at Santa Rosa"; that the defendant employed Whitney as alleged; that "during said time the said defendant Baen also conducted the business of buying, selling, and shipping grapes at said city of Santa Rosa, and shipping said grapes to eastern markets, under the name and designation of Santa Rosa Dehydrating Company, and in and about which said last business the said defendant Baen also employed the said Whitney as agent and manager; that during the times herein mentioned, and between September 30, 1921, and October 19, 1921, the said defendant Baen, by and through said manager and agent, George O. Whitney, did purchase from the said plaintiff herein, at said Santa Rosa, in the said county of Sonoma, lumber lath for use in shipping green grapes purchased by the said defendant Baen under the name of Santa Rosa Dehydrating Company, and which said lumber lath were of the reasonable value of $435.50, and for which the said defendant Baen, by and through said agent and manager, agreed to pay to the said plaintiff herein the said sum of $435.50; no part of which has ever been paid." Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff against defendant Baen as prayed for in the complaint. Baen has appealed from the judgment. He contends that the evidence does not support the findings to the effect that he purchased the materials in question in his individual capacity and is personally liable for the value thereof.

Whitney was in charge of the International Brokerage Company's business at Santa Rosa during the year 1920, and the dehydrating plant was built that year. The company did not operate under the name Santa Rosa Dehydrating Company. Its principal business there "was the dehydrating process." "That is what it (the plant) was built for." "It was advertised as a dehydrating plant." "Fresh grapes were shipped during the year 1920," to what extent does not appear. It used "lumber lath" in shipping such grapes, but the same was not purchased from plaintiff. The materials involved in this action were used in the shipment of fresh grapes during the year 1921. The plaintiff testified that they were ordered by Whitney and delivered at the dehydrating plant; that six deliveries were made; that his bookkeeper charged the sales in his account books to the Santa Rosa Dehydrating Plant; that, "after there had been one or two loads went out, and I found the account here in my book before I knew they had gotten any, * * * I saw Mr. Whitney, and I says, 'Whose is this dehydrating plant?' I know I asked him who it was, and he said it consisted of Mr. Clarence E. Baen of San Francisco, he was the head man, he was the one that would send me the check, * * * He said Mr. Baen would pay that." Plaintiff then wrote in pencil, after the name Santa Rosa Dehydrating Plant in the account, "Clarence E. Baen, Whitney Manager." Plaintiff further testified:

"The International Brokerage Company, I knew they had gone into bankruptcy; that is, I heard they had, but I didn't know anything about the dehydrating plant, and I did not know who the owners were or anything about it at all. * * * When we sold this lumber I knew nothing about" Baen's receivership.

The defendant Baen testified:

"My instructions to Mr. Whitney were * * * not to run up any bills or create any obligation that he did not have the money to pay for." The International Brokerage Company "left a great many debts, a great many obligations to grape growers and to everybody around this country. * * *

"Q. Why did they call it the Santa Rosa Dehydrating Plant (during the receivership)? A. * * * I really don't know. Because the International Brokerage Company name was too long, for one thing, and Whitney took that line up and called it the Santa Rosa Dehydrating Plant because the International Brokerage Company name was too long, he said, and because it had a pretty rotten reputation.

"Q. Did you suggest he do that? A. No. I told him to take it down; that he had no right to do that; that he was manager for me of the International Brokerage Company, and he said, 'That's only the name of the plant, that is not the name of the company.'

"Q. It was run as the Santa Rosa Dehydrating Plant, wasn't it? A. Yes, sir."

Baen further testified that he operated the plant from July to October or November, 1921; that he incurred debts to the amount of about $15,000 in excess of the moneys in his possession as receiver; that he resides in San Francisco; that during the operation of the plant by him he made possibly a dozen visits to Santa Rosa, "different week-ends, Saturday afternoons and Sundays"; that during that time he purchased and shipped, as receiver, 125 or 130 carloads of fresh grapes, at an expenditure of $180,000 or $200,000; that Whitney was not the agent of defendant personally, but only as receiver; and that the materials purchased were used only in the shipment of grapes by the defendant as such receiver.

[1] It is not necessary to consider whether the receiver exceeded his authority by engaging in the business of buying and shipping fresh grapes, or whether that business is included in the business of "dehydration and drying of fruits and vegetables and of packing and shipping the same," or whether the plaintiff, having no interest in the bankrupt's estate, can raise the question of want of authority. The uncontradicted evidence shows that at the time the materials were sold and delivered the plaintiff did not know that Baen was acting as receiver or in other than his individual capacity. Baen, knowing that the bankrupt corporation had a "rotten reputation" at Santa Rosa, was instrumental in misleading plaintiff by permitting Whitney to conduct the business under a name which would naturally tend to hide the identity of the real purchaser, if the bankrupt estate was such. In harmony with the adoption of a misleading name, when plaintiff inquired as to the identity of the Santa Rosa Dehydrating Company, Whitney not only failed to give the desired information, but he made statements which further misled the plaintiff. Baen was the agent of the bankrupt estate. By permitting Whitney to conduct the business thereof under a misleading name, Baen helped to conceal the identity of his principal. Under such circumstances the defendant cannot be heard to deny liability to one who has been misled, on the ground that he was acting for an undisclosed principal.

"The rule is well established that, where one deals with another believing him to be a principal, and subsequently learns that he was dealing with an agent of an undisclosed principal, he may recover either from the person with whom he dealt or from the undisclosed principal. A man has a right to the character, credit, and substance of the person with whom he contracts; if, therefore, he enters into a contract with an agent, who does not give his principal's name, the presumption is that he is invited to give credit to the agent, still more, if the agent does not disclose his principal's existence. If a person would excuse himself from responsibility on the ground of agency, he must show that he disclosed his principal at the time of making the contract, and that he acted on his behalf, so as to enable the party with whom he deals to have recourse to the principal in case the agent had authority to bind him. Consequently, an agent who contracts without disclosing his principal, is personally liable, even where he discloses the fact of the agency, but not the name of his principal." 1 Cal. Jur. 860; Bradford v. Woodworth, 108 Cal. 684, 41 P. 797; Murphy v. Helmrich, 66 Cal. 69, 4 P. 953.

[2] If it be conceded that the defendant conducted the business of buying and shipping fresh grapes as receiver, he nevertheless made himself personally liable to plaintiff by failing to disclose the fact that he was such receiver and was acting in his official capacity. The evidence more strongly supports the judgment in this case than that produced in Bradford v. Woodworth, supra, where the judgment against the agent personally was affirmed. It is true that the trial court in that case found that the agent did not disclose the fact that he made the purchases there in question on behalf of his principal, but, since a finding upon that issue in this case must necessarily, under the evidence, have been against the defendant, he has suffered no prejudice by the failure to so find. An examination of the whole case not only fails to show a miscarriage of justice, but shows affirmatively that no other judgment could properly have been entered.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Louis Filarski against C. H. Covey and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

K. Van Zante, of Hanford, for appellant.
J. L. C. Irwin, of Hanford, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant C. H. Covey, as deputy sheriff, W. J. Hime, as sheriff of the county of Kings, state of California, and Maryland Casualty Company, a corporation, as surety on the official bond of W. J. Hime, as sheriff, for the purpose of recovering damages in the sum of $10,000 for the death of a minor son of the plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of C. H. Covey as deputy sheriff. The trial court sustained the demurrer of the defendants Hime and Maryland Casualty Company to plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to amend, and sustained the demurrer of the defendant C. H. Covey to said complaint, with leave to plaintiff to amend within ten days, which plaintiff declined to do. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and from this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

VI. "That on the 8th day of October, 1923, defendant C. H. Covey, while acting in his official capacity as deputy sheriff, had in his possession a certain automobile which was then under his care, management, and direction, and which he was driving north on the public highway at a place about three miles south of the southeast corner of the city limits of the city of Hanford in said county of Kings, to wit, at the intersection of said public highway and a private road running east therefrom."

VIII. "That on the said 8th day of October, 1923, defendant W. J. Hime, as sheriff of said county of Kings, had in his custody in the county jail of said county of Kings a person whom he had arrested for committing a public offense, who was then and there awaiting his preliminary hearing before, and to be admitted to bail by, a magistrate. That on said day defendant C. H. Covey, while acting in the line of his official duties, went out to call such magistrate, and after having called such magistrate he (defendant C. H. Covey) proceeded to return to take said person so held in custody before said magistrate for examination, to wit, to give him a preliminary hearing and to admit him to bail, and while thus returning as aforesaid said defendant C. H. Covey so wrongfully, carelessly, and negligently, and without due regard for the safety and convenience of others upon said public highway, managed and drove said automobile that the same then and there came into violent collision with said bicycle managed and ridden on by said Joe Filarski. That by reason of said collision said Joe Filarski was thrown upon the ground and rendered unconscious, and his skull and the bones of both his arms were fractured. And the injuries then and there inflicted upon said Joe Filarski, by reason of said collision caused his death on the 9th day of October, 1923."

The grounds of demurrer were that said second amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that said complaint is uncertain in that it cannot be determined therefrom what official act said C. H. Covey was performing, or attempting to perform, at the time of the alleged accident; that it cannot be ascertained from said second amended complaint whether it was sought to hold the Maryland

Casualty Company liable on its bond for wrongful acts committed by said Hime in his official capacity as sheriff or in the negligent performance of his official duties; that said amended complaint is uncertain in that it cannot be determined whether it is sought to allege the wrongful acts committed by Covey in his official capacity or in his individual capacity. Other grounds of demurrer are specified, but these are sufficient to present the questions to be determined on this appeal.

No question is presented upon the allegations that C. H. Covey was a duly appointed deputy sheriff, appointed by the defendant W. H. Hime, the sheriff of Kings county.

As said in 1 A. L. R. 236, in an extended note:

"The general rule has long been settled that sheriffs and other officers performing similar duties are liable civilly but not criminally for the acts and omissions of their deputies when acting officially or under color of the office"—citing a large number of cases.

Among the duties placed upon sheriffs by section 4157 of the Political Code is to "arrest and take before the nearest magistrate for examination all persons who attempt to commit, or who have committed a public offense."

hearing before and to be admitted to bail by a magistrate; "that on said day defendant C. H. Covey, while acting in the line of his official duties, went out to call such magistrate, and after calling such magistrate he (defendant C. H. Covey) proceeded to return to take said person so held in custody before said magistrate for examination, etc., and while thus returning as aforesaid said defendant C. H. Covey so wrongfully, carelessly, and negligently, and without due regard for the safety and convenience of others upon said public highway, managed and drove said automobile that the same then and there came into violent collision with said bicycle managed and ridden on by said Joe Filarski, etc."

This paragraph shows clearly that the defendant Covey was not taking the arrested person before any magistrate. Why the defendant Covey had gone about three miles from the town of Hanford to call a magistrate does not appear. It is argued by counsel that the magistrate had his office in the town of Hanford, but was then living some three miles out in the country. This, of course, cannot be considered, because it does not appear in the pleadings, further than the fact that the defendant Covey had gone that distance out in the country to call a magistrate. We do not think it necessary to cite any authorities to the point that it is no part of the official duties of a sheriff to call either judges or magistrates to come to court. To attend court is the official duty of the judge, justice, or magistrate, from which it follows that, while the defendant Covey had in mind the subsequent performing of an act which would be in the line of his official duty, to wit, the taking from the county jail to the office of the magistrate the person held in custody, he had not at the time of the injury entered upon any such official service. The complaint does not show facts from which it can be concluded that the sheriff had directed the defendant Covey to take out an automobile belonging to the sheriff, or to any other person, and call the magistrate to come into town and discharge his official duties. Hence there is nothing to sustain even the inferences of agency. The allegation of the complaint, "that, while acting in the line of his official duties, defendant Covey went out to call such magistrate," contains no statement of facts upon which such an allegation could be predicated, and is merely the setting forth of a conclusion; but in the setting forth of that conclusion it does allege the performance of an act not in line of his official duty, and hence, so far as it is set forth, controverts the allegation of acting in the line of official duty. While the sheriff upon his official bond would be liable for the wrongful acts of his deputy performed in the line of his official duties, he is not liable upon such bonds for the personal dealings and acts of a deputy otherwise performed. The defendant Covey in this case was not serving any process, had no process in his possession for service, was not taking any prisoner before any magistrate, was not performing any act under color of his office, but was simply, as alleged in the complaint, out in the country to call a magistrate. As to the surety, section 2836 of the Civil Code limits the liability to the express terms of the contract, and if the act upon which the liability is predicated is outside of the official duties and not in the line of the performance of some official act, the surety is not liable. We do not deem it necessary to cite authorities relating to the liability or nonliability of sheriffs for the acts of their deputies, in view of the fact that a reading of the allegations of the complaint, as we have set forth herein, establishes the correctness of the ruling of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DASEY et al. (Cr. 1267.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 7, 1925.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 132(6)—Motion requiring election properly overruled where each charge supported by evidence.

Where two defendants were indicted for two crimes of rape against same person on same day, one count as principal and another as accomplice, a motion after state had presented its case requiring state to elect trial count was properly refused, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 954; there being evidence tending to support each charge.

2. Rape $\S$ 51(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of each of two defendants both as principal and as accomplice.

3. Rape $\S$ 54(1)—Corroboration of testimony of complaining witness held unnecessary.

In prosecution for rape, where complaining witness' testimony was uncorroborated, but such witness was 20 years old, had no previous acquaintance with accused, a good reputation, and justified her failure to tell mother of crime on same evening, it was held that no corroboration was necessary.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 829(3)—Refusal to give accused's instruction as to resistance of prosecutrix held no error.

In prosecution for rape, where requested instruction by accused as to degree of resistance required of prosecutrix was refused, but court charged another as to resistance, held, such refusal was not reversible error.

5. Criminal law §1169(1)—Hearsay evidence by police officer as to automobile number held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for rape, where police officer testified as to automobile number on information from prosecutrix, it was held, where accused admitted crime was committed in automobile, that, although testimony was hearsay, its admission did not prejudice accused.

6. Rape §59(3)—Cautionary instructions as to uncorroborated testimony of prosecutrix held not compulsory.

In prosecution for rape, where prosecutrix was not a child, but her testimony was uncorroborated, and court gave cautionary instruction as to scrutiny of her testimony, it was held no error to refuse cautionary instruction of accused, where no statute made such instruction compulsory.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

James M. Dasey and John M. Dasey were convicted of rape, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Allender, A. S. De Santis, and Irvin C. Taplin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Hamish B. Eddie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. [1] The indictment against appellants is in two counts. Each count charges appellants with the crime of rape committed against the same person and on the same day. It was the contention of the prosecution that each of said appellants had sexual intercourse with one Josephine Price by force and violence, and that while one of said appellants accomplished said act the other aided and abetted in its commission by holding and restraining said complaining witness and thus overcoming her resistance. That is, the prosecution contended that each of said appellants was guilty of two crimes of rape against the same person and on the same day, and that in the commission of one of said crimes the appellant James M. Dasey was the principal and appellant John M. Dasey was the accomplice, and in the commission of the other of said crimes the appellant John M. Dasey was the principal and the appellant James M. Dasey was the accomplice. The evidence admitted on behalf of the prosecution tended to show the commission of each of said crimes. There was therefore no merit in the motion of appellants made after the prosecution had closed its evidence in chief requiring the people to elect one of the two charges contained in the indictment as the one upon which the appellants would be prosecuted. As the appellants were charged with two separate and distinct crimes, and there was evidence tending to support both of said charges, there could be no right whatever on appellants' part to require the people to limit the prosecution to only one of said crimes.

Under section 954 of the Penal Code the indictment may charge two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes under separate counts, and the prosecution is not required to elect between the different offenses or counts set forth in the indictment, but the defendant may be convicted of any number of the offenses charged.

[2, 3] There was ample evidence to support the verdict finding each of the appellants guilty of each of the crimes of which he was charged. The weight of this evidence was for the jury, and, the jury having found against appellants, this court will not disturb their verdict. It is true that the Supreme and appellate courts of this state have in some instances, in cases where the charge was of the same character as those against appellants, reversed judgments of conviction when there apparently was a substantial conflict in the evidence. This was done in the case of People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540, 543, following People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506. The same ruling was made in People v. Ardaga, 51 Cal. 371. See, also, People v. Cavanaugh, 30 Cal. App. 432, 158 P. 1053, People v. Castro, 60 Cal. 118, and Lind v. Closs, 88 Cal. 6, 25 P. 972. Whatever may have furnished the necessity in some of the above cases for the courts to have departed from the well-established rule and practice of refusing to pass upon the weight of the evidence, we see no occasion in this action under the facts as disclosed by the record to justify this court in setting aside the verdict of the jury and reversing the judgment on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence. The reason assigned by the courts in the above cases for reviewing the evidence and considering its weight was that the story of the complaining witness was so improbable as to warrant the belief that the verdict was more the result of prejudice and popular excitement than the calm and dispassionate consideration upon the facts. Such a reason is not to be found in the present action. The complaining witness was a mature young woman of between 19 and 20 years of age. Her reputation was above reproach. She told a straightforward story of being abducted by the appellants at a late hour of night and taken to a secluded spot and there forcibly ravished by them. She had no previous acquaintance with either of the appellants, and testified that she had never seen either prior to the attack being made upon her. It is true that there was no direct corroboration of any of these acts, but no corroboration was necessary. The only respects in which appellants claim that her testimony was improbable were those wherein she testified that she made no outcry when a milkman passed within a few inches of the automobile in which she and her assailants were seated, and at about the time when the assaults were being made upon her, and her further statement that she failed to complain to her mother on return to her home on the night of the assault. She explained her failure to make any outcry at the time the milkman drove near the automobile by the fact that the appellants were at the time choking her and holding their hands over her mouth so that it was impossible for her to speak. She gave as the reason for not complaining to her mother that the latter was in delicate health, and she feared the effect upon her mother's health of her being aroused at that late hour of the night and informed of the serious plight of her daughter. Her testimony shows that the next morning she sent word to the police department and gave to the officers a complete account of the outrage committed against her and all information regarding the affair, which led to the arrest of the appellants. On this subject we would call attention to the case of People v. Fraysier, 36 Cal. App. 579, 172 P. 1126, where the prosecuting witness, a girl of 12 years of age, testified that the defendant, evidently a grown man, committed an assault upon her and immediately thereafter she went home; she said nothing to her mother about the occurrence, but straightway went out to play with her companions and forgot the matter; she thought nothing more about it until the arresting officer called upon her one day at school and questioned her in regard to the affair. There was no corroboration of her testimony, yet the court said at page 581 (172 P. 1126):

"We cannot say from a review of the entire record that the evidence of the prosecution was inherently improbable. The most that can be said is that its truth was open to suspicion. If believed by the jury, it was sufficient to support their verdict and the judgment."

We find nothing so improbable in the story of the prosecutrix in this action that we feel called upon to hold that her testimony was not sufficient to support the verdict.

[4] The court struck out from an instruction proposed by appellants the following:

"Therefore, if you believe from the evidence in this case that the said Josephine Price, while in the automobile mentioned in evidence, while located on the streets mentioned in evidence, at times yielded to the solicitations of the defendants, or either of them, and did not at all times resist to her utmost, but subsequently consented to the acts of intercourse charged in the indictment, then and in that event you should find the defendants not guilty."

It is claimed by appellants that they were seriously prejudiced by the court's refusal to give the foregoing portion of the proposed instruction. Conceding that the portion of the instruction which the court struck out correctly stated the law as to the extent and degree of resistance required of the prosecutrix in a case of this character, there was no error on the part of the court in refusing to give it. The court gave other instructions upon this phase of the case, one of which was as follows:

"The law requires that the prosecution must satisfy your minds that the prosecutrix resisted at all times to the full extent of her ability, and that her resistance was overcome by means of force and violence. And if you find from the evidence in this case that the prosecutrix, Josephine Price, did not at all times resist to the full extent of her ability, and that her resistance was not overcome by means of force or violence, your verdict should be not guilty."

We think the rights of appellants were all properly safeguarded by the court in the instructions given.

Appellants took exception to various statements of the district attorney made during the latter's argument to the jury. In each instance the court sustained appellants' objection to such statements and admonished the jury to disregard them. In view of the nature of these statements, and the admonition given by the court in relation thereto, we are of the opinion that no injury was sustained by appellants on account of such remarks.

[5] No error was committed by the court in permitting the police officer to testify to the number borne by the automobile which it was claimed was used by appellants on the night of the assaults. It may be conceded that the only knowledge that the police officer had as to this number was gained by him from the prosecutrix, although this does not clearly appear from the evidence. Therefore his statement as to the number was hearsay. The only purpose of this evidence was to identify the appellants as the occupants of the car on the night of the assaults and, therefore, as the assailants of the prosecutrix. Each of the appellants admitted that they were with the prosecutrix on said night and were with her in said car, and each further testified that he had sexual intercourse with her while in said car. The testimony of the police officer, therefore, as to the number of the car given to him by the prosecutrix, could not have resulted in any injury whatever to the appellants.

[6] The appellants requested the court to instruct the jury that:

"While it is true that a conviction may be had upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness alone, if it be sufficient to be accepted by the jury as truth, for this reason it is the duty of the jury in such a case to carefully scan the testimony of the prosecuting witness and to view the same with caution."

Our attention has not been called to any authority holding that it was error in cases of this kind to refuse to give a cautionary instruction such as that proposed by appellants.

The subject is considered in California Jurisprudence as follows:

"Although there is no statute especially requiring it, the court may instruct the jury to view the testimony of the prosecutrix with caution where she is a child of tender years and her testimony is uncorroborated, since in this class of cases the accused is almost defenseless and ample opportunity is afforded for the free play of malice and private vengeance. On the other hand, the refusal of such an instruction is not error where the prosecutrix is not a child of tender years where her testimony is corroborated." 22 Cal. Jur. p. 408.

While the court refused to so instruct the jury as requested by appellants, it did give the following instruction:

"The court further instructs the jury that while it is the law that the testimony of the prosecutrix should be carefully scanned, still this does not mean that such evidence is never sufficient to convict."

This instruction is in almost the precise language as that given in People v. Liggett, 18 Cal. App. 367, 372, 123 P. 225. It does not greatly differ from the instruction given by the trial court in the case of People v. Currie, 16 Cal. App. 731, 736, 117 P. 941, 943, concerning which the appellate court said:

"We think the court went far enough in its cautionary signal to the jury to awaken in their minds the importance of carefully scrutinizing the testimony of the prosecuting witness."

The only material respect in which the instruction given in the Currie Case differs from that given in the present action is that in the former case the court charged the jury directly that the law required them "to examine the testimony of the prosecutrix with caution," while in the present action the court instructed the jury that the testimony of the prosecuting witness "should be carefully scanned," but not in as direct language as that used in the Currie Case. On each occasion, however, the attention of the jury was called by the court to the law imposing upon them the duty of carefully scrutinizing such testimony when uncorroborated before convicting the defendants upon it. In the absence of any requirement, arising either from statutory enactment or judicial declaration, making it compulsory upon the court to give any cautionary instruction whatever in cases of this character, it was not error for the court to refuse to give the above instruction requested by appellants. In view of the instruction upon this same subject which the court did give to the jury, we think appellants have no just cause to complain as to the court's instruction.

We find no reversible error in the record, and are of the opinion that the judgment and order denying appellants' motion for a new trial should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

RIVERSIDE PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v. ANCHOR LAUNDRY CO. (SCHAFFER, Intervener). (Civ. 5234.)

1. Corporations ⇨133—Authority to sign name of corporation as indorser on notes held immaterial as respects rights of parties to suit to compel book transfer of attached stock of another corporation.

Whether signing of corporation's name as indorser on notes sued on was authorized held immaterial as respects rights of attachment defendant in such suit, and assignee of attached stock of another corporation, as parties to suit to compel transfer thereof on books.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Trial court's fact findings binding.

The appellate court is bound by trial court's fact findings on evidence conflicting at most.

3. Corporations ⇨123(3)—Instrument directing delivery of stock assigned held sufficient constructive delivery.

Instrument assigning corporate stock as security for indebtedness to assignee, and directing bank holding it as security for notes to deliver it to assignee on payment of such notes, constituted sufficient constructive delivery.

4. Corporations ⇨123(12)—Valid lien on corporate stock not forfeited by good faith assertion of ownership and request for transfer on books.

Lien of assignee on corporate stock was not forfeited by asserting claim of ownership and asking transfer on books, where it was not shown that assignee did not act in good faith or was not within its rights.

5. Corporations ⇨123(1)—Instrument assigning pledged stock as security for indebtedness held not void as providing for forfeiture of stock and restraining right of redemption.

Instrument assigning as security for indebtedness to assignee all title and interest in certain shares of stock then held by bank as security for notes executed by assignor, and providing that assignee on paying off notes should accept stock in full settlement of all claims against assignor and dismiss attachment suit against him, held not void, as providing for forfeiture of stock and restraining right of redemption.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Riverside Portland Cement Company against the Anchor Laundry Com-

any, wherein M. E. Schaffer intervened and filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment against the intervener, he appeals. Affirmed.

G. C. O'Connell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macniel and G. C. De Garmo, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to compel it to transfer on its books certain shares of stock. The defendant appeared and answered the plaintiff's complaint. Later M. E. Schaffer appeared as intervener and filed a pleading by him called a cross-complaint, in which he set forth a claim of title to the same stock, and asked relief against the original plaintiff and original defendant accordingly. Schaffer's pleading was answered by the original parties filing separate answers. A trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court entered an order of nonsuit against the plaintiff, and no appeal has been taken from that order. The trial court made findings in favor of the original plaintiff and against the intervener, and ordered a judgment that the intervener take nothing and that the plaintiff and intervener each pay their own costs. From that judgment the intervener has appealed, and has brought up a bill of exceptions.

Prior to the 25th day of July, 1919, the plaintiff had been attempting to collect certain promissory notes which were past due. Accordingly it had caused to be commenced an action in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles, which action was entitled James H. Woods v. M. E. Schaffer, E. J. Knight Company, a Corporation, and S-C Contracting Company, a Corporation. The plaintiff in that action took out a writ of attachment against M. E. Schaffer and caused the same to be levied on certain real property belonging to Schaffer, and also to be levied upon 200 shares of capital stock of the Anchor Laundry Company which was owned by him but was pledged to Hellman Commercial Trust and Savings Bank as security for the payment of two other promissory notes. Said last-mentioned action had not been brought to trial and was still pending on July 25, 1919. On that date the plaintiff and M. E. Schaffer entered into a contract in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Los Angeles, California, July 25, 1919.

"For value received, I hereby sell, assign and transfer to the Riverside Portland Cement Company, a corporation, of Los Angeles, California, all of my right, title and interest in and to 200 shares of stock of the Anchor Laundry Company, a corporation, of Los Angeles, California, evidenced by certificates No. 1 for 40 shares, No. 2 for 40 shares, No. 3 for 40 shares,

No. 4 for 40 shares, No. 23 for 39 shares and No. 24 for one share, which said stock is now held by the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank as security for a promissory note for $12,000 executed by M. E. Schaffer, and another note for $6,400 executed by the said M. E. Schaffer, both in favor of the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank.

"This assignment is executed as security for any indebtedness owing by the undersigned to said Riverside Portland Cement Company and involved in the action of Jas. H. Woods v. M. E. Schaffer et al., No. B-65944, superior court of Los Angeles county, and is given in lieu of the attachment issued in said action on said stock and on certain real property in the city of Los Angeles, known and described as No. 950 South St. Andrews place; and it is understood that upon the execution of this assignment the said attachment shall be released upon said stock and upon said real property levied upon under said writ of attachment.

"The undersigned hereby represents that the notes referred to and described in the above-entitled action, and the two notes above referred to executed by the undersigned to the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, constitute the only indebtedness owing by the undersigned at the present time, and said attachment is to be released upon such representation and understanding.

"The undersigned further agrees to use his best endeavors to secure renewals and extensions of said notes above described payable to the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, and of the indebtedness thereby evidenced, for a period of one year from date hereof, and to that end agrees to sign such new notes as may be required by said bank for that purpose. At the end of said one-year period, or sooner, at the option of the Riverside Portland Cement Company, the said company may pay off said notes due said Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, and in that case it is to accept and take over said stock above described in full settlement of all claims and demands against said M. E. Schaffer, under said notes last mentioned, either individually or as indorser on the notes described in said action No. B-65944, or as a stockholder and director in the E. J. Knight Company, a corporation, of Los Angeles, California; and said action No. B-65944 shall thereupon be dismissed.

"And for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the preceding paragraph, the said Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank is authorized and directed to deliver to the order of said Riverside Portland Cement Company the stock above described, upon payment of said two notes above referred to, payable to said bank, and said Riverside Portland Cement Company is hereby given full power and authority to surrender said stock to the Anchor Laundry Company and to have the same reissued in the name or to the order of said Riverside Portland Cement Company.

"Riverside Portland Cement Company,

"John Treanor, Manager.

"M. E. Schaffer."

On the 25th day of July, 1920, the plaintiff paid the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank the amount owing to that bank on the two promissory notes, and received from the bank the certificates of stock which are the subject-matter of this suit. At the same time the plaintiff caused to be dismissed the action entitled Woods v. Schaffer et al.

[1] As showing a want of title in the plaintiff, and as showing title in himself, the appellant contends that there was no authority shown authorizing E. J. Knight to sign the name of the E. J. Knight Company as indorsements on the notes sued on by the plaintiff in Woods v. Schaffer. The trial court found the facts against the appellant. However, the subject was entirely immaterial so far as the rights of the parties in the instant case are concerned.

[2] The appellant also sought to show that he had signed the same notes through certain misrepresentations and fraudulent practices made by the agents of the plaintiff. The trial court made findings on those allegations, and all of the findings are against the appellant. The most that can be said is that the evidence is conflicting, but we are hardly prepared to state that there is any conflict in the evidence. Be that as it may, the case presents an instance in which a Court of Appeal is bound by the findings made by the trial court.

[3] The foregoing considerations bring us to a construction of the instrument dated July 25, 1919. By granting to the Anchor Company a motion of nonsuit, the trial court in effect held that said instrument did not constitute an absolute transfer from Schaffer to the Riverside Company of the shares of stock when, on July 25, 1920, that company paid off the Hellman Bank and dismissed the action entitled Woods v. Schaffer et al. Such determination was in legal effect to hold that the Riverside company, after paying off the bank's claim, held the certificates of stock as additional security to secure the notes which it held signed by the intervener. However, the appellant contends that no pledge was created in favor of the Riverside Company because on July 25, 1919, the stock was not manually delivered by the intervener into the hands of the Riverside Company. The instrument dated July 25, 1919, and in particular the last paragraph thereof, was, in legal effect, an order for the delivery of the stock, and as such constituted a sufficient constructive delivery. Yokohama S. Bk. v. Trans-Oceanic Co., 54 Cal. App. 533, 202 P. 346.

[4] Conceding that the Riverside Company at one time had a valid lien, the appellant then asserts that the lien was forfeited when the Riverside Company thereafter asserted a claim of ownership and asked the Anchor Laundry Company to transfer the stock to the Riverside Company, and upon its refusal to do so thereafter commenced an action to compel the Anchor Company to make the transfer. The claim is without merit. There is nothing in the record to show that the acts of the Riverside Company were not made in good faith, or, to put it in another way, there is nothing to show that the Riverside Company was not within its rights in making the application which it made. However, when the trial court granted its order of nonsuit, the Riverside Company accepted the ruling, and since that date has not asserted any claim other than that it holds the stock to secure the notes which were signed by the intervener.

[5] Again, the intervener complains that the document dated July 25, 1919, provides for a forfeiture of the stock subject to the lien, and is in restraint of the right of redemption, and is therefore void. A most casual reading of the instrument shows that it contains no forfeiture and contains no restraint on the right of redemption.

Other points made by the appellant are not of sufficient importance to prolong this opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

FEDEROFF v. BIRKS BROS. et al.
(Civ. 2837.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 13, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error §843(2)—Whether statement that truck would haul tractor over certain road was representation of fact or expression of opinion held immaterial.

Whether seller's statement that truck would haul tractor over certain road was representation of fact or only expression of opinion held immaterial, in absence of evidence that any attempt was made to haul it over such road or similar ground.

2. Appeal and error §843(2)—Whether false representations were made by seller or waived, and certain testimony erroneously excluded, held immaterial.

Whether false representations were made or waived, and whether court erred in excluding testimony in explanation of letter asking extension of time for payment, held immaterial, in absence of testimony that buyers relied on, or were deceived by, seller's statements, or that seller knew, or had reason to know, that they were false.

3. Sales §53(3)—Directed verdict held proper.

In absence of testimony as to matters essential to make out case of fraud and misrepresentation, directed verdict in action on purchase-money note was proper, though there was some conflict in testimony.

4. Bills and notes §534—Direction to jury to fix attorney's fees at reasonable sum, not exceeding amount provided for in note, held not error.

Where complaint asked for attorney's fees, provided in note, and defendants did not contest amount, court did not err in directing jury to allow reasonable sum, not exceeding agreed amount, though there was no testimony as to reasonable value of attorney's services.

5. Bills and notes $\hookrightarrow$ 534—Fifty dollars for services of plaintiff's attorney in action on note held not excessive.

Fifty dollars for services of plaintiff's attorney, in action on note providing for payment of 15 per cent. of amount due, which was $950, as attorney's fees held not excessive, where two days were consumed in trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by W. R. Federoff against Birks Bros., a copartnership, and the members thereof individually, in which defendants filed cross-complaint against H. B. Whitten. From a judgment for plaintiff and cross-defendant, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Huston and Arthur C. Huston, Jr., both of Woodland, for appellants.

John R. Connelly, of Sacramento, and Arthur Coats, of Yuba City, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Action to recover balance of $950 alleged to be due upon a promissory note executed and delivered for the sum of $1,620, by the Birks Bros., to the defendant H. B. Whitten, and assigned by him to the plaintiff, W. R. Federoff. The note was given on account of the purchase price of a 2½-ton United States truck sold upon contract. The defendants interpose the defense of fraud and misrepresentation. The action was tried before a jury, and, at the conclusion of the defendants' testimony upon the defense of fraud and misrepresentation, the court directed the jury to bring in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and cross-defendant and against the appellant in the sum of $950, and also directed the jury to fix the amount of the attorneys' fees. The jury brought in a verdict as directed, and fixed the attorneys' fees at the sum of $50. From this judgment the defendants Birks have appealed. The appellants in their answer set up a number of specifications of fraud and misrepresentation, but at the trial attempted only to prove two of the items thereof, to wit, that the plaintiff's assignor represented the truck to be in good running condition; and also that the truck would carry a tractor weighing about 7,500 pounds. The truck involved in this transaction was a secondhand machine, and had been used about six weeks. The evidence shows that, in response to an advertisement inserted in a Sacramento paper by the respondent Whitten that he had a secondhand truck for sale, the appellants called upon said Whitten at his office in the city of Sacramento, examined the truck, and entered into negotiations with him, culminating in the purchase thereof. During the course of the conversation leading up to the purchase it is claimed by the appellants that the respondent Whitten made certain false and fraudulent representations both as to the capacity of the 2½-ton truck to carry a tractor weighing 7,500 pounds and also as to the condition of the truck. The testimony of John T. Birks, who appears to have conducted the negotiations on the part of the appellants, on direct examination, concerning the carrying capacity of the truck, is set out in the transcript as follows:

"A. I told him what make of a tractor it was, and told him just what it weighed.

"Q. What was it? A. It weighed on the road 7,600 pounds with a load.

"Q. And did you tell him with a load? A. It was about 7,500 with a load.

"Q. What was said about the road between your place and Santa Rosa? A. I told him the kind of a road that we had to travel over, and he was acquainted with it, and he said he would guarantee to haul that tractor over that road."

The same witness, upon direct examination as to the condition of the truck, testified as follows:

"A. He said it was in good condition and guaranteed it to be in good condition and would do that work for which we wanted it."

Upon cross-examination this witness testified as follows:

"A. He guaranteed it to haul that tractor and told me—I told him what it weighed, and he guaranteed it to haul that tractor, and I told him of the other work we wanted to do with it, and he said it would do that work."

It further appears from the testimony that one of the purposes for which the appellants wanted the truck was to haul the tractor over the road mentioned between two farms. As to the condition of the truck, the witness testified as follows:

"Q. Now in what particulars was the truck not in good running condition when you took it across the bridge into Yolo county? A. you say why wasn't it in good running order?

"Q. Why wasn't it in good condition—in what way? A. I couldn't say there was anything the matter with it when we got across there.

"Q. In what particulars was it not in good running condition when you took it across the bridge? A. I supposed it was in good running condition.

"Q. Well, was it? A. It seemed to be when we took it across.

"Q. You think it was? A. It seemed to be.

"Q. You testify now, or your testimony now is, that it was in good running order when you took it across that bridge? A. Well, as far as I could see it at that time.

"Q. I am asking you at that time in your opinion was it in good running condition? A. It seemed to be as far as I could tell.

"Q. And you believed it was? A. It seemed to be.

"Q. Then you think at the time you first took it into your possession that the truck was in good running order? A. Well, it seemed to be. Of course it gave me trouble on the way home.

"Q. But you think when it was delivered to you it was in good running condition? A. It seemed to be.

"Q. And you believed it was? A. Well, I believed it was. It seemed to me that way."

The witness further testified that he had difficulty with the truck on the way home, and that it stopped on him several times and that once when it stopped he had the assistance of some one to remedy the defect, and then he proceeded on with the truck. The testimony simply shows that the driver of the truck had some trouble with it in reaching home, but the testimony does not disclose what the defects, if any there were, in the machinery of the truck, or what, if any, there was of poor condition in the truck that caused the driver thereof to have the difficulty mentioned.

The truck was purchased some time during the month of November, 1921. The attempt to haul the tractor with the truck was not made until some time late in the spring of 1922. The testimony in this particular is as follows:

"A. Well, we loaded the tractor on and tried to haul it.

"Q. And where did you load the tractor on? A. At the home ranch near Meridian.

"Q. And how long was that after you purchased the truck? A. Well, I don't remember just how long it was. It was some time that spring after we purchased the truck.

"Q. And what experience did you have in that connection? A. We loaded it on, and spent nearly an entire day trying to make it pull and get it out of the corral.

"Q. That was at your river ranch in this county? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. On level ground? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Tell us what you did? A. We loaded the tractor on it one day, and we were going to take it out there the next day, and we tried to drive it, and it would go a short distance and stop.

"Q. By stopping you mean the engine would stop? A. Yes, sir; the engine would stop.

"Q. And how far did you get in your effort to haul the tractor to the work? A. I never got it out of the corral or barnyard.

"Q. Who was there with you? A. Myself and brother.

"Q. How long did you work with the truck to take it out? A. All day.

"Q. Did you succeed in hauling this tractor at all? A. No."

The action in this case was not begun until some two years after the transaction mentioned, and during that period of time the testimony shows that the appellants spent something like $300 in having repairs made upon the truck. It further appears that the appellant John R. Birks had a conversation with Whitten about the truck some months after its purchase, in which conversation the respondent Whitten advised the appellants to take the truck to some good mechanic and have him go over the same. The record shows no testimony of any mechanicians. It also appears that some conversation was had between one of the appellants and the respondent Whitten after the institution of this action in which the appellant stated that the truck was "no good" and Whitten replied "that a fellow would naturally say that because he was suing him for the pay of the truck."

[1] The testimony fails to show the condition of the ground in the corral where the appellants attempted to haul the 7,500-pound tractor upon the 2½-ton truck. Whether the ground was soft and yielding or hard and unyielding does not appear. There is not a word of testimony as to whether the ground in the corral was similar to the road over which the appellants stated that the respondent Whitten guaranteed that the truck would haul the tractor. The testimony does not show that any attempt was ever made by the appellants to haul the tractor over the road in question, or to haul the tractor by the truck over any ground where the conditions would be similar. The testimony of the alleged representations in this particular is, as we have said, in the following answer:

"I told him the kind of a road that we had to travel over, and he was acquainted with it, and he said he would guarantee it to haul that tractor over that road."

[2] It is strongly insisted by the respondents that this is neither a false nor fraudulent representation; that it is, at most, only the expression of an opinion. It is only the conclusion of the witness. What the respondent may have said in relation to the capacity of the truck does not appear, but, taken as a representation and as the expression of a fact, there appears nothing in the testimony to show that the truck would not do exactly what the respondent Whitten said it would do, which, of course, disposes of this question, whatever conclusion may be reached based upon the statement of the witness couched in the language which we have set forth. It may be further stated that there is no testimony called to our attention or discoverable in the transcript showing that the appellants relied upon any statements made by the respondent Whitten, or were deceived in any manner thereby. In this particular, our attention is called to the testimony of the witness J. R. Birks as to the capacity of a 2½-ton truck to carry a load weighing 7,500 pounds:

"Q. Have you ever hauled your tractor on a 2½-ton truck before? A. Other people have hauled it.

"Q. Other people have hauled it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you believed at the time you purchased the truck that a 2½-ton tractor, or that a 2½-ton truck would haul a load like that, did you? A. 2½-ton truck?"

"Q. Yes, a 2½-ton truck would haul a load like that? A. Yes, sir; when I saw it done.

"Q. You knew that of your own knowledge? A. Yes, sir; I saw it done twice on a 2½-ton truck. Two times.

"Q. If a person represented to you that a truck was a 2½-ton truck you would conclude of your own knowledge that it would haul a tractor of that size? A. Yes; he guaranteed it to do it."

The witness further testified on redirect examination that he had seen a similar tractor hauled on a 2½-ton truck, and, in addition, a 15-gallon can of oil and a box of tools, etc.

While it does not appear to have been taken into consideration, in directing a verdict to be rendered for the plaintiff, the testimony shows that at a former trial of this action the truck in question was loaded with 75 sacks of cement and driven along the streets in Yuba City, but the weight of the cement sacks is not shown. The testimony shows that the contract for the purchase of the truck was taken by the appellants to their home, and four or five days after its receipt was sent back to the respondent Whitten for correction, was sent to them again by the respondent Whitten, and after some weeks finally signed by all of the appellants and returned to the respondent Whitten. During all of this period of time the contract was in the possession of the appellants. The question being considered during this period of time was that of fixing the date or dates of payment of the unpaid portion of the purchase price of the truck. After the final execution of the contract and during the period of time that elapsed between the date thereof and the institution of this action, the defendants paid thereon the sum of $700. It is further insisted by the respondent that any alleged fraudulent representations made by the respondent Whitten were waived by the conduct of the appellants in asking for and receiving additional time in which to pay for the truck. The record shows that on or about the 23d day of May, 1922, the appellants wrote to the respondent Whitten as follows:

"Meridian, May 23—22.

"H. B. Whitten—Dear Sir: Your letter received and in reply will say that we will have to have an extension of time as there is nothing coming in now just before harvest. After harvest we will be able to meet it. Will try to get down to Sacramento before that time to arrange the matter.

"Yours truly, Birks Bros., Meridian, Cal."

On the part of the appellants it is claimed that the court erred in refusing to allow the appellants to offer an explanation of this letter that at the time of the execution of the contract it was verbally agreed that the appellants might have a full year's time within which to make the payments for the truck. While no action was begun to enforce payment of the contract until long after the period mentioned in the appellants' letter, bearing date of May 23, 1922, the record does not show any formal extension of time executed or granted for the payment of the balance due upon the contract. The record further shows that at the time of the trial, or shortly preceding the date thereof, the plaintiff sought permission of the defendants to demonstrate that the truck in question would haul the tractor over the road mentioned by the respondent Whitten in the conversation had during the negotiations for the purchase and sale of the truck, and that this permission was refused.

From the fact that the record fails to disclose any testimony showing that the appellants relied upon any alleged false representations made by the respondent Whitten, we think we do not need to comment upon the testimony alleged to constitute false representations, or to pass upon the question whether there was a waiver of the alleged false representations, or whether the court erred in refusing to permit oral testimony as to an agreement for a one-year period to make payment for the truck as an explanation of the letter referred to, as these matters are not necessary for a determination of this case. We may state, however, that, in addition to the lack of testimony which we have just mentioned, there is nothing in the record tending to show that Mr. Whitten knew any of the alleged statements to be false, or had any reason to know the same, assuming that they were, in fact, false. There was no evidence that respondent Whitten was in the truck business other than he had this second-hand truck for sale and was in the automobile business.

[3] In view of the lack of testimony to support appellants' allegations of fraud and misrepresentation, we deem it unnecessary to refer to more than one case in support of the ruling of the trial court in directing the jury to bring in a verdict for the plaintiff. In Jacobson v. Northwestern Pac. R. R. Co., 175 Cal. 468, 166 P. 3, it is said:

"A directed verdict is proper, unless there be substantial evidence tending to prove in favor of plaintiff all the controverted facts necessary to establish his case. In other words, a directed verdict is proper whenever, upon the whole evidence, the judge would be compelled to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by the evidence. To warrant a court in directing a verdict, it is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence, but, to deprive the court of the right to exercise this power, if there be a conflict, it must be a substantial one."

It is not a question of a conflict of evidence in this case, assuming that there might be some conflict in the evidence set out in the transcript or that different inferences might be drawn from the testimony to which our attention has been directed and which we have set forth, but it is a question of a lack of testimony upon matters essential and necessary to be proved in order to make out a case based upon fraud and misrepresentation. There being such lack in this case, a directed verdict for the respondents was proper.

[4] The appellants finally insist that the court erred in directing the jury to fix the amount of the attorney's fees to be allowed the plaintiff. No testimony was introduced concerning the reasonable value of the services performed by the attorney for the plaintiff. The note sued upon contains the following clause:

"And I (we) agree in the event this note be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, to pay 15 per cent. of the amount due hereon as attorney's fees."

This note is set out in hæc verba in the complaint, and the prayer of the complaint asks for "an attorney's fee of 15 per cent. of the amount due," etc. In the answer filed by the appellants the matter of the attorney's fee is unmentioned. The court, in submitting the matter to the jury, stated that the amount due, calculated at 15 per cent., was the sum of $174.90, and that the jury might fix the attorney's fee at such reasonable sum as the jury might deem proper, not exceeding $174.90. The jury fixed the amount at $50. While it is true that the amount of the attorney's fees to be allowed might have been contested by the appellants, no attempt was made so to do. It is beyond question that in the note executed by the appellants they contracted to pay an attorney's fee in the sum of 15 per cent. on the amount due. The contract reads a certain sum, and not a reasonable fee, which may not exceed a certain fixed sum, as is the case in many instances. In the case of Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 25, 41 P. 24, the facts are to all intents and purposes exactly the same as the case at bar. The note set out in the complaint fixed definitely the attorney's fee to be paid. The prayer of the complaint asked for that fee which was fixed at 10 per cent. in the note on the amount found to be due. Default was made by the defendant, and the clerk entered up the amount of the attorney's fee and this action was contested on appeal. No testimony, of course, was introduced either pro or con. The note in that case read: "10 per cent. of total amount due for attorney's fees," etc. Upon this character of a complaint, with no question raised as to the attorney's fee by answer filed therein, the court in the Alexander Case held as follows:

"We think, also, that there is sufficient in the complaint to support the allowance of attorneys' fees. The note, which is set forth in full, provides for them, and the prayer of the complaint asks for them, and the action is brought by an attorney at law. The sum asked as attorneys' fees is susceptible of exact determination by simple mathematical calculation.

It is fairly deducible from the complaint, therefore, that plaintiff asks an allowance of a specific sum as being reasonable and due for attorneys' fees under the contract. It is true that this demand is in the nature of special damages, the allowance of which might have been contested by defendant. Prescott v. Grady, 91 Cal. 518 [27 P. 755]. But his default admits the truth of the matters pleaded, and must, therefore, be construed to admit that the amount claimed is both reasonable and due. Thus no evidence was required to be taken for the purpose of fixing that amount."

[5] In 8 C. J. 1101, it is said:

"The amount of fees fixed by the instrument sued on is at least prima facie the sum recoverable, subject to be reduced, it is generally held, where such sum is unreasonable and excessive. It is generally held that a provision for a fixed per cent. as attorney's fees is a contract of indemnity, and not for liquidated damages, so that the maker is liable to the holder only for the amount of attorney's fees actually contracted for, or, in the absence of a special contract for fees, for the reasonable value of the services rendered; but there is authority for the contrary, holding that the sum or per cent. fixed is liquidated damages."

Cases are also there cited to the effect that the plaintiff is prima facie entitled to recover the per cent. stipulated for as attorney's fees, and need not in the first instance show that he has contracted to pay his attorney such per cent. or that it is a reasonable sum. In the case at bar, just as in the case of Alexander v. McDow, the complaint is signed by an attorney at law, and, further, there can be no question that the sum of $50 allowed by the jury is far below what any court would ordinarily fix as a reasonable attorney's fee. The record shows that two days were consumed in the trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by W. R. Federoff against Birks Bros., a copartnership, and the members thereof as individuals, in which defendants filed cross-complaint against H. B. Whitten. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order taxing costs, defendants appeal. Modified, and affirmed, as modified.

See, also, 242 P. 881.

Arthur C. Huston and Arthur C. Huston, Jr., both of Woodland, for appellants.

John R. Connelly, of Sacramento, and Arthur Coats, of Yuba City, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. [1] This is an appeal from an order taxing costs. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the action, and in due time thereafter served and filed a memorandum of his costs and disbursements. Appellant filed a motion to have the costs taxed by the court, objecting therein to certain items claimed by plaintiff. The court overruled the objections, and taxed costs in the amount stated in the memorandum. The action was tried three times. Two items allowed as costs were for the expenses of demonstrating a truck, $10.35 at the second trial, and $9.50 at the third. Relative to such demonstrations, the bill of exceptions contains the following:

"That as to the item charged for the expenses of demonstrating the truck on the second trial, it was shown that at such trial the following stipulations and order were made by the court:

"After argument as to offer to demonstrate truck. The Court: If you had offered to bear the expense of the repairs to this truck, it would be different, but I am not going to saddle the expense of that on—

"Mr. Connelly: That is understood; we will pay all expense.

"The Court: That wasn't understood.

"Mr. Connelly: We include that in the offer; we will pay the expenses of it.

"The Court: I haven't any reasonable assurance it can be done between now and meeting time in the morning.

"Mr. Connelly: If it cannot be done by that time we are willing to waive it; we are willing to pay all expenses. (Argument.)

"The Court: I will make the order that the plaintiff at his expense may pay for the repairs and have it loaded if he can have it done by 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

"That as to the item charged for the expenses of demonstrating the truck on the third trial of said action it was shown that there was no demonstration of said truck during the trial."

It thus clearly appears that at the second trial the plaintiff offered to pay all expenses of the demonstration, and that the court ordered the demonstration made on condition that plaintiff pay the expenses thereof. At the third trial no demonstration was made. It must be held, therefore, that those two items were improperly allowed.

[2, 3] Certain items were allowed as mileage fees paid to residents of Sacramento who were witnesses at the trial. Section 1989 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"A witness is not obliged to attend as a witness before any court, judge, justice, or any other officer, out of the county in which he resides, unless the distance be less than fifty miles from his place of residence to the place of trial."

Section 4300g of the Political Code provides for witness fees as follows:

"For each day's actual attendance, when legally required to attend upon the superior court, per day, two dollars in civil cases. * * * Mileage actually traveled, one way only, per mile, ten cents."

Evidence produced at the hearing of the motion shows that the actual distance from Sacramento to Yuba City, the county seat of Sutter county, is 45 miles. Appellants contend that, notwithstanding such actual distance, title 3, part 2, sections 150 to 208, of the Political Code, is controlling. Section 200 fixes the legal distance from Sacramento to Yuba City at 58 miles. Appellants argue that such witnesses were not obliged to attend, and that, therefore, they were not entitled to any allowance for mileage.

Section 150 reads: "The legal distances in this state are fixed as follows."

Then follow sections 150 to 207, fixing the respective distances from the several county seats of the state to Sacramento. Section 208 reads: "When mileage is allowed by law to any person, the distance must be computed as herein fixed." Appellants rely upon Hegard v. California Ins. Co., 2 Cal. Unrep. 663, 11 P. 594, where it is said:

"The sections of the Political Code, supra, established the legal distances therein set out without any qualification, and hence they are established for any and all purposes."

The opinion cited is not the decision of the court, however, as a rehearing was granted, and the decision of the court in bank is reported in 72 Cal. 535, 14 P. 180, 359. No reference appears therein to the question of legal distances. If the legal distances fixed by the Political Code were adopted "for any and all purposes," some surprising results would follow. The distances to Sacramento from Yuba City and Marysville, respectively, are 58 and 52 miles. Mathematically, therefore, the shortest possible distance between Yuba City and Marysville is 6 miles. Actually, however, they are separated only by the width of Feather river. If such legal distances are controlling in a case such as this, then a resident of Sacramento, when subpoenaed by the superior court of Sutter county, would not be "obliged to attend as a witness"; but one so served who resides 4 miles south of Sacramento, and therefore 4 miles farther from the county seat of Sutter county, would be obliged to attend, he being within the actual limit of 50 miles fixed by section 1989 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the legal distance from his residence to Yuba City not having been established by legislative enactment. Section 208 of the Political Code does not relate to the mileage fees which a witness may collect, because he is entitled to such fees for only the "mileage actually traveled."

The history of the legislation covering the subject-matters embraced in title 3 indicates that the distances therein fixed were intended to be applied only in computing mileage fees allowed by law to officers and others traveling between the city of Sacramento and the several county seats in the state. It was so held in Neely v. Naglee, 23 Cal. 152. In 1854 an act was passed entitled "An act defining the legal distances from each county seat in the state of California to the state capitol at Sacramento, the state lunatic asylum at Stockton, and the state prison at San Quentin." Stats. 1854, p. 78. Section 1 of the act read as follows:

"The distances established by this act shall be, and the same are hereby declared to be the legal distances for which mileage shall be allowed to the state capital at Sacramento: First: For county treasurers in settling their accounts. Second: For conveying the insane to the asylum at Stockton. Third: To sheriffs for transporting prisoners to the state prison at San Quentin."

[4-6] In 1858 an act in substantially the same terms as to title and purposes was passed, and the former act was expressly repealed. Stats. 1858, p. 256. In 1872 the provisions of the latter act and the amendments thereto were incorporated into the Political Code as title 3, part 2, sections 150 to 201. Section 201 was in the identical language of the present section 208; the provisions thereof never having been changed. Viewed in the light of the prior legislation on the subject, that provision shows the purpose and intent of the Legislature as fully as did section 1, supra, of the act of 1854.

"The incorporation of the statute in the Code cannot be said to have a greater effect upon its meaning than an amendment thereof would have had. Where a statute is amended, the parts which are not altered are to be considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted." San Joaquin, etc., Irr. Co. v. Stevinson, 164 Cal. 221, 234, 128 P. 924, 929.

"To arrive at the legislative intent the original purpose and object of the legislation must be considered." Mackey v. Mott, 25 Cal. App. 110, 115, 142 P. 1082, 1084.

"Ordinarily it is the rule that, when the law-making power distinctly states its design in the enactment of a particular statute, no room is left for construction." Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 185, 201 P. 120, 122.

"The statute, like all statutes, must be read in view of the evident purpose of the Legislature in its enactment." Dillingham v. Welch, 179 Cal. 656, 658, 178 P. 512, 514.

The order is modified by striking out the items of $10.35 and $9.50 for demonstrations of the truck, and as so modified the order is affirmed, appellants to recover costs of appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Antonio Paiva and wife against the California Door Company, a corporation. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

P. G. West and J. M. Inman, both of Sacramento, for appellants.

R. Fitzgerald, of San Francisco, and Charles A. Swisler, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. [1] Plaintiff sued to recover damages alleged to have been caused by fire "negligently kindled" by defendant on its land, and by it "negligently, willfully, and carelessly" permitted to spread to and upon plaintiff's land and "burn and destroy a large amount of plaintiff's standing timber, pasturage, fence posts, and wire." At the close of plaintiff's evidence, on motion of defendant, judgment of nonsuit was entered on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove a sufficient case to support a judgment in his favor. This appeal is from the judgment. Since, on a motion for a nonsuit, all the evidence in favor of the plaintiff must be taken as true and all contradictory evidence disregarded, it will be sufficient to state the evidence most favorable to plaintiff's case which tends to support the allegations of the complaint.

Running in a direction approximately west-southwest through defendant's timber land, there is a ravine which crosses the west boundary line about 60 or 70 feet south of the place where the fire in question was discovered. For a week or more prior to the day of the fire the employees of defendant were engaged in clearing its land lying adjacent to the west boundary line thereof, both on the north and the south sides of the ravine, and burning brush and limbs of trees thereon. The evidence justifies respondent's statement that the ravine "had been cleared of all brush, as also had the land of respondent lying to the north of the ravine, and some clearing had also been done south of the ravine." An employee of defendant testified that its land across the line from the place where the fire started "was all burned off slick that I could see." Except for the standing timber, it "was all clear." The defendant had cleared a fire line, or fire trail, along the west boundary from 9 to 18 inches in width.

During the latter part of the week preceding the fire, some of defendant's employees were engaged in burning brush south of the ravine. Witnesses observed fire burning on defendant's property in the bottom of the ravine near the west boundary line in the forenoon of Saturday, September 15, 1923. The employees, in accordance with their usual custom, quit work for the week at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of that day. Between 7 and 8 o'clock Saturday night a fire broke out on defendant's land south of the ravine near the place where the men had been burning brush. "It was just in a little brush and manzanita, * * * a small patch of stuff; it started up in that. * * * There had been little piles of brush burned around there in places * * * where they had been burned a few days before." Three men fought this fire. It burned for "an hour or hour and a half." On Sunday night, at about 10 o'clock, another fire was discovered near the same place. It burned over a larger area than that of Saturday night, and 15 or 20 men were called out to fight it, some of them remaining on duty there until nearly 7 o'clock Monday morning, when only a few stumps were burning. These burning stumps were covered with earth before the men left them.

On Monday, September 17th, a dry wind was blowing from the northeast. "It was more nearly east than northeast." "It blew in a circle. It would come this way in a circle and then go the other way, * * * from all directions; that is the way it blew." It was a "pretty high wind, about 40 miles an hour." A witness testified that from defendant's property towards the place where the fire started, there were "some leaves flying and some ashes where some fire was before. * * * On that place where the wind blew the ashes, there wasn't any fire for 6 days." Two of defendant's employees were felling trees in the morning of that day at a point 80 or 90 feet northerly from the place where the fire started and 25 or 30 feet east of defendant's west boundary line. They had an unobstructed view of the defendant's land lying to the south of them, and of the place where the fire started, but on that morning they did not see any other person in that vicinity or any fire on defendant's land. At about a quarter past 7 o'clock they noticed a fire in "pine needles and manzanita leaves * * * underneath a manzanita bush" about 8 feet west of defendant's boundary line, and, as stated, about 60 or 70 feet north of the ravine. The fire was then about 14 inches high, and covered "a space of 4 or 5 feet." They immediately ran to the fire and endeavored to extinguish it, and other employees went to their assistance within a few minutes thereafter. In spite of the combined efforts of these men, the fire spread rapidly, and swept westerly and southwesterly over several thousand acres of land, including that of plaintiff.

Appellant contends that the defendant negligently left smoldering fires in two stumps north of the ravine and near the west boundary line of its land, and that the evidence warrants the inference that fire was communicated from one of these stumps to the inflammable pine needles and leaves covering the land where the fire was discovered. There is no direct evidence that either of these stumps was burning on Monday morning. If they were burning at that time, in the absence of any other evidence as to the origin of the fire, it might be inferred reasonably that the high wind carried sparks or pieces of burning material from one of the stumps to the place where the fire started. The evidence tending to show that there was fire in these respective stumps will be stated separately.

Euell Gray, an assistant fish and game commissioner, visited the premises in the afternoon of September 20th. He testified as follows:

"Q. Do you know where the * * * big fire started? A. Yes. Q. That was pointed out to you? A. Yes. Q. Well, with reference to that point where did you see any fire burning? A. There was a pitch stump at that point that was very close to the fire line * * * that was still burning. * * * It was a pitch pine stump. * * * It was practically right there. It showed that some effort had been made at that point to corral the fire, * * * and it had apparently gotten away because of the closeness of timber and leaves, etc. * * * It was right there at the point of the fire line. They had scraped the leaves and debris away. * * * It had burned practically through the heart of the stump. It had apparently gone through the stump and had burned underneath, under the ground. The fire was still in the roots of the stump. Q. Was it sticking above the ground? A. Yes. * * * This pitch stump was right in the fire line they had put along the edge of their boundary. * * * It seemed to us at that time that it had started from that pitch pine stump. * * * It showed that from the amount of work that had been done, scraping the leaves in and trying to corral it at that place. * * * You could see where they had put some dirt on the stump. * * * They had apparently tried to cover this stump with dirt and had brought the fire line between the stump and the manzanita bush or the brush on the westerly side. * * * At the time we examined it, it looked as though the fire had apparently gone from this stump. You could see where it crossed the fire line and had got in where there was lots of leaves and pine needles. * * * You could see where the needles had burned from the stump across into the manzanita bush where they first tried to corral the fire."

Cross-examination by counsel for defendant:

"Q. How far would you say this stump was from * * * where the fire is supposed to have started? A. * * * I would say that it was not more than 7 or 8 feet. * * * Q. * * * Would you say that it was possible for embers from burning bushes and branches of that (manzanita) tree to have fallen and ignited the needles on the ground and in that way connected with the stump? A. That is highly improbable on account of the wind and the distance too. Had the wind been blowing in an opposite direction, I would say the fire might have come back. Q. You have had considerable experience with fires, have you not? A. Quite a little, yes. Q. In every fire that starts it eats back towards the way the wind is blowing for some distance, does it not? A. But not in this case. It had burned to this particular point, and there was nothing for it to eat back on. Q. But there was a point where it could eat into it from the other side, was there, from the side you saw the ashes? A. Well, that portion had been burned. The brush had all been burned. Q. In fact it had all been cleared for some time before that, didn't it have that appearance? A. It did at this time, yes."

Another witness testified:

"The fire trail was just west of the stump. There was a thin sprinkling of pine needles in the fire trail that had been burned following directly from the stump to where the thick needles and debris was under the manzanita bush. Q. Were there any evidences as to how this stump had been made—in other words, had it been cut off, or was it an old stump, or what? A. It was all charred over the top and burned down to a small size; I could not say."

An employee of defendant, who "had charge of burning brush," testified that there were no "fires made or kindled" on defendant's land on the 17th of September. It does not appear whether any fires were kindled on defendant's property on the 18th or the 19th.

The testimony relative to the other burning stump is more closely connected in point of time with the fire of the 17th. J. P. Yost, employed by the state board of forestry as a district fire ranger, testified as follows relative to an examination which he made of defendant's premises on the day after the fire:

"I went up Tuesday morning, and went into the bottom of the ravine there on the line they have been calling the fire line. * * * I started east along there, and after I got up the ravine about 75 feet I went straight north to get out of the ravine, and I put my hand up on a round place. It was a stump covered up, and I found it was hot there, and I went to jump up and I landed on a bed of coals, and I found that the stump had burned part way through. * * * There was a bed of hot coals one side of the stump. A jagged end stuck up maybe a foot. The root gave way underneath where it had been burned maybe a foot down in the ground. After I found that I went up and looked over all the property. * * * On the southeast point of the clear ground * * * there was three different stumps burning. * * * Q. With reference to the place where you stepped into the hole, where was that with reference to the California Door Company's line? A. About 75 or 100 feet up the ravine. Q. Where was it with reference to this point which you say you had pointed out to you as the place where the fire started. A. It was east, maybe a little bit southeast—south of a point straight east, maybe 10 or 15 feet south of it."

From the extent to which this stump had been burned, it is evident that it must have commenced to burn at a time prior to September 18th. Since no fires were kindled on defendant's premises on the 17th, it logically follows that it must have been burning on the morning of that day and prior thereto. Taking it then as a justifiable inference that the stump was burning on Monday morning, and giving consideration to the further proved fact that a strong wind was blowing past the stump in the general direction of the place where the fire started, it would not be unreasonable, in the absence of other explanation, to infer that the fire was caused by sparks from the burning stump. Viera v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 10 Cal. App. 267, 101 P. 690; Bowles v. Hickson, 22 Cal. App. 264, 133 P. 1149; St. Paul F., etc., Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 30 Cal. App. 140, 157 P. 247; Reuter v. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co., 37 Cal. App. 277, 174 P. 927; McGillivray v. Hampton, 39 Cal. App. 726, 179 P. 733; Dibble v. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp., 47 Cal. App. 112, 190 P. 198.

[2] Respondent contends that the foregoing reasoning is faulty, in that "an inference cannot be based on another inference." The second inference is not based upon the first inference alone, but upon the inferred fact that the stump was burning, and the further fact, proved by direct evidence, that a strong wind was blowing from the stump towards the origin of the fire. The statement that an inference cannot be based upon another inference appears itself to be based upon an unsubstantial foundation.

"An inference is a deduction which the reason of the jury makes from the facts proved, without an express direction of law to that effect." Code Civ. Proc. § 1958.

"An inference must be founded on a fact legally proved." Code Civ. Proc. § 1960.

Facts established by circumstantial evidence are "proved" and "legally proved," and the foregoing sections do not provide that the facts upon which an inference may be founded must be proved by direct evidence. To hold that an inference cannot be based upon facts inferred from testimonial evidence would be to confine circumstantial evidence within narrow limits. In Wigmore on Evidence, § 41, it is said:

"It was once suggested that an 'inference upon an inference' will not be permitted, i. e., that a fact desired to be used circumstantially must itself be established by testimonial evidence; and this suggestion has been repeated by a few courts, and sometimes actually enforced. There is no such rule; nor can be. If there were, hardly a single trial could be adequately prosecuted. * * * In * * * innumerable daily instances we build up inference upon inference, and yet no court ever thought of forbidding it. * * * The judicial utterances that sanction the fallacious and impracticable limitation, originally put forward without authority, must be taken as valid only for the particular evidentiary facts therein ruled upon."

[3] It is not intended, of course, to express any opinion as to the weight of the evidence produced at the trial, but, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as is required on a motion for a nonsuit, sufficient appears to prove a prima facie case in favor of plaintiff. It cannot be said as a matter of law that it is not negligence to leave burning stumps unguarded during the dry season in close proximity to lands covered with trees, brush, leaves, and grass. It is reasonably to be anticipated that a wind may carry sparks from the burning stump to the inflammable materials on the adjacent lands.

The fires which had been burning upon defendant's land were set without a permit from the state forester or any of his agents, required by the Forestry Act. Stats. 1905, p. 235. That act provides:

"Sec. 14. Every person, who willfully, maliciously or negligently sets on fire or causes or procures to be set on fire any woods, brush, prairies, grass, grain or stubble on any lands not his own, or allows the fire to escape from his own land, whereby any property of another is injured or destroyed, * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. * * * Setting such fires or allowing them to escape shall be prima facie proof of willfulness, malice or neglect under this section, provided, that nothing herein contained shall apply to a person who, in good faith, sets a back-fire to check a fire already burning."

"Sec. 16. Restriction of Use of Fire in Dry Season. It shall be unlawful between May fifteenth and October thirty-first, for any person or persons to burn brush, stumps, logs, fallen timber, fallows, slash, or grass brush or forest covered land or any other inflammable material or to blast with dynamite, powder or other explosives, or set off fireworks of any kind in forest, fallows, grass or brush covered land, either their own or the property of another, unless done under a written permit from the state forester or his duly authorized agent, and in strict accordance with the terms of the permit; these restrictions not to apply to the ordinary use of fire or blasts in logging in the redwood region (sequoia sempervirens). Provided, however, that no written permission shall be necessary to burn inflammable material in small heaps or piles, where the fire is set on a public road, in dooryard premises, corrals, gardens, or plowed fields, at a distance not less than one hundred feet from any woodland, timber, or brush covered land or field containing dry grass or other inflammable material. Any violation of this section is punishable by a fine of not less than fifty dollars or more than five hundred dollars or imprisonment for not less than thirty days nor more than six months in the county jail of the county in which the crime is committed, or both such fine and imprisonment." Stats. 1923, p. 690.

"Sec. 18. Civil Liability for Forest Fires. In addition to the penalties provided in sections fourteen, fifteen, sixteen and seventeen of this act, the United States, state, county, or private owners, whose property is injured or destroyed by such fires may recover in a civil action, double the amount of damages suffered if the fires occurred through willfulness, malice or negligence; but if such fires were caused or escaped accidentally or unavoidably, civil action shall lie only for the actual damage sustained as determined by the value of the property injured or destroyed, and the detriment to the land and vegetation thereof. The presumption of willfulness, malice or neglect shall be overcome; provided, that the precautions set forth are observed; or, provided, fires are set during the 'dry season' with written permission of and under the direction of the district firewarden. Persons or corporations causing fires by violations of this act shall be liable to the United States, state, county, or private owners in action for debt to the full amount of all expenses incurred by the United States, state, county or private owners in fighting such fires." Stats. 1919, p. 234.

[4, 5] Respondent contends that section 18 "provides for a civil liability in cases where a fire is caused or escapes accidentally or unavoidably," and that such provision is therefore unconstitutional, in that it would deprive a person of property without due process of law. It may be conceded that, in a case such as this, it is beyond the power of the Legislature to impose a liability for an accidental and unavoidable fire, which accidentally and unavoidably escapes, if there be no negligence in causing the fire or in allowing it to escape. The provision referred to, however, may be eliminated without affecting the other provisions of the statute. It is within the power of the Legislature to provide, as it has provided in section 14, that proof that a defendant allowed fire to escape from his own land to that of another shall be prima facie proof of negligence. People v. Cockrill, 62 Cal. App. 22, 216 P. 78.

Respondent further contends that, for like reasons, section 16 is unconstitutional, citing In re McCapes, 157 Cal. 26, 106 P. 229. In that case subdivision 3 of section 384 of the Penal Code, as it then stood (Stats. 1907, p. 996), was declared unconstitutional. It made it a misdemeanor for any person to build a fire upon his own land "for the purpose of burning brush, stumps, logs, rubbish, fallen timber, fallows, grass or any other thing whatsoever" without a written permit from a "state or district firewarden." The court said:

"It prevents the setting of any fire without permission from a fire warden, though the fire be set with scrupulous care, and by no possibility could work the destruction of property."

The court further said:

"It is to be noted that the act is designed to prevent the destruction of property, and particularly of forests, by the careless setting of fires. In its purview and purpose, therefore, the act is within the police power of the state. No one at this day can be unaware of the great havoc wrought by forest fires, and, indeed, in states such as this, which undergo long periods of drouth, of the loss which results from fires sweeping over the farming lands and destroying the crops. The purpose of the law being for the general good of the state, to prevent the destruction of property by fires carelessly set and allowed to escape control, not only brings the act strictly within the police power, but the purpose must commend the act to every court. Nevertheless, in the accomplishment of that purpose, it is quite plain that the legislature has transgressed all reasonable bounds."

[6-9] The purpose of the Forestry Act, as expressed in the title thereof, is "to provide for the regulation of fires on, and the protection and management of, public and private forest lands within the state of California." The language of the act, however broad and general its terms, is restrained and qualified by this title to fires within public or private forests or in places so situated in relation thereto as to endanger the same. Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 135. In so far as the provisions of the act are broad enough to apply to fires in other places, such provisions are invalid, because not germane to the title. Such provisions are not to be held void in toto, however, but they are to be construed as applying only to the subject-matter embraced in the title of the act. Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 298; Estate of Melone, 141 Cal. 331, 74 P. 991. The application of the provisions of the Forestry Act is expressly limited by the proviso contained in section 16 thereof, a limitation not contained in section 384 of the Penal Code at the time of the decision in the McCapes Case. Viewing the statute in the light of these limitations, it cannot be said that "the Legislature has transgressed all reasonable bounds."

[10] If the act in question were invalid for the reasons stated by respondent, it would still be liable if it negligently permitted the fire to escape. Section 3346a of the Civil Code and section 3344 of the Political Code, in identical language, provide:

"Every person negligently setting fire to his own woods, or negligently suffering any fire to extend beyond his own land, is liable in treble damages to the party injured."

The judgment is reversed.

WALLACE v. REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5393.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 20, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court. Jan. 18, 1926.)

1. Colleges and universities ⇨ 2—Legislature may limit or abrogate right of university to require vaccination before admission of students.

Legislature, under police power, may limit or abrogate right of University of California, under Const. art. 9, § 9, in absence of lawful statutory limitation, to require vaccination before admission of student.

2. Colleges and universities ⇨ 2—Statute prohibiting regulation of vaccination by school authorities held void, so far as affecting constitutional right of university.

St. 1921, p. 550, prohibiting adoption of rule or regulation as to vaccination for smallpox, by school or local health authorities, and repealing St. 1911, p. 295, which repealed St. 1889, p. 32, held void, as general law, not itself regulating subject, in so far as prohibiting or limiting power of University of California, under Const. art. 9, § 9, to pass health laws.

Application of Ralph C. Wallace, by W. S. Wallace, his guardian ad litem, for writ of mandate to the Regents of the University of California and such University. Writ denied.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Cashin, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Donovan & Lyman, of Oakland, for petitioner.

John U. Calkins, Jr., and Warren Olney, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

Douglas L. Edmonds, of Los Angeles, amicus curiae, for Public School Protective League.

TYLER, P. J. Application for a peremptory writ of mandate compelling respondents to admit petitioner to enter himself as a student at large in respondent corporation.

The facts may be briefly stated as follows:

Petitioner applied to be entered in the University of California as a student at large for the term beginning on or about August 14, 1925, and to receive regular tuition therein. He had complied with all the requirements prescribed by respondents to entitle him to so enter save and except that he refused to submit to vaccination against smallpox, or offer proof of previous vaccination, for which reason his application was denied. In their answer to the petition respondents admit that every person in attendance as a student at respondent institution was and is now required, by a rule or regulation imposed or adopted by the Regents, to provide satisfactory evidence to the authorities in charge of the University that he has been successfully vaccinated against smallpox within seven years prior to his application for admission. It is then alleged in substance that the reason for refusal of petitioner's request was due to the fact that he had not complied with the rule in question. Petitioner claims that the Regents have no authority to exact such a requirement, and that the regulation is invalid and is contrary to existing general law.

The sole question thus presented is whether or not the regulation of the university is one which it has power to enact. Preliminarly, it may be well to briefly refer to the various acts of the Legislature on the subject and the adjudications with reference to such legislation. Prior to the year 1889 there was no law governing the situation. The Legislature of that year passed an act (Stats. 1889, p. 32), requiring the vaccination of every child attending the public schools. The constitutionality of this act was assailed, but its validity was upheld by the appellate courts as being a proper exercise of the police power. Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 P. 383; French v. Davidson, 143 Cal. 658, 77 P. 663; State Board of Health v. Board of Trustees, 13 Cal. App. 514, 110 P. 137.

In 1911 the statute of 1889 was amended so as to provide that any unvaccinated child or person might be admitted to the public schools upon the filing, by the parent or guardian of such child, of a statement in writing to the effect that such parent or guardian was conscientiously opposed to the practice of vaccination and would not consent thereto. Stats. 1911, p. 295.

This act further provided that whenever the state board of health should, after a thorough investigation, find that smallpox existed in any school district or city, all children or persons who had not been successfully vaccinated within seven years then last past should be excluded forthwith and continuously from admission to or attendance upon the benefits of or service in connection with any and all schools, colleges, universities, academies, and other educational institutions situated in such school district, city, town, or city and county until such children were successfully vaccinated or until such time as such smallpox should cease to exist.

While this act was in full force and effect application was made as here by a minor through his guardian to be enrolled at the University. The rule requiring vaccination was then in force. The applicant presented his statement showing that his parents were conscientiously opposed to vaccination. He was refused admission, and brought a proceeding in mandamus to compel such admission. It was his contention that, having complied with all the requirements as set forth in the statute of 1911 prescribing the conditions with respect to vaccination to be complied with for admission as a student, he was entitled to enrollment. He was denied the relief prayed for. Williams v. Wheeler, 23 Cal. App. 619, 138 P. 937. It was there held that the provision of the Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 295), exempting persons who were conscientiously opposed to the practice of vaccination from the operation of the law, otherwise general in its terms, requiring vaccination of persons seeking admission to educational institutions, was not in the nature of a health regulation, and not being so, it was not such a proviso as comes within the general police powers with which the Legislature is invested. It was accordingly further held that it could not be availed of by those seeking enrollment in the University of California to nullify the effect of the rule of the Regents of the University that every person in attendance as a student, or applying for enrollment as such, shall produce evidence satisfactory to the authorities thereof that he has been successfully vaccinated within seven years prior to such attendance or application, or else be vaccinated.

It was also held that by section 9 of article 9 of the state Constitution the University of California was raised to the dignity of a constitutional department or function of the state government, with the investment of power and discretion in the management of its affairs, including the power to make all reasonable rules and regulations as might tend to prevent the introduction and spread of contagious disorders amongst the student body, and that a rule requiring vaccination as a prerequisite to the admission of a student was, in the absence of legislation lawfully limiting the exercise of that power, a reasonable one. In 1921 the Legislature repealed the 1911 statute. Stats. 1921, p. 550. Section 1 of the new act reads as follows:

"The control of smallpox shall be under the direction of the state board of health, and no rule or regulation on the subject of vaccination shall be adopted by school or local health authorities."

Section 2 of the act repealed the only act of the Legislature then in effect dealing with the subject of vaccination.

It is petitioner's contention that by reason of this change in the law it was the intention of the Legislature to take away from all schools and local health authorities the power to make rules or regulations on the subject of vaccination, in consequence of which the University authorities have no power to deny petitioner the privilege he seeks by reason of a rule they have no power to exact or maintain.

Respondents, on the other hand, insist that the word "school," as employed in the act, is not used in its generic sense, but, rather, is limited to institutions of lesser academic requirements than colleges or universities. They also claim that the phrase "local health authorities" has also a limited meaning, and refers to subordinate health boards and health districts of the state. The further claim is advanced that, even assuming that the Regents of the University may be said to come within the prohibition of the statute, the act, in so far as respondents are concerned, is unconstitutional and void.

[1] As we are of the opinion that they are correct in this contention, a decision upon the proper construction to be given to the word "school" or the phrase "local authorities" would answer no useful purpose. As above pointed out, the Board of Regents of the University had, at the time the rule in question was promulgated, power to adopt and enforce regulations concerning health measures and to require vaccination as a prerequisite to the admission of a student to the University, as at that time there was an absence of legislation lawfully limiting the exercise of that power.

There is no question but that the Legislature may under its police power limit or abrogate this right, and in fact respondents do not claim otherwise, for they concede that the power vested under the Constitution in the Regents is not so broad as to destroy or limit the general power of the Legislature to enact laws for the general welfare of the public, including laws regulating the subject of vaccination, even though it might incidentally affect the University of California, as such a law would be paramount as against a rule of the Regents in conflict therewith. They do claim, however, that no such law exists, as neither the Legislature nor the board of health under its grant of power has attempted to pass any law or rule which in any manner contravenes the Regents' regulation in reference to the matter since the passage of the act of 1921.

[2] The present law does not itself attempt to regulate the subject, but it merely delegates to the board in question certain powers. Whatever rights this body may have under this grant of power is a matter with which we are not here concerned, nor it has made no attempt to exercise any power whatsoever. The legislative declaration that no rule or regulation shall be adopted by school or local health authorities is not a regulation, nor, in fact, is it a health law, but rather, under the circumstances, it is one in effect which forbids or prevents the adoption of a health measure, at least until such time as a rule or regulation on the subject has been adopted in conformity with the provisions of the act.

In so far as the act may be considered as a prohibition or limitation upon the constitutional power of the University to pass health laws, it is clearly void. The Legislature cannot, by this character of a general law, take away or impair the power so granted. In order to accomplish this result it must itself regulate the subject by appropriate legislation. A general law which does not itself regulate, but which merely provides, as here, that there shall be no local regulation, can have no proper application to local bodies deriving their powers under a constitutional grant, as such law amounts to no more than a legislative attempt to nullify such constitutional grant, and it is to that extent invalid.

This precise question has been considered and passed upon in the comparatively recent case of Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172. It is there held that an act of the Legislature, general in its terms, prohibiting local legislative bodies, acting under a constitutional grant, from enacting local, police, sanitary, or other regulations, while in a sense a general law, is a legislative attempt to nullify a constitutional grant to the local bodies politic, and therefore to that extent invalid. See, also, In re Murphy, 190 Cal. 286, 212 P. 30; In re Mingo, 190 Cal. 771, 214 P. 850.

In our opinion these authorities are decisive upon the question. Further consideration of the subject is therefore unnecessary.

The writ is denied.

BLAIN v. BURGE. (Civ. 5250.)

1. Judgment $\S$ 942—Recitals in foreign judgment, essential to jurisdiction, presumed true, if not controverted.

In action on foreign judgment, recitals of that judgment, essential to jurisdiction, must be presumed to be true, unless controverted, and party attacking judgment has burden of proof.

2. Judgment $\S$ 822(1)—Foreign judgment of which presumptions of regularity and jurisdiction are not overcome has same effect as final judgment in state.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1915, a foreign judgment, respecting which presumptions of regularity and jurisdiction are not overcome, has same effect as final judgment in state, and same rules relating to collateral attack are applicable.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1010(1)—Finding of trial court as to jurisdiction of foreign court to render judgment, supported by evidence, is conclusive.

In action to enforce foreign judgment, findings of trial court that foreign court had jurisdiction to render judgment, supported by ample evidence, is conclusive on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by J. S. Blain against R. T. Burge. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Hall, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Moote & Patterson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued on a judgment which had been rendered in his favor and against the same defendant in the state of Texas. Plaintiff also had judgment in this action, from which the defendant has appealed on a record prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

In his complaint in this action, the plaintiff pleaded that he recovered a judgment against the defendant for $2,379.21, with interest at 6 per cent. a year in the district court of Jefferson county, Tex., and that said judgment was duly entered and recorded. The defendant denied these allegations for want of information or belief, and, as a special defense, alleged that on August 5, 1921, he was served with a citation issued out of the Fifty-Eighth district court of Jefferson county, Tex., citing him to appear and answer before the Sixtieth district court of the same county; that he employed counsel, who attended the session of the Sixtieth district court on the appearance date fixed in said citation; that on said date said counsel learned that said cause was not on the docket of said court, and that the same was not called for answer; that thereafter the default of this defendant was entered in said cause and judgment thereon was rendered against this defendant by said Sixtieth district court, which is the judgment here in controversy; that said judgment is void for want of jurisdiction, because the said cause had not been duly transferred to the Sixtieth district from the Fifty-Eighth district prior to the issuance of the citation to the defendant to appear in the former district.

The trial court found that the defendant was personally served with process to appear in the Sixtieth district court, and that said process was not issued out of the Fifty-Eighth district court as alleged in the answer. The jurisdiction of the Sixtieth district court to render the judgment in suit was found by the trial court, both as a matter of fact and as a conclusion of law.

The facts of the case, which are undisputed, are that the two courts exercise concurrent jurisdiction in the county of Jefferson and that the records of both courts are kept by the same clerk. The complaint was filed with this clerk, and the cause assigned to the Fifty-Eighth district. The judge presiding in that district immediately assigned the cause to the Sixtieth district, and the clerk thereupon issued the citation requiring the defendant to appear in that court. No appearance was made at any time, and because of defendant's default judgment was entered against him in full accord with the legal proceedings provided in such cases by the laws of Texas. No appeal or other attack had been made on this judgment in the Texas courts, and it had become final before the entry of the judgment in this state.

[1, 2] It is stated in argument that the Texas judgment contained all the recitals essential to jurisdiction, including a recital of due personal service of process. Such recitals must be presumed to be true, unless controverted by other parts of the record or by independent proof. 15 Cal. Jur., § 248, p. 246; Estate of Pusey, 177 Cal. 367, 374, 170 P. 846. The burden of proof is on the party attacking the judgment (Collins v. Maude, 144 Cal. 289, 77 P. 945), and, if the presumptions of regularity and jurisdiction are not overcome, a foreign judgment has the same effect as a final judgment in this state (section 1915, Code Civ. Proc.).

[3] As there has been no direct attack upon the Texas judgment, it has become a final adjudication in that state. Therefore the rules of law above noted, covering collateral attack upon judgments in this state, are particularly applicable. The trial court in this state having found that the Texas court had jurisdiction to render the judgment, that finding is conclusive on this appeal; there being ample evidence to support it.

Judgment affirmed.

NATOLI v. DAVIS, Agent, etc. (Civ. 2927.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 24, 1925.)

1. Limitation of actions ⇐125—Amended complaint, bringing in successor of presidential agent, named in original complaint as defendant, held commencement of new action, barred by federal Transportation Act.

Amended complaint, filed under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 472, 473, naming as defendant successor of presidential agent named in original complaint, did not operate as substitution of parties, but was commencement of new action by bringing in new party, against whom it was barred, because amended complaint was not filed within two years after passage of Transportation Act 1920, as required by section 206a (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10071¼cc).

2. Courts ⇐97(5)—State court bound by federal Supreme Court's decision, in action against presidential agent.

As United States is attempted to be made responsible party, in action against presidential agent on cause arising while carriers were under government control, state Supreme Court is bound by decision of United States Supreme Court that amended complaint, naming as defendant successor of presidential agent named in original complaint, commenced new action, barred by Transportation Act 1920, § 206a (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10071¼cc).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Geo. F. Buck, Judge.

Action by D. Natoli against James C. Davis, as agent, etc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, for appellant.

Scott Rex, of Stockton, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to recover damages for injury to grapes in transit while the carriers on which the grapes were shipped were under government control. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The action was begun on the 1st day of November, 1921, naming as defendants Southern Pacific Company and John Barton Payne, as agent, under section 206 of the act of Congress of the United States, known as the Transportation Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10071¼ cc). Summons was issued in said action on the 14th day of July, 1922, and on the 16th day of August, 1922, an amended complaint was filed herein, naming as defendants Southern Pacific Company and James C. Davis, as agent, under section 206 of the act of Congress of the United States, known as the Transportation Act, etc., and on the 13th day of October, 1922, a second amended complaint was filed herein, naming as defendant only James C. Davis, as agent as aforesaid. The shipment of grapes referred to herein took place in the fall of 1919. The defendant, James C. Davis, appeared and filed a demurrer to the second amended complaint, alleging, among other things, that said second amended complaint did not state a cause of action against said defendant, and also that the alleged cause of action set forth in said second amended complaint was barred by the provisions of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, and by subdivision (a) of section 206 of the Transportation Act of the United States of 1920. The defendant also moved the court to dismiss the action, among other things, upon the ground that at the time the action was brought against the said John Barton Payne, as agent, etc., he was no longer such agent; that on the 28th day of March, 1921, said John Barton Payne retired from office as agent under said Transportation Act, and on said last-named date said James C. Davis had been appointed as said agent, under section 206 of the Transportation Act, and that no proceedings were taken or had by the plaintiff in the above-entitled action for the substitution of said James C. Davis as a party defendant in the place and stead of John Barton Payne within one year after March 28, 1921, in accordance with the terms of that certain act entitled "An act to prevent the abatement of certain actions" passed by the Congress of the United States, and approved February 8, 1899 (U. S. Comp. St. § 1594). The demurrer interposed by the defendant was overruled, and his motion denied, and the cause proceeded to trial.

[1] Two questions only are presented for consideration upon this appeal: (1) The opening of the cause for the taking of further testimony by the court; and (2) the question of the statute of limitations. We think it necessary only to consider the latter question. The record shows that more than two years had elapsed before the bringing in of the defendant, James C. Davis, as agent under the Transportation Act, and that at the time suit was instituted John Barton Payne was not the agent under said act and had not been for some period of time. The amended complaints were filed in this case under the provisions of sections 472 and 473, Code of Civil Procedure, before any answers were filed or appearances made by any of the defendants named in the several pleadings.

While the cases referred to by counsel speak of substitution of parties, under our procedure, what took place in this instance was not, in fact, a substitution of parties as that act is referred to and provided for in our Codes, but was a bringing in of new parties by the filing of the amended complaints and naming of them parties defendant therein. This distinction is set forth in Kittle v. Bellegarde, 86 Cal. 556, on page 563, 25 P. 55, 57, where the court says:

"An order of court substituting a party is different from an order of court allowing 'a party to amend any pleading * * * by adding or striking out the name of any party' by authority of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The substitution is made by the court; whereas the amendment is allowed to be made by the party. A substitution may be made, on suggestion and proof of the requisite facts, at the instance of either party, and might have been made on the suggestion and at the instance of the defendants in this case; whereas an amendment by adding or striking out the name of a party is only allowed at the instance of the party whose pleading is to be so amended. Again, the substitution of a party plaintiff necessitates no change in the defense; whereas the addition or striking out of a party by amendment may require or admit of a different defense."

In Jeffers v. Cook, 58 Cal. 147, the court refers to the section of the Code defining what constitutes the beginning of an action, to wit, "the filing of a complaint" (section 405, Code Civ. Proc.), and then goes on to speak of the effect of filing a supplemental, or amended complaint, bringing in new defendants. In that case the action was to foreclose a mortgage, where all the parties in interest were not made defendants in the original complaint. The court said:

"By moving, in the original action, to make the subsequent grantees of the mortgagor parties to the action, the plaintiff followed the course of procedure approved in Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 465 [76 Am. Dec. 540]; Boggs v. Fowler, 16 Cal. 561 [76 Am. Dec. 561]; Ketchum v. Crippen, 37 Cal. 225; and Aldrich v. Stephens, 49 Cal. 677. But her motion was not made, and her supplemental complaint was not filed until nearly six years after the cause of action stated in the original complaint had accrued; and, according to the rule for moving within reasonable time, enunciated in Goodenow v. Ewer, supra, it would seem to have been too late to resort to a remedy against new parties in aid of a cause of action which, as to them, was barred by the lapse of time within which, under the Code of Civil Procedure, an action could be brought against them upon the cause of action.

"But it is contended that the cause of action was not barred, because the original complaint in the action, having been filed against the mortgagor in statutory time, stopped the running of the statute of limitations. Section 350, Code Civ. Proc. That as a legal proposition is true as to the mortgagor, who was made the sole party defendant to the action at the time of filing the complaint. And it would, also, have been true as to those who were subsequently made parties defendants by the supplemental complaint, if they had been made parties before the statute had run in their favor. * * * The filing of the original complaint, therefore, stopped the running of the statute of limitations only as to him who was the party defendant at the time it was filed; it did not stop the running of the statute in favor of those who were not made defendants in the action at that time. The statute continued to run in their favor. * * * As to them, no action was commenced until the filing of the supplemental complaint in which they were named as defendants. * * * The supplemental complaint was a continuance of the original action as against the original defendant, but it was the commencement of a new action as to them. Until they were made parties to the bill, the action cannot be considered as having been commenced against them."

We do not find that this rule has been departed from in any subsequent California cases. The cases of Walsh v. Decoto, 49 Cal. App. 737, 194 P. 298, and also Thompson v. So. Pac. Co., 180 Cal. 730, 183 P. 153, had to do with the correction of the names of the parties defendants, and were simply cases where a misnomer had occurred, and were not cases bringing in different parties defendant. Recognizing the principle that an action against a Director General of railroads, and his successor in office, as agent, designated by the President in suits against a railroad under government control, is, in substance and effect, a suit against the United States, several courts have held, where the distinction is not made between bringing in new parties and substituting parties, that the procedure adopted by the trial court in this action is correct. These cases also are founded upon local statutes permitting the procedure in the respective states there adopted and followed. In the case of Bailey v. Hines, 131 Va. 421, 109 S. E. 470, the action was brought against Walker D. Hines, Director General, and as successor in office as the agent provided for in section 206 of the Transportation Act. The defendant, Hines, named in said action, appeared, and pleaded in abatement that before the institution of the action he had resigned as such Director General of Railroads and agent, and that John Barton Payne had been appointed in his room and stead. The plaintiff thereupon asked leave to amend by substituting the name of John Barton Payne for that of Walker D. Hines, and moved the court to reject the defendant's plea in abatement, and to dismiss his motion to quash, which request was declined, and also denied said motions. The plaintiff's objection to commencing a new action was that it would be barred by the statute of limitations. Upon this showing the Supreme Court of Virginia, citing the local Code provisions of that state, held that the plaintiff's motion should have been granted, and the motion to quash the proceedings should have been denied, and remanded the cause for further hearing. In Arkansas Land & Lumber Co. v. Davis, 155 Ark. 541, 244 S. W. 730, the Supreme Court of Arkansas had before it similar questions to those presented here, and it was held that—

Where "a person not federal Director General was in that capacity made defendant, and later plaintiff substituted the real incumbent, the time of bringing suit and not time of substitution determined the three years' limitation against plaintiff, since the substitution was, under Crawford & Moses' Dig. § 1239, an allowable amendment in form to correct defendant's name."

The action in that case was brought against John Barton Payne, as Director General of Railroads, within three years after the cause of action accrued, and later, when it was ascertained that Payne was not such director at the time suit was instituted, James C. Davis, who was such director at that time, was substituted as defendant. In the cases of Hill v. Davis (Tex. Civ. App.) 257 S. W. 340; Mickle et al. v. Hines, Director General of Railroads, et al. (Tex. Civ. App.) 263 S. W. 1078; and Kilgore v. Hines (Tex. Civ. App.) 265 S. W. 744, the Court of Civil Appeals, following the local statutes of that state, permitted substitution. The case of Kilgore v. Hines cites the cases of Cohen v. Davis, 247 Mass. 259, 142 N. E. 75; Ætna Mills v. Director General of Railroads, 242 Mass. 255, 136 N. E. 380, where substitution was allowed, even though more than two years had elapsed after the termination of federal control. These Massachusetts cases, as will hereafter appear, were subsequently overruled by the United States Supreme Court. In the case of Ætna Mills v. Director General, etc., 242 Mass. 255, 136 N. E. 380, supra, the court, in discussing the Transportation Act, said:

"That statute impliedly imported into it the state practice with reference to substituting a new defendant by amendment"—citing cases.

"The construction of * * * section 206 of the Transportation Act for which the defendant contends, namely, that it permits the substitution of the agent designated by the President only in suits 'properly brought and pending at the termination of federal control,' seems to us unwarranted by the language of the entire act, and inconsistent with its comprehensive scope, contemplating as it does the settlement of matters arising out of federal control, in all the states. Admittedly the decisions which it cites are not decisive. In Bryson v. Great Northern Railway, 61 Mont. 351, 203 P. 529, the plaintiff, after judgment had been rendered against the railroad company, sought to substitute the federal agent as defendant, and affirm the judgment as against him, without giving him a day in court. In Tutsch v. Director General of Railroads (Cal. Dist. Court of Appeal) 52 Cal. App. 650 [199 P. 861], the local statute of limitation had operated as a bar in favor of the Director General when the plaintiff sought to make him party defendant. A proposed amendment to substitute the federal agent as the sole defendant was denied as not authorized by the Maryland Code, in Atkinson v. Philadelphia, Baltimore & Wash. Railroad, 137 Md. 632 [113 A. 110], and as not permissible under the Alabama Code in Currie v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad, 206 Ala. 402 [90 So. 313, 19 A. L. R. 675]; Neely v. Payne, 126 Miss. 854 [89 So. 669], recognizes that actions under the Transportation Act should be brought against the federal agent and not against the carrier, but does not affect the question raised in the case at bar. * * *

"Finally the substitution of the defendant Davis was lawful and in accordance with the practice in this commonwealth. The cause of action remained the same, in fact. And G. L. c. 231, § 138, expressly states: 'The cause of action shall be considered to be the same for which the action was brought, if the court finds it to be the cause of action relied on by the plaintiff when the action was commenced, however the same may be misdescribed; and the allowance by the court of an amendment shall be conclusive evidence of the identity of the cause of action' [quoting cases]. Our practice act (G. L. c. 231, § 51) provides: 'The court may, at any time before final judgment, except as otherwise provided, allow amendments introducing a necessary party, discontinuing as to a party or changing the form of the action, and may allow any other amendment in matter of form or substance in any process, pleading, or proceeding, which may enable the plaintiff to sustain the action for the cause for which it was intended to be brought, or enable the defendant to make a legal defense' [citing cases]."

It is to be observed that we have nothing of that kind in the Code provisions concerning the practice or the bringing in of parties in the state of California. Following the same rule, as laid down in the Aetna Mills Case, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in L. L. Cohen & Co., Inc., v. Davis, Agent, 247 Mass. 259, 142 N. E. 75, held, where one wrongfully brought an action against a railroad instead of against the government in control thereof, the representative of the government could be made a party by substitution and this substitution could take place more than two years after the termination of government control, where the action was commenced before the expiration of federal control, under Transportation Act of 1920.

"Causes of Action Arising Out of Federal Control—(a) Actions at law, suits in equity and proceedings in admiralty, based on causes of action arising out of the possession, use or operation by the President of the railroad or system of transportation of any carrier (under the provisions of the Federal Control Act, or of the Act of August 29, 1916) of such character as prior to federal control could have been brought against such carrier, may, after the termination of federal control, be brought against an agent designated by the President for such purpose, which agent shall be designated by the President within thirty days after the passage of this act. Such actions, suits, or proceedings may, within the periods of limitation now prescribed by state or federal statutes but not later than two years from the date of the passage of this act, be brought in any court which but for federal control would have had jurisdiction of the cause of action had it arisen against such carrier."

In the case of Fischer v. Wabash Railway Co., 235 N. Y. 568, 139 N. E. 738, the Court of Appeals of the state of New York had certified to it five questions relating to matters which we are here considering. Four of the questions were answered; one was not. The trial court denied the motion for substitution. This order was affirmed. The affirmance of the order had the effect of holding by the court that substitution could not be made after the period of time mentioned in the statute and that the order of substitution would be, in effect, bringing in new parties and not simply correcting a misnomer of the party defendant.

In Fahey v. Davis, 224 Mich. 371, 195 N. W. 46 held: Under "Transportation Act 1920, § 206, terminating federal control of railroads March 1, 1920, and authorizing suits arising out of federal control, brought after the termination of federal control, to be brought against an agent designated by the President, within the prescribed period of limitations, and authorizing the substitution of such agent for the Director General, in suits pending at the termination of federal control, a suit for death in 1919, brought against a railroad company after the termination of federal control, was not pending at the time of such termination, and the substitution of the agent designated by the President was therefore unauthorized, and since the agent was not made a party till more than two years after the cause of action accrued, the action was barred," and also approved the language of the Supreme Court in Currie v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 206 Ala. 402, 90 So. 313, supra, where it is said:

"This cause of action arose in April, 1919, during federal control of railroads. The railroads were returned to the owners by act of Congress on February 28, 1920; and under this act John Barton Payne was designated as the agent to be sued. This was done before this suit was filed. * * * This suit was filed against this defendant on April 14, 1920. The substitution of the designated agent for the defendant in all pending suits as authorized by the act is not applicable to this case. This was not a pending suit when the federal control terminated. It should have been filed against John Barton Payne, Director General of Railroads. It was filed against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. A granting of the motion to substitute John Barton Payne, the agent designated by the President, as the sole party defendant, would work an entire change of the party defendant, and therefore offend our amendment laws, and this substitution is not authorized under the federal act of Congress, as it was not a pending cause when the federal control terminated; hence there was no error in refusing the motion."

In Davis v. Griffith, 103 Okl. 137, 229 P. 499, the Supreme Court of Oklahoma had before it a situation identical with that presented in this case. It was there held that an action, based upon matters occurring during federal control of railroads against John Barton Payne, a former presidential agent, did not make the United States government a party defendant to such action; and an attempted substitution of James C. Davis, the duly appointed and acting presidential agent, for John Barton Payne, agent, resigned, did not confer jurisdiction over the United States government, and such jurisdiction could be acquired, only, by proper service of process; that the United States had a right to prescribe the exact manner in which it could be sued; and that a strict compliance with its terms was necessary, whether the same were considered reasonable or unreasonable. This case takes up and sets forth the history of the federal legislation relating to government control of railroads and shows that prior to the act of 1920 actions might be begun against the Director General without naming him, but that after the passage of the act of Congress, dated February 28, 1920, it was necessary to begin actions against the particular person named by the president to be sued, in order that a valid judgment might be obtained against the revolving fund, which had been created by Congress, out of which judgments for damages might be satisfied. It was there argued that the substitution in name of James C. Davis for John Barton Payne was simply correcting the description or name of the real defendant. This argument is there answered, and in the conclusion of the consideration of this case the court said:

"It is an elementary rule of law that the United States government cannot be sued without its consent, and, if it gives its consent, it has the right to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which it may be sued; and it can be sued, only, by compliance with such terms and conditions, whether reasonable or unreasonable."

And further:

"We conclude that the United States could be sued, only, by making the agent, named by the President under Transportation Act of 1920 for such purpose, party defendant, who in this instance was James C. Davis; and that the trial court acquired no jurisdiction by the attempted substitution of Davis for Payne, since such jurisdiction could be had, only, by service of process."

This holding is, in effect, that the bringing in of Davis was the institution of the action as to him and as against the United States, and, as this was not done within the period of time prescribed by the statute of limitations, the action was barred.

In Vassau v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 69 Mont. 305, 221 P. 1069, the Supreme Court of Montana had before it for consideration the same questions which are presented here. It was there held that "a complaint in an action arising during federal control of railroads, brought against the railroad and a former presidential agent, designated under Transportation Act 1920, * * * did not make the United States a responsible defendant, and an order pursuant to which the pleadings were amended by designating the acting presidential agent was unauthorized, where the cause of action was then barred;" that the bringing in of the actual agent constituted the making of the United States a defendant, and, as this was not done until after the two-year period had elapsed, the amendment was too late. The argument was advanced in that case that the naming of John Barton Payne as Director General, etc., was sufficient to bring in the United States as a defendant. The court held, however, as we have stated, that such was not the case, and that a suit against a former agent was wholly ineffectual upon which to predicate an amendment bringing in the actual agent after the two-year period. In the Vassau Case the court refers to the case of Bailey v. Hines, supra, and also to the case of Arkansas Land & Lumber Company v. Davis, decided by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, and says:

"We think that in each instance undue prominence was given to local statutory provisions authorizing amendments of pleadings, and that the real question in controversy was either overlooked or passed with but slight notice. In the instant case, counsel for plaintiffs rely upon the decisions in those cases and upon our statute of amendments. * * * It is our opinion that the statute referred to has no application whatever to the question now before us."

The court then comments upon the absolute right of the government of the United States to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which it may be sued and the necessity of compliance therewith. The opinion further states:

That in the proceeding before it, which is identical with the cause at bar, "the complaint did not state a cause of action against either of the parties originally made defendants. The only means by which the responsible defendant, the United States, could be sued, was by making James C. Davis, presidential agent, defendant, and this was not done until February 4, 1922. Plaintiffs choose to sue the wrong party and must abide the consequences of their error.

Davidson v. Payne [C. C. A.] 289 F. 69. The effect of the order of February 4, 1922, was not merely to amend the pleading by correcting the name of the defendant, but to bring into the action for the first time the only responsible defendant, the United States."

In the case of Tutsch v. Director General of Railroads, 52 Cal. App. 650, 199 P. 861, this court, in the second division thereof, speaking through Justice Shaw, held:

"Where an action for personal injuries due to the negligence of a railroad company while the company was under government control was brought after the termination of such control against the Director General of the Railroads, instead of against the agent appointed by the President, and the plaintiff did not seek to make the agent a party defendant until after the expiration of one year from the accrual of the cause of action, the action as to such agent was barred by the statute of limitations and properly dismissed."

It was also held in that case that the agent acting for the United States government was not in a position to waive the bar of the statute. This case also refers to the rule which we have heretofore cited:

"The general rule is that unless an action is commenced against a party within the statutory period, or unless such party is by proper proceedings made a defendant by amendment prior to the expiration of such period, no judgment can be had against such defendant, unless the statute is waived."

The court also recognized the rule that in suing the United States government, the conditions embodied in the statute permitting such actions must be strictly complied with. It was there held that the application to amend the pleadings and bring in the person who was then the agent appointed under the Transportation Act of 1920, after the running of the statute, was properly denied.

We have referred to the various cases cited for the purpose of definitely setting forth the law in this state in relation to amendments bringing in new parties under the Code provisions of this state, as well as the Transportation Act of 1920, and also for the purpose of showing what cases set forth the law applicable to such as the one at bar, and the cases which have been, in effect, overruled by the United States Supreme Court. Whatever confusion may have arisen by the decisions in the several cases which we have cited, the law is now definitely settled in the case of Davis v. L. L. Cohen & Co., 45 S. Ct. 633, 69 L. Ed. 1129, decided by the Supreme Court on June 8, 1925. This is the Massachusetts case to which we have heretofore referred, where the defendant, Davis, was permitted to be brought in by way of substitution, after the two-year period specified in subdivision (a) of section 206 of the Transportation Act had expired. The substitution was permitted under the statutes of the state of Massachusetts, to which we have heretofore referred. It appears, as stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the defendant, James C. Davis, was brought into the case in practically the same manner as he was brought into the case with which we are dealing. Davis interposed the objection that the time prescribed by the Transportation Act had expired, and any provisions of the Massachusetts laws purporting to authorize such a proceeding were repugnant therewith and void. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts allowed the amendment, and also held that their local laws relating to substitution, which provided, in effect, in the event of substitution, that the beginning of the cause of action related back to the filing of the original complaint in the action, and not from the time of substitution, or the bringing in of the agent as the defendant prevailed. The Supreme Court of the United States, to which this case was taken by writ of error, in their opinion, among other things, said:

"The Transportation Act, which passed in February, 1920, provided that the federal control should terminate on March 1, 1920. It further provided, in section 206(a), that suits and proceedings based on causes of action arising out of the possession, use, and operation of a railroad under federal control, of such character as prior thereto could have been brought against the railroad company, might, after the termination of federal control, be brought against an agent designated by the President for such purpose, 'but not later than two years from the date of the passage of this act.' It also provided, in section 206(d), that actions of the character above described, pending at the termination of federal control, should not abate by reason of such termination, but might be prosecuted to final judgment, substituting the agent designated by the President.

"At the termination of federal control there was no suit pending against the Director General to enforce the liability of the government. The amendment of the writ and declaration in the suit against the railroad company, in October, 1922, by substituting the designated agent as the defendant, was, in effect, the commencement of a new and independent proceeding to enforce this liability. Being commenced more than two years after the passage of the Transportation Act, it was repugnant to the provision of section 206(a) requiring such an action to be instituted not later than two years after the passage of the act. This was the only consent the government had given to being sued in such an action after the termination of federal control. Nor was this amendment authorized under section 206(d), which related solely to the substitution of the designated agent as the defendant in a suit which had been previously brought against the Director General to enforce the liability of the government; that is, merely authorized the substitution, in such a suit, of another federal agent for the one already before the court. It had no application to suits pending against a railroad company alone, in which there was no federal agent for whom the designated agent could be substituted, where the substitution of the designated agent for the railroad company would work an entire change in the cause of action.

"These conclusions, we may add, are substantially the same as those of the state courts in Fahey v. Davis, 224 Mich. 371, 195 N. W. 46; Fischer v. Wabash Railway, 235 N. Y. 568, 139 N. E. 738; Currie v. Louisville & N. Railroad, 206 Ala. 402, 90 So. 313, 19 A. L. R. 675; Davis v. Chrisp, 159 Ark. 335, 252 S. W. 606, supra; and Davis v. Industrial Commission, 315 Ill. 341, 146 N. E. 569.

"It results that the provisions of the Massachusetts General Laws under which the plaintiff was allowed to amend the writ and declaration so as to substitute the designated agent as the defendant instead of the railroad company, as construed and applied in the present case, are void because of repugnancy to section 206 of the Transportation Act.

"The judgment of the superior court is reversed, and the cause remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion."

[2] The effect of this decision of the United States Supreme Court is to overrule all the cases relied upon by the plaintiff and respondent in this action, and as it is one in which the United States is, in substance and effect, attempted to be made the responsible party, this court is bound by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Cohen Case. It follows that the demurrer of the defendant, Davis, and his motion to quash were both well taken.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, with directions to either grant the defendant's motion or sustain the defendant's demurrer without leave to amend.

EBY et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 20, 1925. Rehearing Denied Dec. 14, 1925.)

1. Master and servant ☞375(2)—Injury to employee carrying tools while driving to work held not to arise out of and in course of employment.

Evidence that carrying of tools by employee to and from his home was merely incidental to his returning home and driving to work in his own car, as was his custom, or at most an accommodation to his employer, held to warrant finding that his injury and death in collision while driving to work with tools did not arise out of or in course of employment.

2. Master and servant ☞375(2)—Mission for employer, to be within course of employment, must be major factor in journey.

To prove that service was being rendered in course of employment of time of injury, received while traveling to work, mission for employer must be the major factor in the journey or movement, and not merely incidental.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Katherine Eby, for herself, and as guardian ad litem for Henry Van Denburgh and others, and by Mary Jenette Eby and others, minors, by their guardian ad item, Dora Eby, for compensation for the death of Roy T. Eby, opposed by J. L. Schimmer & Co., employer, and the International Indemnity Company, insurer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation, claimants bring certiorari. Affirmed.

Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondents J. L. Schimmer & Co. and International Indemnity Co.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Petition for writ of review. Petitioners herein, being the wife and surviving children of one Roy T. Eby, were granted a writ of certiorari to enable this court to review the findings and award of the Industrial Accident Commission of California, made in the matter of a claim filed by them under the Compensation Act and arising out of the death of the said Roy T. Eby.

The facts as they appear from the record are undisputed and may be summarized as follows: Roy T. Eby was employed by respondent J. L. Schimmer & Co. as a night foreman; the Schimmer Company being engaged in cement work. Late in the afternoon of November 27, 1924, Eby, while driving from his home to his place of employment, in his own automobile used regularly for such purpose, met his death in a collision on the public highway. Previous to the accident—whether on that day or the previous day is not clear—Mr. Schimmer, his employer, had requested him to bring to the job certain small tools belonging to his employer, and which were to be found at the employer's garage. After the accident two hammers and a wrecking bar about three feet in length were found in the automobile of the deceased. Schimmer, his employer, was unable to identify these articles as being his property, or the tools which he had requested the deceased to bring to the job with him. It appears from the testimony of witnesses who were at the home of the deceased just prior to the time he left for his place of employment that he was seen gathering certain tools together and putting them in his automobile, and that he explained to his friends that he needed these tools on the job. There is nothing in the record to show whether these tools belonged to the deceased or belonged to his employer. It does, however, appear that in the course of his employment he had the authority to purchase or to secure such tools as were needed by the workmen for certain types of work, and that his employer left to him the matter of purchasing the necessary tools or securing them otherwise. It further appears from the record that the deceased was in the habit of going to and from his work in his own automobile, which was the one he was driving at the time of the accident.

The Industrial Accident Commission, after the case had been submitted, made a finding that "the evidence does not establish that said injury and death arose out of or in the course of his employment." The conclusion of the commission was that the petitioners herein were not entitled to any allowance by reason of the death of the said deceased.

[1, 2] This finding and the judgment refusing an award are assailed by the petitioners as being in conflict with the evidence. With this contention we cannot agree. It is contended that the deceased at the time of the accident was carrying tools to his place of employment at the request of and for the benefit of his employer. The record, however, does not show that the tools which were found in the automobile belonged to his employer, or were the tools which his employer had requested him to get. Furthermore, the record shows that the tools which were in the automobile were apparently gathered up by the deceased upon his own premises. Whether or not these tools belonged to the deceased or to his employer, it clearly appears that the carrying of the tools was a mere incident, or at most, an accommodation to the employer. That the deceased, as a favor to his fellow employees, or even his employer, may have carried from the job to his home for safekeeping certain tools appears in the record. At most, such action on his part was merely incidental to his returning home and going to his work in his automobile. Where it is sought to prove that the service being rendered at the time of the injury was rendered in the course of the employment, by reason of the fact that the employee was performing a mission for the employer, the mission "must be the major factor in the journey or movement, and not merely incidental thereto." London Guarantee, etc., Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 587, 213 P. 977. But here it does not appear that the transportation, if any there was, of tools for use on the job was more than incidental to the main purpose of the journey, which purpose was that of an ordinary passage of the employee from his home to his place of employment.

In all of the cases cited and relied upon by the petitioners it appears that the injury which formed the basis of the award was received during the hours of employment, or in the performance of some special duty imposed by the employer upon the employee. In the instant case it does not appear that the accident happened while the deceased was on any errand in the course of his employment. It happened while he was on his way, as was his usual custom, to his place of employment.

We do not understand it is contended by petitioners that, if the commission was justified in its finding of fact, namely, that the deceased met his death while on his way to his place of employment, and not while in the course of his employment, they would be entitled to recover. Under these circumstances there will be no occasion to discuss in detail the principles underlying the right of recovery, or to cite authorities declaring the law on the subject. The question is wholly one of whether or not the evidence supports the finding of the commission. As indicated in the foregoing discussion, we are of the opinion that the finding of the commission is supported by the evidence, and therefore the award of the commission is affirmed.

1. Levees and flood control ⚡36—Pleading fairly showing that injuries resulted directly from levee officers' negligent acts need not aver proximate cause.

Under St. 1919, p. 756, relative to levee officers' liability for injuries to persons or property, held, it was not necessary, under section 1, subds. 1, 2, thereof to aver directly that officers' negligence was direct and proximate cause of injury, but it is sufficient, if it fairly appears that injuries described resulted directly and proximately from matter complained of.

2. Levees and flood control ⚡36—Levee officers, whose negligence directly caused conditions from which injury resulted, held liable.

St. 1919, p. 756, limiting liability of officers of levee districts for injuries to persons or property from defects in public work by requiring certain facts to appear, held not to relieve from liability those officers, whose negligence was direct cause of condition from which injury to individuals directly resulted.

3. Levees and flood control ⚡36—Complaint, in action against levee officers, negligent in constructing dams, held sufficient under statute.

In action against officers of levee district to recover damages for negligently failing to repair broken levee and erecting dams complaint held sufficient, under St. 1919, p. 756, where it alleged facts from which it fairly appeared that erection of dams at the place and in manner described was negligent, that act was done under direction of trustees, that a dangerous condition was thereby created, which was directly attributable to such negligence, and from which, as an immediate result, the injury followed.

4. Levees and flood control ⚡36—Statutory limitation of officers' liability to cases where injury sustained while public property or work was being carefully used not applicable, where work incapable of use by plaintiff.

St. 1919, p. 756, § 1, subd. 4, relative to levee officers' liability for injuries to persons or property, which requires that it shall appear injury was sustained while the public work or property was being carefully used, has no application, where property or work in question was not of character permitting its use by plaintiff.

5. Levees and flood control ⚡36—Statute placed burden on plaintiff to show due care to avoid injury.

St. 1919, p. 756, relative to liability of levee officers for damages to persons or property, section 1, subd. 4, of which provides it shall appear that damage or injury was sustained while public work or property was being carefully used, and that due care was being used to avoid danger due to such condition, held to place burden on plaintiff of showing affirmatively use of due care to avoid injury, both in cases where defective public work was being used by person injured and those wherein injuries complained of were unconnected with its use by such person.

6. Levees and flood control ⚡36—Plaintiff, required to show affirmatively absence of contributory negligence, need only allege in general terms that due care was exercised to avoid danger.

In action against officers of levee district, where St. 1919, p. 756, requires plaintiff, as condition to recovery, to affirmatively show absence of contributory negligence, held it is sufficient thereunder if plaintiff alleges in general terms that due care was exercised to avoid the danger due to the condition described, or if it appear by reasonable inference from the facts alleged that such care was used, or that, by exercise of ordinary care, injury could not have been avoided by plaintiff.

7. Levees and flood control ⚡36—Allegations as to plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence held sufficient, under statute.

In action against officers of levee district for negligence in failing to repair broken levee and in construction of dam, allegations of complaint as to plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence and exercise of due care sufficiently met requirements of St. 1919, p. 756, § 1, subd. 4, where it fairly appeared therefrom that, by acts described and alleged to have been negligent, a dangerous condition was created; that neither danger nor injury complained of could have been avoided by exercise of ordinary care; and that by no act or omission on his part caused or contributed to damage of plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Thomas Moore against William J. Burton and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Dean Edgerton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joe Crider, Jr., I. W. Stewart, and A. B. Shaw, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An action by appellant to recover damages alleged to have resulted from the negligence of respondents William J. Burton, Edwin F. Williams, and G. B. Alexander Rife, as trustees of the Palo Verde joint levee district of Riverside and Imperial counties; the corporation respondent being surety for each of said trustees on his official bond. A demurrer to the complaint having been sustained, appellant declined to amend, whereupon judgment was entered for respondents and the appeal taken therefrom.

The levee district mentioned, in which is situated certain land owned by appellant, has constructed for the protection of the lands therein from the overflow waters of the Colorado river certain levees along and near the west bank thereof; one of such levees being referred to in the complaint as the Standard levee, situated between the river and the land of appellant. The complaint alleges that the natural slope of the lands within the district and the flow of the river are from north to south; that during the month of June, 1921, the levee mentioned was by the action of the waters of the river cut and about 50 feet thereof washed away; that several overflows therefrom followed which passed through the broken levee, none of which, however, reached the land of appellant until the last week in August of that year, when the damage complained of occurred in the manner hereinafter stated.

It is further alleged that the trustees negligently failed to repair the broken levee; that between the time of the injury thereto and the damage to appellant's land alleged they negligently caused two dams to be constructed and maintained across a certain borrow pit, the pit mentioned being a part of the system provided for the protection of the lands within the district, and which was, as may be inferred from its description in the complaint, a trench running parallel with and west of the damaged levee; that during the fourth week of August, 1921, the overflow waters of the river passed through the break described and, in the words of the pleader, "the last-mentioned overflow waters, held back from flowing with the natural contour of the land by the two dams constructed across said borrow pit as hereinafter alleged, backed up and overflowed" the land of appellant, causing damage to certain vines and crops growing thereon. The location of ap-pellant's land with relation to the break in the levee and the dams mentioned is not clear from the complaint. Giving the pleading, however, the construction prescribed by law (Code Civ. Proc. § 452; Estate of Wickersham, 153 Cal. 603, 608, 96 P. 311; Burian v. Los Angeles Cafe Co., 173 Cal. 625, 161 P. 4), it may fairly be inferred from the foregoing allegations as to the effect upon the overflow waters of the river of the dams described that such land was situated to the north or west thereof; that the damage thereto was not directly caused by the failure of the trustees to repair the broken levee, but by the construction and maintenance of the dams, which prevented the flood waters from flowing through the borrow pit, and thence to the south; and that in the absence of such dams these waters would not have reached or overflowed the land described, but by reason thereof spread to the north or west, causing the damage of which appellant complains.

It is contended by respondents that under the provisions of the act relating to the liability in damages of the officers of districts for injuries to person or property from defects and dangers in public work, property, etc., approved May 18, 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 756), the liability of the officers of a levee district depends upon certain facts therein enumerated, and that it is essential to the statement of a cause of action against such officers that these facts, which, according to the act, "shall first appear," be alleged. The material portions of the act mentioned and upon which respondents rely are as follows:

"Section 1. No officer of any district * * * shall be liable for any damage or injury to any * * * property hereafter resulting from the defective or dangerous condition of any public * * * work or property, unless it shall first appear:

"(1) That the injury sustained was the direct and proximate result of such defective or dangerous condition,

"(2) That such officer had notice of such defect or dangerous condition or that such defective and dangerous condition was directly attributable to work done by him, or under his direction, in a negligent, careless or unworkmanlike manner,

"(3) That he had authority and it was his duty to remedy such condition at the expense of the state or of a political subdivision thereof and that funds for that purpose were immediately available to him, and

"(4) That, within a reasonable time after receiving such notice and being able to remedy such condition, he failed so to do, or failed to take reasonable steps to give adequate warning of such condition; and then only when it shall further appear that such damage or injury was sustained while such public * * * work or property was being carefully used, and that due care was being exercised to avoid the danger due to such condition; provided, however, that this act shall not be construed as enlarging the duty or liability of any public officer."

[1] While the provisions of subdivisions (1) and (2) of the section quoted limit recovery against such officers to cases where "the defective or dangerous condition was the direct and proximate" cause of the injury suffered, thus changing the rule of proof which in ordinary negligence cases requires only that the negligent act shall be shown to have been the proximate, though not necessarily the direct, cause of the injury alleged (Goehring v. Rogers [Cal. App.] 227 P. 687), the well-settled rule of pleading in negligence cases, although requiring a causative connection between the act of negligence and the injury to be alleged, does not require that the complaint aver in terms that such negligence was the proximate cause thereof if such connection appears by fair intendment from the facts alleged therein (19 Cal. Jur. Negligence, § 101; Soule v. Weatherby, 39 Utah, 580, 118 P. 833, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 75; Standard Ency. of Proc. vol. 20, p. 313); and, as the act neither expressly nor by necessary implication requires the facts mentioned to be directly averred, it is our conclusion that the sufficiency of the complaint in this respect is to be tested by the general rule stated; and, it fairly appearing from the allegations of the complaint that the injuries described resulted directly and proximately from the negligent erection and maintenance of the dams described, the pleading in this particular was sufficient. It appears from the various provisions of the act in question to have been the intention of the Legislature to make a distinction between those cases where defective or dangerous conditions in public work are directly attributable to negligent construction in the first instance by an officer having the immediate control or direction of such work, and those wherein such conditions are due to the negligence of persons not under his supervision, or to use, accident, or natural causes, by requiring in the latter instances notice thereof, the authority and duty, with funds available, to remedy those conditions, and that it shall first appear; these facts being shown, that he failed to remedy them within a reasonable time or give adequate warning thereof.

[2] To hold that it was designed to relieve from liability, unless the facts last enumerated appear, those officers, whose negligence was the direct cause of the conditions from which injury to individuals directly resulted, would be to extend the rule now applicable to cases of nonfeasance to official misfeasance, and with it the immunities which considerations of justice, as well as policy, render proper for the protection of those whose duties in the first instance have been properly performed—a construction limiting a just and long-established rule of liability (Dillwood v. Riecks, 42 Cal. App. 602, 184 P. 35; Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, 127 P. 50; 22 R. C. L. Public Officers, p. 484), and not required by the language of the statute or reasonally to be held to be the legislative intent.

[3] The complaint in the instant case, having alleged facts from which it fairly appears that the erection of the dams at the place and in the manner described, was, aside from the direct averment, negligent; that the act was done under the direction of the trustees; that a dangerous condition was thereby created which was directly attributable to such negligence, and from which as an immediate result the injury followed, the pleading was, according to our construction of the statute, in these respects, sufficient.

[4] To the facts as alleged in the complaint the further provision of subdivision (4) of the section, requiring that it shall appear that the injury was sustained while the public work or property was being carefully used, clearly has no application; it appearing that the work described, unlike roads, bridges, or works constructed for similar purposes, was not of a character permitting its use by appellant.

[5] It is further urged by respondents that, in actions against public officers, the last-mentioned subdivision changes the general rule that contributory negligence, if relied upon as a defense, must be pleaded and proved by the defendant, by requiring a plaintiff to plead and prove that due care had been exercised by him to avoid the danger due to defective or dangerous conditions, while it is contended by appellant that this provision of the statute relates only to care in connection with the use of public work.

We are of the opinion that it clearly appears from the language of the statute that it was the intention of the Legislature to require the same allegations and proof of the exercise of due care to avoid injury, both in cases where defective public work was being used by the person injured and those wherein the injuries complained of were unconnected with its use by such person. Numerous situations arise, where, for purposes temporary or permanent, structures are erected or conditions created, which, unless due care be exercised as to the place of erection or the manner of construction, may be the direct cause of injury to individuals, who, in no proper sense, can be said to be using such public work, but whose want of ordinary care is a proximate contributing cause of the injury suffered.

In the case of Ham v. County of Los Angeles, 46 Cal. App. 148, 160, 189 P. 462, in which it was sought to hold certain highway officials liable for damages growing out of injuries due to the defective condition of a bridge, it was held that the act known as the Pridham Act (Stats. 1911, p. 1115), repealed by the act here in question (which contained, in addition to provisions similar to those in the later act, a provision that "it shall further appear that such damage or injury was sustained while said street, highway, public building, public work, or property was being carefully used and that due care was exercised to avoid such danger"), changed the rule generally applicable in negligence cases, and placed the burden upon the plaintiff, in actions against public officers in the cases mentioned, of showing affirmatively the use of due care to avoid injury. This provision having been substantially re-enacted by the repealing act, and having been construed as above, the same construction may reasonably, and on the authority of the case cited should be, given to the later statute.

[6] It being the rule that contributory negligence, if relied upon as a defense, must be pleaded as well as proved, a rule that a plaintiff as a condition to recovery must show affirmatively the absence of contributory negligence reasonably and according to the settled principles of pleading requires the ultimate facts in that connection to be alleged. Allen v. Home Ins. Co., 133 Cal. 29, 65 P. 138; Spring Valley Waterworks v. San Francisco, 82 Cal. 286, 323, 22 P. 910, 1046, 6 L. R. A. 756, 16 Am. St. Rep. 116; Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 411, 415, 76 Am. Dec. 492.

Again, however, a fair construction of the statute does not lead to the conclusion that it was the intention to require in such cases greater particularity in the statement of facts than in ordinary negligence actions; it being sufficient in the latter class to allege negligence in general terms, specifying the particular acts or omissions alleged to have been negligent (Cary v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 157 Cal. 599, 108 P. 682, 27 L. R. A. [N. S.] 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329; Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 P. 618, 36 P. 407), or the specific acts which constitute the negligence complained of provided the circumstances alleged are such as to justify an inference of negligence (Tucker v. Cooper, 172 Cal. 663, 158 P. 181; Quinn v. Electric Laundry Co., 155 Cal. 500, 101 P. 794, 17 Ann. Cas. 1100; Silveira v. Iverson, 125 Cal. 266, 57 P. 996); the same rule being applicable to a plea of contributory negligence (Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 P. 714). Such intention not appearing, the change in the rule as to burden of proof reasonably requires no more than that it be alleged in general terms that due care was exercised to avoid the danger due to the condition described, or that it appear by reasonable inference from the facts alleged that such care was used, or that by the exercise of ordinary care the injury complained of could not have been avoided by the plaintiff.

[7] In the instant case, it fairly appearing from the allegations that by the acts described and alleged to have been negligent a dangerous condition was created; that neither the danger nor the injury complained of could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care by appellant; and that by no act or omission on his part was the damage caused or contributed to, the complaint was sufficient.

We have considered the complaint with reference to respondents' special demurrer, and are satisfied that the allegations are sufficient to meet the objections therein.

For the foregoing reasons, it is our conclusion that the order sustaining the demurrer to the complaint was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed, with the direction to the trial court to overrule the demurrer.

PEOPLE v. ANDERSON et al. (Cr. 1205.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 28, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 25, 1926.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 129(1)—Charging two offenses in indictment held not violation of statute.

Indictment may properly charge accused in one count with extortion and in another count with bribery arising out of same state of facts without violating Pen. Code, $\S$ 954.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1177—Where punishment of two crimes arising out of same state of facts did not exceed penalty of one, judgment would not be reversed.

Where accused was convicted of extortion and bribery, and sentences imposed were to run concurrently, and did not exceed penalty for bribery, judgment would not be reversed on ground that conviction was of two crimes arising out of same state of facts.

3. Bribery $\S$ 1(2)—Marshal held guilty of receiving bribe from one he had not had duty to arrest.

Where city marshal, with no official duty to enforce penal statute of state, accepted bribe from one he had arrested charged with violation of Pen. Code, $\S$ 148, he is chargeable, under section 68, which defines bribery; power to make arrest not being controlling if he assumed to make it under legal authority.

4. Bribery $\S$ 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Accessory may be guilty of bribery as principal.

Where attorney aided city marshal in taking bribe, he was guilty of bribery as defined in Pen. Code, $\S$ 68, in view of section 31, and section 971, which declares distinction between accessory and principal abrogated.

5. Extortion $\S$ 15—Evidence held insufficient to support conviction for extortion.

Evidence held insufficient to support conviction for extortion as defined by Pen. Code, $\S\S$ 518 and 519, where bribe was taken from prisoner already charged with offense, and no threats were made.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 511(1)—Testimony of accomplices held corroborated.

In prosecution of attorney and marshal for bribery, evidence held to sufficiently corroborate accomplices.

7. Bribery $\S$ 1(1)—Payment of money unnecessary to prove bribery.

Proof that a bribe was asked, the money thus secured to go to accused, was proof of crime of bribery, regardless of whether any money was thereafter either paid or accepted.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 507(1)—One agreeing to pay bribe held not accomplice.

Where attorney asked prisoner for payment of money as bribe for having charges against him released, prisoner was not an accomplice of attorney in commission of crime of bribery by asking of a bribe.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 825(2)—Instruction relative to status of police officer held not error without request for further instruction.

Objection that court instructed jury that police officer was executive officer, but did not instruct as to duty of police officer, is without merit, where no request for further instruction was made.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 824(7)—Failure to instruct as to who were accomplices held not error, in absence of request.

In criminal prosecution, failure of court to instruct jury fully as to who of witnesses were accomplices was not error in absence of any request for such instruction by defendant.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 349—Acts of another held admissible to show guilty knowledge of accused.

Where city marshal, with others, was accused of bribery, in which a policeman had a part, testimony that marshal requested such policeman to contradict affidavit previously made, and to leave state to avoid testifying in investigation of bribery charge, was admissible to show guilty knowledge of marshal.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 1172(7)—Accused cannot predicate error on instruction properly limiting effect of incriminating testimony.

Accused, tried with accomplices, cannot predicate error on instructions limiting testimony of his admissions to purpose only of showing his guilty knowledge.

13. Criminal law $\S$ 1172(1)—Fact that instructions were not clear held not reversible error.

That instruction was not entirely clear was not reversible error, where jury was not misled.

14. Criminal law $\S$ 1166 $\frac{1}{2}$ (12)—Court's inadvertent comment on evidence held not reversible error.

That court inadvertently, and without intent to influence jury, commented on evidence, was not reversible error, where he modified or withdrew statements when his attention was called to them, and later admonished jury to disregard any expression of his which seemed to indicate an opinion on weight or sufficiency of evidence.

15. Criminal law $\S$ 622(2)—Separate trial held properly denied, where all evidence did not affect both defendants.

Where attorney was charged jointly with city marshal for bribery, fact that marshal had attempted to suppress evidence, and had used profane language toward prisoner who had paid bribe, could not be considered in determining attorney's guilt, and court committed no error in refusing separate trial; such decision being in his discretion by provision of Pen. Code, § 1098.

16. Criminal law ⇨622(2)—Separate trial held properly refused, where damaging evidence against other defendant could not be considered.

Where attorney was indicted for bribery with another, who had made sworn statement admitting bribery as charged, but against whom the case was dismissed before any testimony had been admitted and where court instructed such instrument could not be used against attorney, denial of his motion for separate trial was not abuse of discretion.

17. Criminal law ⇨655(5)—Differences between court and counsel held not injurious to defendant.

In trial for bribery, in view of considerable feeling between counsel and defendants, that court had frequent differences with defendant's counsel, and had occasion once to make apology to him, and manifested impatience as to amount of time he consumed in presenting case, held not prejudicial to defendant.

18. Criminal law ⇨1023(12)—Order denying motion for arrest of judgment is not appealable.

Order denying motion for arrest of judgment is not appealable.

19. Bribery ⇨11—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for bribery accepted from prisoner.

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for bribery, where money was received from prisoner on agreement to dismiss charge against him.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. The appellants and one Stanley B. Abbott were accused of extortion and bribery. The indictment against them consisted of two counts—the first for extortion, and the other for bribery. After the impaneling of the jury, and before the introduction of any testimony, the court, upon the motion of the district attorney, dismissed the action as to Abbott, and he thereafter testified on behalf of the prosecution. The appellant Anderson was the city marshal of the city of Torrance. He is frequently referred to in the testimony as the chief of police of said city, and at other times as "the chief." Abbott was a policeman of said city, and appellant Morewood was an attorney at law, with his office at the city of Redondo Beach, only a short distance from the city of Torrance. On Saturday evening, at about 6 o'clock, July 24, 1924, Abbott caused the arrest of an automobile party consisting of five men who were motoring through the city of Torrance. These men were J. A. Draffon, E. L. Foster, A. A. Higgins, F. Mangold, and B. F. Frymier. Immediately upon their arrest they were taken to the police station, where charges were made against Draffon of reckless driving and driving a motor vehicle while intoxicated and resisting a public officer. The other four men were charged with attempting to prevent a public officer from performing his duty and with drunkenness. From the police station they were taken to, and confined in, the city jail. The charges of resisting a public officer and of attempting to prevent a public officer from performing his duty preferred against these men grew out of an alleged assault by Draffon upon Abbott, in which it was claimed he was assisted by the other four men, after Abbott had caused them to be "tagged" for reckless driving.

On the following day, Sunday, and while these five men were still in jail, it was suggested to Abbott by Mr. S., a resident of Torrance, who had a casual acquaintance with the arrested men, that, as the men who were under arrest were business men of a neighboring community, they might be willing to pay a reasonable sum of money, either as a fine or otherwise, to secure their release from said charges. The testimony tends to show that Abbott immediately on this suggestion being made to him went to appellant Anderson and informed him of the suggestion made to him by Mr. S., and he suggested to Anderson that the latter see Draffon regarding the matter, but Anderson replied that they would have to have an attorney to handle it for them and suggested that they go to Redondo Beach. On their way to Redondo Beach they discussed the amount of money that the arrested men might be able to raise. Upon arriving at Redondo they endeavored to locate Morewood, but, failing to do so, left word for Morewood to call and see Anderson at Torrance. The next morning Morewood arrived at the police station at Torrance some time before 10 o'clock. He asked for Anderson, and was directed to the latter's home. In a few minutes thereafter Anderson telephoned the police sergeant and directed him to permit

Morewood to see the men in jail. Following the receipt of this telephone message, Morewood returned to the police station and met Frymier, one of the men arrested, who had in the meantime been released on bail. Morewood stated to Frymier that it would be cheaper for the men under arrest to pay a reasonable amount of money than to fight the cases against them, and proposed that for $950 all of the cases could be settled, $150 of this amount to go in payment of a fine to be assessed against Draffon, and the balance of $800 to go to himself, Anderson, Abbott, and others. This proposition was agreed to by Frymier, and it was suggested by Morewood that the cases be continued until 5 o'clock of that evening in order to give the men time in which to raise the money. Accordingly, the cases were continued as agreed. Thereafter Frymier and the other men under arrest raised the sum of $850, which was delivered to Frymier, and a short time before the hour set for the final hearing of the cases, Frymier paid Morewood $750, upon the understanding and agreement that all the cases would be dismissed except the one against Draffon for reckless driving, and that this would be settled by paying a fine not exceeding $150. A few minutes thereafter the cases were again called in court and were all dismissed except the one against Draffon. In this case Draffon pleaded guilty to reckless driving, and was fined $100, which was paid by Frymier. The money was subsequently divided between appellants and Abbott.

Judgment was rendered against appellants in accordance with the verdict of the jury finding each of them guilty of extortion and bribery. The sentence, however, of each appellant, for the crime of extortion was, by said judgment, made to run concurrently with the sentence imposed for the crime of bribery. The appeal is from said judgment, and also from the order of the court denying appellants' motions for a new trial, and for arrest of judgment.

[1] It is first contended by appellants that they are charged with and found guilty of two alleged crimes, purporting to arise out of the same state of facts, the commission of one of which precludes and refutes any possibility of the commission of the other. Appellants insist that "section 954 of the Penal Code precludes the idea of any intent to either indict or try a person jointly for two offenses, where as to one or the other the jury would be in duty bound to acquit." The question as to the legality of an indictment charging two such offenses has been definitely settled in this state adversely to appellants' contention. People v. Piner, 11 Cal. App. 542, 546, 105 P. 780; People v. Shwartz, 43 Cal. App. 696, 185 P. 686; People v. Evanoff, 45 Cal. App. 108, 187 P. 54.

[2] Conceding that appellants have been found guilty of two crimes, arising out of the same state of facts, we question whether the judgment should be reversed on this ground, in view of the fact that the sentences imposed as the punishment for said crimes were made to run concurrently. Extortion is punishable by imprisonment in the state's prison not exceeding five years, and bribery by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years. The maximum punishment, therefore, which appellants might suffer under this judgment, cannot exceed ten years. Had they been found guilty of bribery alone, the term of imprisonment could not have been less than that fixed by the court as punishment for the two crimes. In the case of People v. Sharp, 58 Cal. App. 637, 209 P. 226, the appellant therein had been found guilty of burglary and robbery, and the claim was made that he had been convicted of two crimes arising out of the same state of facts, and the same contention was made in that case as is now made here. The court, however (page 639, 209 P. 267) disposed of the question as follows:

"If it be conceded, for the sake of argument only, that the acts described were so connected together as to amount to but one offense, it may not be said that the judgment was prejudicially erroneous. If the conviction should have been for one offense alone, that conviction might properly have been for the crime of robbery. Under the law, a person convicted of robbery may be sentenced to imprisonment for life. The form of judgment as now authorized to be pronounced under the 'indeterminate sentence law' (it was sufficiently expressed by the judgment herein) is in legal contemplation a judgment for the maximum period authorized by the statute; hence here, had the conviction been for the crime of robbery alone, the sentence imposed would not have been for a less time than that which was fixed."

[3] It is next contended that count 2 of the indictment fails to state a public offense against the appellants. This contention is based upon the definition of bribery as given in section 68 of the Penal Code. By the terms of this section it is provided substantially that every executive officer who asks or receives a bribe upon an agreement that his action upon a matter then pending, or which may be brought before him in his official capacity, shall be influenced thereby, is guilty of bribery. Count 2 of the indictment charges that appellants and Abbott asked and received a bribe upon an agreement that they would refrain from prosecuting and detaining Draffon and his codefendants for the criminal offense of resisting a public officer in the discharge of his duties. It is claimed in this connection by appellant Anderson that the charge against Draffon and others was of a violation of the provisions of section 148 of the Penal Code, that appellant Anderson, as city marshal of the city of Torrance, a municipal corporation of the sixth class, is only charged by law with the prosecution of breaches and violations of the city ordinances of said city, and that it is not his official duty to enforce the penal statutes of this state, or to prosecute persons accused of violating such statutes. This argument of appellants appears to be satisfactorily answered by the case of People v. Lips, 59 Cal. App. 381, 211 P. 22. Lips and one Anderson were deputy sheriffs of the county of Los Angeles and as such officers they arrested J. F. Furay, against whom there was then pending in the state of Texas an indictment. After the arrest of Furay, Lips and Anderson accepted a bribe from him, and in consideration thereof permitted him to escape. It was claimed by Lips that there was no legal duty resting upon him to take Furay into custody, and that, "in the absence of a legal duty, there could be no bribery." The court held that, notwithstanding there might have been no legal duty resting upon the officers to arrest Furay, yet, having made the arrest and accepted a bribe to release him, they were guilty of bribery. The court (page 390, 211 P. 25) quoted with approval from the case of Moseley v. State, 25 Tex. App. 515, 8 S. W. 652. In this latter case the Texas Court of Appeals said:

"It is insisted by counsel for defendant that the arrest and custody of John Gable by the defendant was without authority of law, and that therefore it was no offense for the defendant to accept a bribe to release him. We do not so understand the law. It was by virtue of his official authority that the defendant arrested and held John Gable. It matters not whether the arrest and custody were legal or illegal, the said Gable was a prisoner in the custody of the defendant, a peace officer, and was permitted by the defendant to escape, in consideration of money paid him to effect such escape. We are of the opinion that, in a prosecution for this offense, it is not permissible for the defendant to question the legality of his custody of the prisoner. Such an issue is irrelevant and immaterial. The moral obliquity of this offense is the same where the custody of the prisoner is illegal as where it is legal, and the injury to public justice is the same."

The language of this case is peculiarly applicable to the one before us. The indictment herein charged the arrest of the five men, and the acceptance of a bribe by the officers, upon the agreement of the latter not to detain the men arrested. The legality of the arrest, or the power of the officers to make the arrest, or to thereafter detain the men arrested, is not a matter of controlling importance in cases of this character. It is sufficient if the officers assumed to act under legal authority in arresting and detaining their prisoners, and thereafter accepted a bribe upon the understanding and agreement that they would release them and not further prosecute the charges against them.

[4] Appellant Morewood contends that, as section 68 of the Penal Code only refers to certain officers as being amenable to its provisions, and that as it is neither alleged nor proven that he was an officer of the class mentioned in said section of the Code, nor any officer whatever, he could not be found guilty of bribery as charged in the indictment; therefore the judgment against him cannot stand. It is true that as a private citizen he could not as a principal be guilty of the crime of bribery as defined by the above Code section. But in conjunction with one or more of the officers mentioned in said section of the Code, and as an accomplice of such officer, he could be guilty of the crime as defined by said section 68. Pen. Code, §§ 31 and 971; People v. Bartol, 24 Cal. App. 659, 142 P. 510; People v. Horn, 25 Cal. App. 583, 144 P. 641; Bishop v. State, 118 Ga. 799, 45 S. E. 614.

[5] It is further contended by appellants that the evidence is not sufficient to justify either the verdict of extortion or bribery. As to the verdict finding appellants guilty of extortion, we think appellants' contention must be sustained. The witness Frymier, from whom it is claimed the money was extorted and upon whose testimony the prosecution must rely in support of this charge, testified that Morewood came to him with a proposition or offer that upon payment of a certain sum of money, the charges against all of the five men would be dismissed, with the exception of that against Draffon, and that that could be settled by a payment of a fine. He made no threat to Frymier or to any of the accused men that they would be accused of any crime unless they paid the money. In fact, the evidence shows that they had already been accused of the various crimes enumerated above, and that Morewood's proposition to them was that these charges would be dismissed as against all of them except Draffon. Extortion is defined by section 518 of the Penal Code as the obtaining of property of another with his consent, induced by a wrongful use of force or fear. By section 519 of the same Code it is provided that:

"Fear, such as will constitute extortion, may be induced by a threat, either: * * * 2. To accuse him (the individual threatened), or any relative of his, or member of his family, of any crime."

Count 1 of the indictment sought to charge the crime of extortion as defined by these two sections of the Penal Code. The crime as therein defined is undoubtedly properly and legally charged, but the evidence fails to sustain the charge. We therefore are of the opinion that the judgment, in so far as it is based upon the verdict of the jury finding the appellants guilty of the crime of extortion, is erroneous.

[6-8] As to the verdict finding appellants guilty of bribery, the evidence, in our opinion, is sufficient to support it. Even conceding that both Abbott and Frymier were accomplices, there is ample evidence to be found in the record to meet the requirements of the statute providing that testimony of an accomplice must be corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense before a conviction can be had. There may be some question, however, whether Frymier was an accomplice. The appellants were indicted under section 68 of the Penal Code. By its terms "the asking," as well as "the receiving," of a bribe, is made a crime. The evidence shows that Morewood approached Frymier and proposed that, in consideration of the payment of a certain amount of money to him, the cases against the arrested men would all be disposed of with the payment of a nominal fine. There is no question, according to the testimony of Frymier, that Morewood asked a bribe of him, the money thus secured to go to the appellants and others mentioned by Morewood. This was proof of the crime of bribery, whether any money was thereafter either paid or accepted. The witness Frymier was not an accomplice of Morewood in the commission of the crime of bribery by asking of a bribe. People v. Powell, 50 Cal. App. 436, 443, 195 P. 456.

Numerous objections are made as to the validity of the rulings of the trial court in giving and refusing instructions. One of the instructions, the giving of which appellant strenuously insists is prejudicial error, followed the identical language of an instruction given and approved in the case of People v. Wolff, 182 Cal. 728, 739, 190 P. 22. The giving of this same instruction was later approved in People v. Ramey (Cal. App.) 232 P. 724, and by this court in the late case of People v. Swaar (Cal. App.) 239 P. 412.

[9, 10] The court instructed the jury that a police officer was an executive officer. While appellants do not appear to question the correctness of this instruction, they complain that the giving of such an instruction was error, unless the court further instructed the jury as to the duties of a police officer. No request for such further instruction was made by appellants, and, in the absence of such request, they cannot now complain. And for the same reason the failure of the court to instruct the jury fully as to who of the witnesses testifying in the case were accomplices was not error, in the absence of any request for such instruction by appellants.

[11, 12] The court also gave the following instruction:

"Certain evidence has been received of the acts and declarations of the defendants B. M. Anderson and Stanley Abbott, done and made by them after the alleged commission of the crimes of extortion and bribery. Such evidence was received solely as tending to show guilty knowledge or consciousness of guilt on the part of the defendant B. M. Anderson, and you cannot consider any part of such evidence in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant A. P. Morewood."

It is contended by appellant Anderson that the above instruction does not contain a correct statement of the law upon the subject embraced therein. Appellant Anderson claims, in substance, that the court instructed the jury that they might consider certain acts and declarations of the conspirator Stanley Abbott, made after the termination of the conspiracy, as tending to show guilty knowledge or consciousness of guilt on the part of another of said conspirators, namely, B. M. Anderson. Such a construction might reasonably be drawn if we consider this instruction by itself and without reference to the proceedings shown in the record. A large amount of testimony was admitted, relating to certain transactions occurring between Abbott and Anderson, and after the termination of the conspiracy. These transactions had reference in the main to Abbott, at the request of Anderson, going to the office of the attorney of the latter and there making an affidavit contradicting a previous affidavit made by Abbott, and also to Abbott, at the request and with the assistance of Anderson, leaving the state and remaining absent therefrom for a period of a month or more, in order to avoid testifying before the grand jury while said body was investigating this charge of bribery. Just prior to the admission of this testimony, and at numerous times during its recital, the question arose as to its relevancy and competency. Upon each and all of these occasions the court admonished the jury that such evidence could not be considered by them as against the appellant Morewood, but was competent as tending to show a consciousness of guilt on the part of appellant Anderson. We have no doubt it was to this testimony that the court referred in the above instruction, and we think that this must have been apparent to the jury from the frequent and emphatic admonitions of the court during the trial and while this evidence was being introduced. No injury therefore was sustained by appellant Anderson, and the giving of said instruction was not reversible error.

[13] In our opinion the other instructions given by the court are substantially correct, although the language in some of them is not entirely clear, yet we do not believe that the jury were misled by any of them. Neither did the court err, in our opinion, in refusing any of the instructions offered on behalf of appellants. Neither do we find any error to the prejudice of appellants in any of the rulings of the court in the admission or rejection of evidence.

[14] Appellants have set forth in their brief a number of statements made by the trial judge during the progress of the trial, and it is contended by them that, in these statements, the trial judge commented upon the weight and sufficiency of the evidence to the serious prejudice of appellants' right. It is apparent to us that these remarks and statements of the court, to which appellants have taken exception, were inadvertently made, and without any intention on the part of the court to influence or bias the jury. In most every instance, when the court's attention was called to the objectionable statements, the trial judge either modified its language or withdrew it altogether, and admonished the jury to disregard the same. In addition to this the court instructed the jury as follows:

"You are the sole and exclusive judges of the weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses, and it is your function to determine all questions of fact arising from the evidence in the case. With the facts, the court has nothing to do. I have not expressed, nor intend to express, nor have I intimated or intend to intimate any opinion as to what witnesses are, or are not, worthy of credence, what facts are, or are not, established, or what inferences are to be drawn from the evidence adduced. If any expression of mine has seemed to indicate an opinion relating to any of these matters, such expression must be entirely disregarded by you."

Under these circumstances, we hardly think it probable that the jury were improperly influenced by any of the remarks or statements of the trial judge.

[15, 16] The court did not err in denying appellant Morewood's motion for a separate trial. The affidavit filed in support of said motion sets forth in the main two grounds or reasons why Morewood could not have a fair trial if tried at the same time with Anderson and Abbott. The first of said grounds was that, if tried with Anderson, there would be damaging testimony admitted against Anderson which would be incompetent as to Morewood, but which would inflame the passions of the jury against Morewood and Anderson. This evidence as set out in the affidavit was substantially that Anderson had attempted to suppress certain evidence, and that he had used obscene and profane language towards Draffon and the other men arrested while they were in jail. This evidence could not be considered by the jury in determining Morewood's connection with the alleged crime. It in no way connected Morewood with the charge against him, nor did it relate to him in any manner. We fail to understand, therefore, how it could have prejudiced the jury against him. The second ground relied upon by Morewood on his motion for a separate trial was that he was informed that Abbott had made a sworn statement in which he admitted that he had accepted a bribe as charged in the indictment, and that, if he were tried with Abbott, this written statement would be admissible as against Abbott, and its admission would improperly prejudice the jurors against Morewood. As we have already seen, the case was dismissed as against Abbott before the admission of any testimony. Furthermore, while this written statement was admitted in connection with Abbott's testimony, the court instructed the jury that, having been made after the termination of the conspiracy, it could not be considered by the jury as against the appellant Morewood. The legal presumption is that the jury followed this instruction and disregarded said statement in arriving at its verdict against Morewood. The granting of a motion for a separate trial, made by one defendant jointly charged with others, rests in the discretion of the trial judge (Pen. Code, § 1098), and an order denying such a motion should not be set aside unless it clearly appears that the court abused such discretion. We are of the opinion that the trial court did not abuse this discretion in denying appellant Morewood's motion for a separate trial.

[17] The final contention made by appellant Morewood is that the trial judge erred in making statements in the presence of the jury prejudicial to him. The burden of appellant Morewood's complaint in this respect is that the trial court was so discourteous and disrespectful to his attorney that the latter was prevented from adequately and properly presenting his client's defense. The record shows that the case was on trial for something over two weeks, and that the trial was bitterly contested by all the parties interested therein. Not only was there considerable feeling manifested between the prosecution and the appellants, but the relations between the two appellants were not of the most friendly character. Numerous rulings of the court upon questions arising as to the admission and rejection of testimony were adverse to the contention of appellant Morewood. Frequent colloquies were had between the trial judge and the attorney for said appellant. In some of these verbal engagements more or less feeling was displayed on the part of each party thereto. It is not unusual in trials of this character for the trial judge, on account of the great stress under which he is laboring, to transgress the strict rules that circumscribe his actions. Evidently in this case the trial judge on at least one occasion went beyond what he himself considered the proper limits of correct conduct. In due time, realizing his error, he made an open and frank apology to counsel, in the presence of the jury and of all others in attendance on the court. He manifested some impatience toward counsel as to the amount of time the latter was consuming in the presentation of his case, but we find no instance in which he invaded any of appellant's rights by insisting that the trial proceed with greater rapidity. Our attention has not been called to any single instance in which the court committed any grave error, either in any remark to, or in the treatment of, said counsel. But appellant Morewood claims that, taking all of the remarks made by the court to counsel and the treatment of counsel by the court as a whole, it so prejudiced counsel in the minds of the jury that he was unable to properly present his client's defense. We do not think this conclusion can be drawn from the facts disclosed by the record. While the trial court on numerous occasions ruled against the contentions of said counsel, and upon others admonished counsel to expedite the trial, and on still others expressed its inability to agree with the position assumed by counsel on different questions arising during the trial, yet we find nothing in any of these acts of the court which tended to show any discourtesy or disrespect on the part of the court toward counsel. It appears to us, after a close study of the record, that it was not the desire or intention of the court to deprive said appellant of any of his legal rights or to place his counsel in any unfavorable light before the jury. We have already referred to the occasion when the court, feeling that it had done an injustice to said counsel, apologized to him in open court. On another occasion, at the close of a court session, during which some words had passed between the trial judge and said counsel, the court voluntarily said:

"Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, I just have one matter that I want to say to you in regard to some of the exceptions taken by Mr. Fletcher to the remarks of the court. I don't want it to be understood in any manner or degree that I am charging Mr. Fletcher with any unfairness whatsoever. I may disagree with him as to the materiality as to some of the things that he is doing, but under no circumstances are you to infer that I am charging Mr. Fletcher with unfairness or to desire to do anything other than what he believes to be proper under his duty to his client."

At its conclusion, counsel thanked the court for making this statement. There were other occasions when the court showed its complete willingness to correct any error that it might have made in its rulings or in its remarks, and to remove any erroneous impression that the jury might have gained by any words spoken or acts done by it. The demeanor of the trial judge towards the counsel in question, taken as a whole, while it may not be entirely free from criticism, we think evinces a sincere desire and clear intent on the part of the court to accord to counsel all the rights and privileges due him as an officer of the court in the discharge of his duty towards his client. We are satisfied that the record does not disclose that any injury was sustained by appellant Morewood on account of the treatment accorded to his counsel by the trial judge.

[18] The appeals from the order denying appellants' motions for arrest of judgment are dismissed, as said order is not appealable.

[19] We have heretofore stated that in our opinion the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict finding appellants guilty of extortion. As to the charge of bribery, not only is the evidence sufficient to support the verdict, but there appears to be no error in the record that would justify a reversal of the judgment based upon said verdict finding appellants guilty of the crime of bribery. Therefore the judgment, in so far as it relates to the crime of extortion, is reversed, but in all other respects it is affirmed. The order denying the respective motions of appellants for a new trial upon the charge of extortion is reversed, but said order denying said motions for a new trial upon the crime of bribery is affirmed.

GRISSE v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. Dec. 1, 1925. Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1925.)

1. Physicians and surgeons $\S$ 11(3)—Certiorari proper remedy to review order revoking license; appeal statute being unconstitutional.

Provision of Medical Practice Act, $\S$ 14, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1012, for appeal from order of board of medical examiners revoking physician's license to superior court of county in which made, is unconstitutional, and certiorari or writ of review is the proper remedy.

2. Physicians and surgeons $\S$ 11(3)—Extent of review of order of board of medical examiners revoking license stated.

On application for writ of review of order of board of medical examiners revoking physician's license, court need only determine whether board acted according to provisions of Medical Practice Act, $\S$ 14, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1012, and had jurisdiction over petitioner and whether hearing was had and evidence supporting charge adduced thereat.

3. Physicians and surgeons $\S$ 11(2)—Revocation of license of physician, filing certificate as owner of cancer institute, authorized.

Physician's filing of certificate, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 2466, stating that he was sole owner of "Bohannon Cancer Institute" and was doing business under that name, held violation of Medical Practice Act, $\S$ 14, subd. 8, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1012, so as to authorize revocation of license for unprofessional conduct.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Petition by Davis Grisso for certiorari to review an order of the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California revoking petitioner's license as physician. From a judgment for defendant on order sustaining a demurrer to his petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Hilton & Christensen, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. B. Bianchi, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant, entered upon an order sustaining a general and special demurrer to an amended petition for writ of review.

The petition sets forth that Davis Grisso was a duly licensed and practicing physician and surgeon in the state of California; that a complaint was duly and regularly filed against him by the state board of medical examiners charging him with unprofessional conduct under section 14 of the Medical Practice Act, subdivision 8 thereof (St. 1913, p. 732, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1012); that he filed an answer thereto, and a partial hearing was had in July, 1923, at the city and county of San Francisco, Cal.; that the matter was continued to a subsequent meeting of the Board at Sacramento, Cal., in the month of October, 1923, when and where the hearing was concluded. Dr. Grisso was found guilty as charged, and his license was revoked. A transcript of the evidence produced before the board was appended to the petition for the writ of review, which petition was filed in the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

Defendant filed a demurrer to the petition upon the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the court had no jurisdiction over the parties or the subject-matter and other grounds which need not concern us here. The order sustaining the demurrer was general.

[1] Appellant attacks the ruling upon demurrer as though it were an order upon a special demurrer interposed merely upon the ground that the petition was filed in the wrong forum. As we have stated, that was not the sole ground of demurrer, but, as it was one of the grounds, we shall consider it first. Section 14 of the state Medical Practice Act, as amended, provides:

"* * * That the holder of any certificate which has been revoked or suspended by the board of medical examiners, may within twenty days after receiving notice of said revocation or suspension of his said license, appeal to the superior court of the state of California in the county or city and county in which such suspension or revocation was made by the board of medical examiners. Upon such appeal being taken by such person whose license has been revoked or suspended by the board of medical examiners in accordance with the provisions of this act, the said superior court shall have full power to review all of the proceedings and testimony taken in said hearing before the board of medical examiners, and to inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence upon which such suspension or revocation was made. * * *

Respondent contends that, as the license was revoked in Sacramento, Cal., petitioner's only remedy is an appeal to the superior court there because of the foregoing provision of the state Medical Practice Act. Appellant takes the position that such provision is unconstitutional and void, and he may ignore it and proceed in certiorari. The case of Millsap v. Alderson, 63 Cal. App. 518, 532, 219 P. 469, settles that controversy in favor of appellant. The provision for appeal contained in the state Medical Practice Act is unconstitutional, and certiorari or writ of review is the proper remedy. Had the demurrer raised that question alone it should have been overruled.

[2] We come next to the question presented by the demurrer for want of sufficient facts to warrant the granting of the relief asked.

Section 14 of the state Medical Practice Act as amended makes provision for the revocation by the Board of Medical Examiners of licenses to practice medicine, outlines the procedure upon such revocation and sets forth the causes for revocation. The facts hereinbefore recited and appearing in the petition for writ of review indicate that the board acted according to the provisions of said act, and that the petitioner was regularly brought before the board for trial. He was a physician and surgeon, licensed by the board, and over whom it had jurisdiction. A hearing was had, and evidence supporting the charge was adduced at said hearing. Upon the application for a writ of review the inquiry of the court need go no further; its powers are limited. The case of Jordan v. Alderson, 48 Cal. App. 547, 192 P. 170, is pertinent upon the function of the court in such a proceeding. Therein it was said:

"The proceedings before the board were taken under the provisions of the Medical Practice Act. * * * The complaint charged the petitioner with unprofessional conduct. * * * Appellant contends that the record of the proceedings had and taken before the board shows such an absence of proper evidence as to amount to lack of jurisdiction in the board to make the order under review. It will serve no useful purpose to again state the powers of the court upon certiorari, particularly with reference to the action of the board of medical examiners in revoking a physician's license for unprofessional conduct in procuring an abortion. This subject has been fully discussed in several recent decisions. Thrasher v. Board of Medical Examiners, 44 Cal. App. 26 [185 P. 1006]; Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472 [172 P. 625], expressly approved in Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247 [187 P. 935]; Anderson v. Board of

[3] The petition for the writ alleges that the section of the state Medical Practice Act under which petitioner's license was revoked is unconstitutional; but the power of the Board under this section has been repeatedly upheld in this state as evidenced by the cases cited herein. Petitioner also asserts that his action in filing with the county clerk of the county of Alameda, Cal., a certificate provided for by section 2466, Civil Code of California, stating that he was the sole owner of "Bohannon Cancer Institute," and was doing business under that name, did not constitute a violation of the state Medical Practice Act. A similar contention was made in Berry v. Alderson, 59 Cal. App. 729, 211 P. 836, but the court sustained the action of the board in revoking the license.

There seems to be no merit in the petition for the writ, and the general demurrer was properly sustained upon this theory.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZENOS v. BRITTEN-COOK LAND & LIVE STOCK CO. et al. (Civ. 5241.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 24, 1925.)

1. Pleading ⚡122—Defendant must answer positively when facts alleged in complaint presumably within his knowledge.

When facts alleged in a verified complaint are presumably within knowledge of defendant, he must answer positively, and the answer on information and belief should be treated as an evasion and admission of facts alleged in complaint.

2. Pleading ⚡122—Corporation's answer, denying on information and belief facts, alleged sham and frivolous, where facts presumably within knowledge of corporation.

Answer, in suit against corporation to foreclose mortgage, executed by its officers, denying for lack of information and belief execution or authority to execute, was sham and frivolous; facts being presumably within knowledge of corporation by reason of availability of its books and files.

3. Corporations ⚡432(5)—Burden of proof on corporation to show lack of authority of its officers to execute mortgage.

In suit against corporation to foreclose mortgage executed by corporate officers, where in corporation denied authority of officers to execute mortgage, burden of proof of want of such authorization was on corporation.

4. Corporations ⚡1—Separate entities disregarded to prevent fraud when corporation mere instrument of owner of all capital stock.

Where owner of all corporate capital stock uses corporation merely as an instrument through which he transacts his business, separate entities will be disregarded when necessary to prevent fraud and protect rights of third persons.

5. Corporations ⚡425(5)—Corporation bound by acts of officers knowingly permitted for long period.

When a corporation knowingly suffers officers for long time to have actual management of business, and to so act as to lead third persons to believe that they are acting under proper authority, it becomes bound by their acts in its name.

6. Corporations ⚡426(10)—Corporation held bound by mortgage executed by officers, where benefits therefrom retained with full knowledge.

Where corporation held out its secretary and president as duly authorized to contract for it, and, with full knowledge of circumstances, accepted benefits and retained possession of land purchased by them for which officers executed mortgage, corporation held bound by such mortgage.

7. Estoppel ⚡52—Legal effect of "ratification" and "estoppel" same.

Generally speaking, "ratification" applies to a formal declaration of the approval of another's act, whereas "estoppel" is where the party is bound by his own act, but the legal effect is the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estoppel; Ratification.]

8. Corporations ⚡482(4) Plaintiff, suing to foreclose mortgage on defense of want of execution being interposed, could show estoppel, without further pleading.

Plaintiff, in suit to foreclose corporate mortgage, was required to make out a prima facie case, and, on defense of want of execution being interposed, plaintiff could show acts constituting an estoppel, without further pleading.

9. Corporations ⚡426(10)—Corporation, knowingly accepting benefits, held conclusively presumed estopped from denying authority of officers to execute mortgage.

Where purchase-money mortgage executed by president and secretary of corporation represented that they were duly authorized, and corporation knowingly accepted benefits, retained land, and paid interest, corporation, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, is conclusively presumed to be estopped from denying authority of officers.

10. Trial ⚡395(7)—Judgment conclusion of law in favor of respondent.

A judgment itself is a conclusion of law in favor of respondent.

11. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1071(6)—Failure to make more complete findings does not require reversal, where any further findings must have been favorable to respondent.

Where, taking judgment with facts found, it is evident that any further facts or conclusions of law must have been favorable to respondent, failure to make more complete findings of fact or conclusions of law does not require reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action to foreclose mortgage by John Zenos against the Britten-Cook Land & Live Stock Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George E. Brannan and Lee Walker, both of Chicago, Ill., and Leo B. Ward, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. S. Larew and D. B. Roberts, both of El Centro, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to foreclose a mortgage for $5,000 on certain land located in the county of Imperial. The cause was tried before the court and resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals upon a record prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The facts of the case are that on July 1, 1917, the note and mortgage in suit were executed under seal by Britten and Cook, the president and secretary, respectively, of defendant corporation, in the city of Chicago, where the defendant corporation had its principal place of business. The mortgage was acknowledged before a notary public in the city of Chicago by said officers on July 27, 1917. At the same time and as a part of the same transaction the plaintiff sold and conveyed to the defendant corporation the land described in the mortgage, the note was given as part payment of the purchase price thereof, and the mortgage was given to secure the same. This deed of conveyance was duly recorded and transmitted to the defendant corporation in the city of Chicago. When these documents were executed by the president and secretary of the corporation, these officers constituted a majority of its board of directors and owned 7,000 of the 7,500 shares of the stock of the corporation; this being the full number of shares which had been issued and held by stockholders of the corporation at the time. The remaining 500 shares of the issued capital stock were held by one Kilgour, who was an employee of the corporation in the capacity of a sales agent. Prior to the execution of the note and mortgage these three directors, in meeting assembled, formally approved a written contract with O. E. Cook as general manager of the corporation. This contract, among other things, authorized Cook, who was also the secretary of the corporation, and the one who executed the mortgage in suit:

To supervise the purchase of all land and "to generally supervise all of the activities of the company and to have full charge of all of the details with full power to act on the premises in any manner which in his judgment may be to the best interests of the company, with the exception that all checks shall be drawn in the regular way, and all documents under seal shall be executed in the regular way."

The corporate seal which was impressed upon the document was the official seal of the corporation which had been duly adopted at the first meeting of the board of directors. The land in question was a single tract of 164 acres, the total purchase price of which was $27,000. The defendant corporation paid a portion of the purchase price in cash, assumed an obligation in the sum of $9,500, which was secured by a mortgage on a portion of the tract, and executed a second mortgage to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, which the defendant subsequently paid. Interest on the note in suit was paid by the defendant totaling $615.86, the last payment of which was on the 1st of October, 1919. It further appears that the defendant corporation was engaged in the business of raising hogs for the market and that soon after the conveyance of the land involved herein the defendant, under the direction of its secretary and general manager, commenced to improve and develop the land and to devote it to the purposes of the corporation's business. On numerous occasions after this conveyance and prior to the commencement of this action the directors of the corporation were sent from the Chicago office to Imperial county to inspect the land and properties of the corporation, and on all occasions expressed their approval of the acts of its secretary and general manager, and in some instances carried the expressions of approval into formal resolutions adopted by both the board of directors and by the stockholders in meeting assembled. Prior to the commencement of the action the corporation suffered financial difficulties. A reorganization was had, and the new organization, though not rescinding the transaction or offering to reconvey the property to the plaintiff, repudiated the obligation on the ground that it had not been executed under special authorization of its board of directors.

[1, 2] On this appeal the appellant urges that the judgment must be reversed, because the evidence fails to support the finding of due execution of the mortgage, and because, the trial court not having specifically found on the issues of ratification or estoppel, the respondent cannot avail himself of that answer to the appellant's defense of want of authority to execute the mortgage. The issue of due execution of the mortgage was not properly brought before the trial court. The complaint is in the usual form of a suit to foreclose a mortgage. The execution of the prom-issory note and of the mortgage to secure its payment was specifically pleaded. The answer did not directly deny any of the material allegations of the complaint. The defendant denied on information and belief only that the corporation executed either the note or the mortgage and denied on information and belief, also, that the corporation had authorized the execution of either the note or the mortgage by resolution of its board of directors or otherwise, or that the corporation had ratified the execution or delivery thereof.

These denials were followed by the pleading that the defendant corporation was informed and believed and upon such information and belief alleged that no interest had been paid by the defendant corporation upon the alleged indebtedness. The answer is plainly sham and frivolous. All the facts alleged in the complaint, and which were denied for lack of information and belief, were facts which were presumably within the knowledge of the corporation, and required a positive denial in the answer. The books and files of the corporation were all available to the pleader, and it had every opportunity to ascertain the truth of the facts alleged in the complaint prior to the filing of the answer, or, at least, in time to enable it to file an amended answer before the trial of the cause, which was held more than one year after the original answer was filed. When the facts alleged in a verified complaint are presumptively within the knowledge of the defendant, he must answer positively, and an answer upon information and belief only should be treated as an evasion and an admission of the facts alleged in the complaint. Curtis v. Richards & Vantine, 9 Cal. 33, 38; San Francisco Gas Co. v. City of San Francisco, 9 Cal. 453, 466; Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 300, 15 P. 844; Zany v. Rawhide Gold Mining Co., 15 Cal. App. 373, 376, 114 P. 1026. In view of the rule of the cases cited, the answer should have been treated as sham and evasive, and the respondent was entitled to judgment upon the completion of a prima facie case. The character of the pleadings was such, therefore, as to sustain the finding of due execution of both the note and the mortgage.

[3, 4] But notwithstanding the defective pleadings, the parties went to trial, and the appellant endeavored to prove that the note and mortgage were not properly authorized. In this respect its proof was on a line with its pleading. Though it had every opportunity to produce evidence in support of its pleading, it rested upon the testimony of witnesses, who were able to testify merely that they had no information or knowledge upon the subject-matter of their testimony. The appellant also offered in evidence portions of the minutes of the meetings of its board of directors and of its stockholders, from which it is argued that the authority to execute this particular note and mortgage does not appear. The burden of proof of want of authorization was, of course, upon the appellant. Patterson v. Robinson, 116 N. Y. 193, 200, 22 N. E. 372. The portion of the minutes which was offered in evidence discloses some of the transactions of the corporation, and does, as claimed by appellant, fail to mention the note and mortgage in suit. Because of this fact the appellant argues that the case is controlled by Blood v. La Serena Land & Water Co., 113 Cal. 222, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252, and Bliss v. Kaweah Canal & Irrigation Co., 65 Cal. 502, 4 P. 507. The Bliss Case rested upon the definite finding that no resolution, either general or specific, had been passed authorizing the president of the corporation to execute the document in question, and, in fact, no authority had been given him to affix the corporate seal to any document executed in the name of the corporation. The Blood Case was determined upon the admitted facts that the documents in question were executed solely upon the pretended authority conferred by the stockholders of the corporation at its first meeting prior to the organization of its board of directors. In that case there was no act of the board of directors pretending to confer either general or specific authority for the execution of the documents. It was held in each case that the instrument was not duly executed by the corporation; authority therefore not having been given in writing as required by section 2309 of the Civil Code.

In the case before us two circumstances are present which did not arise in the California cases cited. First, it appears that the president and secretary of the corporation who executed the note and mortgage were the owners of the corporation and used it merely as their alter ego in the transaction of their business. Second, the board of directors of the corporation entered into a contract in writing with the secretary of the corporation, whereby he was employed to act as the corporation's general manager, and wherein he was given blanket authority to do anything and everything which in his judgment might be to the best interests of the company with full power to act on the part of the corporation for that purpose.

In regard to the relation of Cook and Britten to the corporation, it appears that they held 7,000 shares out of the 7,500 of the capital stock of the corporation issued at the time of the execution of the documents. The remaining 500 shares were held by one of their employees, who was designated as a sales agent. The corporation was engaged in the business of raising hogs on ranches acquired by Cook and Britten in the county of Imperial. All these properties had been acquired and all the business of stocking them had been conducted by Cook and Britten in the name of the corporation without any specific authorization from the board of directors other than that noted. The board then consisted of three directors, Cook, Britten, and their sales agent. Where an individual is the owner of all the corporate capital stock and uses the corporation merely as an instrumentality through which he transacts his business, the separate entities will be disregarded when necessary to prevent fraud and to protect the rights of third persons. Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 487, 202 P. 673; Wenban Estate, Inc., v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, 696, 227 P. 723, 731. In the last case the Supreme Court say:

That when such a situation exists "equity, looking to the substance rather than the form of the relation, and the law as well, will hold such corporation obligated for the acts of the sole owner of the corporation to the same extent and just as he would be bound in the absence of the existence of the corporation."

Though the cases cited related to a situation where but one individual used the corporate name in the manner suggested, the principle is the same when two own the stock and act in conjunction in the name of the corporation. The McCormick-Saeltzer Co. v. Grizzly Creek Lumber Co. (Cal. App.) 240 P. 32.

[5, 6] In relation to the authority under which Cook and Britten acted in executing the note and mortgage, it appears that by the by-laws of the corporation they had been authorized to execute all documents under seal and that Cook had been expressly employed as the general manager of the corporation with full power to act. On this phase of the case the rule applicable is that stated in Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) vol. 3, § 716; McCartney v. Clover Valley Land & Stock Co., 232 F. 697, 702, 146 C. C. A. 623, 1 A. L. R. 1127; Aigeltinger, Inc., v. Burke, 176 Cal. 621, 626, 169 P. 373, and cases there cited, which is that when a corporation suffers its officers to have actual charge and management of the business of the corporation and to so act as to lead those having dealings with the corporation to believe that they are acting under proper authority of the corporation, and this conduct continues for a long period of time with the full knowledge and consent of the corporation, it thereupon becomes bound by the acts of its officers done under its name. Here the evidence is that the corporation did not only give to Cook plenary power to do everything which he believed to be essential for the benefit of the corporation, but held out both Cook and Britten as its duly authorized agents to contract for it, and with full knowledge of the circumstances accepted all the benefits of their actions, received and retained possession of the lands which they had purchased in the name of the corporation, and on numerous occasions in both stockholders' meetings and meetings of the board of directors approved the things done for its benefit by these officers.

pellant is that inasmuch as the trial court did not expressly find on the issue of ratification or estoppel those issues are not involved on this appeal. It is not necessary to enter into a discussion of the difference between the doctrines of ratification and estoppel as used in cases of this kind. Generally speaking, ratification applies to a formal declaration of approval of the act of another by the party sought to be bound, whereas estoppel is where a party is bound by his own act, but, as said in Curtin v. Salmon River, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 308, 312, 74 P. 851, 99 Am. St. Rep. 75, the legal effect is the same, and it can matter little by what name it be called. Neither ratification nor estoppel was expressly pleaded in the complaint and, of course, it was not necessary to do so. The suit was one to foreclose a mortgage, and the respondent was required to make out a prima facie case. When the defense of want of execution was interposed, he could then show acts constituting an estoppel without further pleading. Blood v. La Serena Land & Water Co., 113 Cal. 221, 229, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252. The defense of estoppel in pais is a mixed question of law and fact. 10 R. C. L. § 151, p. 845. The trial court found that the corporation, by and through its president and secretary, executed the mortgage under its corporate seal on July 1, 1917, paid the interest thereon up to the 1st day of October, 1919, and that the note was given in part payment of the purchase price upon the land upon which the mortgage was a lien, and that the conveyance thereof to the corporation was a part of the same transaction. If the trial court had drawn from these facts the conclusion that the corporation was thereby estopped from denying the note and mortgage, there would have been an end to the argument. It is because the trial court did not draw this conclusion that the appellant now insists that the respondent may not rely upon the doctrine of estoppel. All the evidence shows without conflict the facts from which an estoppel should arise. The original representations in the mortgage itself that the president and secretary were duly authorized to execute it, the knowledge on the part of the corporation of the execution of the mortgage and that it was to secure part payment for the land which the corporation held, the payment of the semiannual interest thereon for a period of some two years, the retention of the benefits of the transactions over a period of three years before the suit to foreclose was commenced, the failure of the corporation either before or after the commencement of the action to restore the consideration or to do equity in the premises, and the detriment which the respondent would suffer if the appellant should prevail, would have required a conclusion on the part of the trial court that the appellant was thereby estopped from denying the due execution of the mortgage. These facts, which are all undisputed, bring the case within the provisions of subdivision 3, § 1962, Code of Civil Procedure, and, by reason of that section, the conclusive presumption follows that the appellant is estopped from denying its act. The judgment itself is a conclusion of law in favor of the respondent. Taking the judgment with the facts which the court found to be true, it is evident that if any further facts or conclusions of law had been made they too must have been favorable to the respondent. Such being the case, the failure to make more complete findings of fact or conclusions of law does not call for a reversal of the judgment. Rea v. Haffenden, 116 Cal. 596, 600, 48 P. 716; Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 572, 217 P. 750.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action for an accounting by Ida A. Morgan Clark against Homer C. Millsap and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson and F. E. Davis, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bradner W. Lee, Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This is an action in accounting. Defendant and appellant Homer C. Millsap, an attorney admitted to practice law in the courts of this state, was employed in April, 1913, by Mrs. Ida A. Morgan, since married to Charles W. Clark, plaintiff and respondent herein, to act as her attorney and counsellor at law and represent her in certain legal matters then pending or about to be commenced in the courts of this state, both against her and in her behalf. It is alleged, and was found by the court to be true: That at various times between April, 1913, and the 1st day of January, 1922, respondent, without the aid of any independent advice whatsoever in the premises, and relying solely upon appellant as a counsellor at law in good faith to advise and direct her in all matters of a legal or equitable nature that should arise in the course of his employment as such attorney and counsellor, did, upon the advice, counsel, and solicitation of appellant, as her said attorney, assign, transfer, and set over to him to be by him held for her benefit pending a threatened contingency long since passed, and then to be returned to her, certain real and personal property of great value, consisting of two parcels of land situate in the province of Manitoba, Canada, 500 shares of the capital stock of the Chamber of Commerce Safety Vault Company of Chicago, of the value of $150 per share, aggregating $75,000, and three lots of real property situate in the city of Pasadena, this state. Certain mining properties known as the Peris group of quartz mining claims and the Desert Queen mining claim, located in the county of San Bernardino, this state, and owned by Mrs. Morgan, seem not to have been conveyed, but were turned over to the control and management of appellant. That the said defendants and appellants Millsap and his wife, Bernice Williams Millsap, into whose hands also a portion of said properties came, have failed and refused to return any of the said properties or the proceeds therefrom, except certain relatively small specified sums, all of which was in violation of the trust and confidence which respondent reposed in appellant as her counsellor and attorney at law. The complaint sets forth a general plan and scheme adopted by appellant Homer C. Millsap, who was later aided and abetted therein by his wife, Bernice Williams Millsap, by which the said Homer C. Millsap would come into the possession and control of the entire estate of the respondent, and thereupon appropriate to the use of himself and his wife practically said entire estate. A prayer for general relief is added to the petition for an accounting.

The outstanding facts of the controversy are as follows: William Morgan, the first husband of respondent, died January 12, 1912. Appellant's employment by Mrs. Morgan began in April, 1913. Practically all of the properties which form the basis of the judgment in this action, from which this appeal is prosecuted by appellant, came to her by the decree of distribution in the estate of her deceased husband, William Morgan, entered on the 4th day of May, 1914. It was during her earlier period of widowhood that she surrendered herself to the domination of her attorney. The transactions into which she was led show very clearly that she was a woman without previous business experience.

While visiting at her mining properties located in San Bernardino county, respondent became involved in an alleged blackmail plot, the sequel of which was that one Mrs. Budd brought an action against her for the alienation of her husband's affections. The employment of the appellant to defend her against this action was the beginning of the relationship of attorney and client out of which the present action arose. The trial resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Mrs. Budd, against Mrs. Ida A. Morgan, the defendant, in that action and respondent in the instant case, in the sum of $15,000. The judgment was thereafter reversed. Budd v. Morgan, 187 Cal. 741, 203 P. 754. Appellant Homer C. Millsap, as her attorney and counsellor in said action, advised her that the only method by which her property could be made secure against a forced sale upon execution, and thereby defeat any judgment that might be obtained against her, was for him to organize a "holding corporation," and upon its organization she should at once transfer and convey all of her property and tangible assets to said corporation. This project having been consented to, he thereupon organized such a corporation for the admitted purpose of defeating the court's order and processes. The court found, however, that the real reason that moved Mr. Millsap to form the corporation was to gain for himself control and possession of respondent's estate that he might appropriate it to his own use and benefit. The corporation thus formed as a "holding corporation" was styled the M. M. Investment Company. It took over practically the entire estate of Mrs. Morgan. Much of the real property and the larger portion of the securities were converted into cash and taken possession of by Millsap. The original incorporators were Leroy Millsap, a brother of appellant, E. D. Forbes, and appellant H. C. Millsap, all of whom were present at the first meeting of the incorporators, held June 27, 1914, and were elected president, vice president, and secretary, respectively. They also constituted the entire list of the original stockholders. Leroy Millsap was succeeded as president by P. C. Lynch. Forbes shortly withdrew as a director and vice president, and Mrs. Morgan became a director, and was made vice president and treasurer. On the 29th of June, 1914, one of the two shares of stock formerly held by Forbes was transferred to Lynch, and the other share was transferred to H. C. Millsap, and 94 shares were issued to Mrs. Morgan. On the following day 53 of Mrs. Morgan's 94 shares were transferred to Leslie Willis Whitlow, a minor, who was Mrs. Morgan's nephew. No shares of stock were ever delivered to him. Indeed, if any deliveries were actually made to the purported owners of stock, such deliveries were made as a ruse and in furtherance of the general fraudulent plan. On July 21, 1914, one of H. C. Millsap's shares of stock was transferred by him to his stenographer and law clerk, Miss Georgia Elster. On September 8, 1914, 25 of the 41 shares of stock remaining in the name of plaintiff were transferred to H. C. Millsap, and 15 shares were transferred to Whitlow. The foregoing brief entries exhaust the information furnished by the stock certificate book. Stubs of certificates have been torn from the stock book and one certificate was not issued. The last certificate to be issued was No. 16. Important records of the corporation were lost or destroyed, if actually made. The capital stock of the corporation was 100 shares of the par value of $100 per share. Speaking to the purpose of the corporation's existence, Mr. Millsap at the trial said:

"The whole proposition as I have explained—to cover up; that was their desire; and that was the only way I knew how to do it."

Again he testified:

"As I have explained before, and as I understand, this whole arrangement from the very inception of the thing, it was to defeat these people, if possible. It seems to me, from the facts in the case, that any reasonable justifiable means on earth of defeating those people should be pursued. Mrs. Morgan, of course, gave Mr. Lynch her power of attorney. I had no thought in the matter, other than to accomplish what we were all trying to do. Our theory was to defeat the litigation. Mr. Lynch said that we had started this thing, and in his notion the proper thing to do was to send to Mrs. Morgan from time to time such money as would be sufficient to carry her along, and that, upon the termination of the litigation, then we would settle the whole thing up."

He testified to the fact, which was amply established by the testimony of other witnesses, that—

"All the money we received was money received from the property which Mrs. Morgan transferred to the corporation."

He also stated that no dividends had ever been declared by the corporation. In speaking further as to the purpose to be served by the formation of the corporation, he said:

"Now, Leslie Whitlow, was a young man, a nephew, and I didn't really pay any particular attention to Mr. Whitlow, because I felt that Mr. Whitlow was cognizant of what was going on. In fact, he had nothing to do with it, as I rather looked at it. Now, as I have explained before, that was the position that we took at the inception, and I had always understood that Mrs. Morgan in reality—I felt in reality that, whenever the time came that Mrs. Morgan could procure a transfer of the stock, whatever the assets of the corporation were would go to Mrs. Morgan."

"The Court: Q. That is what I am getting at. Was not the whole theory of the transaction, then, that this was Mrs. Morgan's property that was transferred to the corporation for the purpose of holding the property, that being for the purpose of defeating possible judgment creditors of Mrs. Morgan, and that, when the danger was over by reason of lapse of time, or by reason of successful art, of the litigation as far as Mrs. Morgan was concerned, that property would be turned back to her; in the meanwhile she was paid the proceeds and given sums of money from time to time? Wasn't that the whole transaction? A. That is the ultimate effect I expected to accomplish, but here is the situation. * * *

The appellant at this point digressed from the question to make the claim that the stock of the corporation and its assets belonged to its stockholders and not to Mrs. Morgan, as she had transferred her stock to Whitlow, retaining but one share, and that her interest in the corporation was limited to one share.

Repeatedly throughout his testimony appellant admitted that the only property owned at any time by the corporation was property transferred to it by Mrs. Morgan and that no one else at any time had contributed or paid a dollar thereto for the purchase price of stock issued to the said several stockholders. Neither is it claimed that any one performed services for the corporation. Miss Elster, formerly Millsap's stenographer, described the purposes of the corporation in these words:

"The M. M. Investment Company was a closed corporation, organized and incorporated under the laws of the state of California, to which all of the property of Ida A. Morgan, or all of the property of Ida A. Morgan then in the United States, was transferred. The real purpose of the formation of this corporation was to avoid the payment of any judgment which might be obtained in California against Mrs. Morgan. * * * The whole thing was planned, cut, and dried. * * * From my knowledge gained in the office and from some conversations in the office, I saw that the purpose of the formation of the company was to avoid payment of any judgment which might be obtained in the case of Budd v. Morgan."

The fraudulent purpose of the corporation being admitted, it is not necessary to devote more time to that subject. Its office was at Mr. Millsap's law office, where the books and documents were supposedly kept, unless removed elsewhere for convenient purposes, and there seem to be but few records of any important proceedings which bear the stamp of verity. Records and correspondence that might be of value to the respondent and which doubtless bore a "telltale" aspect were destroyed. Respondent had been advised to destroy all letters and writings of every kind which would tend to throw any light upon her transactions with the corporation or her attorney, Millsap. Bernice Williams Millsap, codefendant and wife of Homer C. Millsap, prior to her marriage and a short time thereafter was stenographer and confidential secretary of said Homer C. Millsap, and latterly handled the respondent's funds and mingled them with her own funds and with those of her husband, as found by the court. On February 28, 1920, the corporate powers, rights, and privileges of the M. M. Investment Company were suspended for failure to pay the corporation tax required by the laws of this state. On July 18, 1920, said tax having been paid, said corporation was restored to its former corporate powers, rights, and privileges.

On March 5, 1921, said corporation's powers, rights, and privileges were again suspended for a failure to pay the corporation tax, and it has since stood suspended and incapable of exercising corporate powers.

The amended complaint states four causes of action. The first cause of action joins H. C. Millsap, said suspended corporation, and Bernice Williams Millsap, and alleges the misappropriation by them and each of them of moneys and property belonging to the plaintiff in the sum of $60,232.57. By the second cause of action it is alleged that in May, 1913, plaintiff, Mrs. Morgan, employed said Homer C. Millsap as her attorney to defend her in the suit of Budd v. Morgan, supra, for which it was agreed by her and said Millsap that he should receive in full for all services performed by him the sum of $7,500, said Millsap to pay all costs and expenses of every kind and character that might arise out of said action; that in May, 1914, she paid him said sum of $7,500 for the purposes above stated; that she was compelled thereafter to pay costs and counsel fees arising out of said action, aggregating $1,951.30, which Millsap had agreed to pay, and which it was his duty under said contract to pay, but that he has since refused and failed to pay said sum or any part thereof, wherefore she asks to be reimbursed for said payments made by her on account of Millsap's failure and refusal to keep his contract. The third cause of action sets out circumstances antedating and attending the making of a promissory note by respondent in favor of H. C. Millsap in the sum of $20,000 while she was in hiding at Vancouver, British Columbia, where she had been advised by Millsap to go and remain under a fictitious name to avoid being served with any kind of legal process. The note, which purported upon its face to have been executed at Los Angeles, Cal., under date of June 30, 1914, was in fact signed at Vancouver, British Columbia, on December 25, 1914. It had been prepared by Millsap at Los Angeles and dispatched to Vancouver by special messenger, Miss Georgia Elster, Millsap's stenographer, who was directed to explain to the plaintiff, Mrs. Morgan, that her signature did not "mean anything" as to her and she would be held harmless, but her signature thereto was necessary to the execution of the general plan and scheme that he was evolving for her benefit and welfare. The note as carried by the messenger had written upon it in ink, "Paid in full, September 8, 1914, H. C. Millsap." Said $20,000 note was signed according to instructions, but remained in the possession of its maker, Mrs. Morgan. It was intended that it should remain in her possession. This transaction, if free from the taint of fraud, would have reduced his obligation to that extent. There is nothing about the transaction itself which suggests that it had any connection whatsoever with the payment of an attorney's fee. It bears no such indicia and the transaction is not in accord with the ordinary course of business. The bona fides of this transaction presents one of the main controverted facts urged upon appeal; the contention of appellant being that the item of $20,000 was the fee that he was to receive for professional services rendered through a long course of litigation. On the other hand, the claim is made by respondent that appellant Millsap agreed to perform all the services undertaken by him for the sum of $7,500, out of which sum he was to pay the costs as heretofore noted. The trial court found against appellant's contention and refused to allow him any credit on account of said note, on the ground that its execution was fraudulently procured and its execution was without consideration. By the fourth cause of action plaintiff alleges much of the matter contained in the first cause of action and prays for judgment for the sum of $60,232.57 on account of moneys had and received. In avoidance of the statute of limitations, it is alleged that all knowledge of the fraudulent dealings of appellant Millsap with respect to respondent's property was designedly kept concealed from her and that she was misled and deceived by the fraudulent statements and acts of appellant Millsap as to the true condition of her estate. It is also claimed that all books, papers, and records purporting to relate to the business and transactions in controversy were at all times in the possession and under the control of appellants and that she at no time had access to or was accorded the privilege of inspecting any books or papers purporting to record said transactions affecting her property, but was compelled to rely upon the statements of her attorney, H. C. Millsap, which information subsequently proved to be false and untrue. She also alleged that no claim was made by appellant as to his right to an attorney's fee in the sum of $20,000, nor did she have any knowledge of the fraudulent use or appropriation of any part of her estate by appellants until six months next preceding the commencement of said action. The deceptions practiced, and the withholding of knowledge and information from the respondent, and her confidence and faith in her said attorney are sufficiently pleaded and proved to relieve her from the bar of the statute, and it is unnecessary to refer further to this issue.

The defendants Homer C. Millsap and Bernice Williams Millsap demurred separately to the amended complaint. The grounds of demurrer are practically the same, being both general and special. Misjoinder and defect of parties defendant, in that the directors of the M. M. Investment Company at the time of the forfeiture of its charter and the trustees thereof, other than Homer C. Millsap, were not joined as defendants in the action, and secondly, that the M. M. Investment Company, a defunct corporation, was improperly joined as a party defendant in the action with the other defendants, were also urged as grounds of demurrer, but the objections were overruled. Homer C. Millsap answered individually, and also as a trustee for the M. M. Investment Company, and Bernice Williams Millsap made joint answer with him. Defendant H. C. Millsap admitted his employment in April, 1913, by respondent, to represent her in the case of Budd against Morgan, and also to represent her in the matter of the estate of William Morgan, deceased, which proceeding was then pending in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles. He denied that any agreement had been made between Mrs. Morgan and himself as to the amount of the compensation to be paid him for his legal services until the 15th day of January, 1914, on which day a contract was made and entered into between him and Mrs. Morgan. He averred that he continued to render services for her pursuant to said contract of employment until June 30, 1914, on which day the prior contract was, by mutual consent, canceled, and a contract for remuneration in the sum of $20,000 was made because of threatened litigation not contemplated by said parties at the time the other contracts were made. He denied that he was at all times the sole adviser of plaintiff, Mrs. Morgan, or that she at all times followed or relied upon his advice, or that she delivered or intrusted to him the property described in the complaint. He denied that he took any part in the sale of the 500 shares of capital stock of the Chamber of Commerce Safety Vault Company made to R. Floyd Clinch. He further denied that he had advised the plaintiff that her said property could be more easily and effectively managed if a corporation were formed and said property was transferred, conveyed, assigned, or delivered to said corporation. He admitted and averred that there was pending, at the time plaintiff transferred and conveyed to said corporation the property described in the complaint, certain actions for damages against Mrs. Morgan, amounting to $110,352, and that Mrs. Morgan, for the purpose of defeating the collection of any sum whatsoever by plaintiffs against her in said several actions, and to avoid the payment of any judgment or judgments which might be rendered against her, conveyed to the corporation the property described in the complaint and received in payment therefor stock of the M. M. Investment Company, which, subsequently to the transfer, was sold and transferred by her. Incorporation of the M. M. Investment Company under the laws of the state of California is admitted, but denial is made by Mr. Millsap that he was, at any time subsequent to July 21, 1914, an officer or director of said corporation. Denials are also made to the allegations of the complaint to the effect that defendant H. C. Millsap collected certain large sums of moneys belonging to Mrs. Morgan, but admissions are made that said sums were received by the M. M. Investment Company. Both defendants, by answer, denied, after the transfer of the properties to said corporation was made, that the plaintiff had any interest therein, except as that of a stockholder. Both denied that Bernice Williams Millsap received at any time any money or property belonging to the plaintiff. It is not denied by either of the defendants that large sums of money belonging to the investment company were received by them. Their denials go only to the ownership of the property. Attorney Millsap, by separate answer, denied that he agreed to defend the Budd Case for $7,500, or that he was paid that sum by plaintiff for said services, but, on the contrary, averred that plaintiff had agreed with him upon a $20,000 fee basis, and that he (Millsap) was to pay the costs, etc. While the answer makes reference to each allegation of the complaint, not all of the issues raised therein are squarely met, but in a number of respects the denials are somewhat evasive. The defendants admit that the plaintiff is not indebted to either of them in any sum, but affirmatively aver that she is indebted to the M. M. Investment Company in the sum of $35,500, and on behalf of said corporation ask that judgment in that sum, together with interest, be entered against her and in favor of said corporation. The provisions of sections 337 to 341, both inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, are pleaded as a bar to the action.

The court found in favor of the plaintiff and against defendants H. C. Millsap and wife on every material allegation of fraud alleged in the complaint and on every material issue pleaded therein. In view of the findings made by the court, the objections made to the pleadings on the ground of misjoinder of parties defendants, that is to say, whether the corporation or its trustees were necessary parties, are of but slight consequence. The positions taken by the defendants as to the question of misjoinder is rather unique. By their demurrer, they objected to the joining of the corporation with them and complained because the trustees of the corporation were not joined. During the trial of the case the court dismissed the corporation from the action on motion of plaintiff, a ruling which defendants had previously insisted upon, but to which ruling when about to be made, interposed vigorous objection.

It is alleged by the complaint that H. C. Millsap was one of the original organizers of the corporation and was an officer and director thereof at the times it twice forfeited its charter by failure to pay its franchise tax, and he thereupon, by operation of law, became a trustee of said corporation. Section 416, Code of Civil Procedure. By his answer, he assumed to be a trustee by demanding, on behalf of the corporation, a judgment in its favor and against plaintiff in the sum of $37,500. By so doing, he placed himself in the office of a trustee. According to the claims of appellants that the corporation was legally organized and that its corporate entity could not be collaterally attacked, this single circumstance would not render the defendants immune from liability in an action brought against them based upon fraud in a transaction such as this case presents. But whether the defendant H. C. Millsap will be heard to urge a failure to join the trustees with him is a question attended with serious doubt. At the time the action was commenced, the respondent was the equitable owner of all the stock of the corporation. The persons in whose names it stood upon the books, and the number of shares of stock purported to be held by each, were as follows: Homer C. Millsap, 27 shares; Georgia Elster, his stenographer, 1 share; Leslie Whitlow, nephew of respondent, 68 shares; T. C. Lynch, 3 shares. Not one of the foregoing named persons, excepting Mrs. Morgan, paid anything at all for the stock that stood in their respective names.

[1] About the time the corporation was formed, Mrs. Morgan paid into it the sum of $10,000, which sum was equal in amount to its paid-up capital stock. This sum was to be regarded as surplus earnings and was to be used as an expense fund. It was soon thereafter depleted. Article 12, § 11, of the Constitution of this state provides:

"No corporation shall issue stock or bonds, except for money paid, labor done, or property actually received." etc.

Section 359, Civil Code, contains a restatement of the constitutional provision. It has been held that shares of stock issued in violation of said prohibition are void and the parties receiving them do not thereby become shareholders. J. F. Lucey Co. v. McMullen, 178 Cal. 425, 173 P. 1000; Kellerman v. Maier, 116 Cal. 416, 48 P. 377; Cortelyou v. Imperial Land Co., 156 Cal. 373, 104 P. 695; Jefferson v. Hewitt, 103 Cal. 624, 37 P. 638; Ewing v. Oroville Min. Co., 56 Cal. 649. The statute was again violated by the issuance of stock, as no effort was made to conform to the requirements of the provisions of the Investment Companies Act, in effect November 1, 1913, statutes and amendments 1913, p. 715. By section 5 of said act it is made unlawful to issue any security or stock, unless a certificate or a temporary permit authorizing the issue thereof shall first have been secured from the commissioner of corporations as provided by said act. It further provides that—

"It shall further be unlawful for any investment company, * * * as in this act defined, to sell, offer for sale, negotiate for the sale of or take subscriptions for any stock, stock certificate, bond or other evidence of indebtedness of any kind or character without exhibiting to the prospective purchaser or prospective purchasers of such securities, or any thereof, a copy of the certificate issued to such investment company in accordance herewith."

A corporation may, however, without applying for a certificate, issue to each of its directors one share of stock for the purpose of qualifying as directors. The commissioner of corporations, if satisfied that the investment company intends to do a fair, just, and equitable business, may, forthwith upon the filing of the statement and other papers required by section 4 of said act, issue to said investment company, upon such conditions as he may prescribe, a temporary permit to issue its securities pending the examination of said statement and other papers, and may, from time to time, for cause, rescind, alter, or amend said temporary permit. But no application was filed at any time by H. C. Millsap, acting for the corporation, for permission to sell stock or effort made to comply with the requirements of the act in any respect. To do so would have put himself and his corporation under the scrutiny and examination of the commissioner of corporations, evidently a thing he sought to avoid.

[2-5] But waiving the question of failure to comply with the several statutes of this state regulating the formation and transaction of business by corporations, the plaintiff, by force of the broad and liberal principles of equity, was not required to make either the corporation, or the trustees thereof, parties defendant. In the instant case the corporation, as has been so many times said, was solely a creature of H. C. Millsap, managed and controlled by him. It transacted no business whatsoever, except to receive, as a medium, the property of respondent, and formally convey it to other persons. The proceeds of sales went into his own possession. Instead of the corporation being a "holding" concern, it was in fact merely a "disbursing" concern. Millsap throughout his long course of handling the estate of respondent did not pretend that he was acting for, or that the transactions were being conducted in behalf of, the corporation, but that they were personal matters between himself, Mrs. Morgan, and third parties. All of the papers executed by Mrs. Morgan or by Millsap were executed as the individual act of each, and this of itself would be sufficient to estop him from now asserting that he was not acting for himself but for the corporation. It is a well-recognized rule of law that a corporation may be considered a legal entity when used for the accomplishment of a legal purpose. Corporations, however, cannot be used as a cover under which wrongs may be committed and fraud perpetrated. In such a case the court will look through the form of the corporation to ascertain its actual purpose and intent. If the purpose and intent of the corporation are bad, its corporate entity will be no cover for wrong, fraud and bad faith. Macfadden v. Jenkins, 40 N. D. 422, 169 N. W. 151. Upon the dissolution of a corporation the directors become the trustees for the creditors and they may be sued in any court in the state. Section 400, Civil Code. This does not mean, however, that a person who has at all times exercised absolute control over a corporation and used it wrongfully as a medium to enrich himself will not be held personally responsible for this misfeasance. And it may not be necessary under some circumstances to make the corporation which was used as an entity merely to consummate a wrong a party to the action. The facts of a case may be such as to require a court of equity, which always has inherent power in such cases, to treat the corporation and the individuals owning all of its stock as identical. Thus corporate entity, existing as such entirely distinct from its members, may be ignored in order to circumvent the fraudulent purposes of the stockholders in its organization. Ayer & Lord Tie Co. v. Commonwealth, 208 Ky. 606, 271 S. W. 693. In order to redress wrongs committed by fraud and protect third persons' rights or to prevent a palpable injustice, equity will interfere and cast aside the legal fiction of a corporate existence and deal with the corporation and stockholders as identical entities with identical duties and obligations. "Where an individual is the owner of all the corporate capital stock and uses the corporation merely as an instrumentality through which he transacts business, the separate entities will be disregarded when necessary to prevent fraud and to protect the rights of third persons." Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 487, 202 P. 673; Wenban Estate, Inc., v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, 696, 227 P. 723, 731. In the last-cited case this court said:

That, when such a situation exists, "equity, looking to the substance rather than the form of the relation, and the law as well, will hold such corporation obligated for the acts of the sole owner of the corporation to the same extent and just as he would be bound in the absence of the existence of the corporation."

While many of the cases cited relate to a situation where but one individual uses the corporate name in the manner suggested, the principle is the same when two or more own the stock and act in conjunction in the name of the corporation. The McCormick-Saeltzer Co. v. Grizzly Creek Lumber Co. (Cal. App.) 240 P. 32; Zenos v. Britten-Cook Land & Livestock Co., a Corporation et al. (Cal. App.) 242 P. 914; 6 Cal. Jur. 591. "Corporate entity is ignored in order that fraud or some kindred wrong may be defeated." Erkenbrecher v. Grant, 187 Cal. 7, 203 P. 641; Relley v. Campbell, 134 Cal. 175, 66 P. 220; Rutz v. Obear, 15 Cal. App. 435, 115 P. 67; Deming v. Maas, 18 Cal. App. 330, 123 P. 204;

Minifie v. Rowley, supra. The doctrine of corporate entity is not so sacred that a court of equity will hesitate to look through form to the substance of the thing, and it may, in proper cases, ignore it to preserve the rights of persons imposed upon or circumvented by fraud. In such cases, corporate fiction is disregarded. So, in the instant case, as corporate entity was absolutely disregarded by H. C. Millsap in all of his transactions with the respondent, except in such respects as the requirements of law compelled him in order to accomplish his purposes, to adhere to the forms of corporate procedure, he will not be permitted to defeat an action against himself for an accounting of property which came into his hands as the result of his unlawful methods merely because all the trustees of the defunct corporation, of which he was one, were not sued in conjunction with himself, when as a matter of fact, he was the organizer and the manager and promoter of the scheme and project by which the fraud was committed.

[6, 7] Appellant sustained a double trust relation to respondent. First, by force of the provisions of section 2224, Civil Code, which provides that—

"One who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it."

Second, the Metropolis Trust & Savings Bank v. Monnier, 169 Cal. 592, 147 P. 265, restates the universal test which must be applied to every transaction between attorney and client by which the attorney during the continuance of his employment gains any advantage from his client, in the following language:

"The relation of attorney and client is of a fiduciary character, and the Civil Code (section 2235) clearly provides that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, 'are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence.' This does not mean that a trustee may not deal with his beneficiary; but, if he does deal with him in such manner as to obtain an advantage, the trustee has the burden of showing by evidence that the transaction was fair."

See, also, Sanguinetti v. Rossen, 12 Cal. App. 623, 107 P. 560.

That appellant gained an advantage from his client, no doubt can exist. That he did not meet the burden of showing that the transaction was fair, which the law casts upon him, is amply supported by the evidence set out in the record.

[8] The commonplace maxims of equity, "He who seeks equity must do equity" and "He who comes into a court of equity must come with clean hands," have no application to the facts adduced in the instant case. Certainly the law will not hold a client in pari delicto with her attorney, who, acting under his influence and advice, places her property in his name and possession for purposes of concealment. As between the two, the client is not, in the eyes of the law, as culpable as the legal adviser. Herrick v. Lynch, 150 Ill. 283, 37 N. E. 221, lays down the true rule in such cases. It is there said:

"We do not think, however, that under the circumstances there should be an application of that rule of equity which denies relief to one party against another when both have been engaged in a fraudulent transaction. The parties were not in pari delicto. One was legal adviser; the other client. The advice of the former being adopted, he procured title to the latter's interest in valuable real estate. Equity will not tolerate the idea that an attorney may make use of his peculiar power over his client to procure a contract which is illegal and contrary to public policy, and to then invoke the aid of the law to enable him to retain that which he has obtained through his fraudulent artifices."

It was not intended by the conveyances made by respondent to said corporation that any beneficial interest in the property transferred or conveyed upon appellant's advice should pass or vest with the legal title thus conveyed. Such are the admissions of appellant.

[9, 10] Appellant's further contention is that the trial court committed reversible error by refusing to accept as conclusive and binding the findings of the referee appointed by the court, with the consent of counsel, to take and state the account of all transactions had between the parties thereto and each of them. It was further stipulated that all exceptions or objections to the report or findings of the referee might be made by either party at the time of the trial with like effect as if a bill of exceptions had been prepared, settled, and allowed and filed in said action. The referee made his report from what was shown upon the face of certain books and documents, and, in doing so, reported the transactions as existing between Mrs. Morgan and the M. M. Investment Company, making no mention of Homer C. Millsap, except as to the $20,000 promissory note. This gives rise to the claim that, as the referee stated no account and made no report as to anything due the plaintiff from the Millsaps, the court was thereby bound by what appeared upon the referee's report as to who the real parties to the equitable proceeding were. The referee was authorized only "to take and state the account of all transactions had between the parties hereto." Of course, this meant that he was only to furnish the court with a report as to what the books and accounts showed as to charges, receipts, and disbursements of every kind, to account for property and funds, and did not authorize the referee to try all issues of fact and law and to report a finding and judgment thereon as provided by section 638, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The referee was appointed to aid the court in the computation of accounts in the interest of time. We think the attitude of counsel clearly shows this to have been the understanding, as shown by the objections made by counsel on both sides. The court went fully into the whole matter of the accounting. Section 644, Code of Civil Procedure, is not controlling in the light of the circumstances of this case, as the reference did not include both questions of fact and law, and was not adopted by the court, and therefore was susceptible of vacation without the necessity of the granting of a new trial. Harris v. San Francisco S. R. Co., 41 Cal. 393; 22 Cal. Jur. 698. Besides, the report was not supported by evidence which was deemed satisfactory by the court and it had the inherent power to set it aside, as if it were a jury verdict. Cappe v. Brizzolara, 19 Cal. 307.

We think the point must be decided against appellant on the theory that a clerical duty only was committed to the referee and he was not empowered to make findings on the issues not properly coming within his limited duty. The order of reference did not take the cause from the court and commit it to the referee for decision.

[11-13] The contention of appellant Millsap that he was entitled to a credit of $20,000 as and on account of an attorney's fee, instead of $7,500, as allowed by the court, is a question of fact, arrived at by the court upon a consideration of conflicting evidence which involves the unraveling of transactions intermingled with fictitious and fraudulent acts. The burden of showing that his dealings with his client in all respects was fair was upon appellant, and he failed to satisfy the court of the justness of his claim. It is to be observed in this connection that a court may refuse to allow an attorney any sum as an attorney's fee, if his relations with his client are tainted with fraud. "Fraud or unfairness on the part of the attorney will prevent him from recovering for services rendered; as will acts in violation or excess of authority, and acts of impropriety, inconsistent with the character of the profession, and incompatible with the faithful discharge of its duties." 6 Corp. Jur. 722, 723. But as opposing counsel did not object to the allowance of the sum of $7,500 as an attorney's fee, and the court awarded that amount in full of all services performed, the order in that respect will be regarded as final.

[14] The statute of limitations cannot be invoked in appellant's behalf. Respondent was practically an exile from her residence for a period of about five years, living a portion of the time in a foreign country under an assumed name, upon the advice of appellant, and all information concerning the condition of her affairs was withheld from her on the theory that if her presence should be discovered she would be unable to furnish any information on supplemental proceedings as to her financial situation. This, at least, is the version of respondent. After her return to Los Angeles she was denied an inspection of the books and accounts of the corporation and refused information which she was entitled to receive.

[15] We have examined the findings, which are voluminous, and, while there may be some slight inconsistencies, they are not so serious as to confuse the substantial issues. A reviewing court in such a case as this will not make its examination of a record so searchingly technical, if fairly sustainable, as to overthrow a just judgment. An officer of the court, such as an attorney, who finds himself enmeshed by the skeins which he has designedly woven to encompass another, will not be assisted by a court of equity from the peril of his position, if to do so would militate against the advantage of the client upon whom he had sinister designs.

The court found that plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum of $31,394.54, together with interest thereon, amounting to $17,693.11, from defendant H. C. Millsap and the sum of $8,561.97, together with interest thereon, amounting to $2,114.82, from the defendant Bernice Williams Millsap, and it was ordered and adjudged that the sum of $10,676.79 of said judgment be joint as to said defendants Homer C. Millsap and Bernice Williams Millsap, and that plaintiff have and recover costs.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEDRO v. POTTER et al.

WILFERT v. SAME.

(L. A. 8002.)

1. Landlord and tenant $\Leftrightarrow$ 80(1)—Sublease subject to conditions of original lease held not to incorporate agreements of original lease; "condition."

A sublease, providing that it was made subject to conditions of original lease, which gave lessor option to terminate, did not incorporate provision of original lease for payment of all loss and damage; as a "condition" means a qualification or restriction annexed to a conveyance providing that in certain event an estate shall commence, be enlarged or defeated (citing Words and Phrases, Condition.)

2. Landlord and tenant ☞210—Sublessee held not entitled to apportionment of rent paid on termination of lease.

Where sublease did not provide for apportionment of rent paid in enumerating causes for damage in event owner exercised option to terminate lease, sublessees held not entitled to an apportionment of rentals.

3. Landlord and tenant ☞80(1)—Sublessee charged with notice of conditions of original lease and estopped to deny them.

By taking sublease subject to conditions of original lease, sublessee was put on notice of conditions therein and was estopped to deny them.

4. Landlord and tenant ☞210—Tenant not entitled to apportionment of rent where deprived of enjoyment of premises by inevitable casualty.

A tenant, who is deprived of the beneficial enjoyment of leased premises by an inevitable casualty without fault of landlord or tenant, is not entitled to an apportionment of rent, in absence of a covenant in lease so providing.

5. Landlord and tenant ☞130(4)—Sublessees held not entitled to recover advanced payments of rent under implied covenant of quiet enjoyment.

Where sublease provided for possible termination by original lessor, the sublessees cannot recover advanced payments of rent as for breach of implied covenant of quiet enjoyment under Civ. Code, § 1927, especially where action was not based on that section.

6. Landlord and tenant ☞80(3)—Under indemnity against damage to crops, sublessees entitled to damages for labor and time in preparing soil.

A reasonable construction, under Civ. Code, § 1643, of sublease indemnifying sublessees against damage to crops in case of termination of lease, entitles sublessees to damage for labor and time necessarily spent in preparing soil for planting, though no crops were actually planted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge pro tem.

Actions for damages by Nick Pedro, and by F. A. Wilfert, against D. A. Potter and W. L. Owen, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of Potter & Owen. Judgment for plaintiff in each case, and defendants appeal. Appeals consolidated. Judgments modified, and as modified affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Newby & Palmer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. On August 25, 1921, D. A. Potter and W. L. Owen, the defendants and appellants herein, leased from the Bradbury estate a portion of the Rancho Laguna, consisting of approximately 65 acres, situate in the county of Los Angeles, for the term of five years, beginning September 1, 1921, and ending August 31, 1926. The lands were leased for farming purposes and at an annual rental of $2,890, payable semiannually in advance on the 1st day of September and March of each year during the term. Said lessees covenanted to pay said rent throughout said term and agreed not to assign or hypothecate said lease without the written consent of the lessors. It was provided in said lease, however, that said lessees might sublet said lands or any portion thereof for like farming purposes, subject to all the terms and conditions provided in the original lease, "the subtenants to pay the rent and to be answerable to said lessees under the term of any sublease not in conflict with the terms of this (said original) lease." Said lessees covenanted and agreed for themselves, successors, and subtenants, not to commit or suffer to be committed any strip or waste on said property and not to pollute or suffer to be polluted or filled in any of the flowing wells upon said property, and upon the termination of the lease to leave all casing which was then in or might thereafter be placed in any wells by said lessees. Said lessees were given the right at the termination of the lease to remove all pumps, pipe lines, machinery, and improvements placed on said property by them, excepting the casing placed in said wells. The lessors reserved the right to terminate the lease at any time by giving 60 days' written notice and paying to the lessees "all loss and damage occasioned thereby." Said lessors were given the option of purchasing all of the improvements placed upon the premises by the lessees except the casing in the wells, which was to be left upon said premises, within 60 days after the expiration of or upon the sooner termination of said lease, by giving written notice of such intention to purchase. Covenants to protect the property against liens, etc., suffered by the fault of the lessees or their subtenants, and agreements to submit to arbitration the question of the amount of damages suffered in the event that their tenancy should be terminated before the expiration of their full term; values of improvements, and the adjustment of other matters likely to result in disputes or disagreements, were specifically provided for by the lease, as well as the usual covenants and agreements to be kept by a lessee, but as these are not matters in any wise involved in the action, further notice of them is unnecessary.

On August 15, 1921, appellants executed two separate subleases upon the portion of the rancho above referred to, one to respondent Nick Pedro, and the other to respondent F. A. Wilfert. The subleases are very similar in all material respects, and counsel, having agreed that the questions of law applicable to one case are also applicable to the other, stipulated that the two appeals might be consolidated, and they are so presented upon an agreed statement of facts in lieu of a bill of exceptions. By said subleases respondent Wilfert became the tenant of 45 acres of said rancho, at an annual rental of $2,025, and respondent Pedro became the tenant of the remaining 25 acres at an annual rental of $900. In each case the term is for five years from August 15, 1921, rent payable six months in advance in equal installments. The main question raised by the appeals involves the construction of the two subleases with reference to the original overlease, and is based upon the following language which is contained in each of the subleases, to wit:

"This lease is made subject to the conditions of the lease of this property from the Bradbury estate to parties of the first part."

As the right to recover damages and the amount thereof rests upon language peculiar to each lease, it is necessary to make a brief résumé of each. By the lease made between appellants, the sublessors, and Wilfert, the latter agreed to equip the water well on said property and put it in condition to pump and to pay one-half of the expenses of equipping the same and thereafter to pay his own operating expenses during the life of the lease. In case of sale of the property, appellants agreed to take over the pumping plant at its appraised value and also to compensate Wilfert for all "damage to crops from sale." It was further agreed that the appellants, sublessors, were to retain a one-fourth interest in a well described in the lease and were to have the use of said well and water on land they might lease, and they were to pay their part of the cost of operating expense thereof. It was also agreed that Pedro should have a one-fourth interest in said well and to pay his part of the operating expenses. The sublease made between appellants and Pedro of even date with the Wilfert sublease contained the agreement whereby Pedro was to share in the cost of equipping a well on said property and putting it in a condition to pump to the extent of one-fourth of the total cost. He was also to pay his part of the operating expenses of said well. Like the Wilfert lease, it contained the clause that in case of sale of the property the appellants were to take over the interests of the sublessee in the pumping plant at its appraised value and also to compensate the sublessee for all damage "to crops from said sale." A reservation was also made by appellants of a one-fourth interest in the water of the well, to be used on any lands they might lease; appellants to pay their portion of the operating expenses. It also contained a reciprocal provision that Wilfert was to have a one-half interest in said well and to bear his portion of the operating expenses. Both of said subtenants paid the first installment of rent in advance. By the agreed statement of facts before us it is made to appear that the lease made to Pedro was a sublease of land held by Potter & Owen under a lease by them from the heirs of the Bradbury estate; that while in possession under said sublease he was served on the 14th day of December, 1921, by the Bradbury estate with a notice that said overlease, or main lease, would be terminated 60 days thereafter and a demand that as a subtenant he surrender possession of said premises within 60 days thereafter, as in said original lease provided; that in pursuance of said notice terminating said lease, the tenant, Pedro, delivered up possession on February 6, 1922, and has not since been in possession of said premises. It was also stipulated that the same situation as above recited existed as to Wilfert, who received a similar notice of the termination of his sublease, and that he surrendered the demised premises to the owners, as provided by the provisions of the main lease, on the 6th day of February, 1922. It is further stipulated that the surrender of possession by Pedro and Wilfert was not voluntary, and that neither waived any rights which he was entitled to under his sublease for damages against appellants. It is agreed that said Pedro and Wilfert, as occupants of said premises under their respective subleases, performed labor and expended money in the preparation of the soil for the planting and harvesting of crops thereon; that Pedro, upon entering into the possession of said premises, paid the sum of $450 on account of rental, and that on the 14th day of December, 1921, he was served with notice that his tenancy had been terminated; that between August 15, 1921, and December 14, 1921, he expended the sum of $704.80 in preparing the soil for a future crop. It is agreed that the reasonable value of the work performed by him amounted to $250; also, that he expended upon the pumping plant the sum of $215.60 and that the stipulated appraised value of his one-fourth interest in said pumping plant was the sum of $474. It is stipulated and agreed that the foregoing amounts as found by the trial court are correct and fairly represent the value of the services performed and are reasonable appraisements of each item and thing as made by the court. It is agreed that the only question raised upon the Pedro appeal is the right of plaintiff to recover all of said amounts as against the appellants Potter and Owen.

Wilfert paid to appellants rental in the sum of $1,012.50, and also expended, in preparing said premises for cultivation, between the 15th day of August, 1921, and the 14th day of December, 1921, when notice of termination of his tenancy was served upon him, the sum of $562. It was stipulated that the reasonable value of his personal services during said time was $300, and that he expended upon the pumping plant the sum of $392.03, and that the appraised value of his one-fourth interest in said pumping plant was the sum of $948. It was also stipulated that the value of the services rendered and materials furnished by him as found by the trial court are supported by evidence, and the only question urged upon appeal is as to the liability of defendants for certain charges made against them. It is admitted that said subtenants, Pedro and Wilfert, raised nothing of value on the premises leased by them during their occupancy, and that each was in the exclusive possession of said premises until said surrenders were made, to wit, February 6, 1922, and that said Pedro had planted and attempted to raise certain crops which failed for lack of water prior to said surrender. It is further agreed that Pedro is entitled to recover as against appellants the sum of $474, the stipulated appraised value of his one-fourth interest in the pumping plant installed upon said premises. Appellants contend that the following items allowed by the court are not recoverable in the action: Rent, $450; work and labor, $704.80; personal supervision of cultivation, $250; and $215.60 expended upon the pumping plant. The correctness of the items, as such, is not disputed. As to Wilfert, it is agreed that he is entitled to recover the sum of $948, the appraised value of his one-fourth interest in the pumping plant; but appellants dispute his right to recover the following sums: $1,012.50, rent paid in advance; $562, work and labor; $300, personal supervision of the work and labor performed upon said premises; and $392.03 expended upon the pumping plant. The correctness of said items, as such, is likewise admitted. Finally, "it is stipulated and agreed that the questions to be decided by the appellate court are the proper construction of the terms and provisions of the sublease under which the said tenants took possession, and of the main lease from the owners of the said premises to the defendants, Potter & Owen, and whether or not the plaintiff should recover from the defendants the respective amounts awarded by the court, all of which amounts were expended in good faith by the plaintiffs in each action, in expectation of recouping the said expenditures from the crops which would have been planted upon the demised premises if the notice to terminate their respective subleases had not been given."

The total amount of the Wilfert judgment was $3,214.53, and the Pedro judgment was $2,094.40. The original lease, subleases, and notice to surrender possession are set out in hæc verba in the complaint and are found by the court to be true. The labor, for which compensation was allowed in each case, was found by the court to have been properly and necessarily performed in order to plant and harvest crops upon the respective demised premises, and the amounts expended upon the pumping plant were found to have been a necessary and proper expenditure of moneys. The court further found that there was not sufficient time between the date of said subleases and the termination thereof for plaintiffs to have matured crops upon the demised premises, and no crops were in fact harvested therefrom; and the use of said premises during the period of occupancy by said subtenants—August 15, 1921, to February 6, 1922—was merely nominal and of no value to the respective occupants.

[1-3] The important question raised in these cases is whether the following clause contained in the subleases, "This lease is made subject to the conditions of the lease of this property from the Bradbury estate to parties of the first part," can be construed as incorporating by reference into said subleases the clause contained in the original lease by which it is claimed a covenant was created to apportion rent in case the original lease be terminated, to wit, "by paying to the lessees all loss and damage occasioned thereby." We do not think that it can be so construed. No inference arises from the use of the clause "this lease is made subject to the conditions of the lease of this property from the Bradbury estate," that it was intended thereby to incorporate and make all of the stipulations and agreements of the Bradbury lease a part of said subleases. The term "condition" has a well-understood meaning in law when used with reference to estates. "A condition is a qualification or restriction annexed to a conveyance of lands, whereby it is provided that in case a particular event does or does not happen, or in case the grantor or grantees do or omit to do a particular act, an estate shall commence, be enlarged, or be defeated." 2 Words and Phrases, 1394; Anderson v. Palladine, 39 Cal. App. 256, 178 P. 553; Matter of Russell, 163 Cal. 668, 126 P. 875, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 152. "In its more extended sense the word 'condition' signifies a clause in a contract or agreement which has for its object the suspension, rescission or modification of the principal obligation, or, in case of a will, to suspend, revoke or modify the devise or bequest." As tersely defined by this court in the Matter of Russell, supra, "In law, it [condition] means 'a qualification, restriction or limitation, modifying or destroying the original act with which it is connected,' or defeating, terminating or enlarging an estate granted." 1 Bouv. Law Dict. Rawle's Revision, 382. It will be found upon an examination of said subleases that the only language contained therein upon which respondents may at all rely in support of the claim that they are entitled to an apportionment of rentals paid is a clause which has reference solely to the happening of the event which would destroy respondents' leasehold interest. It will further be noted that damages which were likely to accrue to the subtenants from a number of causes in the event that the Bradbury estate exercised its option to terminate the original lease were ex industria provided against, but the right of an apportionment of the rentals was not included therein. We are not at liberty to reform said instruments, as no such relief was sought in the court below, and we cannot say from an inspection of said instruments that the parties thereto, at the time of execution, failed to express themselves fully upon all subjects which they regarded as important to themselves. The termination of the subleases was certainly within the contemplation of all the parties to the transactions. It is not claimed that the termination of respondents' leasehold interests was occasioned by the fault of appellants. It cannot be claimed that the respondents did not have notice of the fact that the leasehold estate which they accepted was subject, upon notice given, to termination at the will of said grantors. They would be estopped by the recitals and covenants which they signed and sealed with their own hands to deny the existence of the conditions set out in said original lease. The rule of law which governs this precise situation is stated in Georgous v. Lewis, 20 Cal. App. 255, 128 P. 768, as follows:

"It is the duty of a person contracting for a sublease to ascertain the provisions of the original lease; and a subtenant is charged with notice of the existence of the original lease, and is bound by its terms and conditions. 1 Woods on Landlord and Tenant, § 93, p. 184; Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 455; Blachford v. Frenzer, 44 Neb. 829, 62 N. W. 1101; Dunn v. Barton, 16 Fla. 765.

"But even if this were not so, the clause contained in the sublease under consideration that it was 'to hold only to the conditions of the original lease' was actual notice to the plaintiff of the existence of the original lease; and knowing of its existence he was charged with knowledge of its covenants, conditions, and limitations which, by reference, were made a material part of the terms and conditions of the sublease. Coalinga, etc., Co. v. Associated Oil Co., 16 Cal. App. 361, 116 P. 1107; Brock v. Desmond & Co., 154 Ala. 634, 45 So. 665, 129 Am. St. Rep. 71.

"The expressed covenants of the original and sublease are obviously opposed to the existence of an implied covenant which was to endure beyond the term granted to the defendants by the original lease."

It is appellants' contention that a lessee cannot recover back from his lessor rent paid in advance. In the instant cases the tenants occupied the demised premises covered by the advance payment for the full six-month period, less seven or eight days. There is no escaping the conclusion that the sublessees had actual notice of the existence of the covenants and conditions contained in the original lease in the face of the fact that they rely upon the language of their subleases as expressly incorporating therein the terms, covenants, and provisions of the original lease. It must be held, therefore, that the sublessees had full knowledge that the tenancy of the sublessor was dependent upon the will of the overlord and that they had taken subject to the will of the overlord, and, further expressly agreed to a termination of their leases in the event of the sale of the premises by the overlord, a contingency which was likely to and which in fact did happen. The subleases, while providing for the recoupment of moneys paid out for certain improvements made by the tenants, contain no covenants for the recovery of rent paid in advance in case the estate of said subtenants be terminated before the expiration of the full term. The wisdom of such a contract is not a matter for our determination, nevertheless it is conceivable that with all the facts that were within the knowledge of the sublessees such a contract may have appeared to be to the advantage of said sublessees, and that it was intended to be, as it was made, without the insertion of a clause covenanting for a repayment or apportionment of rent paid in advance.

[4] It is a general rule in this state, as at common law, that a tenant who, after the beginning of the term, is deprived of the beneficial enjoyment of the leased premises by inevitable casualty, happening without the fault of either the landlord or tenant, would not be entitled to an apportionment of rent in the absence of any covenant in the lease so providing. C. M. Staub Shoe Co. v. Byrne, 169 Cal. 122, 145 P. 1032; Harvey v. Weisbaum, 159 Cal. 265, 113 P. 656, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 540, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1115; Meek v. Cunha, 8 Cal. App. 98, 96 P. 107; 15 Cal. Jur. 721. The destruction of the premises by fire furnishes the most common illustration of the rule. In such a case courts have refused to apportion rent after destruction of the leased premises by fire, flood, etc., assigning, among other reasons, that as neither the lessor nor lessee is responsible for the destruction of the property, it is but equitable to divide the losses, or, put in another form, as the lessor must lose the property, the lessee should lose the term. But the reason of the rule does not rest solely upon the equitable principle of the division of losses occasioned by inevitable casualty. Other reasons of the rule take into consideration the law of contracts and the fundamental principles that govern leasehold estates. As an illustration, the lease is held to be an interest in real estate passing from the lessor to the lessee. The consideration for the advance payment is not only the use of the premises, but the conveyance by way of lease and the obtaining possession of the premises. It is further illustrated thus: The fact that rent was to be paid in advance might have been the controlling factor in the mind of the lessor when he executed the lease and delivered the possession of the premises to the lessee; in many cases the landlord may have expended more money than the advanced rent, and for the very reason that he is receiving rent in advance, it may have been the very inducement to the lease. Again it is said:

"The lessee has only paid the money he agreed to pay at the time he agreed to pay it; and as he has not seen fit to have any provision inserted in the lease as to the recovery of the advance rent, or a part thereof, in case the premises are destroyed by fire, the law will not insert such provision for him, particularly as in many cases it might work a great hardship on the lessor."

We cannot say that the principles of law announced in cases where the destruction of the premises was caused by fire are not or should not be applicable in a general sense to a case where a sublessee who has been deprived of the enjoyment of the leasehold estate without the fault of the sublessor but by the happening of an event which the sublessee expressly stipulated that if it should happen would put an end to his lease, and who made no provision for a return of rent paid in advance in such event. Tiffany, in his work on Landlord and Tenant (volume 1, p. 1099), thus states the rule:

"In cases in which the loss of possession is due to the stipulations of the lease, he [tenant] may lose his advance payment, but this is merely a natural and legal result of the stipulation for payment in advance. One who agrees to pay in advance cannot well complain if, as a result of the agreement, he is in a position different from that in which he would be had he not so agreed."

[5] No question of damages for the breach of an implied covenant of quiet enjoyment and possession of the demised premises arises, or could arise in this case by force of section 1927, Civil Code, as the subleases made provision for a disturbance of the sublessees' possession, and the complaint does not contain a single allegation sounding in breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment and possession. Respondents, in their brief, emphatically repudiate the claim that the action is brought under the provisions of section 1927, Civil Code, as the following language makes plain:

"In the case at bar the plaintiffs are not being sued [suing] for a failure to pay rent due prior to an eviction, but are seeking a recovery of rent paid in advance under an express covenant of indemnity against loss occasioned by the exercise of the option of the owners of the land to terminate the tenancy." (Italics supplied.)

If, therefore, no express covenant is to be found in the subleases, which we hold there is not, the question of the right to recover said advance rent is lost so far as the present action is concerned.

Baranov v. Scudder, 177 Cal. 458, 170 P. 1122, contains nothing in conflict with the particular point involved in this case, but is in affirmance of it. That case approves what was said in Georgous v. Lewis, supra, to the effect that as the sublessee knew that his sub-lessor was but a lessee of the owner of the demised premises, he also knew the contents of the lease.

Anything said in the Georgous Case which may be construed as holding that a sublessee, knowing that he is a sublessee, is not under the protection of section 1927, Civil Code, against a breach of any condition in the overlease, if no act of omission or commission on the part of the sublessor occasions a breach, is regarded as dictum and disapproved. Baranov v. Scudder, supra, was an action by a sublessee against a sublessor for damages for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment and possession sustained by the sublessee through eviction by the landlord for a breach of the covenant in the original lease against subletting. The fact that the sublessee knew of such a covenant, or was charged with such knowledge, was not deemed sufficient to absolve the lessor from the provisions of section 1927, Civil Code. It is there said:

"One may agree, in future, to convey property to which he has no title, and the other party to the pact, knowing of the lack, may expect that the day fixed for performance will bring to him that title."

Continuing, the argument is that the sublessee, assuming that he had knowledge of the covenant against subletting, had the right to assume that the sublessor would procure, if not, in fact, that he had already procured, the overlord's consent to the sublease. But that case holds that where the sublease, as in the Georgous Case, and likewise in this case, contained the express provision that it was "to hold to the conditions of the original lease," takes the case without the operation of section 1927. It is said there, as it must be said here:

"Scudder (the sublessor) could have readily protected himself against the effects of an eviction such as later resulted to Baranov (the sublessee) by a clause in the sublease, but omitted to do so."

Surely, a lease contract may be so written, as in this case, as to take it without the protection of section 1927, Civil Code. We must therefore hold that the respondents are not entitled to recover the advance payments of rent in the action as maintained in the court below.

[6] It is next contended that the court erred in allowing damages in the way of expenditures made in preparing the lands for the planting and cultivating of crops and for expenditures made on the pumping plant. As to the first item, as no crops were actually planted, it is claimed, under the provision made for allowing the sublessees "all damage to crops," the labor and time necessarily spent in making the soil ready for the planting of crops does not constitute damages to crops, and therefore such expenditures are not recoverable. We think this would be a narrow construction to be placed upon the contract and would result in unjust consequences. The intention of the parties is to be found in the instruments considered as a whole and with reference to the contingencies that were intended to be taken into consideration by the contracting parties. Surely it was not the intention or the understanding of the parties that by the use of the words "damage to crops" the sublessees should be entitled to damages only in the event that they would be compelled to surrender the demised premises at a time when crops were, as it is argued, in a state of maturity and practically ready to be harvested. We think that the contract cannot be so construed. In so holding we are not writing into the contract provisions not found therein, but simply placing a reasonable construction upon language therein contained. Section 1643, Civ. Code. We are not disposed to disturb the judgment of the lower court as to allowances made with respect to moneys expended upon the pumping plant found by the trial court to constitute an element of damage.

The cause is before us on an agreed statement of the case. No fact is disputed or contested, as such. The stipulation of the parties is that this court may construe the contract and place such construction upon it as in law it should receive, allowing or disallowing such items of damages as may appear to be within the intent of the parties thereto. It is very evident that the stipulation was made to avoid a retrial of the action. In making our order we are not called upon to make new or different findings than those made by the trial court.

It is therefore ordered that the judgments be modified by striking from the judgment awarded respondent Wilfert the sum of $948, and by striking from the judgment awarded Pedro the sum of $450 on account of rents paid in advance by each, and as so modified, said judgments to stand affirmed.

WOOD v. LONGYEAR. (L. A. 7327.)

1. Abatement and revival ☞64—Liability of lessees joint and several, and action against them for breach of lease not abated by death of one.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1659, obligation of lessees is joint and several, and an action for breach of lease did not abate by death of one of defendant lessees, as action could proceed against remaining defendant in so far as an individual remedy against him was sought.

2. Action ☞38(5)—That lessees joined in pleas did not render the action joint.

That defendant lessees united in their defenses and affirmative pleas did not change nature of proceeding against them for breach of lease, from a joint and several action to a joint action.

3. Abatement and revival ☞64—Cross-defendant may waive requirement of joint action, where one of defendants died.

Even though action against lessees for breach of lease became a joint action under Code Civ. Proc. § 382, where lessees united in their answer, counterclaims, and cross-complaint, cross-defendant waived such requirement by proceeding with trial after death of one of defendants, which waiver did not injure remaining defendant.

4. Landlord and tenant ☞124(1)—Provision in lease held mere description of leased premises and not express warranty.

Provision in leasing agreement, occurring in portion of agreement containing description of premises leased, "one rock-crushing plant with a capacity of about 100 tons per hour," merely constituted words of description, and was not an express warranty, especially in view of absence of any language indicating intent of lessor to warrant capacity of rock crusher.

5. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence that lessees were not entitled to rescind leasing agreement under Civ. Code, §§ 1932, 1933, and that their attempted rescission was ineffectual, will not be disturbed by appellate court.

6. Appeal and error ☞1052(8)—Error, if any, in admission of evidence held not ground for reversal, where proper judgment rendered.

In action against lessees for breach of lease, which proceeded to trial notwithstanding death of one of lessees, error, if any, in admitting testimony of conversation between plaintiff and deceased lessee was immaterial and not ground for reversal, where, under the evidence, judgment had been properly rendered in favor of lessor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by H. S. Wood against E. J. Longyear and another, wherein defendants filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment against him, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Williams, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lawler & Degnan and J. B. Irsfeld, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the defendant and cross-complainant, E. J. Longyear, from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the recovery of rent, with interest and costs, amounting to the sum of $5,503.83, claimed to be due said plaintiff upon a lease by him to the defendants of certain premises occupied by and used as a rock-crushing plant. The complaint, which was filed on October 30, 1917, sets forth, in substance, that on or about April 14, 1916, an agreement in writing was entered into between said plaintiff and the defendants W. A. Boland and E. J. Longyear whereby the said plaintiff leased to said defendants the premises described therein for a period of three years from and after said date for a stipulated rental of $400 per month for the first year of said lease and of the sum of $725 per month for the remainder of the term, payable quarterly; that said defendants paid said rental up to and including the quarter ending May 31, 1917, excepting a balance of $210.30 on account of said last quarter, but that they failed and refused to pay the rental due for the quarter ending August 31, 1917, and also for the quarter ending November 30, 1917, amounting to the sum of $2,175 for each of said quarters, and for the total of these sums, amounting to $4,560.30, with interest, the plaintiff brings this action. The defendants appeared to said complaint, and united in an answer thereto and also in a counterclaim in the same pleading and in a cross-complaint in a separate pleading. In the first count in their second answer the defendants, while admitting the making of said leasing agreement, aver that the said lease contained an express warranty that the rock-crushing plant upon the leased premises had a capacity of 100 tons per hour, and that the defendants relied thereon in agreeing to enter into said lease; and that, by reason of the fact that said rock-crushing plant did not have any capacity in excess of 30 tons per hour, the terms of said warranty had been violated by said plaintiff; and that, on account of such warranty and of the plaintiff's said violation thereof, the said defendants had, on or about the 24th of August, 1917, rescinded said leasing agreement and surrendered possession of all of the premises described therein to said plaintiff, and hence that no sum whatever was due or payable to said plaintiff from the defendants or either of them. By the second count in their said answer the defendants set forth that by a clause in said leasing agreement it was provided that, if said rock-crushing plant upon said premises should be destroyed by fire, flood, or other unavoidable accident so that operation of the same must be suspended for a longer period than one week, the said lessees should not be required to pay rent during the period of such suspension; and that, owing to the fact that on or about April 6, 1917, war was declared between the United States and Germany, and as a result thereof and of the general conditions arising therefrom, and particularly of the requisition by the United States government of all railroad facilities and means of transportation, it became impossible for said lessees to get cars or transportation facilities for their output by reason of which the suspension of operations of their said plant became necessary, and the same were in fact suspended and continued to be suspended during the remaining term of said lease, the said lessees were thus absolved under the foregoing provision in said lease from any further payment of rent for said premises or the use thereof.

The third count in the defendants' said answer contains their counterclaim based upon the breach by plaintiff of the express warranty referred to in the first count thereof and of the otherwise faulty and defective construction of said rock-crushing plant whereby the said defendants were unable to adequately or profitably operate the same, but, on the contrary, were put to large expense in attempted repairs thereon and to great loss and damage in its attempted operation, amounting to the net sum of $4,667, for which they seek recovery in the way of affirmative relief. By the fourth, fifth, and sixth counts in the defendants' said answer they further amplify the extent of the injury and damage which they allege themselves to have suffered from the unsuccessful operation of said rockcrushing plant due to the plaintiff's breaches in his aforesaid warranties and to his misrepresentation as to its working capacity; the aggregate of which they allege to be the sum of $85,000, for which they seek recovery. By their separate cross-complaint the said defendants repeat substantially the averments of their foregoing answer and counterclaim, and pray for substantially the same amount of recovery by way of affirmative relief. To this cross-complaint the plaintiff presented an answer wherein he denied the existence of any express warranty in said leasing agreement as to the capacity of said rock-crushing plant, and also denied the making of any representations as to the working capacity of said plant as an inducement to the entering into said lease by said defendants, and denies any defectiveness in construction or working conditions of said plant which was not repairable by said defendants as provided for in said lease, and denies any right in the defendants to work rescission of said lease upon either of the foregoing grounds; and, generally speaking, otherwise denies specifically the averments of the defendants' said answer, counterclaims, and cross-complaint.

The cause came on for trial before the court without a jury upon the issues, as thus framed on November 25, 1918. At the opening of the trial, counsel, who had theretofore represented both of the defendants, suggested to the court that the defendant W. A. Boland had died in the state of Michigan on September 15, 1918, and on the basis of that suggestion objected to the further progress of the trial upon the ground that, the defendants having been sued jointly, and having also appeared jointly by their answer, and also in and by their cross-complaint, the court had no jurisdiction to proceed with the trial until the representatives of the deceased defendant had been brought before the court. The court overruled this objection, and, upon the insistence of the plaintiff, directed the trial to proceed in so far as the defendant, Longyear was concerned. The trial then proceeded with the introduction of much evidence, upon the conclusion of which it was submitted to the trial court for decision. Thereafter the trial court made and filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein it found that the leasing agreement had been entered into as alleged and admitted, and the premises duly delivered to the defendants thereunder, and that there remained unpaid to the plaintiff the sums due as rent therefor according to the averments of the complaint. The court further found that there had been no proof presented in support of the averments of the defendants' answer as to any interference with or suspension in the operations of the said rock-crushing plant upon said premises by reason of the state of war existing between our government and Germany, or of the conditions which prevailed in consequence thereof, and that the operation of said plant had not been suspended upon that account. The court further found that it is true that said leasing agreement contained the following words: "Together with one rock-crushing plant with a capacity of about one hundred tons per hour," but it is not true "that plaintiff covenanted or warranted said rock-crushing plant to have such capacity, nor did the defendants rely upon such recital as a warranty of the capacity of said rock-crushing plant. On the contrary, the intent of the parties in executing said lease, in the use of the words aforesaid, was that such words were to be accepted merely as descriptive of the property leased and not as a covenant or warranty of the capacity of any part thereof." The trial court further proceeded to make findings against said defendants specifically upon the issues tendered by their counterclaim and cross-complaint respectively. In its conclusions of law the court reiterated its aforesaid finding of fact as to the words in the lease relating to the capacity of the rock crusher as not constituting a warranty, but as merely descriptive of said portion of the property leased. The court also concluded that as a matter of law the defendants' attempted rescission of said leasing agreement was ineffective for the reason that no right of rescission then existed in favor of defendants against plaintiff. Finally, the court directed judgment against the defendant, Longyear, for the sums demanded in the plaintiff's complaint with interest and costs. Judgment was entered accordingly, and it is from such judgment that the defendant, Longyear, prosecutes this appeal.

[1-3] The first contention of the appellant to be disposed of is that urged by him at the opening of the trial of the cause, and which was to the effect that, his codefendant Boland having died since the issues in the case were made up and prior to the date set for the trial, the trial court had no jurisdiction to proceed with the trial until the legal representatives of his deceased codefendant had been brought before the court. This contention was predicated upon the assumption that the obligation of the defendants for the breach of which the action had been instituted was a joint obligation and the liability of the defendants thereon a joint liability, and hence that, since said action had been abated as to one of said defendants by virtue of his death, it was in abeyance as to both until revived by proper proceedings against the legal representatives of the decedent. This assumption, however, fails in the light of section 1659 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"Where all the parties who unite in a promise receive some benefit from the consideration, whether past or present, their promise is presumed to be joint and several."

In the case of Gummer v. Mairs, 140 Cal. 535, 537, 74 P. 26, 27, this section of the Civil Code was construed as applied to tenants in common in the following language:

"In this case the consideration for the promise inured to the benefit of Enos and Mairs equally. They purchased the whole of the land, each taking an equal interest, and were tenants in common, and the 'presumption,' therefore, is, that their promise was 'joint and several.' It is quite true that, notwithstanding the consideration moving to each was the same, the contract might have been made a joint contract by an express statement or agreement to that effect, but in the absence of evidence showing a contrary intention, the presumption stated in said section 1659 must control."

A like interpretation was placed upon this section of the Civil Code in Bell v. Adams, 150 Cal. 772, 90 P. 118, and De Angeles v. Cotta et al., 62 Cal. App. 691, 217 P. 821. There being nothing in the instrument itself to overcome this presumption, it follows that the trial court was correct in holding that the obligation of these defendants was a joint and several obligation, and hence that the action might have been begun and might proceed against either of them in so far as an individual remedy against either was sought, unaffected by the death or other disability of the other defendant. The appellant, however, urges that, since the defendants had united in their answer, counterclaims, and cross-complaint, a different situation was thus created which prevented the trial court from proceeding to hear and determine the merits of the defendants' affirmative pleadings until the legal representatives of the appellant's deceased codefendant had been brought before the court. We are unable to perceive, however, how the defendants, by uniting in their defenses and affirmative pleas, could operate to change the nature of the proceeding from a joint and several action to a joint action; but, conceding section 382, Code of Civil Procedure, to be applicable to such a situation, we incline to the view that the requirements of said section were intended solely for the benefit of the defendant (in this case the plaintiff and cross-defendant), and hence could be waived by him; and, if so, were waived by his insistence upon proceeding with the trial. By such waiver, the appellant herein was not injured, and hence cannot complain. The trial court therefore properly determined to proceed with the trial of said action as to the defendant, Longyear, and to render a judgment therein affecting only the rights and defenses of the living defendant before it.

[4] The next and, in fact, the main contention of the appellant herein is that the leasing agreement in question contains an express warranty that the rock-crushing plant upon the leased premises had a capacity of 100 tons per hour, which warranty being violated, the lessees had all of the defenses and affirmative rights and remedies which are asserted in their answer, counterclaims, and cross-complaint. The alleged express warranty as to the capacity of the said rock-crushing plant occurs in that portion of said leasing agreement which embraces the description of the premises leased and their appurtenances, and is in fact a part of said description. It is embraced in no other portion of the leasing agreement, and is noticeably absent from the particular portion thereof which purports to set forth the respective covenants, obligations, and liabilities of the lessor and lessees respectively as parties to said agreement. There is also noticeably absent from the clause in said portion of said lease which embraces the words "together with one rock-crushing plant with a capacity of about one hundred (100) tons per hour" any words of express warranty or any other words evincing an intention that said phrase was inserted therein for the purpose of warranting the capacity of said rock-crushing plant. Being inserted in said instrument as an obvious portion of the description of the premises leased and their appurtenances, the natural assumption is that the phrase in question was intended merely as an identifying part of said description. This assumption might be weakened or overthrown, it is true, by the language of other portions of said leasing agreement indicating an intent on the part of the lessor to warrant the capacity of said rock-crushing contrivance, but, when we look to the body of said instrument generally, we find the existence of conditions which strengthen rather than overthrow the assumption that the phrase in question was merely descriptive of said appliance and was not intended to warrant its working capacity. The instrument discloses that the rock-crushing appliance in question was old and apparently much out of repair, and that, by the express terms of said lease, the burden was placed, not upon the lessor, but upon the lessees of putting and of keeping said rock-crushing plant in workable order. These conditions and agreements are inconsistent with the idea that the lessor, by the use of the phrase referred to, and in the portion of said lease wherein the same is found, intended to warrant the working capacity of a complicated appliance which was not in working condition at the time of the execution of said lease and of its delivery to the lessees thereunder and which the latter and not the lessor were to assume the responsibility and expense of putting and keeping in condition for its intended use.

We are of the opinion that the trial court was correct in its interpretation of the foregoing phrase in said leasing agreement as constituting words of description and not of warranty. This conclusion renders unnecessary a determination of the question as to whether the phrase in question is to be interpreted as referring to a contemplated capacity in said rock-crushing plant of 100 tons per hour of crushed rock only or of crushed rock, sand, and gravel passing through said plant, although there was much evidence introduced into the record relating to this disputed interpretation.

[5] The next contention which the appellant urges is that the rock-crushing plant, the operation of which constituted the main use to which the leased premises were to be put, having become dangerous to life and limb, and unsafe to operate after its delivery to and attempted operation by said lessees, they were entitled to treat said leasing agreement as terminated under the provisions of sections 1932 and 1933 of the Civil Code. This contention is predicated upon one or both of two alleged supports. The first of these is the alleged guaranty of the working capacity of said plant, but this support, as we have seen, has failed. The other support relied upon is that of the evidence showing the unsafety of further attempts to operate said plant after a few months of endeavor so to do, arising from its age, original deficiencies of construction, and general worn-out condition. As to this, however, the state of the evidence was that of substantial conflict, and the findings of the trial court were against the said defendant's contentions in each and all of the foregoing regards. The findings of the trial court were also against the defendant upon the issue presented in his answer, counterclaims, and cross-complaint as to existence of any false representations on the part of said plaintiff as to the condition or capacity of said rock-crushing appliance or as to any reliance placed by the said lessees thereon which would have entitled them to a rescission of said agreement, and, as a result deducible from these findings, the trial court found and concluded that the said lessees not only were not entitled to rescind said leasing agreement, but that their attempted rescission thereof was ineffectual as defective in substance and as attempted too late. It is almost needless to reiterate that this court will not disturb the findings of the trial court upon these matters, based as they are upon substantial conflicts in the evidence presented in the case.

[6] Finally, the appellant contends that the trial court committed reversible error in overruling the said defendant's objections to the introduction of certain evidence relating to conversations between said plaintiff and the appellant's codefendant Boland, and also between the plaintiff and certain other persons more or less intimately associated with this particular defendant during the pendency of the negotiations preceding the making of said lease. These conversations had relation to the issue raised by the said defendant in relation to his right to rescind said leasing agreement, when he attempted so to do, and bore upon his contention and testimony that he had no knowledge of the plaintiff's breach of his aforesaid warranty or of the defective condition of said plant prior to July 1, 1917, when or shortly before he made his attempted rescission; but, since we have hereinbefore held that the plaintiff committed no breach of warranty, and since the right of the defendant to rescind said agreement was properly denied by the trial court on other grounds, the error, if any, of the trial court in the admission of said testimony becomes immaterial, and hence furnishes no ground for a reversal of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

DE RECAT CORPORATION v. DUNN et al.
(S. F. 11743.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 15, 1926.)

Trial ⚡6(3)—Proceeding to trial and judgment without notice, where defendant's attorney resigned, held without error.

Proceeding after several continuances to trial and judgment on day set without notice to defendant, whose attorneys had resigned, held not abuse of discretion; Code Civ. Proc. § 286, requiring notice "when an attorney dies or is removed or suspended or ceases to act as such," not being applicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by the De Recat Corporation against B. J. Dunn and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying his motion to set aside judgment, defendant B. J. Dunn appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Edwin V. McKenzie and Frank J. Mahoney, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arnold C. Lackenbach, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant and appellant B. J. Dunn, and also from an order denying the said defendant's motion to set aside said judgment upon the ground hereinafter to be stated. The action was one for money had and received, and was commenced by the plaintiff on June 5, 1923, against all three of the defendants, doing business as copartners under the firm name and style of Dunn, Hurst & Martin, who were all duly served with process. The defendants Hurst and Martin defaulted, and their defaults were duly entered. The defendant Dunn answered on August 15, 1923. On December 12, 1923, the plaintiff moved the trial court to set the cause for trial, and an order was accordingly made setting the cause for trial upon March 1, 1924, of the making of which order notice was duly given to the attorneys who were at that time the attorneys of record for said defendant Dunn. On the date so set for the trial of said cause it was continued for trial to the 26th day of August, 1924. On or about August 21, 1924, Mr. V. G. Skinner, one of the attorneys of record representing the defendant Dunn, called up Mr. Lackenbach, the attorney of record for the plaintiff, and requested a postponement of the trial, giving as the reason therefor the asserted fact that he and his associate, Mr. Lemberger, had been representing Mr. Dunn in a number of actions, and that Dunn had failed to pay their fee for such services rendered, and that he did not wish to try said case unless Dunn paid his said attorneys their fee. The request of Mr. Skinner was acceded to, and accordingly Mr. Lackenbach appeared in court on the day set for the trial and suggested a continuance of the cause, which request was granted and the cause continued to be reset. On or about September 15, 1924, counsel for plaintiff appeared in court with a request that the cause be reset for trial upon September 25, 1924, which request the court granted. On September 19, 1924, notice of the setting of the cause for trial upon September 25, 1924, at the hour of 2 p. m., was duly served upon said A. F. Lemberger and V. G. Skinner as attorneys of record for the defendant Dunn. On the evening of September 24, 1924, the said attorneys of record for defendant Dunn served a notice upon Mr. Lackenbach, the plaintiff's attorney of record, that they had resigned as attorneys of record for said defendant Dunn, and on the following day filed a copy of said notice and of their said resignation with the clerk of said court.

Upon September 25, 1924, at the time set for the trial of said cause, plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Lackenbach, appeared, and, upon the case being called for trial, stated substantially the foregoing facts to the court, and further stated that the plaintiff, who was an indispensable witness in the case, was compelled to leave California for the east, where he was permanently to reside, and that he therefore insisted upon going on with the trial of the cause. Neither the defendant Dunn nor his counsel was present, and the fact of the attempted resignation of his said counsel from the case was brought to the court's attention. The court proceeded with the trial of the cause, with the result that a judgment was presently rendered and entered in the plaintiff's favor. Thereafter, and on October 3, 1924, the defendant Dunn appeared in court by his then counsel, Frank J. Mahoney, and moved the court to set aside and recall its aforesaid judgment, offering in support of said motion the judgment roll and papers in the case, including the said notice of resignation of said defendant's former attorneys of record theretofore filed. Upon this showing Mr. Mahoney stated the contention of himself and his client to be that the court was without jurisdiction to render said judgment at the time the same was rendered and entered by virtue of the provisions of section 286 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was thereupon conceded by plaintiff's counsel that no such notice as is provided for in said section of the Code had been given.

In response to said motion plaintiff's counsel presented his own affidavit setting forth substantially the facts with relation to the several settings of said cause for trial and the continuances thereof for various reasons as hereinabove set forth, and also stating the facts relating to his client's compulsory departure from the state of California, which had induced his insistence upon the trial of said cause upon the date last set therefor. It further appeared upon said hearing that the defendant Dunn had been notified on the day before the trial of said cause of the resignation of his former counsel, who had at the time informed him that the case could not go to trial upon the following day because of the operation and effect of section 286 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The matter having been submitted to the court, the motion to set aside said judgment was denied, and thereupon this appeal from said judgment and from said order denying the said defendant's motion to set aside the same was taken.

The sole question presented upon this appeal is as to the operation and effect of section 286 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon the situation as presented by the foregoing admitted facts. Section 286 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

"When an attorney dies, or is removed or suspended, or ceases to act as such, a party to an action, for whom he was acting as attorney, must before any further proceedings are had against him, be required by the adverse party, by written notice, to appoint another attorney, or to appear in person."

The phrase in said section which is brought immediately under review is that reading "ceases to act as such," the contention of the appellant being that the interpretation to be put upon said phrase is "ceases to act as the attorney for the particular party to an action for whom he was formerly acting as attorney," while on the other hand, the respondent insists that this phrase in said section means "ceases to act as an attorney"; or, in other words, "ceases to be an attorney." In the absence of direct authority in the decisions of the courts of this state, we are thus put to a study of the origin and history of this section of our Code of Civil Procedure, for what light these may shed upon the interpretation to be placed upon this particular clause therein. It would seem to be fairly beyond dispute that section 286 of the California Code of Civil Procedure came directly into our jurisprudence from a like section of the New York Code of Civil Procedure existing therein in practically identical form at the time of the original adoption of our California Codes. The section of the New York Code of Civil Procedure then in existence was codified therein from 2 Revised Statutes of New York, p. 287 (Edition of 1829), and to have been ingrafted therein from an act of the New York Legislature adopted in 1787 (chapter 35, § 4), which reads as follows:

"When any attorney shall die, or cease to act, or be put out of the roll of attorneys, the persons for whom he was attorney shall be warned to appoint another attorney in his place so that in the meantime no damage or prejudice may come to the party." 1 Laws of New York (1 Greenleaf 1778 to 1787).

The foregoing provisions of the New York statutes and Codes do not seem to have been made the subject of any direct interpretation by the courts of that state bearing upon the meaning to be given to the phrase, "ceases to act," therein, but apparently this particular provision in the laws of New York has been carried into the statutes of other and later formed commonwealths, since it appears in practically identical language therein. The state of Michigan adopted a similar provision prior to 1872, as appears from the Compiled Laws of Michigan of that year (Comp. L., § 5630), the language of which is substantially identical with that of our own Code section. In the case of Coon v. Plymouth Plank Road Co., 32 Mich. 248, the said provision came before the Supreme Court of that state for interpretation in a case not distinguishable as to its facts from the case at bar, and in which

Mr. Justice Cooley, after quoting the provision of the Michigan statute, said:

"We do not understand this to apply to a case where a practicing attorney for any reason declines to go on with a particular case while still continuing in practice. It might be made the means of serious mischief if it could have such a construction. The plain meaning of the statute is to provide for cases in which the attorney or solicitor, by reason of death, disability, or other cause, has ceased to practice in the court. His refusal to proceed in a particular case is not ceasing to 'act as such' attorney or solicitor; it does not even disconnect him with the case; for that can only be accomplished by consent of the parties, or of the court, or by regular proceedings for the substitution of another."

The concluding clause in the foregoing excerpt from the opinion of Mr. Justice Cooley is in harmony with the doctrine early enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States v. Curry et al., 47 U. S. (6 How.) 106, 12 L. Ed. 363, wherein it was held that "no attorney or solicitor can withdraw his name, after he has once entered it on the record, without the leave of the court." This rule was reaffirmed by the same high tribunal in the case of Rio Grande I. & Col. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 174 U. S. 603, 19 S. Ct. 761, 43 L. Ed. 1103, from the decision in which case it appears that a similar rule had been given effect in the states of Massachusetts, Illinois, and Indiana. See Fay v. Hayden, 7 Gray (Mass.) 41; Dana v. Adams, 13 Ill. 691; Sloan v. Wittbank, 12 Ind. 444. These cases and others of later decision are collated and cited in support of the text to the same effect in 1 Thornton on Attorneys at Law, pp. 242-256. The case of Branch v. Walker, 92 N. C. 87, cited by the above author, is an instructive case touching the power of an attorney of record to withdraw at will from the case. The court, in dealing with that subject, says:

"It is a mistaken notion that an attorney can become counsel of record in an action, and cease to be counsel at his own will, pleasure and convenience. He is, in an important sense, an officer of the court, and under its direction and control in respect to matters affecting the court and the administration of public justice, and as soon as he is duly retained in an action or proceeding, he has, by virtue of his office, authority to manage and control the conduct of the action on the part of his client during its progress, subject to the supervision of the court, and he is the proper person on whom notice should be served in respect to matters pertaining to the conduct of and proceedings in it after it is brought; and his authority and responsibility continue until it is completely determined in the court wherein it is pending."

Section 286 of the Code of Civil Procedure was adopted in this state in the year 1872, and has since remained in substantially its original form, and while, as we have seen, this court has not heretofore been called upon to give its judicial interpretation to the particular clause therein here under review, certain other states, which have also ingrafted a similar provision upon their Codes or statutes have done so. In the case of McInnes v. Sutton, 35 Wash. 384, 77 P. 736, the Supreme Court of that state, in a situation substantially identical with that presented upon this appeal, held, upon the authority of Coon v. Plymouth Plank Road Co., supra, that the phrase in the Code provision of that state, "ceases to act as such," did not relate to the voluntary refusal of an attorney for a party to proceed with a case when it is regularly called for trial and the adversary is prepared with his witnesses to proceed. "If such were the meaning of the statute," says the court, "it could, by collusion between attorney and client, easily be used as a means of effecting at least a 20-day delay, which, in some instances, might amount to a practical denial of justice. The relation of attorney and client, when once established in a case, is not to be so easily severed, when the rights of others depend thereon. The interdependent relation is such that what is the client's duty is often the attorney's duty, and the client cannot escape his obligation to the court and to his adversary to proceed with a trial, for the mere reason that his duly appointed confidential agent—his attorney—may have declined to act." The Supreme Court of Washington in said case referred approvingly to the discussions of the Supreme Court of the United States above cited, with reference to the power of an attorney of record in a case to delay the trial thereof by an attempted withdrawal from the case, and held that the trial in that case proceeded regularly, notwithstanding such attempted withdrawal of counsel for the defendant, and approved the action of the trial court in refusing to set aside a judgment entered therein. In the case of Van Cott v. Wall, 53 Utah, 282, 178 P. 42, the same precise question was presented to the Supreme Court of that state in the interpretation of a section of the Compiled Laws thereof identical in form with our own Code section (Compiled Laws 1907, § 119), and wherein the said court adopted the interpretation placed upon the phrase, "ceases to act as such," approved by the Supreme Court of Washington in the case above cited, and further quoted with approval the language of the Supreme Court of Michigan in the case of Coon v. Plymouth Plank Road Co., supra. The court further called attention to a decision of this court in the Matter of Bollinger's Estate, 145 Cal. 751, 79 P. 427, wherein it was held that the trial court did not err or abuse its discretion in refusing a further continuance of a contest in a probate matter after counsel for the contestant had attempted to withdraw from the case, and after their client, having had opportunity to do so, had failed to employ other counsel. In that case this court said:

"If a contest of a will is initiated in good faith, and the contestant shows due diligence, every opportunity should be given for a full investigation of the issues made by the contestant, but if a contest must be continued for an indefinite time every time an attorney withdraws from the case, there would be no end to the matter."

Counsel for the appellant seems to rely strongly upon the decision of the District Court of Appeal in the case of McMunn v. Lehrke, 29 Cal. App. 298, 155 P. 473, wherein that court appears to have adopted the interpretation of section 286, Code of Civil Procedure, for which the appellant herein is contending. In that case, however, the record discloses that the question of the interpretation to be given to the phrase, "ceases to act as such," was not presented in the light of the origin or history of said section of our Code nor with any citation of authority, but was merely assumed to bear the meaning assigned to it without mature discussion or consideration. We cannot approve the language of said court in the interpretation placed by it upon this section of the Code, or of the particular phrase therein here under review. While it is true, as was said by this court in the Matter of Bollinger's Estate, supra, that litigants should be given a fair opportunity to present the merits of their case, we are satisfied that no sufficient or compelling ground was presented by the attempted withdrawal of the appellant's attorneys of record from the case upon the eve of the trial thereof, and that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in proceeding with the trial thereof and in entering judgment therein in plaintiff's favor under the circumstances of this case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

IN RE MORRISON'S ESTATE.

STATE v. SCOTT. (S. F. 11081.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 15, 1926.)

1. Wills §322—Order of proof is discretionary.

In trial of will contest, order of proof is within discretion of court.

2. Trial §76—Objection to evidence of declarations of testator regarding his will held too late.

In contest of will, objection to testimony of declarations of deceased that paper exhibited to witnesses was his last will held too late, where not made until after witnesses had completed testimony.

3. Wills §297(1)—Declarations of testator, exhibiting paper, that it was his last will admissible as res gestæ.

In contest of will, testimony of declarations of deceased, at time he exhibited paper claimed to be his will, that it was his last will held admissible as part of res gestæ.

4. Wills §297(1)—Declarations of deceased that he had made will admissible on issue of forgery of claimed will.

Where olographic will was contested as forgery, and testimony of handwriting experts was in sharp conflict, declarations of deceased shortly before his death that he had made a will and left his property to proponent as his sole beneficiary held properly admitted as tending to show existence of document such as the one produced.

5. Appeal and error §1046(5) — Occasional impatience of judge with handwriting experts held not prejudicial.

In contest of olographic will, where outflow of opinion of handwriting experts was not confined to limits prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1944, occasional impatience manifested by trial judge with prolixity of examination of such witnesses held justifiable in most cases, and not prejudicial.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Application by Marion Scott, also known as Maude Scott, for the probate of the will of Leon Morrison, also known as L. Morrison, deceased. From a decree in favor of proponent, the State and others, contesting the will, severally appeal on a single record. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Frank L. Guereña and L. B. Browne, both of San Francisco, and E. E. Gehring, L. Gonsalves, and Glickman & Glickman, all of Oakland, for appellant.

H. L. Hagan and Milton T. U'Ren, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. There are in this proceeding three appeals from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Alameda admitting to probate an instrument alleged by the respondent to be the last will and testament of Leon Morrison, deceased, and by the terms of which the said respondent, Marion Scott, was made the sole devisee and legatee of said decedent. There were three separate contestants against the admission of said will to probate and three separate appeals, but by stipulation between the parties these several contests and appeals were presented upon a single record and upon briefs filed by the contestant, state of California.

Leon Morrison died in the county of Alameda, state of California, of which county he was a resident, on June 20, 1921, leaving a considerable estate therein, consisting principally of two clothing stores in the city of Oakland, which, since the inception of proceedings for the administration of his estate, have been converted into cash. The record herein shows that shortly after the death of said decedent the respondent herein commenced a proceeding in said court for the probate of a lost or destroyed will of said decedent under the provisions of sections 1338, 1339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but later dismissed said proceeding, whereupon the public administrator was appointed the administrator of the estate of said decedent. Several months thereafter the respondent produced and filed for probate the instrument alleged by her to be the decedent's last will and testament, the validity of which has been put in issue by the contestants herein. The said instrument is in the form of an olographic will, and reads as follows:

"Oakland, Cal. Janry 12, 1921.

"At my death I give all my property to my dear friend Marion Scott. L. Morrison."

[1-3] The three contestants herein are, respectively, Mordko Grulin Grysolet, who alleges himself to be a brother and heir at law of the deceased; L. Soshokoff, who alleges himself to be a nephew and heir at law of said deceased; and state of California, which alleges that the decedent left no heirs. The opposition of each of the two contestants who aver themselves to be heirs of said deceased is based upon the following grounds, viz.: That said pretended will is void because not made or executed by the decedent, nor written, dated, or signed in his handwriting; that at the time of the alleged signing of said instrument said Leon Morrison was not of sound and disposing mind; that, if said pretended will was executed by said decedent, it was while he was under undue influence and was also laboring under an insane delusion. The opposition of the state of California to the admission of said instrument to probate is based upon its denial that the decedent left any will, and upon its further denial that said alleged will is the last or any will of said decedent. To each of these several contests the proponent of said will filed her answer, denying the averments thereof. The issues as thus framed came on for trial in said court and before Hon. Stanley Murray sitting as judge pro tem. therein, whereupon the proponent of said document offered the same in evidence, and in support of said offer was sworn as a witness, and testified that the said instrument was in the handwriting of the decedent. She further testified that the first time she had seen said document was upon a date several months after the death of said decedent, when she had received the same through the mail and in an envelope addressed to herself. After being submitted to a lengthy cross-examination by the contestants as to the circumstances under which she had received said document and as to her sources of knowledge as to the decedent's handwriting, the obvious purpose of which was to break down the proponent's story as to the circumstances under which the document in question had been received by her, and also to destroy the value of her testimony that the instrument was in the handwriting of the decedent, the proponent produced two further witnesses whose names were John W. McKenzie and Barney A. Hoffman. The first of these testified that during the months of May and June, 1921, he was a nurse at the Fabiola Hospital in Oakland during the period when Leon Morrison was a patient in said hospital, and that he met and ministered to Mr. Morrison frequently in a professional way. The witness was then shown the document purporting to be the will of Mr. Morrison, and was asked whether he had ever seen it before, to which he testified that he had, and that it was the paper which Mr. Morrison had shown him at the Fabiola Hospital on the evening of the 16th of June, 1921, while the former was a patient there. He further testified that Hoffman, who was also a nurse, was present when he was shown said paper; and he identified said document as being the same paper which was shown to himself and Hoffman by Morrison himself at said time. He further recited in detail the circumstances under which the paper had been exhibited to him by Morrison, stating that on the evening of said day, while in the toilet of said hospital, to which said Morrison had been assisted by himself and Hoffman, Morrison had taken from his pocket said paper, and handed it to him, saying, "Mac, do you want to take a look at this? This is my last will and testament." The witness stated that he looked at the paper, and examined it curiously, because, as he said, "It seemed odd for anybody to hand me anything of that kind." He then passed it to Hoffman, who also examined it, and handed it back to the witness, who in turn handed it back to Mr. Morrison, who folded it up and put it in his purse. Having so testified fully to the circumstances under which the witness had been shown said paper and to the statement made by Mr. Morrison regarding the same while in the act of handing said paper to him for his inspection, and having done so without objection of any kind on the part of the contestants, or any of them, the witness McKenzie was subjected to an exhaustive cross-examination by counsel for each of said contestants, during which every incident in connection with said episode was made the subject of scrutiny. The witness was then excused, whereupon the other witness, Hoffman, was called by the proponent and similarly examined, without objection, and testified to the same circumstances and the same language used by the decedent, and he also was exhaustively cross-examined by counsel for the contestants. It was not until the examination and cross-examination of the witness Hoffman had been concluded and the proponent had closed the presentation of her prima facie case that counsel for the contestants undertook to voice any objection whatever to the testimony given by McKenzie and Hoffman, or any portion thereof, and the objection thus tardily urged was not to any particular portion of the evidence given by these two witnesses, but was to the whole thereof upon the ground that the offer and admission of such evidence was not in accordance with the orderly procedure to be followed in the trial of contests of wills. The trial court overruled said objection, and apparently did so properly upon the authority of Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414-437, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441, wherein it was held that the order of proof in such cases was a matter within the discretion of the trial court. The cause then proceeded; the contestants introducing a number of witnesses for the purpose apparently of impeaching the credibility of the proponent and her two witnesses. After evidence of this sort had been presented, occupying over 100 pages of the printed record, counsel for the contestants again undertook to question the admissibility of the testimony offered by the witnesses McKenzie and Hoffman, and then for the first time presented the objection that, while the testimony of these two witnesses was competent as to the identification of the offered paper, the accompanying declaration of the testator was not admissible as to whether or not it was his will. The court overruled said objection, whereupon contestants moved the court to limit the testimony of these two witnesses solely to the matter of identification. The court, however, permitted the testimony of these witnesses to stand "for what it is worth," and the point that the trial court was in error in these rulings is the first point of error urged upon this appeal. It is our opinion, as above indicated, that the contestants' objection to the evidence of these two witnesses came too late, and also that the tardy request of the contestants that the effect of the said evidence should be limited solely to the matter of identification came also too late; but, were it otherwise, we are further of the opinion that the testimony of these two witnesses, both as to the identity of the document offered by the proponent as an authentic document and as to the decedent's statement made at the moment of its production by him for the inspection of these witnesses, to the effect that it was his will, was legally admissible, and was not subject to the objection which the contestants now strenuously urge against its admissibility.

The circumstances of this case are peculiar. The offered will of the decedent was an olographic will, the existence of which the proponent had reason to surmise, but the whereabouts of which was unknown to her until the receipt of it through the mails several months after the death of the testator. A direct attack was made by all of the contestants upon the authenticity of the document; and, while the proponent might possibly have contented herself with the proof offered by herself as a witness to the decedent's handwriting, there would seem to be some justification for her attempt to show, as a part of her prima facie case, that the document offered had been seen in the possession of the decedent a few days before his death, and that with direct reference to it the testator had designated this particular instrument as "his last will." The three cases upon which the appellants chiefly rely in support of their objection to the inadmissibility of the said declaration of the testator do not, in our opinion, apply to such a situation as is here presented, for the reason that the declarations of the testator made at the moment of submitting to the scrutiny of these two witnesses the identical document here produced as the last will of such decedent were part of the res gestæ, or, in other words, of the immediate transaction to which said witnesses were testifying, viz. their identification of the offered instrument as an existing document at the time of its presentation to them for inspection by the testator. In Estate of Gregory, 133 Cal. 131, 65 P. 315, no such evidence was offered and no such question presented. The same may be said in Estate of Thomas, 155 Cal. 488, 101 P. 798, both of which cases we shall submit to a closer scrutiny at a later point in this opinion. In the case of Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552-573, 21 S. Ct. 474, 45 L. Ed. 663, it was conceded that evidence touching the identity of a certain document would be admissible when part of the res gestæ. As illustrating this exception to what the court in that case states to be the otherwise general rule the court cited the case of Burge v. Hamilton et al., 72 Ga. 568. This was a case where a testator, during an interview with his legal advisor attending the making of a codicil to his will, and with the original will in his hand, identified the same and the several pages thereof as and declared the same to be the original will; and the court upheld the admissibility of the testator's declarations to that effect as going directly to the identification of the particular document as the will of the testator and as part of the res gestæ. In so doing the court, in the case of Burge v. Hamilton, supra, exhaustively reviewed the authorities, in the course of which it cited with approval the case of Gould v. Lakes, 6 Law Reports (P. D.) p. 1, wherein it was held that the statements of a testator with reference to the constituent parts of an instrument purporting to be his will were admissible, citing Sugden v. Leonard, 1 L. R. (P. D.) 154. The foregoing cases in principle have direct application to the question presented by the case at bar. For both of the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the testimony of the witnesses McKenzie and Hoffman as a whole was properly before the court, and hence that the court committed no error in its refusal to grant the appellants' belated motion to strike out such testimony or to limit the application thereof.

[4] A more serious question is presented with respect to the rulings of the trial court in the admission of the testimony of the witnesses Collins, Caufield, and Sterne under the following circumstances, and at a later stage of the trial: After the contestants, in support of their assertion that said document offered as the decedent's last will was a forgery, had presented much testimony on the part of expert witnesses as to the handwriting of the deceased for the purpose of showing that said instrument was not in his handwriting, the proponent presented a witness named Charles F. Collins, who was a fellow inmate with Morrison at the Fabiola Hospital, and who was asked to relate a conversation between himself and Morrison wherein mention of a will was made by Morrison. The witness, over objections by the contestants, testified that Morrison in that conversation said that he had made a will and left his entire estate to Miss Scott. The objection urged by one of the counsel for the contestants to the admissibility of this evidence was in the following form:

"I object on behalf of the heirs on the ground that this is incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial and hearsay as declarations inadmissible to show the contents of the will,"

—to which the court responded:

"It doesn't appear to me that way. It may be a circumstance to show that there was a will; objection overruled."

At the conclusion of the testimony of the witness, counsel for contestants moved to strike from the record all of the testimony of Collins upon the same ground, and also upon the ground that it was "inadmissible to prove the existence of any will at any time or at that time." The court denied said motion. Similar evidence was also offered by two other witnesses, Martin Caufield and Albert Sterne, to which similar objections and similar rulings were made. The contestants urge upon this appeal that the testimony of these three witnesses was inadmissible over their said objections, and cite in support of their said contention the same line of authorities which were cited by them in support of their effort to have excluded or limited the testimony of the witnesses McKenzie and Hoffman. In most of these cases, however, the question of the admissibility of the declarations of a decedent as to whether he had made or had not made a will arose in proceedings where the issue of fraud or menace or undue influence was involved, as in the case of In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 P. 577, and also Estate of Gregory, 133 Cal. 131, 65 P. 315, wherein the contestants' specification was to the effect that the proponents of the decedent's later will had procured her signature to the same while she was in an intoxicated condition. The court in the Gregory Case elaborated upon and followed the rule laid down in the Calkins Case to the effect that the declarations of a decedent were inadmissible upon the issue of undue influence; and, after doing so, undertook in a sentence to give application of the same doctrine to cases wherein the issue of forgery was involved. In Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583-594, 82 P. 252, wherein the only issues involved were those of fraud and undue influence, this court held, upon the authority of In re Calkins and Estate of Gregory, supra, that the declarations of the testator when not part of the res gestæ were not admissible as narrations of the exercise or effect of undue influence. In Estate of Thomas, 155 Cal. 488-494, 101 P. 798, wherein the sole issue involved in the contest of the decedent's offered will was that it was a forgery, this court upheld the action of the trial court in permitting the admission of declarations of the alleged testator as to the existence within his knowledge of certain facts which were, if known by him, contrary to the recitals contained in the disputed will to the effect that such facts were not known to him at the time of the alleged making of the contested will.

This court, in passing upon this question, cited Estate of Gregory and Estate of Arnold, supra, as to the correctness of the rule as applicable to that class of cases, and also cited Throckmorton v. Holt, supra. In so doing, however, the court stated that there was a strong counter current of authority "by which it is held that where the issue is forgery, declarations of the testator, even as to his testamentary intent, though forming no part of the res gestæ, will be received as tending to prove the issue." In Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 P. 598, wherein the sole issue was that of undue influence, the court reaffirmed the rule approved in Estate of Arnold, supra, but held that, even in such a case, the declarations of the decedent showing her state of mind and mental attitude toward the various objects of her bounty were admissible, and might be legitimately considered by the jury, if limited in the instructions of the court to that purpose. In Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467-485, 117 P. 539, the court approved the rule laid down in Estate of Snowball, supra. In Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756-762, 130 P. 872, wherein also the sole issue was that of undue influence, the court held that the declarations of a testator as to his state of mind at the time of the execution of his will when not part of the res gestæ were inadmissible, citing a number of the cases above referred to and among them Estate of Gregory. In Estate of Carson, 184 Cal. 437, 194 P. 5, 17 A. L. R. 239, involving the issue of undue influence, the subject was somewhat remotely considered and the doctrine in the Arnold Case generally approved. In Estate of Sweetman, 185 Cal. 27, 195 P. 918, the issues involved arose out of an attempt on the part of the proponents to probate a lost or destroyed will; the immediate question presented being as to whether such will was in existence at the date of the death of the decedent. Evidence was offered and admitted as to the declaration of the decedent made three days before her death that a certain will theretofore executed by her was in existence. The admissibility of this evidence was conceded, but the court divided as to the effect of its admission as overcoming the presumption which arises when a will cannot be found that it has been destroyed animo revocandi. This case is here cited, not for the purpose of showing that the court therein passed upon the question of the admissibility of such evidence, but of showing the propriety of recourse to this class of evidence when the direct issue is as to whether a certain document alleged to be the decedent's will was in existence prior to his death or was a later creation. In the light of the foregoing review of our previous decisions it cannot be said that the immediate question herein presented has been definitely decided. This much, however, may be said, as was said in the Estate of Thomas, supra, that—"There is a strong counter current of authority by which it is held that where the issue is forgery, declarations of the testator, even as to his testamentary intent, though forming no part of the res gestæ, will be received as tending to prove the issue."

The question at the last analysis largely depends upon the circumstances of the particular case. It must be conceded that the circumstances of the instant case are peculiar, since, while the contestants herein, or some of them, at least, alleged as grounds of contest that the will in question was the product of undue influence, and also of an insane delusion on the part of the testator, these grounds of contest were upon the trial wholly abandoned by the contestants, and the only evidence offered by them, or any of them, aside from their attempt to discredit the proponent's witnesses, was confined to the offer of expert testimony upon the subject of the decedent's handwriting. Upon this subject the testimony of these opinion witnesses, pro and con, was sharply in conflict. In this state of the case, and after all of such expert testimony had been presented, the trial court permitted the introduction of the testimony of the three above-named witnesses for the proponent to the effect that the testator had declared to each of them a short while before he died that he had made a will and left his property to the proponent herein. An instructive and persuasive case bearing upon an almost identical situation is that of Hoppe v. Byers, 60 Md. 381. In that case, as in this, the sole question was whether the proffered document offered for probate was in the handwriting of the decedent or was a forgery, and the only direct testimony upon that issue was the testimony of handwriting experts. In such a state of the case the contestants offered in evidence the declaration of the decedent made to his wife a few days before his death "that he had made no disposition of his property, and that the law made for him the only will he wished; that she would get a good part of his property and the balance would go to his grandchildren." In upholding the admission in evidence of this declaration on the part of the alleged testator, the Supreme Court of Maryland said:

"There was no witness who could prove that he saw the deceased write or sign it. Proof as to his handwriting, by witnesses acquainted with it, was the only direct testimony by which the genuineness of the instrument could be established or assailed. Such testimony was offered, and we infer from the record, that a large number of witnesses, and perhaps an equal number on each side, testified upon this subject, those for the caveators swearing that to the best of their knowledge and belief the writing was not, and those for the caveatees that it was, the handwriting of the decedent. The jury had also before them on the same paper the admittedly genuine part of the letter and were at liberty to compare this with the disputed writing. But in this state of case was no other evidence admissible? Were the jury bound to decide the issue and make up their verdict upon such testimony alone, and do the rules of evidence inexorably exclude from their consideration every other fact or circumstance that would tend to throw light upon the subject, so as to render it probable or improbable that such a paper was ever written by the deceased, or in corroboration of the direct testimony as to handwriting given on either side? We think not. It must be admitted that testimony as to handwriting, in any case of alleged forgery, though the best the nature of the case admits of, is usually the most unsatisfactory species of evidence courts of justice have to deal with. It is matter of common experience in such cases that witnesses of equal honesty and character, and with equal means of knowledge, are found to testify both for and against the genuineness of the disputed signature. The difficulty and doubt are increased in a case like the present, where the instrument alleged to be forged is set up as a will which takes effect only after death, and where a forgery, if committed, would surely, if ever, come to the knowledge of the party whose testament it purports or is said to be. It seems to us that in such a case every collateral fact and circumstance which is not clearly immaterial and irrelevant ought to be admitted, to aid the jury in reaching the truth, which after all is the object of every jury trial."

The foregoing decision and the reasons which are given to support it has been cited with approval by a number of other states in decisions made since its rendition, and the doctrine therein declared, with notes embracing these decisions, has been embodied in the text of the following authors in the editions of their works on evidence issued or revised since the decision of the Maryland case: See 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) pp. 57, 81, 261; 4 Chamberlayne on Evidence, § 2649; Chase's Stephens Digest of Law of Evidence (2d Ed.) p. 100; 1 Elliott on Evidence, § 533; 1 Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) § 112, 3 Id. §§ 1735, 1736. In the author's note to Wigmore on Evidence, § 112, supra, the case of Hoppe v. Byers, supra, and the later decisions of other states adopting its doctrine are cited at length, and the case of Throckmorton v. Holt, supra, which indicates a different rule, is criticised as against the weight of authority and as "a lonesome decision." In the comparatively recent case of State v. Ready, 78 N. J. Law, 599, 75 A. 564, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 240, it was held in a case involving a prosecution for the forgery of a will that evidence was admissible of the declarations of a testator indicating an intent to execute a will of the tenor of that alleged to have been forged if made at a period not so remote from the date of the will as to render them immaterial, citing in support thereof 3 Wigmore on Evidence, supra, as stating the correct rule. From this résumé of the most recent authorities touching this subject, and the comment of the standard text-writers thereon, we are satisfied that, under the limitations stated in the foregoing excerpts from Hoppe v. Byers, supra, and under the circumstances of this particular case, the declarations of the testator that he had made a will and had named therein the proponent herein as his sole beneficiary were admissible in evidence as tending to show the existence of such a document prior to the death of the decedent.

[5] The remaining contentions of the appellants herein relate to a large number of alleged errors and irregularities on the part of the trial judge occurring during the trial of the cause. The trial of the cause was had before the court sitting without a jury. It occupied several weeks, and the record thereof and of the evidence taken therein is embraced in four bulky volumes containing more than 1,000 pages of typewritten testimony and numerous exhibits. The appellants herein have furnished us with no appendix to their briefs, and with but one opening brief wherein the irregularities complained of are recited and commented upon in a space of 50 pages largely taken up with comment and with only brief and disconnected excerpts from the testimony. With respect to many, if not most, of these alleged errors and irregularities it would be impossible to estimate their seriousness without recourse to a much more extended review of the record than the appellants have seen fit to assist us in making. We have, however, sufficiently examined the record to conclude that the contentions of the appellants as to the rulings and conduct of the trial judge are not sufficiently well founded to justify a reversal of the case. A few examples will suffice. The appellants criticize the trial court for certain occasional interruptions and possibly strictures of the trial court made during the giving of the testimony of the handwriting expert witness Heinrich, called on behalf of the contestants. The testimony of the witness Heinrich in chief occupies 54 pages of the reporter's transcript, during the course of which the witness was given the utmost latitude in stating his conclusions as to the authenticity of the disputed will based upon comparisons with admittedly genuine specimens of the testator's handwriting, and also in giving his views as to the peculiarities and divergencies of different schools and systems and national traits in handwriting. The efforts of the trial judge to confine the witness' outflow of opinion to the limits prescribed by section 1944 of the Code of Civil Procedure were only occasional, and did not in our opinion, evince any disposition to unduly curb or discredit the testimony of this witness or discount the proper degree of weight to be accorded to it. The same thing may be said as to the testimony of the witness Eisenschimmel, whose testimony in chief, covering substantially the same ground as the former witness, occupied 45 pages of the reporter's transcript. The trial judge did, at the outset of this witness' testimony, make an effort to abbreviate his examination in chief with the suggestion that, after he had given his conclusions that the will was a forgery, his reasons therefor might well be left to be developed upon cross-examination, but this course was not followed, and the witness proceeded to testify with great fullness, going far beyond the Code limitation in theorizing upon handwriting in general. Some of these excursions the court very properly checked, but his course in so doing did not, in our opinion, indicate any disposition not to give an open-minded consideration to such of the witness' testimony as was relevant to the inquiry. With respect to the testimony of the witness McGovern, called for the proponent, the appellants complain at the action of the court in permitting the said witness to change his testimony as to a particular date when he first saw and examined the disputed will after consulting a letter which he drew from his pocket and handed to the court at its request for inspection, but which letter was not put in evidence. The episode occurred within the observation of contestants' counsel, who made no comment upon the same at the time, and made no request either for an inspection of the letter or for its presentation in evidence. Their later urged objection to the action of the trial judge in the premises was evidently an afterthought. It would unduly lengthen this opinion to pursue the subject farther. Looking to the record as a whole, it would seem that the trial judge distributed his comments and suggestions freely and rather impartially among the several handwriting experts on both sides of the case, frequently asking questions and displaying a very decided and intelligent interest in the subject of handwriting, to which he stated he had given considerable study. That the trial judge did occasionally, as the case dragged its weary length toward its conclusion, manifest impatience with the prolongation and prolixity of the examination of the witnesses for both sides of the case is true; but this is not unusual during trials, and was in the main in this case justifiable. We do not find that his action throughout or in so doing either interfered with a full presentation of the evidence, or disclosed an attitude of partiality or prejudice in respect to the merits of the case. With the question as to whether the trial judge ruled rightly upon the motion of the contestants to disqualify him from participation in the hearing upon motion for new trial we are not concerned, since the appellants concede that it rested in his own power and discretion to decide the question of his own disqualification, and the correctness of his ruling in that regard is not contested upon these appeals.

The judgment is affirmed.

75 Cal. App. 404

PEOPLE v. SWOAPE et al. (Cr. 1243.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 2, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⌘622(1)—Granting motion for separate trial within sound discretion of court.

The granting of motion for separate trial to defendants, jointly charged with commission of offense, rests in the sound discretion of the court, under Pen. Code, § 1098.

2. Criminal law ⌘622(2)—Court's refusal to grant defendant separate trial because of other defendant's statements and admissions not abuse of discretion.

In prosecution for grand larceny, held, court did not abuse discretion in refusing to grant one defendant's motion for separate trial because of other defendant's statements and admissions, where trial court repeatedly instructed jury statements made by such defendant could not be considered as to other defendants.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 507 $\frac{1}{2}$, 1170(2)—Sustaining objection to question whether witness had been charged with or arrested for same offense erroneous, but not injurious.

It was error to not permit inquiry on cross-examination to show that state's witness had been charged or arrested for same offense as accused, thus showing him to be accomplice, requiring corroboration under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111, the examination not being properly restricted, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2051, to convictions for felonies, but, in view of witness' admitted participation, such error was harmless.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1166 $\frac{1}{2}$ (12)—Defendant not prejudiced by court's intimation counsel would be in contempt if further attempt made to elicit information which it erroneously believed inadmissible.

In larceny prosecution, where trial court erroneously excluded testimony on cross-examination, under mistaken theory that it was inadmissible, held, defendant was not prejudiced by trial court's intimation thereafter that counsel would be in contempt of court if he further attempted to elicit such information.

5. Larceny $\S$ 70(3)—Refusal of instruction on accessories held error, in view of evidence.

In larceny prosecution, where it was possible from evidence jury did not believe accused had aided and abetted in actual theft, but believed that after property was stolen accused obtained full knowledge of the facts and concealed same from magistrate, or protected persons charged with crime, held, court erred in refusing to give requested instruction to effect that if defendant's co-operation was only after crime had been committed he was entitled to acquittal.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 69—Accessory before the fact aiding and abetting commission of crime, punishable as principal.

An accessory before the fact, who aids and abets in the commission of a crime, is punishable as a principal, in view of Pen. Code, $\S$ 971.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 1167(1)—Defendant not injured by alleged variance of information charging theft of drill pipe and evidence showing theft of line pipe.

In prosecution for larceny, held, accused was not injured by reason of alleged variance between information charging theft of "drill" pipe, and evidence showing theft of "line" pipe, where it was disclosed pipe was originally drill pipe, but prior to time it was stolen it was converted to line pipe.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 829(13)—Refusal of requested instructions as to competency of codefendant's written statement not error, where covered by other instructions in substance.

In prosecution for larceny, refusal of court to give requested instruction that written statement of one codefendant was not competent evidence against other defendant held not erroneous, where the substance thereof was contained in given instructions.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 742(2), 780(1)—Court should instruct on law of accomplices when it is involved, and leave decision to jury.

When question of accomplices arises in trial of case, the generally accepted rule is for court to instruct jury touching law of accomplices, and to leave question whether or not witness was accomplice for decision of jury as matter of fact.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 742(2)—When facts are undisputed, it is for court to say whether witness was an accomplice.

Whenever the facts are in dispute as to whether witness did things which would make him an accomplice, jury's determination thereon will not be disturbed, but where the facts undisputed it becomes a question of law for court whether facts make witness an accomplice.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 780(2)—Witness' uncontradicted testimony required instruction that he was accomplice.

In prosecution for larceny, where testimony of witness to effect that he knew property was being stolen and assisted in loading it on truck was uncontradicted, refusing instruction that witness was an accomplice, and that instructions given on subject of accomplices should be applied, was error.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 780(3)—Refusal of instruction as to sufficiency of corroborative evidence, which defined "corroborative evidence," held to deprive defendant of substantial right.

In prosecution for larceny, refusal of defendant's requested instruction to effect that corroboration of accomplice is not sufficient if it merely shows commission of offense or circumstances thereof, and which defined "corroborative evidence" as additional evidence of a different character to the same point, held to deprive accused of substantial right.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Corroborating Evidence.]

13. Criminal law $\S$ 780(3)—Instruction on feigned accomplices, not based on evidence, erroneous, as permitting jury to engage in guesswork.

In prosecution for larceny, court's instructions as to feigned or pretended accomplices held erroneous, as permitting jury to engage in guesswork, as to whether accomplices in case were real or feigned, inasmuch as there was no evidence upon which such instructions should be given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

William F. Patterson and Charles Slack were convicted of grand larceny, and they appeal. Reversed.

Wood & McArthur and Earl W. Wood, all of Long Beach, and Wallace Collins, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Hamish B. Eddie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. On an information which charged R. L. Swoape, William F. Patterson, and Charles Slack with the crime of grand larceny, the defendants Patterson and Slack were convicted. Each of them appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] At the outset it is urged by appellant Slack that he is entitled to a new trial, for the reason that by the order of the trial court he was denied a separate trial from his codefendants. By the information all the defendants were charged jointly with the commission of the offense, and in such circumstances, by statutory provision, the granting of a motion for a separate trial rests in the sound discretion of the court. Section 1098, Pen. Code; People v. Anderson, 59 Cal. App. 408, 431, 211 P. 254. The determinative question is whether the trial court abused the discretion vested in it. The principal reason urged by Slack for a separate trial was that it appeared from an examination of the transcript of the record of the preliminary examination that defendant Patterson had made statements or admissions involving the other defendants and particularly involving said defendant Slack, which said statements and admissions, if competent against the defendant making them, would not be admissible against the said defendant Slack, and consequently that such admissions and statements were prejudicial to said defendant Slack.

In the case of Commonwealth v. Place, 153 Pa. 314, 26 A. 620, where a motion for a separate trial was denied to one of the two defendants, it was held that:

"The fact that one defendant was attempting to escape by throwing the blame on the other, was no reason why the court should grant them separate trials."

In the case of People v. Hotz, 261 Ill. 239, 103 N. E. 1007, where a similar question was before the court, it is said (syllabus):

"The court, by expressly limiting testimony as to statements made by one of the defendants to such defendant alone, sufficiently protected the rights of his codefendants, and the denial of separate trials on the ground that such statements would be offered in evidence was not error."

[2] In view of the fact, as appears by the record herein, that the trial court repeatedly instructed the jury in substance that the statements made by the defendant Patterson could not be considered as to the other defendants, and that any confession would apply only to the defendant making it, while from a practical standpoint the efficacy of such admonition may be doubted, presumably from a legal standpoint the jury was able to and did disregard the confession made by the defendant Patterson so far as it contained any implicative statements regarding the defendant Slack. It must therefore be held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a separate trial to defendant Slack.

[3] One of the witnesses for the prosecution testified to his participation in the commission of the offense of which the defendants were charged. On cross-examination, among other questions, he was asked:

"Q. You have been charged by an information with this same crime, have you not? Q. Well, have you been arrested for this same offense?"

Counsel for defendant Slack explained that the purpose of the questions was to show that the witness was an accomplice; but an objection interposed by the people as to each of such questions was sustained by the court on the theory that, according to the provisions of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the only permissible question to be asked the witness in connection with the matter was whether he had ever been convicted of a felony. If it be assumed that the witness had never been convicted of a felony, the credibility of the witness would be still open to investigation. It would seem but reasonable that, for the purpose of attacking the credibility of the witness by showing that he was an accomplice, or that he had been charged with the commission of an identical offense for which the defendants in the action were on trial, and that the witness was testifying with the hope of obtaining immunity, the defendants should have been permitted to show the facts. In such circumstances the provisions of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, with reference to a conviction of a felony, would not be exclusive. As is stated in 40 Cyc. p. 2683, where authorities are cited:

"As indicating interest or bias, it is proper to show that a witness for the prosecution or the defense in a criminal case has himself been officially accused of or indicted for the crime for which defendant is on trial, particularly where the witness testifies for the prosecution under a promise of or in the expectation of leniency or immunity."

In State v. Rosa, 71 N. J. Law, 316, 58 A. 1010, it is said:

"* * * The fact that a witness knows himself to be officially accused of the crime which his evidence tends to fasten upon another person cannot be overlooked in considering whether he is free from every influence that might lead to falsehood."

In State v. Burpee, 65 Vt. 1, 25 A. 964, 19 L. R. A. 145, 36 Am. St. Rep. 775, appears the following:

"If he was under suspicion of having committed the identical crime in question, and had been arrested for it, he was testifying as it were with a rope about his neck, and might naturally desire and seek to screen himself in the account he gave as to how the cattle came into his possession."

In the case of People v. Demera, 64 Cal. App. 121, 220 P. 673, where it appeared that the witness was the originator of the crime and had been jointly charged therewith with the defendant, but which witness before taking the witness stand had had the action dismissed as to him, the court said:

"While he was upon the stand the counsel for the defense endeavored to bring these facts before the jury in order to attack his credibility as a witness which, of course, they had a right to do."

See, also, People v. Robles, 34 Cal. 591, 594.

The testimony given by the witness here in question was of a most damaging character to the case of the defendants. The credibility of the witness, so far as the defendants were concerned, was of vital importance. If the witness was an accomplice of the defendants, it was necessary before a conviction of the defendants could be had thereon that the evidence of the accomplice be corroborated by such other evidence as tended to connect the defendants with the commission of the offense. Section 1111, Pen. Code. The defendants were therefore entitled to show by this witness just what was his position with reference to the situation then before the court. That right having been denied the defendants, it follows that in that regard the defendants were injured by the action of the court were it not for the further fact that within the testimony of the same witness, his complicity appears in that it was shown that he did take part in the commission of the crime. The error of the court therefore became immaterial, as did another alleged error of the court in sustaining an objection to the following question asked the witness by counsel for defendants: "Well; you did help steal this pipe, didn't you?"

[4] In connection with the asking of such questions, misconduct of the court is charged, in that the judge strongly intimated to counsel for defendants that if any further attempt were made to elicit the desired information from the witness counsel would be in contempt of court and be ordered to suffer accordingly. But from the judge's viewpoint, believing, as he apparently did, that the questions were improper, the course pursued by him was entirely regular and fully justified. No undue harshness or arbitrariness was indulged in by the court, nor was any personal reflection cast upon either of the defendants. In such circumstances we are unable to agree with appellants that the jury was prejudicially affected against defendants by reason of any alleged misconduct on the part of the court.

[5, 6] Defendant Slack requested the court to give to the jury the following instruction, which was by the court refused:

"The court instructs the jury that an accessory, as defined in the Penal Code of this state, is a person, who after full knowledge that a felony has been committed, conceals it from the magistrate, or harbors and protects the person charged with it or convicted thereof, and if you believe that the defendant Charles Slack is such an accessory and not a principal in the commission of the crime charged, you should find the defendant Charles Slack not guilty."

It is suggested that, because defendant Slack claimed and attempted to prove that he was only an accessory after the fact, he was entitled to have the quoted instruction given to the jury. Had he been an accessory before the fact or aided and abetted in the commission of the crime, he would have been punishable as a principal. Section 971, Pen. Code. His requested instruction proposed to tell the jury that in view of the particular offense of which he was charged, if his co-operation with the thieves was only after the crime had been committed, he was entitled to an acquittal. The case of People v. Gassaway, 28 Cal. 404, is in point. It is there held (syllabus) that:

"Upon a trial for robbery, if the evidence is circumstantial and involves the inquiry whether the defendant was guilty, if guilty at all, as principal or as an accessory after the fact, the court should instruct the jury, if requested, that the defendant cannot be convicted if he was only an accessory after the fact."

The evidence included testimony that the night after the pipe was stolen Slack met one of the men who were concerned in the affair and said to him:

"Say, the boys got caught taking the pipe last night. Now you don't know anything about it, and see that you don't. There has been three or four dicks around the office all day."

The evidence tended to show that Slack did not know that the pipe was to be stolen, but that about noon of November 19th, which was the day following the theft, he heard that it had been taken and who had taken it; that Slack met a man by the name of Ponder, who, it appeared from the evidence, helped steal the pipe, the last night of November before Ponder became a fugitive from justice, and said to him:

"I thought you were in jail. You took my truck when you got that pipe, didn't you? You will be in jail."

Also, that with full knowledge of the theft and who committed it Slack took no action against the guilty parties.

It is possible that the jury did not believe that Slack aided and abetted in the actual theft of the pipe, but did believe that after the pipe was stolen he obtained full knowledge of the facts and thereafter concealed them from the magistrate, or harbored or protected the persons charged with the commission of the crime; and that thereupon the jury concluded that Slack should be found guilty of the crime charged in the information. It would therefore appear that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the requested instruction.

[7] It is contended by appellants that, whereas the information accuses them of the crime of grand larceny in that they "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take, steal and carry away 20 lengths of 6-inch drill pipe," etc., the evidence shows that instead of the pipe being "drill" pipe it was "line" pipe that was stolen, and hence that a fatal variance exists between the allegation and the proof. The evidence disclosed that the pipe was originally drill pipe, but that by reason of the removal of the tool joints thereof prior to the time that the pipe was stolen the pipe was thereby converted, from drill pipe to line pipe. It is clear that the defendants were in no wise injured in their defense by reason of such alleged variance, and for that reason they are in no position to complain of the discrepancy.

[8] Complaint is made by appellant Slack that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury, at his request, an instruction to the effect that:

"The court instructs the jury that the written statement of the defendant Patterson is not competent evidence against the defendant Slack, and that no portion of said statement should be considered by this jury against the defendant Slack."

The specification of error, however, we think not well founded, for the reason that the substance of the requested instruction was contained in one of the other instructions given by the court to the jury.

[9-11] A man by the name of Johnson was a witness for the prosecution. He testified, in substance, that he knew the pipe was being stolen and assisted in loading it on the truck that carried it away. There was no contradiction of his testimony in that regard. In such circumstances the defendant Slack requested the court to give to the jury the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that the witness Johnson is an accomplice in the commission of the offense charged in the information herein, and for which the defendants are on trial, and that the instructions that are here given to you on the subject of an accomplice should be applied by you to the testimony of said witness."

The requested instruction was by the court refused.

In the case of People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 433, 436, 119 P. 901, 902 (39 L. R. A. [N. S.] 704), the rule with reference to the duty of the trial court, where the question is whether a witness is an accomplice, is stated as follows:

"When the question of an accomplice arises in the trial of a case, the general and accepted rule is for the court to instruct the jury touching the law of accomplices, and leave the question whether or not the witness be an accomplice for the decision of the jury as a matter of fact. People v. Kraker, 72 Cal. 459, 14 P.

196, 1 Am. St. Rep. 65. Whenever the facts themselves are in dispute, that is to say, whenever the question is whether the witness did or did not do certain things, which, admittedly, if he did do them, make him an accomplice, the jury's finding, upon familiar principles, is not disturbed. But where the facts are not in dispute, where the acts and conduct of the witness are admitted, it becomes a question of law for the court to say whether or not those acts and facts make the witness an accomplice. For the law declares in mandatory terms that: 'A conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice, unless he is corroborated by other evidence which in itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof.' Pen. Code, § 1111."

The point is elaborated in the case of People v. Southwell, 28 Cal. App. 430, 433, 152 P. 939, 940, where, among other things, it is said:

"Under this state of the case, and assuming that the corroborative evidence, admittedly slight, was sufficient to support the conviction, it was very material to the defendant to have the law as to the testimony of accomplices explicitly stated to the jury. It was not for the jury to decide whether each or any of the witnesses were accomplices, but under the testimony, it was the duty of the court to give the requested instructions advising the jury that Mrs. Willie Martin and Rena McMonagle were both accomplices as to the crime charged against the appellant. Under the state of the record as we have described it, there should have been left to the jury no discretion of judgment to determine as to whether these witnesses were accomplices; the testimony showed as a fact that they were. For aught that appears, the jury may not have applied the rule of section 1111 of the Penal Code, to the testimony of these witnesses, but may have given full credit and weight to their testimony and left out of account altogether the requirement that such testimony, before it was sufficient to warrant a conviction, should be corroborated by other and independent evidence. For this error alone, we think that the appellant is entitled to a new trial."

The comment made by the court in the case last cited, respecting the possible effect on the jury of the failure of the court to declare as a matter of law that the witnesses therein referred to were accomplices, is applicable in the instant case. Relying upon the testimony given by Johnson, the jury would have been correctly instructed by the court had it been told that Johnson was an accomplice and that his testimony was to be weighed in accordance with the law affecting the testimony of accomplices, as elsewhere given by the court to the jury. Johnson's testimony affected all the defendants, but particularly implicated defendant Slack, and all the defendants were entitled to have Johnson's testimony judged by the jury in accordance with the provisions of the statute affecting the testimony given by accomplices. That right was denied them; and it is impossible to determine the severity of the injury which each of them suffered by reason of such refusal.

[12] Defendant Slack also requested the court to give to the jury the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that, in a criminal action, a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense charged and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof; and the jury are further instructed that by corroborative evidence is meant additional evidence of a different character to the same point."

In lieu of such instruction, the court gave to the jury another instruction which, in substance, covered the law as presented in defendant Slack's proposed instruction, with the exception that it omitted the statement that "the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof; and the jury are further instructed that by corroborative evidence is meant additional evidence of a different character to the same point." The first clause in such omitted statement is a part of the language of the statute (section 1111, Pen. Code); and the latter part, that is, that "by corroborative evidence is meant additional evidence of a different character to the same point," in view of the fact that the evidence of accomplices was relied upon to a very considerable extent by the prosecution, was of extreme importance to the defendant's case and should have been given to the jury. The question here presented was passed upon by the Supreme Court in the case of People v. Sternberg, 111 Cal. 11, 43 P. 201, where it was said:

"Members of a jury might be in excusable ignorance of the legal definition of corroborative evidence and yet possess (or at least they should) intelligence enough to comprehend what was meant when they were told that it was additional evidence of a different character to the same point. The second and third proposed instructions are correct in law. They were not covered by any that were given, and should have been declared, if applicable to the case. That they were applicable no doubt can be entertained. The evidence of accomplices was before the jury. It was defendant's right that his triers should know that it was a duty imposed upon them by law to receive this evidence with distrust. The question of the support of such testimony by corroborative evidence was a vital one for their determination. They were instructed in the language of the code (Pen. Code, § 1111) that they could not convict unless there was corroborative evidence. Defendant was plainly within his right in asking that they be told what corroborative evidence is. That the jury was instructed in the language of section 1111 of the Penal Code, that the evidence of an accomplice is not sufficient to convict unless he is corroborated by other evidence which, in itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to convict [connect] defendant with the commission of the crime, informed them of the amount and kind of corroborative evidence required, but they were still left without enlightenment as to what in law constitutes this character of evidence."

In People v. La Rue, 62 Cal. App. 276, 216 P. 627, the court, in commenting upon the importance to a defendant of an instruction similar to the one here being considered, used the following language:

"Where the prosecution relies for a conviction upon the testimony of an accomplice, even though corroborated, the proposed instruction should be given, because the jury may reject the corroborating evidence as unworthy of belief, and in such case the instruction would be vital."

See, also, People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 433, 436, 119 P. 901, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 704.

It therefore becomes clear that, through the refusal of the court to give the instruction requested by defendant Slack, said defendant was deprived of a substantial right.

[13] Appellants specify further error in that, at the request of the people, the court gave to the jury the following instructions:

"The court further instructs the jury that the question whether a witness is an accomplice in fact and intent or only a feigned or pretended accomplice, is to be determined by the jury from all the evidence and circumstances in proof in the case.

"The uncorroborated testimony of one who, under the direction of the officers of the law, or of any other person, or upon his own initiative, feigns complicity in the commission of a crime merely for the purpose of detecting and prosecuting the perpetrators thereof is not an accomplice in law and the law does not require corroboration of such witness."

It is contended by appellants, and not denied by respondent, that the record discloses no evidence upon which either of such instructions could be given. Such being the case, it must be assumed that there was no evidence of a feigned accomplice having operated in the course of the commission of the offense. The harmful effect of the criticized instructions is apparent. They permitted the jury to indulge in guesswork as to whether any or all of the accomplices in the case were real, or whether, under the direction of officers of the law or on their own initiative, they were feigning complicity in the perpetration of the crime. If the jury concluded that the latter state of affairs existed, the instructions informed the jury that the testimony of such accomplices required no corroboration, thereby giving to such testimony weight and credit not permitted to be given to the testimony of accomplices by the terms of the statute.

Other specifications of error are presented by each of the appellants, but, if the correct conclusion has been reached on those points which have already been touched upon herein, it is useless to devote further consideration to the appeal.

It is ordered that the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial as to each of appellants be and they are reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

PEOPLE v. BURKETT et al. (Civ. 2924.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 27, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 25, 1926.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⚡272—Written notice to owner of premises not required, where permanent injunction only is sought.

Provision of St. 1915, p. 236, § 3, requiring two weeks' written notice to owner of premises before filing of complaint for abatement of liquor nuisance, relates to temporary injunctions only, and notice is not necessary where only permanent injunction is sought.

2. Courts ⚡107—Expressions in judicial opinion read in light of particular question considered.

Expressions in a judicial opinion must be read in light of particular question presented for decision and under consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the People against Grant Burkett and others to abate liquor nuisance. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed with direction.

William E. Rothe, Dist. Atty., of Chico, and Clinton W. Johnson, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Oroville, for the People.

Bond & Deirup and J. Oscar Goldstein, all of Chico, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that the defendant Park Hotel Company is the owner of a certain described building; that a designated part of the building "is, and for many months prior to the filing of this complaint has been, used for the purpose of unlawfully selling, serving, keeping, storing, and giving away intoxicating liquor"; that the defendants "during all the time herein mentioned have been and now are conducting and maintaining the same as a place where intoxicating liquors have been, and now are, kept, sold, stored, or given away," contrary to the state and national prohibition laws. The prayer is for a judgment, among other things, abating the alleged nuisance, and enjoining the further maintenance thereof by defendants. The complaint does not allege that the district attorney had served notice of the existence of the alleged nuisance upon the owner of the property prior to the filing of the complaint. The defendants Burkett and Park Hotel Company filed separate demurrers to the complaint, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the action. This appeal is from the judgment of dismissal. A temporary injunction was not applied for.

Counsel for respondent Burkett, evidently through oversight as to the contents of the complaint, contends that the allegations thereof show the maintenance of a nuisance, not at the time the complaint was filed, but only at times prior thereto. Counsel's error is apparent from the parts of the complaint herein set out.

[1] The only other ground upon which respondents attempt to justify the ruling of the court is that the complaint is insufficient in the failure to allege that written notice was served upon the owner of the property by the district attorney prior to the filing of the complaint. They rely upon the provisions of section 3 of chapter 132, Statutes of 1915. That section reads as follows:

"The complaint in such action must be verified unless filed by the district attorney. Whenever the existence of such nuisance is shown in such action to the satisfaction of the court or judge thereof, either by verified complaint or affidavit, and the court or judge is satisfied that the owner of the property, has received written notice of the existence of such nuisance, signed by the complainant or the said district attorney at least two weeks prior to the filing of the complaint, the court or judge shall allow a temporary writ of injunction to abate and prevent the continuance or recurrence of such nuisance. On granting such writ the court or judge must require, except when it is granted on application of the people of the state, written undertaking on the part of the applicant, with sufficient sureties, to the effect that he will pay to the party enjoined such damages, not exceeding an amount to be specified, as such party may sustain by reason of the injunction, if the court finally decides that the applicant was not entitled thereto."

The foregoing provisions, excepting the words herein italicized, are in the precise language of section 4 of chapter 17, Statutes of 1913, relating to the abatement of houses of prostitution. The other sections of the act of 1915 are largely literal copies of those contained in the act of 1913. The provisions of that act have been declared valid in several cases arising thereunder. People v. Barbieri, 33 Cal. App. 770, 166 P. 812; People v. Casa Co., 35 Cal. App. 194, 169 P. 454; Selowsky v. Superior Court of Napa County, 180 Cal. 404, 181 P. 652. The provision of section 3 of the act in question here, requiring service of notice upon the owner of the property alleged to be a nuisance, so clearly relates to the issuance of a temporary injunction only that argument in support of the proposition seems to be superfluous. If section 3 were stricken from the act entirely, the provisions of the remaining sections would fully authorize a judgment, in a proper case, permanently enjoining and abating a nuisance of the character defined in the act, and it is not perceived that the provisions relating to the issuance of a temporary injunction have any bearing whatever in a case where no application is made for a temporary injunction. Respondents rely upon some of the language used in the case of In re Brambini, 192 Cal. 19, 28, 218 P. 569, 573. In that case it is said:

"The next question presented is that arising from the fact that the state law requires that a written notice be given to the owner of the premises before the suit is instituted (Stats. 1915, p. 237, § 3, supra), while the Volstead Act does not require such notice. It is only necessary in the matters at bar to determine whether or not such notice is jurisdictional. If it is jurisdictional in the sense that the superior court would not have authority to issue the preliminary injunction without this notice, then the injunction in this case having been issued without such notice, is void, and the petitioners are entitled to discharge. On the other hand, if the failure to give such notice merely goes to the sufficiency of the complaint as a foundation for the temporary and permanent abatement of the nuisance, and if the error of the court in issuing the temporary injunction is an error committed in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the preliminary injunction in this case comes under the head of an injunction improvidently issued as distinguished from one utterly void and petitioners' remedy was not to violate the injunction, but to apply to the court for its dissolution and in default of such dissolution to appeal to the higher court for a reversal of the order of the superior court in issuing, or in failing to dissolve, the injunction. The authorities fully support the view that such a defect in the complaint is not jurisdictional, because it goes merely to the sufficiency of the facts alleged as a basis for the injunctive relief asked for, and not to the power of the court to issue the injunction."

[2] The only question considered in the paragraph quoted was whether the temporary injunction issued by the trial court was void by reason of the failure to serve notice upon the owner of the existence of the alleged nuisance, and the language used must be understood as applying to that question alone. A permanent injunction had not been issued.

"Expressions in a judicial opinion must be read in the light of the particular question presented for decision and under consideration." City of Oakland v. Buteau, 180 Cal. 83, 88, 179 P. 170, 173.

The language of the court in the Brambini Case is not even the expression of an opinion that notice to the property owner is a prerequisite to the issuance of a permanent injunction, but only that, when application is made for both a temporary and a permanent injunction, notice to the owner of the existence of the alleged nuisance is necessary to justify the issuance of a temporary injunction.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to overrule the demurrers.

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 59(2)—Admission of proof out of order held not error.

In action on altered check, admission of check in evidence before defendant had made any showing held not error, and not determination of plaintiff's right to recover; the order of proof, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 607, 2042, being within discretion of court.

2. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 234(7)—Instructions relative to burden of proof held proper.

In action to recover on altered check, instructions that burden of proof was on plaintiff to show consideration held proper, although such consideration is presumed in case of unaltered instruments.

3. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 242—Instructions relative to presumptions held not confusing.

In action to recover on altered check, instructions relative to presumptions held not confusing.

4. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 243—Instructions relative to presumptions held not conflicting.

In action to recover on altered check, instructions that there were no presumptions in favor of integrity of altered check held not to conflict with other instructions defining and relative to presumptions.

5. Bills and notes $\hookrightarrow$ 538(3)—Instructions relative to consideration supporting subsequent promise held not to conflict with statute.

In action to recover on altered check, where no evidence was introduced that brought case within provisions of Civ. Code, §§ 3094, 3095, relating to validity of check regardless of date inserted by maker, instruction that services as nurse would not constitute consideration to support subsequent promise to pay excessive amount therefor were not in conflict with such code provisions.

6. Bills and notes $\hookrightarrow$ 538(3)—Instruction relating to consideration for altered check held not confusing.

In action to recover on altered check, instruction relative to possibility of services as consideration for such check held not confusing.

7. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 193(2)—Instruction relative to consideration of altered check held not expression of opinion on question of fact.

In action to recover on altered check, instruction relative to plaintiff's services as consideration for such check held not an expression of opinion by court on question of fact.

8. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 260(1)—Refusal of instruction held not error, when subject-matter covered by other instructions.

Refusal of instruction held not error, when subject-matter was covered by other instructions.

9. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 758(3)—Appellate court will not make comparison of pleadings and evidence, where brief of party complaining of error does not do so.

Where appellant's brief, in violation of rules and statute, does not make comparison of allegations of pleadings or the calls of a question as compared with allegations of pleadings or elements of an objection as compared with terms of question objected to, appellate court will not make the comparison.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by E. M. King against Rosa Tarabino, administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of John Tarabino, deceased, substituted for Barney Tarabino, deceased, formerly executor of such estate. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kimball Fletcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arthur W. Eckman and Wm. B. Himrod, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is the second appeal in the above-entitled action. The decision on the first appeal (53 Cal. App. 157, 199 P. 890) sets forth all of the facts, and there is no necessity for repeating the facts in detail.

The plaintiff sought to recover on a check which had certain alterations on the face thereof. On the first appeal it was held that the plaintiff must first assume the burden of accounting for the alterations. When the case was on trial the second time, each party offered the testimony of certain witnesses as experts on the subject of the alterations. Thereafter the court instructed the jury and gave to the jury a general verdict and a number of special verdicts. The jury returned a general verdict and special verdicts in favor of the defendant, and a judgment was entered in accordance therewith. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] The appellant contends that she made out a complete case, and that the respondent did not make out any defense, and therefore the verdict was contrary to the evidence. In making this contention the appellant cites and relies upon Thompson v. Thompson, 140 Cal. 545, 74 P. 21. That case is not in point, because the writing involved in that case was entirely regular on its face. In connection with this point the appellant seems to contend that, because the check was received in evidence, that fact was determinative of the litigation. Of course, that is not the rule. To state such a proposition is to say that under certain circumstances a defendant is not to be heard at all. When the trial court admitted the check in evidence, the ruling of the trial court was in effect to say that the appellant had introduced some evidence tending to support her contention. In this connection we understand the appellant to take the position that the respondent should have made its showing before the check was received in evidence; or, in other words, that in a case such as the instant case the ruling admitting the check in evidence should occur as the very last step in the proceedings in the introduction of evidence in the trial court. The appellant cites and relies in this behalf on what is said in Manuel v. Flynn, 5 Cal. App. 319, 326, 90 P. 463. There is some language in that case tending to support the contention of the appellant, but there is nothing in that case to the effect that the trial judge may not for special reasons otherwise direct the order of proof, or that it is error for the trial court to receive certain proof out of order. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 607, 2042.

The appellant makes several points regarding the giving and refusing of instructions. As printed in the transcript instructions requested but not given are set forth consecutively, and for the purposes of this decision we have lettered the same a, b, c, etc. The instructions given by the trial court are set forth consecutively, but are not numbered, and for the purposes of this decision we have numbered the same 1, 2, 3, etc. Commencing with No. 15, the instructions given include the following:

"(15) The alteration of the signature 'Owen Apartments, by John Tarabino' by a crossing out of the words 'Owen Apartments' is a material alteration of the signature, and consequently the plaintiff under the law must prove by a preponderance of all the evidence that the alteration was made with the knowledge and consent of the said John Tarabino, before plaintiff can recover.

"(16) Section 1700 of the Civil Code of the state of California provides as follows: 'The intentional destruction, cancellation, or material alteration of a written contract, by a party entitled to any benefit under it, or with his consent, extinguishes all the executory obligations of the contract in his favor, against parties who do not consent to the act,' which is but the statutory declaration of the common law that any material alteration of a written instrument made after its execution by a party claiming thereunder or with his privity, without the authority or consent of the other party, or parties, to the instrument, invalidates the instrument in the hands of the party responsible for the alteration, unless the maker subsequently ratified the alteration.

"(17) You are instructed that the check sued upon in this action shows upon its face that it was altered after its signing in that some person, or persons, after John Tarabino wrote at the bottom of the paper 'Owen Apartments by John Tarabino,' expunged the first line of the said signature, leaving standing only the words 'By John Tarabino,' and which alteration would be a material alteration under the law, unless it was assented to or ratified by him.

"(18) Therefore, before you can find a verdict for the plaintiff in this case, you must find, by the preponderance of the evidence, as the same is defined in these instructions, that said alteration of said check was made by, or with the knowledge and consent of, John Tarabino, or was subsequently ratified by him.

"(19) You are instructed that, if, at the close of all the evidence in this case, the evidence is evenly balanced as to whether or not the striking out of the words 'Owen Apartments' from the signature on said check was done with the knowledge, or authorization, or consent, or was subsequently ratified by John Tarabino, then and in that event the plaintiff has not proved by a preponderance of the evidence the truth of such fact, and, therefore, your verdict should be for the defendant.

"(20) In other words, as to any question in this case, the burden of proof of which the court has instructed you is upon the plaintiff, should you feel, at the close of the case, that the evidence respecting the point, is evenly balanced, then the proposition has not been proven by a preponderance of the evidence, and your verdict should be for the defendant.

"(21) You are instructed that the delivery of the instrument sued upon in this action and the consideration therefor are denied by the defendant under oath. This places upon the plaintiff the burden of proof by a preponderance of the evidence that the instrument in controversy, in its altered form as alleged in the plaintiff's complaint, and as appears as to the date and signature, was delivered to the plaintiff by the decedent, John Tarabino, in his lifetime; and this burden must be sustained by the plaintiff, either by direct or indirect evidence, or by presumptive evidence, or by both. If you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff has proven by such evidence that the said instrument, in its form, as alleged in her complaint, and as appears in the date and signature, was delivered to the plaintiff by said decedent, John Tarabino, and that said delivery was for valuable consideration, then and in that case your verdict should be for the plaintiff, otherwise for the defendant.

"(22) It is a presumption of law in this state that a person is the owner of property from exercising acts of ownership over it, and, also, that a thing which a person possesses is owned by him.

"(23) A presumption of law is a deduction which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts. It can be founded only upon a fact or facts legally proved, and not upon another presumption or upon a mere inference of fact.

"(24) The foregoing presumptions are disputable, that is to say, they are satisfactory, if uncontradicted, and, unless so contradicted, the jury is bound to find in accordance with the presumption. But they may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect. When such a presumption is so controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect, it is to be regarded as evidence in the case giving rise to a conflict of evidence, and it is then for the jury to resolve the conflict and determine whether it will find in accordance with the presumption, or in accordance with the other evidence.

"(25) It is for the jury to say whether or not, from a preponderance of all the evidence, there was any consideration of any character or kind for the making, signing, and delivery of the check in question by said John Tarabino to the plaintiff, if you find that said John Tarabino made, signed, and delivered said check to plaintiff in the form in which it has been presented in evidence and to the jury. In other words, if you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the check, in its present form, was delivered by John Tarabino, it will then be for you to find from the evidence whether it was delivered for a valuable consideration, or whether it was delivered as a gift.

"(26) You are instructed, as a matter of law, that, unless a check is supported by a valuable consideration, it is revoked by the death of the maker before its payment, and, therefore, even though you should believe, in this case, from a preponderance of the evidence, that the alterations upon the check in question were made by, or with the knowledge and consent of John Tarabino, or were subsequently ratified by him, yet your verdict cannot be for the plaintiff, unless the plaintiff has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that there was a valuable consideration for the giving of the check to her by John Tarabino, and, unless the plaintiff has established this latter proposition, your verdict must be for the defendant.

"(27) As already stated to you in these instructions, the check sued on in this case appears to have been materially altered after signing. You are instructed that there are no presumptions in favor of the integrity of such an altered instrument, and that the burden is on plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence in the case that such check was delivered to her by John Tarabino in its present condition, or that John Tarabino authorized or directed plaintiff to write her name in said check as payee, together with the words $5,000, in words and figures, and the date, August 13, 1918, or that he assented to or ratified the same. You are further instructed that there is no presumption due to the mere possession of said check that the same was given for a valuable consideration, and the burden is upon plaintiff to prove by preponderance of all the evidence on that point that there was a valuable consideration for said check.

"(28) You are instructed that any services rendered John Tarabino by E. M. King, as nurse or otherwise, if said service was rendered gratuitously, would not constitute a valuable consideration. If such services were rendered, and were not gratuitous, they still would not constitute such a valuable consideration as would support a subsequent promise to pay an amount so greatly in excess of their value as to be wholly disproportionate thereto.

"(29) Some testimony has been admitted in evidence relative to an engagement of marriage between plaintiff and defendant, John Tarabino. Such an engagement, if it existed, would not constitute a valuable consideration to support the check sued on. Where a check is given solely upon the consideration of love and affection, or gratitude and esteem, the death of the maker of such check before it is presented to the bank for payment revokes such check and renders it void.

"(30) It is the duty of the jurors to deliberate and consult with a view of reaching an agreement, if they can do so, without violence to their individual judgment, upon the evidence and under instructions of the court. Each juror must decide the case for himself or herself, but no juror should defer to the opinion of a majority of the jurors if he or she is convinced that a contrary view is proper under the law and evidence in this case.

"In other words, no juror should bow to the will of the majority merely because it is a majority opinion, but should arrive at his or her conclusion from a careful consideration of all the evidence and the instructions in the case."

It will be noted at once that the trial judge meticulously distinguished (1) an unaltered check from (2) a check altered before execution, and (3) from a check altered after execution.

[2] The appellant contends that instructions numbered 20, 21, 26, and 27 conflict with the doctrine stated in Thompson v. Thompson, supra, and Pacific Improvement Co. v. Maxwell, 26 Cal. App. 265, 146 P. 900. The cases cited deal with unaltered instruments. There is nothing in the instructions complained of which is at variance with the cases cited.

[3] The appellant complains of instructions numbered 22, 23, and 24, claiming that they were confusing. The point is not elucidated by argument. We have carefully read the instructions, and find no error.

[4] The appellant also objects to instruction No. 27, and asserts that it nullified the instructions referred to in the preceding paragraph. In support of the contention she cites Bagley v. McMickle, 9 Cal. 430. A most cursory reading of the instructions discloses that one does not conflict with the other, and we find nothing in the case cited which contains anything to support the argument of the appellant.

[5] The appellant asserts that instruction No. 28 conflicts with the provisions of sections 3094 and 3095 of the Civil Code. The point is without merit. Moreover, there was no evidence introduced at the trial that brought the case within the provision of either of the code sections cited.

The appellant cites instruction No. 26, and then she cites the rule that the burden of showing a want of consideration to support an unaltered written instrument rests on the party who would defeat the written instrument. The vice in the contention is that the court in the instruction in question was addressing itself to the law applicable to an altered written instrument.

[6, 7] The appellant complains of instruction No. 28, and asserts that it was confusing, or otherwise it indicated the expression of an opinion by the court on a question of fact. It is not vulnerable to either attack.

[8] The appellant claims that she was seriously prejudiced by the refusal of the trial court to give the instruction lettered (a). There is nothing in the claim because the subject-matter was fully covered by instructions numbers 12, 13, and 14.

The appellant complains because the trial court refused to give the requested instruction lettered (b). The subject-matter of that requested instruction was the disputable presumptions defined in section 1963, Code of Civil Procedure. The instructions which the court did give and which we have quoted above fully cover the subject-matter. The appellant has not called to our attention any particular in which they do not.

[9] The appellant makes the claim that the trial court erred in ruling on the admission of evidence. She divides this claim into five divisions. The form of the first division is similar to that of each of the other divisions. The first division is as follows:

"In view of the allegations of the answer, it was error to sustain the objections assigned as objections 6 and 7."

A brief made up in the foregoing form does not comply with the calls of the statute or the rules of this court, and is not fair to the opposing party. An appellate court will not undertake to make a comparison of the allegations of the pleadings one with the other, the calls of a question as compared with the allegations of the pleadings, and the elements of an objection as compared with the terms of the question objected to, when the party complaining of error neglects to do so in the first instance.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

PEOPLE v. MAIN. (Cr. 1219.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 8, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 4, 1926.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 111(1)—Indictment for selling securities without license need not negative exception of privately owned stock.

An indictment for selling securities without a permit or license, in violation of the Corporate Securities Act, need not negative exception embracing sale of privately owned stock; not bringing the seller within the classification of a dealer or broker.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 31—Estoppel, when applicable in criminal prosecutions, is same in principle as in civil actions.

Estoppel is infrequently invoked in criminal prosecution, but, where applicable, it does not differ in principle from the same rule when used in a civil action.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 31—Essentials of "estoppel by misrepresentation" stated.

To constitute estoppel by misrepresentation, in criminal prosecutions, as in civil actions, the estoppel assertor must be a person to whom, mediate or immediately, the representation was made, and he must, on the faith of the misrepresentation, have changed his position prejudicially.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estoppel in Pais.]

4. Licenses $\S$ 42(4)—Evidence held insufficient to show company, securities of which accused sold, was a corporation.

In a prosecution under the Corporate Securities Act for selling securities in a company alleged to be a corporation, without having obtained a license or permit, evidence held insufficient to show that the company was a corporation.

5. Licenses $\S$ 42(2)—State held not entitled to rely on asserted estoppel to deny corporate existence of company, securities of which accused was alleged to have sold without license.

In prosecution under Corporate Securities Act for selling stock of alleged corporation, without license, the state held not entitled to assert that defendant was estopped to deny corporate existence of the company, but was required to prove such corporate existence, notwithstanding Pen. Code, $\S$ 1102, since injury to, and change of position by, the prosecuting witness, was immaterial, even conceding that the state might assert estoppel in witness' behalf.

6. Licenses $\S$ 42(4)—Use in contracts of word "company" and name of a certain company held not to show company was corporation; "capital stock."

In a prosecution under Corporate Securities Act for selling capital stock of alleged corporation, without license, the use, in contracts introduced by accused, and purporting to be purchase contracts of "capital stock" in a company, of the words "company" and of a name designating a certain oil company, held not to show that the company was a corporation, in view of section 2 of the act; meaning of the phrase "capital stock" not being limited to shares in a corporation.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 317—No presumption arose against accused from his failure to introduce more evidence than he did.

No presumption arose against accused from his failure to introduce more evidence than he did.

8. Licenses $\S$ 42(6)—Absence of proof that company, shares in capital stock of which were contracted to be sold by accused, was corporation having capital stock, held to require reversal.

In a prosecution under the Corporate Securities Act for having sold and issued shares of capital stock, in a company which was alleged to be a corporation, without having obtained a license or permit, absence of proof within Civ. Code, $\S$ 297, or proof establishing a corporation de facto, that the company designated was a corporation having capital stock, held fatal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Hardy, Judge.

F. L. Main was convicted of violating the Corporate Securities Act, and he appeals. Reversed.

Anderson & Anderson, T. E. Parke, and B. V. Elconin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant and appellant was charged by indictment in the county of Los Angeles with having violated the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673). It was alleged in four counts thereof that on the respective dates therein mentioned he sold and issued shares of the capital stock of a corporation which had not obtained a permit to issue or sell its stock, and in a fifth count that, without first having obtained a permit or license so to do, from the commissioner of corporations, he engaged in the business of selling shares of the stock of the same corporation on the dates specified in the first four counts. General and special demurrers were interposed, which were overruled, and the defendant was convicted by a jury upon each of said counts. Motion for a new trial was thereafter presented and overruled, and this is an appeal from the judgment and the ruling upon said motion.

[1] The charging part of the first four counts of the indictment, to which exception was taken by demurrer, and which constitutes the basis of attack here, alleged that "the said F. L. Main did then and there willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously, and for a valuable consideration, sell and issue, and aid and abet some person or persons to complainant unknown in selling and issuing to one Carrie Bowman" certain shares of the capital stock of the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company, a corporation. It is said that, inasmuch as none of the counts alleged that the stock was not the privately owned property of the defendant, each count failed to charge a public offense; that he might lawfully sell his own stock, and that in this respect the alleged sales would fall within an exception to the penal provisions of the act. It is doubtless true that the statute in question does not attempt to prohibit one from selling his privately owned corporate securities without a permit or license, provided his transactions do not bring him within the classification of "dealer" or "broker." In re Lamb, 61 Cal. App. 321, 215 P. 109. However, the indictment need not negative such exception, for it formed no part of the definition of the offense. People v. Jevne, 179 Cal. 621, 178 P. 517; People v. Cencevich, 64 Cal. App. 39, 44, 220 P. 448. Another ground of demurrer, that the indictment failed to state by whom the stock was owned, or that it was not owned by the defendant, was directed at the fifth count; and in connection with both grounds it is insisted that there was no evidence tending to show the facts as to which the indictment is said to be silent. The principles above stated apply to these criticisms, and we think that further discussion of the matter is not necessary.

[2] The most serious point raised is that there is an entire lack of proof to support the allegation that the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company was a corporation having a capital stock. The indictment alleged in that behalf that "the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company was then and there a corporation having a capital stock"; that it had no permit to issue, nor did the defendant have a permit to sell, such stock; that said stock was a security"; and that "the crime of violation of the corporate securities act, a felony, was committed by the said F. L. Main," in that he did willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously, for a valuable consideration sell and issue shares of the capital stock of said corporation.

"The 'securities' which may not be issued or sold without the permission of the corporation commissioner are the 'shares, or other interests or rights, into which the * * * property of companies * * * or rights of * * * members thereof are divided, * * * and all certificates and other instruments issued by them or their authority, evidencing or representing such shares, interests or rights'; also 'any instrument issued or offered to the public by any company' evidencing any right to participate in the profits or earnings or the distributions of assets of any business carried on for profit by the company." In re Lamb, 61 Cal. App. 321, 331, 215 P. 109, 113.

The evidence offered by the people to prove the existence of the corporation was the testimony of witnesses that the defendant represented it to have been incorporated, and exhibited prospectuses, printed subscription contracts, and purported stock certificates, which were introduced at the trial, and that he had in his possession a book of printed stock certificates, all of which bore the name of the purported corporation. It is urged by the prosecution that, in view of the evidence referred to above, had this been a civil action, the defendant would have been estopped to deny that the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company was a corporation, and further proof of that allegation would have been unnecessary.

Comparatively few criminal cases are to be found in the books where the facts create a situation permitting the application of the doctrine of estoppel. However, we are referred to several embezzlement cases where estoppel has been invoked against a defendant. In both Ex parte Hedley, 31 Cal. 108, and People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 10 P. 502, the defendants were held estopped to deny that the relationship of principal and agent existed between them and the persons whose principals they had respectively held themselves out to represent, and thus secured the money in question. In People v. Leonard, 106 Cal. 302, 39 P. 617, the defendant was not allowed to deny that the corporation whose agent he had admittedly been was such corporation. Other cases to the same or similar import might be mentioned. In People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 P. 630, 39 P. 524, language is contained in the opinion to the effect that the defendant, having received a draft, a part of the proceeds of which he was charged with having embezzled, could not be permitted to say that he was not authorized to receive the money as treasurer of a certain association, or that the association was not entitled to it, or that the draft was not a valid one. While these and a few other examples are to be found in which the rule of estoppel has been invoked against a defendant in a criminal action, the extreme infrequency of such instances suggests caution in extending its application. We are accustomed, in criminal cases, to regard the presumption of innocence as universally placing the burden of proof upon the people to establish every essential element of the offense charged, beyond a reasonable doubt. In none of the opinions which we have examined upholding the application of the rule of estoppel is any reference made to the presumption of innocence or the fact that a plea of not guilty is in itself a denial of every element involved in the charge to which that plea is entered. In fact, in none of these decisions is there to be found more than the statement of a conclusion that under the circumstances considered the defendant could not be heard to deny the fact as to which he was held estopped, with the further intimation, in certain instances, that to hold otherwise would be inequitable and place a premium on dishonesty.

[3] It is true that the rules of evidence are generally the same in criminal and civil cases. Pen. Code, § 1102. Undoubtedly, wherever the doctrine of estoppel is applicable in a criminal case, it does not differ in principle from the same rule when used in a civil action. Also, whether the estoppel rests in judgment, deed, contract, or in pais, the rule and the reason for it are the same. Allen v. Hance, 161 Cal. 189, 118 P. 527. If the defendant is to be held estopped in the instant case to deny the corporate existence of the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company, the type of the estoppel would necessarily be by misrepresentation. It is elementary that among the essentials of this class of estoppel (as well as of all others for that matter) are: The estoppel asserter must be a person to whom, mediately or immediately, the representation was made; also the estoppel asserter must, on the faith of the misrepresentation, have changed his position prejudicially. Ewart on Estoppel, p. 10. In none of these decisions in the embezzlement cases above referred to or others of a similar nature which we have examined is any attempt made to explain upon what theory the state is held to be authorized to assert an estoppel against a defendant when these essentials are taken into account. Hence, in reviewing these authorities, it is impossible to do more than speculate as to the reasoning which may have been applied therein. Of course, in a criminal case, the prosecuting witness is only a witness and not a party to the proceeding. The action is one in which the people of the state are plaintiff, and no one else. If, instead of being a criminal prosecution, the same transaction were before the court in a suit by the complaining witness to recover damages for conversion, the plaintiff, having been the one to whom the representations had been made, and who had changed his position prejudicially on the faith of them, would clearly have the right to assert the estoppel. It would seem that, if the state is to be allowed the same right in an embezzlement case, it must be on the theory that in that behalf and for that limited purpose it is, so to speak, subrogated to the rights of the person who would be the estoppel asserter in a civil action involving the same alleged wrong. It is plain that the state could not qualify as an estoppel asserter, based upon any claim of its own against the defendant; the representations were not made to it, nor has it parted with anything or in any way changed its position prejudicially by reason of the deceit which was practiced. Some individual, usually the complaining witness, would be damaged if the estoppel were not maintained, and if it were a civil action in which his rights were involved. The state having taken up his cause, and in a sense having assumed to vindicate the wrong done him, may reasonably say to the defendant, in the language of Lord Mansfield: "No; it shall be as you represented it to be. No man shall set up his own iniquity as a defense, any more than as a cause of action." And it is true that, while in a criminal action the people constitute the plaintiff, punishment for the offense through a criminal prosecution is one form of redress granted to the individual for the vindication of a wrong. Hence a person injured, though not strictly a party to the action, is so far interested in it as that the state, in punishing the wrongdoer, may assert an estoppel in his behalf, where it is necessary or proper to provide that form of vindication.

[4, 5] But while these considerations might uphold the use of an estoppel as against the defendant in a prosecution for embezzlement, obtaining money under false pretenses, or similar offenses, they furnish no support for the same procedure in the instant case. Here the person to whom the representations were made is entirely disinterested in the outcome. She did change her position by reason of them, but, so far as the evidence discloses, not to her prejudice. Indeed, evidence to show that she was damaged, if such were the case, would be irrelevant and immaterial. No wrong done to her is the subject of vindication in this action. Whether the defendant is permitted to deny the corporate existence of the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company, or is estopped to do so, is a matter of complete unconcern to her. Her interest is as casual as that of a bystander who witnesses a robbery. It follows that the embezzlement and other cases to which we have referred furnish no support for the contention that the state is in a position to assert an estoppel against this defendant.

Unlike these cases, the instant prosecution is one which in no way involves the redress of a wrong done to any individual. The offense committed by the defendant, if any there be, is strictly malum prohibitum, and wrong only because it violates a statute intended to regulate the sale of securities; it is a wrong primarily and exclusively against the state. The outstanding facts in the offense are (1) that the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company was a corporation; (2) that the defendant sold securities of the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company, a corporation; (3) that at the time of making such sale he had secured no license so to do as required by law; and (4) that at the time of making such sale the corporation had not obtained a permit from the commissioner of corporations of this state to issue or sell its capital stock. Each of these is an integral part of the corpus delicti, without proof of which the state would necessarily have failed to make out a case. If invoked here, as urged by the respondent, estoppel would deny the defendant the right to prove that what he sold were not securities. It would prevent him from disproving the existence of an essential element of the offense in question, to wit, the corporate existence of the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company, and thus bar him from showing that he had not violated the act under which he was charged. Indeed, it would result, not only in convicting him upon his extrajudicial statements alone, but in denying him the right to show, though able to do so to the point of demonstration, his complete innocence of any offense charged against him. Obviously, unless the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company was a corporation, proof of the other facts would fall. The other evidence, even remotely bearing upon the subject, was that of a witness who testified that he was told by Main that O'Connor was field manager, and that he "supposed" some other men whom he saw at the well were working for the company. It is apparent that this adds nothing to the people's case in this behalf. We think that, having alleged it, the people were obliged to prove the corporate existence of the company, and could not rely for that purpose upon any asserted estoppel.

[6] We have considered all of the evidence produced by the people having a tendency to prove that the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company was a corporation. Reference is now made to certain exhibits introduced by the defendant in connection with the cross-examination of the people's witnesses. These exhibits purport to be purchase contracts. They are identical, except for the figures referring to the number of shares purchased. Defendant's Exhibit A is as follows:

"Purchase Contract.

"Dated April 19, 1920, at El Monte, Calif.

"To F. L. Main of New York City, N. Y.—I hereby contract for and agree to purchase from you 300 shares of the issued capital stock of the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company at $100/100 per share and pay for same as follows: Cash.

"Name: Carrie Bowman.

"Address: El Monte, Cal.

"Banking Reference ———.

"Accepted: F. L. Main, by ———."

This evidence cannot aid the people. The use of the name "Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company" is insufficient to prove that it is a corporation. Briggs v. McCullough, 36 Cal. 542; People v. Cherniak, 216 Ill. App. 423. Nor do the words contained in these exhibits, "shares of the issued capital stock," amount to an admission that the company is a corporation. While the term "capital stock" is often used in the sense of the amount derived from the issuance of shares in a corporation, still its signification is by no means limited to that definition. On the contrary, it has been defined to be "money invested in business operations, whether that business is conducted by a single individual, partnership, corporation, or a government." 9 C. J., p. 1280. It has been said to be "the amount fixed upon by the partners or associates as their stake in the concern" (Hightower v. Thornton, 8 Ga. 486, 52 Am. Dec. 412); also as the fund or property belonging to a firm or corporation and used to carry on its business (Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 23 L. Ed. 220). Section 2 of the act known as the Corporate Securities Act provides that "the word 'company' includes all domestic and foreign, private corporations, associations, joint stock companies, and partnerships, of every kind, and also trustees, * * *" and adds thereto certain exceptions. This law clearly recognizes that any of the various entities just enumerated may issue securities, and gives the corporation commissioner jurisdiction over the sale thereof in this state—and this concerning foreign as well as domestic organizations.

In Re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 200 P. 593, the defendants were prosecuted for a violation of the Corporate Securities Act because they were alleged to have sold unit shares in a common-law trust company, organized in pursuance of a declaration of trust without having secured a permit from the corporation commissioner. The complaint in that action alleged that the defendants "did * * * execute and sell shares, interests, and rights into which the capital stock and property of said company and the rights of members and holders thereof were divided." Again, the same complaint charged that neither the defendants nor the company in question had obtained a permit from the corporation commissioner to issue or sell any securities of the company or "any shares, interests, or rights into which the capital stock or property of said company and the rights of stockholders and members thereof were divided." Here we have a practical construction of the term "capital stock," in a prosecution under the same act as that in the instant case, using it in the sense of the fund or property belonging to a common-law trust company. If joint-stock companies and similar concerns have capital stock, of course they may issue certificates to purchasers of interests or shares therein. Therefore, as we have said, the fact that the words "company" and "shares of the issued capital stock" are employed in the exhibits introduced by the defendant does not constitute an admission that the legal entity, shares in whose capital stock were contracted to be sold, is a corporation.

[7, 8] But it may be said that, if estoppel is not applicable, at least the fact of the corporate character of the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company may be presumed, even though the presumption be a rebuttable one, and that, although the defendant might overcome it by proof to the contrary, if he does not do so, the fact is sufficiently established. The specific charge laid against him was that he sold and issued shares of the capital stock of a company that was "then and there a corporation." The defendant introduced no evidence upon the trial, except three exhibits of the nature mentioned herein, and no presumption arose against him from his failure to do so. People v. Streuber, 121 Cal. 431, 53 P. 918; People v. Emmons, 13 Cal. App. 487, 110 P. 151. The burden rested with the people to prove every fact essential to a conviction, beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Ribolsi, 89 Cal. 492, 500, 26 P. 1082; People v. Gordon, 88 Cal. 422, 26 P. 502. Hence we must decide what character of proof is requisite to sustain this burden, and whether or not that which was offered measures up to the required standard. In proof of the existence of a domestic corporation, a copy of its articles of incorporation, filed as required by the statutes, and certified by the secretary of state, or by the county clerk of the county wherein the original articles shall have been filed, must be received as prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated. Civ. Code, § 297. It has been held in criminal cases that parol proof of a de facto corporation is competent and sufficient, but that it must be proved, like character, by reputation, and not by the direct statement of a witness. People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 497, 55 P. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50. In People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645, the defendant was charged with having possessed, with felonious intent, certain blank and unfinished bank bills of a foreign banking corporation, which were false, forged, and counterfeit. It was there held that the undoubted rule in civil cases, where the fact of the legal existence of the corporation, was in issue is that proof of a foreign corporation can only be made in the same manner as any foreign law or statute is proven, but that in a criminal case, involving crimes such as forgery of bank paper, since the existence and character of a bank is generally well known where its bills are current, proof by reputation in such matters is not liable to lead to error. In the absence of proof that this company was a corporation having a capital stock, the people's case was incomplete, for each count contained the allegation that it was such a corporation. Therefore the motion for new trial should have been granted.

The remaining grounds assigned for reversal involve the giving and the refusal of instructions. One requested instruction, which was refused, contained matters expressly appearing in a given instruction to which appellant objects, and the other instructions complained of followed the allegations of the information. We find no error committed in the giving or refusing of instructions, and, in view of the opinion above expressed, it is unnecessary to consider other points raised.

The judgment and order denying the motion for new trial are reversed.

FINLAYSON, P. J. I concur in the judgment, and, in the main, with what is said by Mr. Justice CRAIG, but upon the question of estoppel I wish to add the following:

To determine whether the doctrine of estoppel can be invoked by the people in support of the issue respecting the corporate existence of the Southern Oregon Oil & Gas Company, it should first be ascertained, if possible, what is the underlying principle which has induced the courts to sanction the application of that doctrine in criminal cases. Unless we can discover the fundamental reason upon which rests the doctrine of estoppel in criminal cases, we are without chart to guide or compass to locate the boundary which separates the cases where that doctrine is properly applicable from those where it is not. In none of the decisions brought to my attention was any attempt made to set forth the philosophical basis or rationale of the rule which sanctions the application of the doctrine of estoppel in criminal prosecutions. In many of the decisions the courts, without attempting to probe to the bottom in search for the reason upon which the rule rests, have given unquestioning assent to a dictum of Mr. Bishop, and have let it go at that. See Ex parte Hedley, 31 Cal. 113, for the language of Bishop.

An analysis of the criminal actions in which estoppel has been held to be applicable discloses that, as between the prosecuting witness and the accused, the former was vested with some sort of private right, that this right was the result of acts of estoppel on the part of the defendant, and that violence had been done to that right by the criminal act which the accused committed against the peace and dignity of the state—his act of criminality being at once both an injury to the wronged individual, furnishing the basis for a civil liability, and an injury to the public, for which a penal liability attached.

Almost all of the criminal actions in which the doctrine of estoppel has been held applicable are cases of embezzlement. In that class of cases it has been held that, in prosecutions against an agent or servant for embezzling the money or property of his principal or employer, if the accused has received the money or other thing of value in the assumed exercise of authority as such agent or servant, he is estopped to deny the authority when prosecuted for the embezzlement. Ex parte Hedley, supra; People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 10 P. 502; People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 471, 35 P. 80; People v. Leonard, 106 Cal. 302, 39 P. 617. It also has been held in embezzlement cases that an agent who has treated his principal as the owner of the property is estopped to deny the latter's ownership (State v. Whitworth, 30 Wash. 47, 70 P. 254); also that one entrusted with money or other thing of value is estopped to claim that his principal obtained it illegally, or that he could not lawfully possess it under the statute (People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 186, 187, 37 P. 630, 39 P. 524). See Sebree v. Commonwealth, 190 Ky. 164, 227 S. W. 152, and cases there cited. It seems clear that in each of these classes of cases the act of estoppel related only to the private right of a private individual, usually the complaining witness. Take for example those embezzlement prosecutions in which it is held that an agent who has treated his principal as the owner of the property is estopped to deny the latter's ownership or his lawful right of possession. It is manifest that in that class of cases the principal has a private right of property which he could successfully assert in any civil action which might be brought by him against his unfaithful agent. The same is true of that other class of cases where it is held that the accused is estopped to deny that he received the money or property in the course of his employment, if he received it in the assumed exercise of authority as an employee or agent of the prosecuting witness. In that class of cases the complaining witness has a valuable private right, based on the acts of estoppel of the one assuming to exercise the authority; that is to say, in any civil action brought by him he would have the right to claim, as against the one assuming to act as his agent or employee, that the latter received the money or thing of value in the due course of his employment, and that therefore the self-assumed agent or employee is responsible to him for all the legal consequences which naturally flow from such assumption of authority. "The word rights, is generic, common, embracing whatever may be lawfully claimed." Lonas v. State, 3 Heisk. 306. (Italics mine.) In White v. Commissioners of Multnomah, 13 Or. 317, 10 P. 484, 57 Am. Rep. 20, it is said that "a 'right' has been defined by Mr. Justice Holmes to be the legal consequence which attaches to certain facts." Under these definitions, it is clear that in all the cases mentioned by me as examples of the applicability of the doctrine of estoppel in criminal prosecutions, the complaining witness was vested with some sort of a private right arising out of the acts of estoppel, and that this right had been violated by the criminal act committed by the accused.

It cannot be that estoppel is invokable by the people as the direct or primary beneficiary thereof. It is a fundamental principle of estoppel that it operates only between parties to the transaction and their privies. A stranger, who is not a party nor a privy, can neither be bound nor aided. 21 C. J. 1180; Pomeroy, Eq. Juris, (4th Ed.) vol. 2, § 813. See Figg v. Handley, 52 Cal. 244. In the classes of criminal prosecutions where acts of estoppel may be proved against the defendant, such, for example, as the embezzlement cases cited supra, the state, proceeding in its sovereign capacity to punish for an infraction of its criminal laws, is a total stranger to the transaction out of which the estoppel arose. The acts of estoppel did not directly affect any public right; i. e., any right of the sovereign state as distinguished from the private right of the complaining witness, who, by reason of the acts of estoppel, could lawfully claim, in any civil action which he might bring, that certain legal consequences flowed from the estoppel. Nor could it be said in any of those cases that the state was in privity with the complaining witness whose private right attached by reason of the acts of estoppel. A crime has been defined as "a public wrong, in that it affects public rights and is an injury to the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity." 16 C. J. 54. It is an act committed against the public and not against an individual merely. The guilty party is prosecuted in the interest of the state and not in the interest of the party injured. 7 Cal. Jur. 840. True, the same act may constitute both an injury to an individual, furnishing the basis for a civil action by him, and an injury to the public, for which a penal liability arises. But when the penal liability is enforced in the interest of the people by criminal proceedings, the only right the injury to which is considered is that public right which is due the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity. For this reason it is impossible for the people to be in privity with the individual whose private right was violated by the wrongful act of the accused. Equally obvious is it that the people do not "represent" the private right of the individual in the sense that it is a right to which the people have succeeded.

For the foregoing reasons I think it clear that the sole basis for the application of the doctrine of estoppel in criminal cases is the existence in some individual of a private right, depending for its existence upon the acts of estoppel, which right was invaded by the accused when he committed the criminal act against the state. In the ordinary criminal prosecution for embezzlement, where the complaining witness actually owns the money or property embezzled, or actually has some qualified ownership thereof with the right of possession and control, the prosecution, to make out a case against the accused must of course prove such ownership in the prosecuting witness. In a case where the private individual injured by the act of embezzlement does not actually own the money or other thing of value, or has not an actual qualified interest therein, but has nevertheless the right to claim ownership as between himself and the accused, based upon the latter's acts of estoppel, he has a certain kind of private right—a right which, in a civil action by him against his unfaithful agent, would constitute the basis for appropriate relief against the wrongdoer. This private right, notwithstanding it rests entirely upon estoppel, may be proved by the prosecution in a criminal action against the wrongdoer for the same reason and for the same purpose that the prosecution may prove ownership in the complaining witness where the latter is in fact the rightful owner. But whether the people prove an actual ownership, as is ordinarily the case, or prove that the accused is estopped to deny ownership, in either event the prosecution does no more than prove the existence of a private right in the complaining witness—a private right which the accused has injured by an act which constitutes at once an injury to the public and an injury to the individual who has been harmed in his private property right. And so, where the accused, by his assumption of authority, has estopped himself to deny that he received the money or property in the course of his employment, evidence of the acts of estoppel is admissible, not upon the theory that the estoppel inures to the people as the direct and immediate beneficiary thereof, but upon the theory that, as between the complaining witness and the accused, the acts of estoppel in effect establish a fact, namely, the relation of principal and agent, which fact is one that appertains to a private right which the accused has criminally violated. "Every fact," says the court in White v. Commissioners of Multnomah, supra, "which forms one of the group of facts of which the right is the legal consequence, appertains to the substance of the right." And so, in every other instance in which the doctrine of estoppel has been applied in a criminal action, it will, I believe, be found that the application of the doctrine was but a means of proving the existence of some private right in the complaining witness which had been injured by the criminal act of the accused, even though that right be one which exists only as between the complaining witness and the defendant.

It seems clear to me that the admissibility of acts of estoppel in criminal cases can be justified only upon some such theory as that which I have attempted to outline. In a vigorous dissenting opinion in State v. Dawe, 31 Idaho, 796, 177 P. 393, it is said by Mr. Justice Morgan that "the application of the doctrine of estoppel in criminal cases is of doubtful origin and worse than doubtful soundness." Unless I thought that the application of the doctrine could be justified upon some such theory as that which I have sought to expound, I should feel constrained to agree with the learned author of that dissent. The application of the doctrine of estoppel in criminal cases certainly would be of "worse than doubtful soundness" if it were made to rest upon the notion that the estoppel is invokable by the people as its direct and immediate beneficiary. If that were the theory upon which it rested, it would do violence to the fundamental rule that estoppel operates only between parties and their privies.

If the foregoing be a correct exposition of the underlying theory upon which rests the doctrine of estoppel in criminal cases, then that doctrine is not applicable in the instant case. Here the criminal act with which appellant is charged did no injury to the complaining witness or to any of her private rights. The injury was solely to society in the aggregate. It is this which differentiates the present case from those relied upon by the Attorney General. I therefore concur in the judgment of reversal.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice CRAIG, with this exception: I do not concur in what he says upon the subject of estoppel. I think it inexpedient to join in a quest for the reasons upon which the Supreme Court, in company with other tribunals, has applied the doctrine of estoppel in criminal cases, for I do not think such a search is necessary to a decision of the present action. Upon the question of estoppel, I think no more than this need be said: The doctrine has been applied in no criminal case except where the defendant was sought to be punished for a wrongful invasion of the private property right of an individual, which invasion might have been the subject of a civil action by the individual, and in which he might have invoked the estoppel allowed to be asserted in the criminal case. The prosecution here seeks to punish appellant for acts and omissions which did not themselves invade the property right of any individual. There is no estoppel involved in the specific charges here made which any individual could invoke. It seems to me that these are sufficient reasons for the assertion that the criminal cases in which the doctrine has been applied are not authority for its application in the present instance. Laying aside the compulsion of precedents, I can perceive no ground for its application here, and respondent has shown us none.

SADDLER v. CALIFORNIA BANK.
(Civ. 4826.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 9, 1925. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 5, 1926.)

1. Banks and banking ⚡161(2)—Principal selecting bank as collecting agent is bound by reasonable usage prevailing among banks at place where collection is made.

A principal who selects a bank as his collecting agent, in the absence of special direction, is bound by any reasonable usage prevailing and established among the banks at the place where the collection is made, without regard to his knowledge of such custom.

2. Banks and banking ⚡161(2)—Knowledge on part of customer as to existence of reasonable usage among banks to collect items is conclusively implied.

Knowledge on the part of a customer as to any reasonable usage prevailing and established among banks for the collection of items, at the place of collection, is conclusively implied.

3. Banks and banking ⚡161(2)—Presumption held not to support finding defendant bank credited as cash draft drawn on another bank, in view of custom.

Mere silence on part of bank on entering the amount of a draft on another bank in depositor's book did not raise an inference that the bank credited the amount as cash, in view of a custom that the credit of such entry was conditional on collection.

4. Banks and banking ⚡171(6)—Bank held not liable to depositor for amount of bank draft which it never collected.

Defendant bank, accepting from plaintiff customer for deposit a draft drawn on a bank in Texas, and entering a credit in plaintiff's passbook representing amount of the draft, forwarding it to its collecting agent, from which it received a conditional credit, but never receiving the money by reason of the insolvency of the payee bank and the negligence of an intermediate collecting bank, held not liable to plaintiff for amount of entry notwithstanding defendant's failure to accept debit of item charged back to it by its initial collecting bank, and notwithstanding it credited interest on the entry to plaintiff and paid an installment thereof.

5. Judgment ⚡273(5)—Judgment entered in name of plaintiff after her death without substitution of administrator as party plaintiff held not void.

Where the case was tried and the cause submitted for decision before plaintiff's death, but no decision was rendered until after her death, a judgment thereafter entered in the name of plaintiff nunc pro tunc as of a date antedating her death, and without substitution of the administrator of her estate, held not void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Perry Wood, Judge.

Action by Emilie E. Saddler against the California Bank. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Curtis, J., being disqualified, not participating.

Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George H. Wilson and J. W. Hocker, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On and before February 19, 1921, the plaintiff had in the defendant bank an interest-bearing account, known as a special ordinary account, subject to check. Her business in connection with that account was conducted by George H. Wilson, her attorney in fact. On the above-stated date Wilson deposited for her in defendant bank a cashier's check, made to her order by the First National Bank of Desdemona, Tex., in the sum of $3,640, and the bank credited that amount on her passbook. On October 6, 1921 (said deposited amount not having been theretofore withdrawn), plaintiff presented to defendant bank her check for the sum of $3,653.03, being the said sum of $3,640, together with accrued unpaid interest thereon. The bank refused payment of this check. Thereafter the plaintiff commenced, and prosecuted to judgment, her action to recover the amount so demanded. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

It appears from the findings of the court that on receiving the cashier's check, defendant indorsed the same and delivered it to the Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles, Cal., for credit, and received from said bank a credit therefor in the sum of $3,640; that the Commercial National Bank indorsed said check and forwarded it to the City National Bank of Galveston, Tex., for credit; that the City National Bank of Galveston, Tex., indorsed the check and transmitted it to the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Tex., which bank, on the 26th day of February, 1921, forwarded the cashier's check, together with other items, by mail, direct to the First National Bank of Desdemona, Tex., the payor of the item, and requested a draft in payment thereof; that the Desdemona bank thereupon forwarded to said Federal Reserve Bank, as requested, a draft for the full amount of the remittance, said draft being drawn on a bank at Fort Worth, Tex.; that before this draft on the Fort Worth bank was honored, the First National Bank of Desdemona, Tex., closed, and payment of the draft on Fort Worth was refused by the Fort Worth bank; that the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Tex., has filed its claim against the receiver of the First National Bank of Desdemona, Tex., for the full amount of the draft received by it from the First National Bank of Desdemona, Tex., and said claim has been allowed to said Federal Reserve Bank.

The findings further state that the plaintiff's passbook and the deposit slip used in the making of the deposit of this item contained provisions that the bank in accepting drafts, etc., for collection or credit, does so solely for the depositor, and shall not be liable for default of any bank or agent to which the draft, etc., may be sent, nor until the proceeds in actual money or solvent credits shall come into its possession, and that under these conditions items previously credited may be charged back to the depositor's account; that there is a custom among banks in Los Angeles that in receiving drafts, etc., on points outside of Los Angeles, the deposit bank shall transmit the same in the usual manner for collection to such bank or person as it may deem reliable, and that such deposit bank shall not be liable for default of any bank or agent to whom the draft, etc., may be sent, until the proceeds in actual money or solvent credits shall come into its possession; that neither the plaintiff nor her attorney in fact, who made the deposit, had read or knew the contents of the provisions in the passbook and on the deposit slip, and that they had no knowledge of said custom; that the defendant carried the item on its books to the credit of plaintiff, and rendered her monthly statements showing such credit from February, 1921, to October, 1921, and allowed and paid to plaintiff interest thereon at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum. The court further finds that at the time of making the deposit nothing was said to plaintiff by the defendant's officers or agents regarding the conditions under which said deposit was received or the terms under which it was accepted, and that the same was accepted by defendant, California Bank, the same as accepting that much cash, and the defendant bank immediately delivered it to the Commercial National Bank, a solvent banking house, and received from it credit therefor, and has that credit at the time of the trial of this action.

The action came to trial on the 25th day of April, 1922, whereupon the evidence was received and the case submitted for decision. Prior to any decision, and on June 28, 1922, plaintiff died. Thereafter the court rendered its decision, and judgment was entered on January 30, 1923, nunc pro tunc, as of June 20, 1922. An administrator of the estate of plaintiff was appointed on January 19, 1923, but in this action no substitution of party plaintiff was made.

[1, 2] We shall first consider the point noted as point IV in appellant's brief, which is that the universal custom among banks in Los Angeles in accepting checks for deposit payable elsewhere is that credit is given subject only to final payment, and that this custom must conclusively be deemed to have been known to the plaintiff. We think that this point is correctly stated and is definitely supported by authority of the decisions in this state.

"The rule prevailing in California has been stated to be that 'a principal who selects a bank as his collecting agent, thus availing himself of the facilities which it holds out, in the absence of special direction, is bound by any reasonable usage prevailing and established among the banks at the place where the collection is made, without regard to his knowledge of its existence. Knowledge on the part of the customer is implied conclusively.' * * * The same rule prevails in many other jurisdictions." Lucke v. First National Bank of Marysville, 193 Cal. 184, 190, 223 P. 547, 550.

See, also, Nicoletti v. Bank of Los Banos, 190 Cal. 637, 641, 214 P. 51, 27 A. L. R. 1479.

The law being as above stated, the finding to the effect that the plaintiff had not, and that her attorney in fact had not, any knowledge of said custom among banks of Los Angeles, becomes immaterial, and it is not necessary to closely examine appellant's claim that said finding is not sustained by the evidence.

[3, 4] The finding that the amount of the cashier's check was accepted by defendant bank as "that much cash" is not sustained by the evidence, unless it can be sustained as an inference from the fact that at the time of making the deposit nothing was said to plaintiff by the defendant's officers or agents regarding the conditions under which the deposit was received, or the terms under which it was accepted. But in view of the custom to which we have referred, that inference from the mere silence of the defendant is without foundation. On the contrary, the only legitimate inference from the facts directly proved is that a conditional credit only was given for the amount of the item, the credit being conditioned upon the final payment of the check. This conclusion is reinforced by the fact that provisions which were in accord with said custom were printed in the passbook, and upon the deposit slip which accompanied the deposit of the cashier's check, as well as upon previous deposit slips which had been used by the plaintiff in connection with her said account. In view of the fact that our decision herein rests principally upon said established custom of banks, we need not enter into a discussion of the decisions which bear upon the further point made by appellant, that said printed provisions thus constituted a binding contract between the depositor and the bank.

Respondent points out that appellant credited interest on the disputed balance, and actually paid an installment thereof. But the evidence also, without conflict, shows that the account, when the deposit was made, had placed on it the notation, "hold eight days," and that information of nonpayment of the check was promptly given to respondent, and that at all times thereafter respondent was informed that appellant denied its liability for said check.

It may be conceded that the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Tex., should have sent said cashier's check to a bank in Desdemona other than the payee bank, with instructions to demand actual money from the payee, and that said Federal Reserve Bank was negligent in sending the cashier's check directly to the payee bank, as well as in requesting payment by draft. We are not now concerned with the liability of the Federal Reserve Bank for such negligence. For the purpose of the present action it is sufficient that the money called for by the cashier's check has not been paid by the payee or by said Federal Reserve Bank, and that the money has not been received by the defendant. The credit received by defendant from the Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles is conditional in its nature and remains unsettled. This being so, the condition upon which any liability of defendant bank to the plaintiff for the amount of the deposited cashier's check could arise is thus far a nonexistent condition. That the credit received by defendant from the Commercial National Bank was given as a tentative one, taking its form as a matter of bookkeeping, is shown by the fact that the transaction was subject to an agreement between the said two banks, which agreement is contained upon the face of the deposit slip deposited by defendant with the Commercial National Bank on February 21, 1921, for items which included said cashier's check. This agreement provided that the Commercial National Bank "reserves the right to forward at depositor's * * * checks, drafts, etc., deposited for credit or collection, to collection agents of its selection who may or may not be the payee * * * thereof and the bank is not liable for the neglect, delay or default of such agents. No responsibility is assumed until final payment is received." Such final payment has never been received by the Commercial National Bank, and it is established without question that that bank, by reason of the nonpayment of the cashier's check, on April 4, 1921, charged back to defendant the amount thereof. The fact that defendant bank has declined to accept the debit of the item without return of the cashier's check or its amount is consistent with its defense, and merely shows a continued effort of defendant to complete the collection.

[5] Appellant's contention that the judgment as entered is void because entered in the name of the plaintiff after her death, and without substitution of the administrator as party plaintiff, appears to be without merit. In Estate of Pillsbury, 175 Cal. 454, 460, 166 P. 11, 3 A. L. R. 1396, it was held that in a case wherein an action against the defendant was tried and the trial concluded two days before his death, and the judgment against deceased was entered two days after his death, and thereafter the court, being advised of the death, entered the same judgment nunc pro tunc as of the day of the submission of the cause for determination, the court had power to enter a valid nunc pro tunc judgment, and that the same was valid. We therefore are of the opinion that, for the purpose of entry of judgment, on the facts shown by this record, a substitution of the administrator of plaintiff's estate was not necessary.

For the reasons hereinabove stated, the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. MAGNI (Cr. 1281.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 10, 1925.)

Criminal law  730(3)—Conduct of district attorney in cross-examining accused and act of court in reprimanding accused's counsel held error not cured by admonition to jury.

Conduct and remarks of district attorney in cross-examining accused, over objections, as to whether he was out on parole or bail, and action of trial court in reprimanding accused's counsel instead of district attorney, held error, which was not cured by admonishing jury to disregard excluded evidence, and that remarks of counsel were not evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Tony Magni was convicted of assault, with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Roy C. Lewis, of San Rafael, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of a felony, to wit, assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to commit murder. The principal point urged for reversal is that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in the trial of the case; such claim being predicated upon an incident which occurred during defendant's cross-examination, and which appears in the record thus:

"Q. (By district attorney): Have you ever been convicted of a felony? A. Yes sir.

"Q. Are you now discharged after serving your term, or out on parole?

"Mr. Lewis (counsel for defendant) Just a moment. We object to that as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, assign it as misconduct on the part of the district attorney—attempting to put before the jury matters he knows to be not competent evidence. There is only one question—

"The Court (interrupting): Now, without any argument, Mr. Lewis, if you will make the objection.

"Mr. Lewis: I made the objection.

"The Court: The objection is this is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial?

"Mr. Lewis: Yes.

"The Court: I will sustain the objection.

"Mr. Lewis: I want the record to show I assign it as misconduct on the part of the district attorney, unfair practice.

"Mr. Greer: Q. You have been out since you were arrested on this charge; you have been out on bail, and while out on bail isn't it a fact you took a shot at a man?

"Mr. Lewis: We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, improper question to be asked by the district attorney.

"Mr. Greer: I think that is a fact.

"The Court: I do not know whether it is or not. What is the object of it?

"Mr. Greer: Well, the object was, I was going to ask afterwards if since he was out on bail he had been in trouble and taken a shot at a fellow.

"Mr. Lewis: Before the question is answered I am going to assign it as misconduct, just done for the purpose of trying to prejudice the witness before the jury.

"Mr. Greer: The court asked what the purpose of it was.

"Mr. Lewis: Is it—

"The Court (interrupting): Are you through?

"Mr. Lewis: No; I am waiting for the district attorney to ask some more questions which he knows and which I know are not admissible in evidence, and the district attorney knows are not admissible in evidence.

"The Court: What are you getting so excited about?

"Mr. Lewis: I have a right to assign it as misconduct.

"The Court: Sit down.

"Mr. Lewis: I have a right to object to this.

"The Court: I will find you guilty of contempt of court, and assess you $50 fine.

"Mr. Lewis: Very well.

"The Court: And there will probably be something to follow.

"Mr. Lewis: I believe I am an attorney in this court and have a right to be heard in this court.

"The Court: You will be heard, but I will conduct this case.

"Mr. Lewis: No; but I have a right to assign misconduct.

"The Court: You have it, but you are not arguing—

"Mr. Lewis (interrupting).

"The Court: I will continue this case, and fine you for contempt.

"Mr. Lewis: Very well; do it because I will go to jail.

"The Court: You will remain in the courtroom when this case is concluded.

"Mr. Lewis: I will do that.

"The Court: Now to resume the case: Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, you are admonished at this time that remarks of counsel are not argument—or, at least, are not evidence in the case. The only evidence in the case is the sworn testimony of the witnesses. Remarks of counsel are not to be taken by you as evidence in the case. The court will rule on all objections that are made, and, if evidence is offered and ruled out, you will entirely disregard it.

"Mr. Greer: That is all. No further questions.

"Mr. Lewis: What was the ruling to the question in reference to his being out on bail? May I ask the court's ruling on that?

"The Court: Yes, if it is ruled on. (Record read.)

"Mr. Greer: I withdraw the question.

"Mr. Lewis: At this time, if the court please, I ask the court to admonish the jury to disregard it.

"The Court: Mr. Lewis, I have already ruled on that, and I will not rule again, and I take it you are asking for something which is already in the record, and I think you understand that quite fully.

"Mr. Lewis: I did not understand your honor had instructed the jury it had been overruled or sustained. I did not understand it to be that way—misconduct on the part of counsel in open court.

"The Court: There is no need for any argument. You have the ruling and you have your remedy."

We think the admonition given by the court to the jury and above quoted was scarcely sufficient to correct the injustice that had been done the defendant before the jury, both by the questions and remarks of the district attorney and the action of the court in reprimanding defendant's counsel instead of the district attorney, who was clearly in error.

We may say that it is clear from the record that all parties concerned were trying to do their duty as they saw it, and it is possible that the manner of defendant's counsel in making his objections may have been affected by the excitement of the trial, and he may have contributed, thus, indirectly, to the unfortunate situation which arose. However, the cold printed page of the transcript does not reveal this, and the Attorney General has caused the appeal to be submitted merely upon the brief of the appellant, being unable to defend against the assignments of error.

The record reveals a sharp conflict of evidence, and an examination of the entire transcript does not convince us that the same verdict would have been reached without the weight of the objectionable incidents above set forth.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial granted.

RUDD v. MEANS. (Civ. 5314.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 11, 1925.)

Assault and battery ⚡35—Evidence held to support award of damages for aiding another to assault plaintiff.

Evidence held to support findings and award to minor for assault and injury instigated, aided and abetted by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas O. Toland, Judge.

Action by George Rudd, an infant, by H. E. Rudd, his guardian ad litem, against E. H. Means. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Porter C. Blackburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McGovey & Klein, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff, an infant, by his guardian ad litem, alleges, in substance, that on the 12th day of March, 1922, defendant ordered and directed his servant, one Greenfield, to inflict bodily injury upon him; that, acting under this direction, said Greenfield did violently assault and beat the plaintiff; that by reason of said beating plaintiff suffered severe bruises upon his head, nose, and body, which caused great pain and agony. Damages were claimed in the sum of $1,000 for the injuries suffered, and exemplary damages in a like amount were prayed for.

Trial was had without a jury. The court found that defendant maliciously aided, abetted, and encouraged Greenfield to inflict bodily injury upon plaintiff, and, by reason of this malicious aiding and abetting, plaintiff was violently assaulted and beaten upon the face and jaw without just cause or provocation, in consequence of which he suffered pain and agony and was damaged in the sum of $200. Judgment was accordingly entered for this amount.

As grounds for reversal, it is claimed that the evidence fails to support the findings. There is no merit in this contention.

There is evidence in the record to show that defendant took Greenfield to the place where the injuries were suffered by plaintiff and that he ordered and directed Greenfield to inflict the beating which caused the injuries complained of.

The judgment is affirmed.

EASTMAN v. MEANS. (Civ. 5313.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 11, 1925.)

Evidence ⚡148—Telephone conversations properly admitted, in view of testimony prima facie proof of identity of defendant as person addressed.

In action for personal injuries to minor, testimony by father and mother as to telephone conversations with defendant held properly admitted on proof that witnesses and defendant were residents of same city, that person called at defendant's residence, was addressed by defendant's name, and his answers to inquiries of witnesses referred to transaction involved.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas O. Toland, Judge.

Action by Charles Eastman, an infant, by T. L. Eastman, his guardian ad litem, against E. H. Means. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Porter C. Blackburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McGovney & Klein, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action to recover damages for injuries which, according to the findings of the trial court, were willfully inflicted by appellant upon respondent, the latter being a minor. Judgment was entered against appellant and the appeal taken therefrom.

As a ground for reversal it is contended that the court erred in permitting the father and the mother of the minor to testify that following the injuries alleged certain conversations were had by them by means of the telephone, which, if the person with whom they conversed was appellant, were admissible as evidence of admissions then made by the latter.

The witnesses mentioned and appellant were all residents of the city of Los Angeles, and it appears from the testimony that the person with whom the conversations were had answered a telephone call to the residence of appellant, was addressed by the name of appellant, and that the answers to the inquiries of the witnesses referred to the transaction involved in the action. This testimony was sufficient prima facie to prove the identity of appellant with the person addressed, and was properly admitted. Union Construction Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 163 Cal. 298, 307, 125 P. 242. In addition to the foregoing, appellant, while a witness on his own behalf, admitted the fact of the conversations.

No error being shown, the judgment is affirmed.

YOAKAM v. HOGAN. (S. F. 11011.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 16, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡933(4)—Sufficiency of evidence cannot be considered, where order granting new trial was general.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, where order granting new trial did not specify it was granted because of insufficiency of evidence, Supreme Court will presume order was not based on that ground, and is precluded from considering sufficiency of evidence, unless it is insufficient in law and without material conflict.

2. Appeal and error ⚡867(3)—Insufficiency of pleadings cannot be considered on appeal from order granting new trial.

Insufficiency of pleadings cannot be considered on appeal from order granting new trial.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⚡349—Damages growing out of delay in performance held sufficiently pleaded.

Where plaintiff bought house from defendant, who failed to have certain agreed work done on it within stipulated time, and complaint alleged loss of use of premises with rental value thereof during period of delay, plaintiff sufficiently pleaded damages growing out of delay in performance.

4. Damages ⚡39—Loss of rents, though element of damage, should be specially pleaded.

While claim for damages based on loss of rents should be specially pleaded, such loss is proper element of damage when caused by delay in performance by contractor.

5. Evidence ⚡113(8)—Evidence of cost held relevant on question of value.

Where vendor failed to furnish certain articles he had agreed to put in house, and purchaser supplied them, in action to recover value thereof, evidence of cost of procuring them was relevant on question of such value, and admissible.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⚡343(1)—Vendor held liable for value of undelivered furnishings.

Where vendor failed to carry out contract to deliver certain furnishings, he became liable to purchaser in damages for value thereof.

7. Evidence ⚡213(1)—Evidence of compromise held incompetent, though brought out by proper questions on cross-examination.

In action for damages, where answers to questions, proper on cross-examination, and asked of defendant's witness on cross-examination, tended to show offer of defendant to compromise, such evidence would be as incompetent as if adduced directly by plaintiff.

8. New trial $\Leftrightarrow$ 41(2)—Admission of evidence held not to result in miscarriage of justice.

Where, in action for damages, testimony of defendant's witness on cross-examination did not show any offer by defendant to allow judgment to be taken against him or to compromise claim, but showed that he rejected proposed offer of plaintiff, and court instructed that any evidence of compromise should be disregarded in arriving at damages, held no evidence of compromise was admitted which would result in miscarriage of justice.

9. Appeal and error $\Leftrightarrow$ 1052(8)—Evidence of compromise could not cause miscarriage of justice, where verdict was supported by uncontradicted evidence of damage.

Where evidence of damage was uncontradicted and sufficient to sustain jury's verdict, admission of incompetent testimony as to offer of compromise between parties could not have resulted in miscarriage of justice.

10. Trial $\Leftrightarrow$ 296(2)—Demand for performance of contract to supply furnishings held not condition precedent to purchaser's right to sue.

In action against vendor for failure to supply certain furnishings in house, instruction to determine all damage proximately caused by defendant's failure to perform within agreed time, if he had failed to perform, was proper, where other instructions charged that plaintiff could not recover, if he caused delay or prevented performance; demand for performance not being condition precedent to plaintiff's right to sue.

11. Vendor and purchaser $\Leftrightarrow$ 350—Evidence in action against vendor for failure to supply furnishings held sufficient in law.

Evidence in action against vendor for failure to supply certain furnishings in house held sufficient in law to warrant verdict for damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Jasper A. Yoakam against Walter H. Hogan. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant's motion for new trial was granted. From the order granting such motion, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James F. Brennan, of San Francisco (Alfred S. Humphreys, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. In this action for damages for breach of contract relating to exchange of properties, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000. A motion by defendant for a new trial upon the grounds: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) that the verdict is against law; and (3) errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by defendant, was granted. The order was general, and did not specify as a ground thereof the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. Plaintiff appeals from such order.

The parties during the month of August, 1921, agreed to an exchange of real property, consisting of a ranch in Butte county owned by plaintiff, and two parcels of improved property in the city of San Francisco belonging to defendant, one situated at the corner of Larkin and O'Farrell streets, and the other at the corner of Waller and Stanyan streets. The parcel last mentioned is in part designed for use as a hotel or rooming house, and also includes flats with storerooms on the first floor of the building. Deeds were exchanged, followed by a delivery to plaintiff of possession of the parcel of San Francisco property first herein mentioned. As a part of the same transaction, and supported by the same consideration, an agreement in writing was entered into dated August 12, 1921, by which defendant undertook to alter and to paint and tint portions of the hotel building, and further to place in the rooms thereof certain furniture, household furnishings, and utensils, as specified in the agreement within 60 days from its date, all without expense to plaintiff. The hotel being at the time partially furnished, it was provided in the agreement that "all surplus carpets, beds, and bureaus and chairs now in said building to be retained or disposed of by said Hogan (the defendant) for his own benefit and account." It was alleged by plaintiff that defendant failed to complete the alterations, painting, and tinting mentioned and to furnish the personal property as provided; that plaintiff was prevented from taking possession of the hotel building until February 17, 1922, when he went into possession, notifying defendant that, owing to the delay, he elected to terminate defendant's right to perform, and, as grounds for the recovery of damages, a loss of rents from the property during the period between the expiration of the time fixed by the contract for performance and the taking of possession, alleged to have been of the value of $1,010 per month, together with the cost of completing the work unperformed and the value of the personal property undelivered.

Defendant denied the allegations of the complaint with the exception of the rental value, which he admitted was the sum of $600 per month, and claimed by appropriate pleading damages due to the alleged withholding by plaintiff of possession of the ranch mentioned, the conversion by the latter of the surplus carpets, beds, etc., in the hotel, and for extra work alleged to have been performed by him in the building.

It appears from the testimony of appellant that respondent failed to furnish a substantial portion of the articles called for by the contract; that a sum exceeding $3,000 was expended by the former in the purchase thereof and in completing the alterations, and, as shown by the warehouse receipt in evidence, respondent, in an attempt to deliver after the notice referred to, stored for the benefit of appellant a miscellaneous assortment of furnishings, to that extent negating his contention of an actual and complete performance by delivery on the premises. In addition to the foregoing is the testimony of appellant mentioned above as to the loss of rents; the whole showing an aggregate loss of more than the amount of the verdict.

[1] Respondent, in support of the order appealed from, contends that the trial court erred in certain of its rulings and instructions, and that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. As the order granting the motion for a new trial was general, and did not specify that it was granted because of the insufficiency of the evidence, it will be presumed on this appeal that the order was not based on that ground. Code Civ. Proc. § 657. We are precluded by the Code provision from considering the question whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict, unless it is insufficient in law, and without material conflict in any material point. Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 677, 209 P. 892.

[2-4] It is urged that the complaint fails to state a cause of action and is insufficient to support a verdict for damages growing out of delay in performance. The question of the insufficiency of the pleadings cannot be considered on an appeal from an order granting a new trial (Clark v. Torchiana, 19 Cal. App. 786, 127 P. 831; Crescent, etc., Co. v. United Upholsters' Union, 153 Cal. 433, 95 P. 871), but it appears that plaintiff sufficiently pleaded the damages sustained by him. The complaint alleged the loss of the use of the premises with the rental value thereof during the period of delay; and, while a claim for damages based upon a loss of rents should be specially pleaded (Tally v. Ganahl, 151 Cal. 418, 90 P. 1049), such loss is a proper element of damages when caused by delay in performance by a contractor (Tally v. Ganahl, supra; Bird v. American Surety Co., 175 Cal. 625, 166 P. 1009). The trial proceeded on the theory that the question whether the premises could have been leased for the monthly rental alleged had the contract been performed was an issue in the case, and appellant testified upon this subject without objection.

[5, 6] It is further alleged that the court erred in permitting the appellant to testify as to the cost of procuring the articles agreed to be furnished by respondent. Evidence of cost has been held to be relevant on the question of the value, and the testimony was properly admitted. Angell v. Hopkins, 79 Cal. 181, 21 P. 729; Greenebaum v. Taylor, 102 Cal. 624, 36 P. 957; Levy v. Scott, 115 Cal. 39, 46 P. 892; Union Hollywood, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles, 184 Cal. 535, 538, 195 P.

55; Travis Glass Co. v. Ibbetson, 186 Cal. 724, 200 P. 595. When respondent failed to carry out his contract to deliver the furnishings, he became liable to plaintiff in damages for the value of the property. Cummings v. Dudley, 60 Cal. 383, 385, 44 Am. Rep. 58.

[7-9] Respondent contends that the trial court was justified in granting a new trial because it erroneously permitted evidence of an offer of compromise to go before the jury. A witness for respondent was asked on cross-examination if he had not stated to appellant that he would advise respondent to pay a sum mentioned in settlement of the controversy, and whether the witness had not himself offered such sum to appellant for the same purpose. The witness answered the last question in the negative, but, in response to the first stated, that, though he had endeavored to effect a settlement, no amount was mentioned by him, but that appellant had suggested the sum of $4,850 as the amount he would be willing to accept, and that the suggestion was submitted to the respondent and rejected. This testimony was admitted without objection. The respondent asked that the answers be stricken out. The court denied the motion, but instructed the jury "that anything in the nature of a compromise shall not in any way interfere with your right to arrive at a verdict as to the damages in the case." While the questions may have been proper as cross-examination, if it can be said that the answers tended to show an offer on the part of the defendant to compromise, the evidence would be as incompetent as if adduced directly by the appellant. The question is whether the answer, permitted to go to the jury, justified the implied conclusion of the trial court that an error was committed which resulted in a miscarriage of justice. We do not see how it could. The testimony of the witness did not show any offer on the part of the defendant to allow judgment to be taken against him, or to compromise the claim, but, on the contrary, the testimony was that the defendant rejected the purported offer made by the plaintiff. But, assuming that the testimony may have left an impression that the respondent was seeking to compromise his differences with the appellant, and that the instruction of the court did not remove the impression that the answer might properly be considered as evidence of the fact and the amount of damage, the record shows that respondent offered no evidence in contradiction of the testimony of appellant as to the value of the personal property undelivered, or the work claimed by the latter to have been unperformed, nor of the loss caused by the delay; the evidence adduced by the respondent being directed to the questions whether the agreement had been substantially performed and the delay excusable. The evidence of damage, being uncontradicted, was, entirely aside from the incompetent testimony, sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury, and it cannot reasonably be said that its admission resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

[10] Respondent complains that the court erred in instructing the jury that, if it found that respondent failed without fault on the part of appellant to perform the agreement within the time limited by the contract, it would be its duty to ascertain the damage, if any, suffered by the latter, and to determine the amount which would compensate him for all detriment proximately caused by such failure, in that the instruction ignores respondent's defenses that no demand for performance was made; that the delay was caused by extra work done at the instance of appellant and the latter's indecision as to whether the building should be altered for use as a hotel or apartment house. While these matters were not pleaded as a waiver of performance or as an excuse for delay (Herdal v. Sheehy, 173 Cal. 163, 159 P. 422; Estate of Warner, 158 Cal. 441, 111 P. 352), the answer consisting of denials and affirmative allegations of full performance, there is evidence in the record tending to show an interference by appellant with the conduct of the work on the building; and the court instructed the jury that, if it found that the delay was caused by the fault of appellant, or that the latter prevented performance, he could not recover. These instructions fully covered the defenses based upon the evidence mentioned; a demand for performance not being a condition precedent to appellant's right to sue. O'Connor v. Dingley, 26 Cal. 11; Marshall v. Ferguson, 23 Cal. 65.

[11] Other contentions of respondent in justification of the order granting a new trial do not require consideration. We are satisfied that the evidence in the case was sufficient in law, and without conflict on the material issues of the case. No errors have been pointed out that warranted setting aside the verdict.

The order granting the new trial is reversed.

MILLER v. MILLER. (Civ. 5339.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. Dec. 16, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 11, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨302(5)—Objection that court erred in denying defendant's motion for new trial, because findings were incomplete, and that court failed to find on material issues, not considered on appeal.

Objection that court erred in denying defendant's motion for new trial, because findings were incomplete, and that court failed to find on material issues, cannot be considered on appeal, where defendant did not point out in what respect findings were incomplete, or what material issues had not been covered by findings made, or wherein any of claimed defects have been to his prejudice.

2. Husband and wife ⇨297—Allegation of cruelty in cross-complaint held not supported.

In action for separate maintenance, evidence held not to support defendant's allegation of cruelty in his cross-complaint.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence is conclusive.

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

4. Appeal and error ⇨197(3)—Objection that trial court was without jurisdiction to award plaintiff one-half community property, in that issue was not raised by pleadings, held unavailable on appeal.

In action for separate maintenance, objection that trial court was without jurisdiction to award plaintiff one-half community property, in that no such issue was made in the pleadings, held unavailable on appeal, where allegations in pleadings were sufficient to confer on court jurisdiction of subject-matter, and trial was had on theory that issue was properly before court, and all evidence on subject of community property was received without objection.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action for separate maintenance by Ruby T. Miller against Herbert L. Miller, in which defendant filed cross-complaint for divorce. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

August L. Fourtner and J. J. Lermen, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Philip M. Carey, of Oakland (Chas. D. Woehr, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for separate maintenance, setting forth two causes of action, one based upon the defendant's desertion, and the other based upon the defendant's cruelty. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint for divorce, charging the plaintiff with cruelty. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff upon her first cause of action—desertion—and awarded her alimony in the sum of $1,000 a year, and also awarded to her a one-half interest in the community property. At the same time the defendant was denied any relief upon his cross-complaint. He now appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, and the appeal is presented upon a record prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The first point raised by the appellant is that the trial court erred in denying his motion for a new trial, because the findings were incomplete, and because the trial court failed to find on material issues. This is all that is said in regard to the point raised. The appellant has not pointed out in what respect the findings are incomplete or what material issues have not been covered by the findings made, or wherein any of these claimed defects have been to his prejudice. Objections raised in this manner do not require consideration. People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 309, 67 P. 770; People v. Cebulla, 137 Cal. 314, 315, 70 P. 181.

[2] The second point raised is that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court adverse to the appellant's allegations of cruelty found in his cross-complaint. The appellant alleged that, during the entire married life of the parties, respondent had inflicted upon him great mental pain and suffering due to certain specified acts of alleged misconduct. The bulk of the evidence offered in support of these allegations covered quarrels between the parties occurring some 9 or 10 years prior to the trial of the action and all prior to two distinct acts of reconciliation and forgiveness on the part of both parties. Those acts, which were specified in the cross-complaint as having occurred within the statutory period, were either unsupported by any competent evidence or were of such a trivial character as to have been entirely overlooked during the course of the trial. In addition to this, all the testimony covering these specifications of cruelty was in wide conflict with the accusations on the part of the husband, being either positively denied or explained away by the testimony offered by the wife. For these reasons the finding of the trial court is not subject to attack on this appeal.

[3] The appellant argues that the judgment awarding the respondent maintenance is error, because the appellant's separation from his wife was caused by her cruelty and misconduct, and that therefore the desertion which is the basis of the award of maintenance is chargeable to her. This point is covered by what has just been said regarding the allegations of cruelty on the part of the wife. The whole argument is based upon the theory that the separation occurred through the fault of the wife, and that the appellant was really forced to leave the home because of her cruelty. But the trial court found adversely to appellant upon this issue, and, as we have said, the evidence being conflicting, that finding is conclusive.

[4] When the cause came on for oral argument in this court, the appellant for the first time raised the point that no issue had been made in the pleadings as to a division between the parties of the community property, and that the trial court was therefore without jurisdiction to award to the respondent one-half of this community property. It appears, however, that in the original complaint the respondent set forth the existence of community property and prayed for a specific sum as maintenance and for such other relief as may seem just and equitable. In his answer, the appellant admitted the ownership of the community property, and in his cross-complaint went into greater detail as to the description of this property. The facts regarding the community property were found by the trial court in accordance with the allegations which the appellant himself had set up. The trial was had upon the theory that the issue was properly before the court and all evidence on the subject of community property was received without objection from either side. The allegations in the pleadings were sufficient to confer upon the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and, though the descriptions of the property were not as complete as might have been required in face of a special demurrer, they were sufficient, particularly in view of the fact that no objection was made to the reception of the evidence, to support the finding and award of the trial court.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WALDEN et al. (Cr. 1227.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 14, 1925.)

1. Criminal law §622(1)—Court not required to order separate trial on mere request of defendant.

Under Pen. Code, § 1098, providing that defendants jointly charged shall be tried jointly, court in its discretion may order a separate trial, but is not required to do so on mere request of defendant.

2. Criminal law §622(2)—No abuse of discretion in denying defendant separate trial from that of his wife.

In prosecution for arson, court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant a separate trial from that of his wife, merely because Pen. Code, § 1322, prohibits husband or wife from being a competent witness for or against the other, except with consent of both.

3. Arson §37(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for arson, evidence held to sustain conviction against one defendant, but insufficient as to other.

4. Criminal law §1144(16)—Jury presumed to have obeyed court's proper instruction.

Where jury was properly instructed that it must not consider statement of defendant's wife implicating him in burning of a house as evidence against defendant, it will be presumed that jury obeyed that instruction.

5. Criminal law — 552(1)—Flight alone is not evidence of consciousness of guilt.

Flight, without some other incriminating evidence, is not evidence of consciousness of guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Clarence B. Walden and Martin Colson were convicted of arson, and they appeal. Conviction reversed as to defendant Walden, and affirmed as to defendant Colson.

Stanley Visel, of Los Angeles, for appellant Walden.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for appellant Colson.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Appellants Walden and Colson, together with Walden's wife, Edna Frances Walden, were jointly charged with the crime of arson, committed by willfully, etc., setting fire to and burning a dwelling house owned by Sophie Gwertz.

Walden asked that he be granted a separate trial from that of his wife. This request was denied. His motion was based upon an affidavit which stated that he and Mrs. Walden were husband and wife, and "by reason thereof and section 1322 of the Penal Code," alleged:

That "unless he is granted a separate trial from that of the codefendant, Edna Frances Walden, he cannot have a fair and impartial trial, and he will be prejudiced therein and will suffer a substantial injustice by reason thereof."

Said section 1322 is the section under which, in a case of this kind, neither husband nor wife would be a competent witness for or against the other, except with the consent of both.

[1, 2] On the subject of separate trials of defendants in criminal actions the rule now prevailing in this state requires that defendants jointly charged shall be tried jointly, "unless the court orders separate trials." Pen. Code, § 1098. The court in its discretion may order a separate trial, but is not bound or required to do so upon the mere request of any defendant. People v. Anderson, 59 Cal. App. 408, 431, 211 P. 254. This is in accordance with the common law. United States v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. 480, 6 L. Ed. 700; People v. Perry (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 890. Assuming that in some case there might be such an abuse of discretion, in denying a separate trial, as would call for reversal of a judgment of conviction, it does not appear herein that, upon the facts which were placed before the court in support of the motion of appellant Walden, there was any error in the court's order.

Each of the two appellants contends that as to him the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The house that was burned, together with the land on which it was situated, had been sold by one Mrs. Cummings to the Waldens for $2,300, of which, at the time of the fire, they had paid $630. In the meantime the Waldens had sold the property to Mrs. Sophie Gwertz at the agreed price of $3,000, of which she had paid approximately $600. At the time of the fire there was a $3,000 insurance policy on the house, which was issued to Mrs. Cummings with an attached "contract of sale clause" in favor of C. B. and E. F. Walden, covering their interest in the property under their contract with Mrs. Cummings.

[3] There is an abundance of testimony about the circumstances of the fire showing that it was of incendiary origin. The evidence is likewise amply sufficient to sustain the verdict against defendant Colson. There was introduced in evidence a statement which appears to have been freely and voluntarily made by Colson to the county fire warden. In that statement Colson described in much detail how he had entered the house with a pass-key, where he assembled various combustible materials and set fire to the house. He said that he did it "to secure the love of of a girl," Mrs. Walden; that he thought she might leave her husband, and especially if the husband did not have anything at all; that he thought that if he did this they might separate and he would get the girl. There are, in the evidence, some facts, concerning the friendly relations between the Waldens and Colson which tend to support this theory of Colson's motives.

[4, 5] Concerning Clarence B. Walden, a very different case is presented. There was introduced in evidence a statement made by Mrs. Walden, to some extent implicating her husband in the burning of the house. The jury was properly instructed that it must not consider that statement as evidence against her husband. It will be presumed that the jury obeyed that instruction. Defendants Walden were living in the house in question, as tenants of their vendee, Mrs. Gwertz, at the time of the fire. According to uncontradicted testimony, the Waldens left home in their automobile after noon in the day preceding the night of the fire, and did not return to the neighborhood of their home until after the fire had occurred; also there was introduced in evidence a statement made by appellant Walden, wherein he told the assistant fire warden, Kennedy, about the places where he and his wife had been during the afternoon and night. According to Kennedy's testimony, Walden said:

That "going home they got to within a block of the house when he saw it in flames. He said he turned around and beat it to Bakersfield. I asked him why, when he saw his house burning, why he did not go to find out the cause, or try to put it out. He said he was afraid on account of his bad record that he would be suspected. He said he went to protect his wife."

This is the only competent evidence in the record which can be said to be evidence tending to connect appellant Walden with the burning of the house. It shows flight under circumstances which might be taken as evidence of consciousness of guilt, if there had been any other incriminating evidence against him, but, taken alone, it is not sufficient even for that purpose. There is no evidence that at that time Walden knew that anybody had set fire to the house; in other words, there is no evidence that he knew that a crime had been committed or that he was likely to be accused thereof.

The judgment against appellant Colson and the order denying his motion for a new trial are affirmed. The judgment against appellant Walden and the order denying his motion for a new trial are reversed.

JONES, Sheriff, v. BUSICK, Judge.
(Civ. 3039.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 15, 1925.)

Appeal and error  612(1)—Absence of reporter held to justify court in refusing to certify transcript.

Where shorthand reporter was not present during partial hearing on petition for writ of mandate, on appeal under alternative method provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, court was not authorized to certify to correctness of transcript, absence of reporter, who was only one designated by law to make it up, preventing it from being "full, true, and fair transcript" as provided.

Application by Ellis W. Jones, Sheriff, for writ of mandate, to be directed to Charles O. Busick, Judge of the Superior Court of Sacramento County, to require respondent to certify reporter's transcript on appeal. Writ denied.

Ralph H. Lewis and Berkeley B. Blake, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an application by the petitioner, Ellis W. Jones, for a writ of mandate, requiring the respondent, as judge of the superior court of the county of Sacramento, to certify a reporter's transcript of the proceedings had in a certain cause entitled Catherine M. Johnston v. Ellis W. Jones, tried before the respondent as a judge of the superior court of said Sacramento county.

The record before us shows that in a certain mandamus proceeding, wherein Catherine M. Johnston was the petitioner and Ellis W. Jones the respondent, a writ of mandate was issued by the respondent in this action, Hon. Chas. O. Busick, as judge of the Superior court of Sacramento county, commanding the said Ellis W. Jones, as sheriff of the county of Sacramento, to release certain property from the levy of an attachment theretofore levied upon by the said sheriff under attachment proceedings taken and had in the superior court of Sacramento county. After the granting of the writ of mandate herein first referred to, the respondent in that action and the petitioner in this gave notice of an appeal under the alternative method provided for by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The clerk prepared the papers constituting the judgment roll, and the shorthand reporter transcribed the phonographic notes taken by him during the course of the trial. Upon presentation of the reporter's notes, as typewritten, the respondent declined to certify to the correctness of the same, on the ground that they were not complete, that a portion of the trial of this cause was had in the absence of a phonographic reporter, and that, in such cases, section 953a did not apply, and the only method by which a record could be made up, and alleged errors, if any, presented on appeal, was by a bill of exceptions.

The record, as presented to us by the petition and affidavits submitted upon this application, shows that on the 22d day of August, 1925, a partial hearing was had on the petition for a writ of mandate filed for the purpose of requiring the sheriff to release certain attached property. The affidavits are to the effect that the verified petition was offered in evidence; that certain oral stipulations were entered into in open court in relation thereto, and that these stipulations were to some extent subsequently modified; that the cause was partially argued, and then continued until the 24th day of August, 1925, with permission to the respondent to file an answer. Upon the 24th day of August, 1925, when the cause was called for hearing, the respondent filed both a demurrer and answer, and the trial was proceeded with until a final determination. No reporter was present on the 22d day of August, but a reporter was present and took stenographic notes of the partial trial had on the 24th day of August, 1925. The reporter's notes, as typewritten, included only that which took place on the said 24th day of August.

It is contended, on the part of the petitioner herein, that nothing took place on the 22d day of August which should have been set forth in the reporter's notes, that the petition for a writ of mandate in the case of Johnston v. Jones is a part of the clerk's record, and does not need to be set forth in the reporter's notes, that the stipulations entered into and made in open court were not entered in the minutes kept by the clerk, and that the subsequent hearing had on the 24th day of August constituted all there was of the trial. This position is controverted by the respondent. It is for this very reason, and to avoid such controversies, that, when an appeal is taken by the alternative method, the presence of a reporter is necessary to take stenographic notes of all the proceedings had in the cause. The third paragraph of section 953a expressly provides that the notes, as typewritten, shall contain a—"full, true and fair transcript of the proceedings had at the trial, the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, instructions, acts or statements of the court, also all objections and exceptions of counsel and matters to which the same relate."

It has been frequently held that the shorthand reporter is the only one designated by law to make up such transcript, and, where there is no reporter present to take down the proceedings, the trial judge is not authorized to certify to the correctness of the transcript. The following cases are decisive of this question: Martin v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 321; Bush v. Allen, 172 Cal. 102, 155 P. 456; Totten v. Barlow, 165 Cal. 378, 132 P. 749; Allen v. Conrey, 22 Cal. App. 409, 134 P. 730; Koeberle v. Coit, 46 Cal. App. 642, 189 P. 727. The case of Pierce v. Works, 171 Cal. 684, 154 P. 852, does not involve the question of any proceeding or trial had during the absence of a phonographic reporter, and therefore is inapplicable to the case at bar.

Writ denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by C. H. Caswell against Baker & Co., Inc. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, for appellant.
T. B. Scott, of Modesto, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in an action for the value of 192 sacks of beans alleged to have been converted by the defendant Baker & Co., from which judgment the defendant appeals.

[1] Both the appellant and the respondent set forth a résumé of the testimony in the briefs submitted on this appeal. After setting forth the testimony, appellant makes this statement:

"With these facts in mind, it is the contention of the defendant that no credence can be placed upon his (plaintiff's) testimony as to what he did, or where he did it, and that such testimony should be given no credence in the consideration by the court as to whether he is entitled to relief."

It is almost commonplace for us to state that with the credibility of witnesses courts of appeal have nothing to do. The trial court has the witnesses before it, and if the trial court accepts the testimony of a witness and there is nothing inherently improbable in the witnesses' testimony, or nothing showing that it cannot be true, courts of appeal are bound by the determination of the trial court.

The testimony set forth in the transcript shows that during the year 1922 one McBride was a tenant of the plaintiff Caswell; that during the year 1922 McBride farmed lands belonging to Caswell and raised thereon 537 sacks of cleaned beans; that McBride farmed Caswell's land upon shares; McBride's portion of the beans numbered 345 sacks, Caswell's portion 192 sacks; that after the beans were harvested, McBride employed a truckman to haul the beans and deliver the same at a warehouse belonging to the defendant; that immediately after the beans had all been hauled and delivered to the warehouse belonging to the defendant, McBride called at the warehouse, had a conversation with Mrs. Kelly, a bookkeeper of the defendant, asked for a piece of paper that he might figure out the number of sacks belonging to himself and the number of sacks belonging to Caswell, and at that time stated that Caswell owned a certain portion of the beans just delivered; that McBride was informed by Mrs. Kelly that the fairest way to divide the beans would be to wait until they had been cleaned; that upon the receipt of the beans by Baker & Co. tags were issued therefor for the several sacks of beans, the heading of which tags, after giving the date, read as follows: "Received from McBride for account of M. B. & G. Co." Then follows a detailed statement of the number of bags and gross weight of beans received. These tags were delivered to McBride. McBride testified that he did not examine these tags and that he never gave directions to any one that the tags should be made out in favor of M. B. & G. Co., which the testimony shows to be the letters used to indicate Modesto Bean & Grain Company; that shortly after the beans had been recleaned McBride, in company with an official of the Modesto Bean & Grain Company, went to the office of the defendant and had a warehouse certificate for 345 sacks of beans issued in favor of the Modesto Bean & Grain Company; McBride testified that he never gave any agent or official of the defendant any directions to issue any warehouse certificate to any one covering the remaining 192 sacks of beans. The record shows that Baker & Co. did issue warehouse receipts or certificates in favor of the Modesto Bean & Grain Company covering the 192 sacks of McBride beans which McBride and Caswell testified belonged to Caswell as his share of the beans raised upon the Caswell ranch. Some time after certificates had been thus issued covering all the beans delivered at the warehouse of Baker & Co. by McBride, the Modesto Bean & Grain Company, discovered that it had to its credit 192 sacks of beans deposited by McBride with Baker & Co. that the Modesto Bean & Grain Company had not purchased and thereupon wrote the following letter:

"Dec. 28, 1922.

"Baker & Company, Modesto, Cal.—Dear Sir: There are 192 sacks of the McBride Blackeyes, a portion of lot No. 6571 which belong to C. H. Caswell. The Modesto Bean & Grain Company never had any title to these beans. About November 12th when we learned the fact that we had not purchased these beans, we set aside lot No. 6692 W-R No. 800—192 sacks for Mr.

Caswell. Please deliver these beans or their equivalent to Mr. Caswell, and oblige.

"Modesto Bean & Grain Co.,

"By P. S. Bomberger, President.

"Carbon copy sent to Mr. Caswell.

"O. K. W. T. Scoon, Trustee."

On the right-hand side: "O. K. JWH."

[2] It further appears from the transcript that at the time of the writing of this letter by the president of the Modesto Bean & Grain Company to Baker & Co. that the bean company was in financial difficulties and at the same time owed Baker & Co. a considerable sum of money, and that at the time of the writing of this letter the defendant had in its possession 551 sacks of beans inclusive of the 192 sacks of beans which Baker & Co. had been directed to transfer to the account of Caswell on the ground that the bean company had not purchased the same. It further appears from the transcript that under these circumstances and the financial difficulties in which the Modesto Bean & Grain Company was laboring as a debtor of Baker & Co., Baker & Co. took the 551 sacks of beans before referred to, sold the same as its own, giving credit to the bean company for the 551 sacks of beans above mentioned. In the latter part of December the plaintiff called upon the defendant and demanded his 192 sacks of beans. These beans the defendant refused to deliver, alleging that they were covered by outstanding warehouse receipts. Warehouse receipts, however, had been returned by the Modesto Bean & Grain Company sufficient to cover the quantity of beans to which the plaintiff alleged he was entitled, though it would appear that they were not the identical beans, as the letter quoted calls for the identical beans or their equivalent. Some days after the refusal of the defendant to deliver the beans claimed by the plaintiff, this action was begun. The appellant, among other things, urges that the testimony is contrary to the findings made by the trial court. This claim, however, is supported only upon the theory that the defendant's version of the transaction, or rather that the version of the transaction as testified to by the defendant's witnesses, is correct, but, as we have said, there is testimony supporting the plaintiff's contention that the beans were deposited with the defendant; that the defendant was informed that Caswell was entitled to a share of the beans; that directions were never given by McBride or the plaintiff to issue a warehouse certificate to the Modesto Bean & Grain Company for any greater number than 345 sacks of said beans; that the warehouse certificates issued in favor of the bean company covering the remainder of said beans were made without any directions being given therefor, either by McBride, the plaintiff, or the bean company, and that the bean company notified the defendant of the mistake; that the defendant thereafter sold the beans and credited the Modesto Bean & Grain Company for the amount thereof on the claim or account that the defendant held against the said bean company. There is testimony also to the effect showing the value of the beans at the time of the alleged conversion was equal to the judgment rendered by the trial court.

The appellant makes the further contention that the cause of action, if any, which the plaintiff had, was barred by the provisions of section 18 of the act of the Legislature, approved March 19, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 440), and the amendments thereto. That section reads as follows:

"If some one other than the depositor or person claiming under him has a claim to the title or possession of the goods, and the warehouseman has information of such claim, the warehouseman shall be excused from liability for refusing to deliver the goods, either to the depositor or person claiming under him or to the adverse claimant, until the warehouseman has had a reasonable time to ascertain the validity of the adverse claim or to bring legal proceedings to compel all claimants to interplead. If such adverse claimant shall not bring suit and serve summons on the warehouseman within forty-eight hours after the service of notice of his adverse claim, such failure shall act as a complete abandonment of such adverse claim."

[3] In deciding this contention, which was argued in the court below, the learned trial judge used the following language, which we adopt as correct:

"The first point to be considered is whether the provisions of section 18 of the Warehouse Act are applicable to the case under consideration. This section is quoted in full in the briefs submitted by the attorneys for both parties, and it is not necessary to incorporate it herein. I think from a reading of this section that it is not applicable to the situation which is now before the court in the pending case. In the pending case, the warehouseman, himself, is making a claim to the grain deposited or stored as against a depositor. I think the section must be construed to mean that where two or more persons other than the warehouseman have a claim to the articles stored that the warehouseman would then have the right to insist that this section of the Warehouse Act be complied with. But where the situation is such that a direct suit in conversion is brought against the warehouseman himself, charging the warehouseman with conversion, it cannot be argued that this section is applicable. The dispute here is between the defendant and the plaintiff; no one other than Caswell and Baker & Co. are making claims to this property. McBride makes no claim to the property in question, neither does the Modesto Bean & Grain Company; in fact, all the parties who might claim title that the property was the property of the plaintiff, other than the defendant, warehouseman. It seems to me that the slightest analysis of the section in question would lead one irresistibly to the conclusion that this section was only meant to apply where two or more persons other than the warehouseman were making claims to property deposited and held under warehouse receipt."

We think the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

GILBERT v. SHERROD et al. (Civ. 5275.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 5, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 82(1), 873(1)—Order striking cross-complaint, filed after final judgment, is appealable, and, where no appeal taken, order cannot be held improper.

A motion striking a purported cross-complaint, filed after notice of motion for new trial, is an order made after final judgment, and is appealable, so that, where no appeal was taken, the order cannot be held to have been improperly rendered.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 544(1)—Order striking cross-complaint, being made after final judgment, can be considered only when presented on bill of exceptions, in absence of which order cannot be held improper.

A motion striking purported cross-complaint, filed after notice of motion for new trial, being an order made after final judgment, can be considered on appeal only when presented on bill of exceptions, and where no bill was settled or printed in transcript, the order cannot be held to be improper.

3. Pleading $\S$ 352—Cross-complaint, filed after final judgment without authority of court, held properly stricken.

Where purported cross-complaint was filed after the entry of final judgment, without authority of court, as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 442, it was properly stricken.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 706(3)—Denial of new trial not subject to review, where none of papers on which motion was based were presented in bill of exceptions.

Where none of the papers upon which motion for a new trial was based were presented in a bill of exceptions, ruling denying a new trial is not subject to review.

5. Ejectment $\S$ 112—Claim presenting no issue under the pleadings is not ground for new trial.

Claim by defendants in ejectment suit that, if plaintiffs had complied with certain conditions suggested by them, defendants would have been able to raise sufficient money to pay off indebtedness and prevent foreclosure of trust deed under which plaintiffs obtained title, not presenting any issue under the pleadings, is not ground for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Charles L. Gilbert against William H. Sherrod and wife and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

James E. Fenton, James W. Bell, C. C. Mishler, and John F. Keogh, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Julius V. Patrosso, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued in ejectment to recover possession of certain real property in the city of Los Angeles. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and defendants William H. Sherrod and Mildred H. Sherrod appeal on the judgment roll.

The complaint and answers are in the usual form in actions of this nature. The complaint was filed on July 8, 1922. The action was tried on August 25, 1922, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff on September 13, 1922. On September 22d the defendants gave notice of their intention to move for a new trial, and on October 2d filed affidavits to be used on this motion, together with a pleading designated as a cross-complaint in equity. This pleading was, on motion of the plaintiff, stricken from the files on October 18th. Defendant's motion for a new trial was apparently denied, though this does not appear in the transcript. The notice of appeal recites that the appeal is taken by the defendant William H. Sherrod and his wife from the judgment and from the order overruling their motion for a new trial. No bill of exceptions was settled, but the transcript contains a number of affidavits and other papers, followed by the clerk's certificate that they are true copies of the documents on file.

On this appeal the appellants urge two grounds for a reversal: That the order striking their cross-complaint from the files was improper, and that the trial court erred in denying their motion for a new trial. The arguments advanced by the appellants in their brief are specious and insincere and do not merit consideration.

[1-5] The answers to both grounds are simple, and do not require elaboration. First: (a) The motion striking the purported cross-complaint from the files is an order made after final judgment. It is an appealable order. No appeal was taken from it. (b) Being an order made after final judgment, it could be considered on appeal only when presented on a bill of exceptions. No bill was settled or printed in the transcript. (c) Section 442, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes the filing of a cross-complaint at the time of answering or subsequently thereto by permission of the court. The purported cross-complaint having been filed after the entry of final judgment and without permission of the court, it was properly stricken from the files. Second: (a) As none of the papers upon which the motion for a new trial was based has been presented in a bill of exceptions, the ruling of the trial court in denying a new trial is not subject to review. Linthorpe v. San Francisco Gas & Electric Co., 156 Cal. 58, 67, 103 P. 320, 19 Ann. Cas. 1230. (b) The only reason urged by appellants for a new trial was that, if respondent had complied with certain conditions suggested by appellants, they (the appellants) would have been able to raise sufficient money to pay off the indebtedness and thus prevent a foreclosure of the trust deed under which respondent obtained title. As this was not an issue under any conception of the pleadings, it was not a ground for a new trial.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WALSH et al. (Cr. 1131.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 5, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 1, 1926.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 232—Defendant held not to have been denied counsel at preliminary hearing so as to justify setting aside of information.

Where defendant, charged with burglary, was represented by counsel at first hearing, and given opportunity of accepting other counsel after reasonable continuance had been granted, the information will not be set aside on ground that committing magistrate had denied defendant right of counsel at preliminary hearing.

2. Burglary $\S$ 19, 24—Information need not state time or details of burglary.

Information, charging burglary, need not state whether burglary had been committed in daytime or nighttime, or detail facts of larceny intended to be committed by defendant when he made the entry.

3. Indictment and Information $\S$ 59—Information not defective for failing to specify degree of burglary.

An information, charging burglary, is not defective in failing to specify degree of burglary alleged to have been committed.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 622(2)—Trial court held not to have abused its discretion in refusing a separate trial.

In prosecution for burglary against two defendants, trial court, in denying motion for separate trial did not abuse discretion given it in such matter by Pen. Code, $\S$ 1098.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1134(3)—Grounds for impeaching verdict, frequently found insufficient, not considered, where conviction based on unimpeached testimony.

Where record showed that defendant charged with burglary was fairly tried and convicted on evidence which was not impeached or questioned on appeal, other grounds tending to impeach the verdict, which have been frequently held insufficient, will not be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Thomas Walsh was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant and appellant was tried on an information charging him jointly with one Dorney with the commission of the crime of burglary. The two defendants were tried together, and the trial resulted in a verdict of guilty as to the defendant Walsh and in a disagreement as to the defendant Dorney. The defendant Walsh has appealed from the judgment following the verdict and from the order denying him a new trial. The appeal is presented on a record prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

It would serve no purpose to outline the facts of the case, as it is conceded that there was sufficient competent evidence before the jury to support the verdict of guilty. The grounds urged by the appellant for a reversal cover assignments of error which are claimed to have occurred during the course of the trial. These grounds will be considered in the order presented.

[1] First. It is claimed that the trial court erred in denying appellant's motion to set aside the information on the ground that the committing magistrate had denied appellant the right of counsel at the preliminary hearing. Appellant cites People v. Napthaly, 105 Cal. 641, 39 P. 29, but the case is inapplicable because the appellant here was represented by counsel at the first hearing and was given the opportunity of accepting other counsel after a reasonable continuance had been granted by the committing magistrate. The case on the facts is similar to the case of People v. Caballero, 41 Cal. App. 146, 149, 182 P. 321, and the rule in that case supports the action of the trial court in denying appellant's motion.

[2, 3] Second. The appellant urges that the trial court erred in overruling his demurrer to the information. The point raised was that the information was insufficient because it did not state whether the alleged burglary had been committed in the daytime or in the nighttime, and because it failed to detail the facts of the larceny which it alleged the appellant intended to commit when he made the entry. On each ground the point has been ruled adversely to appellant. People v. Jefferson, 52 Cal. 452, 454; People v. Smith, 86 Cal. 238, 240, 24 P. 988. It is also argued that the information was defective in that it did not specify the degree of burglary which the appellant was charged to have committed, but this point has been covered by People v. Jefferson, supra, where an information in similar form was held sufficient.

[4] The appellant complains of the action of the trial court in denying his motion for a separate trial. It seems unnecessary to do more than to refer to section 1098 of the Penal Code, which expressly provides the procedure to be taken when two defendants are jointly charged with the same crime. By the terms of that section such parties must be tried jointly, unless the trial court in its discretion grants a separate trial. We see no abuse of this discretion on the part of the trial court in denying appellant's motion for a separate trial.

[5] Other grounds urged on the appeal relate to the efforts of the appellant to impeach the verdict of the jury on various grounds which have time and again been held insufficient, and we deem it unnecessary to discuss these points, inasmuch as an examination of the record discloses that the appellant was fairly tried and convicted upon evidence which was not impeached and which has not been questioned on this appeal.

Judgment and order affirmed.

In re MORTON (Civ. 5254.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 10, 1925.)

1. Attorney and client §61—On showing of good conduct for seven years, after disbarment, petitioner held entitled to reinstatement.

On showing that during seven successive years, after disbarment, petitioner has lived a clean, sober, and honorable life, and has gained confidence and approval of the bench and bar of another state, there being no opposition from the bar association, petitioner is entitled to be reinstated as an attorney at law.

2. Attorney and client §61—Mere sentimental belief that punishment has been sufficient does not justify restoration to the bar.

A mere sentimental belief that erring lawyer has been punished enough will not justify his restoration to the bar; the question being whether applicant, notwithstanding former delinquency, is now fit to be admitted to practice of law, and whether there is reasonable grounds to believe that fitness will permanently abide in him.

3. Attorney and client §61—Reinstatement after disbarment should be difficult.

Reinstatement after disbarment should be difficult, rather than easy, to obtain.

In the matter of the application of W. Ona Morton for reinstatement as an attorney at law. Application granted.

Wm. J. Clark, of Los Angeles, for applicant.

CONREY, P. J. By judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county, entered in the year 1918, the petitioner was deprived of his license to practice law in the state of California. The facts, as found by the court in that proceeding, are set forth in a decision of the Supreme Court. In re Morton, 179 Cal. 510, 177 P. 453.

[1] Petitioner alleges that during the succeeding seven years he has lived a "clean, sober, and honorable life," and has gained the confidence of all of the members of the bench and bar in the Texas counties where he has been practicing for some years under a license obtained prior to his former residence in California, although the fact of his disbarment in California was well known in Texas. These allegations are strongly supported by letters which bear the signatures of numerous lawyers, including some of the district judges and some of the justices of the Court of Appeals of the state of Texas.

Ample notice of the present application has been given to the Los Angeles Bar Association which prosecuted the disbarment proceeding against Mr. Morton. The Bar Association presents no opposition to the reinstatement. On the contrary, the justices are directly informed by the president of the association that its trustees have considered the matter and have determined that no objection should be made. We take this as a definite decision that no objection ought to be made.

[2, 3] The principles which should control in a matter of this nature are quite clear. A mere sentimental belief that the erring lawyer "has been punished enough" will not justify his restoration to the bar. In re O'Connell, 64 Cal. App. 673, 222 P. 625. The real question is: Notwithstanding his former delinquency, is the applicant now fit to be admitted to the practice of the law, and is there reasonable ground to believe that this fitness will permanently abide in him? As was said in O'Connell's Case, supra:

"In proceedings of this character the court owes a solemn duty to the community and to the legal profession which must be performed without regard to feelings of sympathy for the applicant."

In other words, reinstatement after disbarment should be difficult, rather than easy, to obtain.

But the law does not intend that the obtaining of such an order shall be practically impossible. In the instant case, the court finds in favor of the application.

It is ordered that W. Ona Morton be and he is hereby restored to the rights and privileges of an attorney and counselor at law, and is authorized to practice in all of the courts of this state.

IN re NEWELL'S ESTATE.

NEWELL v. NEWELL.

(Civ. 5414.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 12, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 8, 1926.)

1. Wills $\S$ 360—Failure to actually offer will in evidence not objectionable under circumstances.

In probating will, failure of proponent to formally state that he offered will in evidence and to read will held not open to objection by contestant on appeal, where no motion, objection, or exception called attention of trial court to the omission, and both court and counsel assumed that will was in evidence.

2. Wills $\S$ 302(1)—Proponent's testimony held not to identify different will from that probated.

Proponent's testimony identifying will held not to identify a different will from that probated, because he testified that will stated it was his only will, when no such statement was in will probated, other testimony showing this statement was made by testator.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 204(7)—Testimony received without objection held not subject to contention that witness was not qualified.

In probating will, testimony of proponent that will was in handwriting of deceased held not reversible error on ground that witness was not qualified, where no objection was made to its reception.

4. Evidence $\S$ 563—Banker held qualified as handwriting expert.

A banker of 23 years' experience, although testifying that he was not an expert in handwriting and had never testified as an expert theretofore and did not personally know handwriting of testator, held qualified as expert to compare handwriting, in view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1944.

5. Wills $\S$ 386—Appellate court cannot disturb findings of trial court supported by testimony.

In probate of will, where there is direct testimony that deceased signed will, court, on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, cannot disturb findings of trial court to that effect, and therefore will not order exhibits certified to it in order to make handwriting comparison.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Application by Joseph L. Newell for the probate of the will of Sem Newell, deceased. From a decree in favor of proponent, Francis E. Newell, contestant, appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for appellant.

L. E. Fulwider, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is a proceeding to contest a will before probate. The proceeding was heard before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the proponent, and thereafter ordered judgment in accordance therewith. From that judgment the contestant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The first point made by the appellant is "that no will was before the court as evidence; no will was introduced in evidence; no will was offered in evidence; and no will was even marked for identification; that there is an entire absence of even a prima facie case warranting the admission of the will to probate." The point rests upon the fact that the proponent did not formally state that he offered the will in evidence, and he did not formally read the will; nevertheless we think that the record is not vulnerable to the attack made by the appellant. The appellant does not call to our attention any objection, motion, or exception showing that the point was in any way called to the attention of the trial court. On the calling of the case the proponent commenced to introduce a prima facie case proving his petition for the probate of the will. He called as a witness the proponent, and, having elicited other jurisdictional facts, the attorney for the proponent asked the witness:

"Did your father leave a will? A. He did.

"Q. I will show you this, and ask you if that will is entirely written, dated and signed by the hand of your father? (Showing.) A. The will is written entirely and dated by my father, and states it is his only will."

On cross-examination the attorney for the contestant propounded the question:

"Now you said in your examination by Mr. Fulwider that when your father made the will he stated that it was his only will and the last handwriting he would ever do. A. That is right.

"Q. Were you present when he was writing this? A. No, sir; he told me about it the day after he made it.

"Q. How do you place the time as the day after it was made? A. Because he said: 'I made my will yesterday before noon, and I placed it in the Bible, and I want no man to move it; it is in a place where it should be held inviolate until I am dead.'

"Q. And is that where you found it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. After his death? A. While he was unconscious.

"Q. You got it before he died, though? A. I got it to make a copy of it, and placed it in the same place it was, so if it was removed I would know what the will was, and it would be a protection to me.

"Q. Then you had a copy of the will before he died? A. Yes; after he was unconscious.

"Q. Where is that copy you made? A. Mr. Fulwider has it.

"Q. I would like to see that. (Mr. Hall examines paper.) Where did you make this copy? A. I made it on the same desk which contains the book he wrote it on.

"Q. When did you make this copy? A. Well; I made it in the kitchen, or the bedroom which was formerly the kitchen, where he laid."

Later the contestant offered the copy in evidence. The court ordered it received and considered read. The copy so received is as follows:

"Copy.

May 9th, 1919.

"In the name of God, amen this is my last Will will I hereby leave all my real and personal property to my son J. L. Newell if he should die before I do then it shall go to my brother's children share and share alike $5 goes to my son F. E. Newell Signed by Father.

"Copied by J. L. Newell."

Indorsed in ink: "Copy of Will."

The clerk's transcript sets forth the petition for probate of will, and shows that the same was filed April 21, 1924. And immediately following the same transcript contains the will, and shows it was filed April 21, 1924. We have carefully examined the record, and do not find any place in which the appellant claimed that the copy received in evidence was not a true and correct copy. The witness in the chair in numerous places testified that it was. As the witness was leaving the stand the trial court asked the attorney for the proponent if that was his prima facie case. After a discussion, in which the attorney for the proponent, the attorney for the contestant, and the trial court participated, regarding the evidence as to proof of notice, etc., the attorney for the proponent stated: "That is our prima facie showing. The Court: You may proceed then." Thereupon the contestant proceeded to introduce proof of the allegations contained in the written contest. From that point on to the end of the case each attorney at different times referred to the will and asked questions of various witnesses in the same manner and to the same extent as though the original will had been formally read in evidence. Furthermore, after the contestant had introduced his evidence and after the proponent had introduced his evidence and had rested, the contestant called as a witness Mr. R. A. Belden, and after propounding questions and developing the facts that Mr. Belden was a banker of 23 years' experience and had acted in every capacity of the banking business, and had occasion, as a banker, to compare signatures of various parties, the contestant then propounded the following question:

"Q. I show you here a document which is Contestant's Exhibit 1. That is the original will as filed in the clerk's office—that is the original will—and I show you here on page 227 a signature, and ask you to compare them."

Now, as a matter of fact, Contestant's Exhibit 1 was not and did not purport to be the will or a copy of the will, but it was an agreement of hire dated March 19, 1920, as appears on page 16 of the transcript. Be that as it may, the record fully discloses that both attorneys and the trial court were laboring under the impression that the will had been formally admitted in evidence, and each was fully informed as to what was meant by the expression "the will." No one at any time in any place contended or suggested that there were two or more papers purporting to be wills. Under these circumstances we think that the first point made by the appellant is entirely without merit.

[2] The second point made by the appellant is, "So far as there was any identification of a will, it was a different document from that admitted to probate." Supporting this point appellant first quotes the will, then he quotes that part of the testimony printed above where the witness made the answer, "The will is written entirely and dated by my father and states it is his only will." Counsel then argues that, as the will on its face does not show that it is the only will of the decedent, therefore the will admitted to probate was a different will from the will mentioned by the proponent. Whatever there is in the point is quickly dispelled when one picks up the record and reads the further testimony given by the proponent. Immediately following the answer cited by the appellant the contestant interrupted:

"Mr. Hall: That is the only will? A. In other words, he stated it was the last handwriting that he would ever do.

"Mr. Donohue: I did not get that. A. He stated at the time he told me he made the will that it was the last handwriting he would ever do."

At the time of the trial the appellant did not misunderstand the witness because in cross-examination appellant's counsel propounded the question:

"Now, you said in your examination by Mr. Fulwider that when your father made the will he stated that it was his only will, and the last writing he would ever do? A. That is right.

"Q. Were you present when he was writing this? A. No, sir; he told me about it the day after he made it."

[3. 4] The last point made by the appellant in his opening brief is, "That the proponent did not sustain the burden of proof to support the finding that the will admitted to probate was the will of the deceased." Under this point the appellant makes two contentions. He contends that the evidence does not show that the proponent was qualified to state whether the writing on the face of the will was the handwriting of the deceased. A sufficient answer to that contention is that when the question was propounded to the witness as to whose writing it was the witness was allowed to answer without any objection whatsoever. As supporting the testimony given by the proponent he called as witnesses Joseph G. Morrow and Joseph A. Lombardi. In reply to questions propounded by the proponent, Mr. Morrow testified that:

"I am connected with the First National Bank of Santa Rosa and have been for about 23 years. During that time I have had considerable opportunity from time to time to judge of handwriting and compare signatures. It is a portion of my duties in the banking business to compare handwritings and to compare signatures and to decide from time to time whether signatures are what they purport to be."

And then, in reply to questions propounded by the contestant, the witness testified:

"Almost daily I have been called upon to examine handwritings in the bank. In the legitimate conduct of the affairs of the bank business I compare the handwriting of our customers with checks that they draw. I do not pretend to be an expert. I never testified as an expert on handwriting. I do not profess to be an expert. I am not an expert. I am not familiar with Sem Newell's signature."

Thereupon the contestant objected to the witness testifying as to the signature of Sem Newell because the witness was not qualified. The trial court remarked:

"Personally, I think I would rather trust the testimony of a banker than the testimony of an expert, for the reason that the banker makes it his business in life to compare signatures in paying out money, he depends on that knowledge, and I should think their evidence would be very valuable. * * * Moreover it has been the custom in our state to accept the testimony of banking men as a class, not only in this court, but in every court of this state. I think he is qualified to testify."

Many courts of last resort agree with the trial judge and the reason for his conclusion. Digesting those decisions, Professor Jones says:

"Courts will take notice that certain pursuits are so intimately connected with others as to give those following one of such pursuits unusual facilities for becoming acquainted with the other; and if the occupation and experience of the witness have been such as to give him the requisite means of knowledge of the subject, he may be competent as an expert, although engaged in some other occupation or even if he has abandoned the business to which the inquiry relates. * * * In order that a witness should be competent as an expert in respect to handwriting, it is not necessary that he should belong to any particular calling or profession. It is only necessary that the business opportunities and intelligence of the witness should be such as to enable him to have reasonable skill in judging of handwriting. While it is not necessary that the witness should have made the comparison of handwriting a specialty, it should appear that he has been engaged in some business which calls for frequent comparisons, and that he has in fact been in the habit for a length of time of making such comparisons." Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) pp. 556, 861, 862.

It seems clear therefore that, although Mr. Morrow did not know that he was a writing expert, nevertheless, under the law, he was fully qualified as such. What has been said regarding Mr. Morrow applies equally to Mr. Lombardi. The trial court did not err in receiving their testimony. Code Civ. Proc. § 1944.

[5] In concluding his reply brief the appellant states that if we disagree with him in the legal proposition that no prima facie case had been made, that then this court order certified up to this court Contestant's Exhibits 3, 4, 5, and 6, exemplars of handwriting, and then that this court make the comparison. We would make the order if by so doing it would be of any benefit to the appellant. But it would not be. The question of determining who wrote the signature "Sem Newell" to the will was a question of fact. The very first witness on the stand testified that Sem Newell wrote it. There was therefore evidence in the record in favor of the respondent and against the contestant. The trial court made its finding in favor of the respondent. If all of the exhibits were before this court and this court reached a different conclusion it would have no power to disturb the finding made by the trial court under the circumstances enumerated.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Thomas Griffin was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco (James A. Himmel, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. The defendant was convicted of robbery and appeals from the judgment. The crime with which he was charged was robbing a bank at Clovis, Fresno county, Cal., on February 5, 1924, of approximately $28,000. The robbery occurred as follows: A man entered the bank and presented a $20 bill to Thomas Howison, an employee of the bank, and asked for small change. While the change was being counted out, the second robber entered the bank and, pointing a revolver at Howison, commanded him to throw up his hands. Howison's hands were then tied with a rope and he was locked in a vault, which was looted. The vice president of the bank, Mr. R. R. Rayburn, returned from his luncheon before the robbers left the bank. A revolver was pointed at him and he was ordered to stand behind some filing cases. He stepped behind the cases until the robbers left the bank and then ran to the front door in time to see an automobile speeding away. He ran down the street calling to bystanders to stop the automobile, but the men escaped.

At the trial, Rayburn identified the defendant as the man who had pointed the revolver at him. Howison was not able to positively identify the defendant as one of the men who participated in the robbery, but stated that he resembled the man who had asked for the change. He stated that he had not noticed this man particularly because there was nothing to arouse suspicion when he entered, and later Howison's attention was upon the man who held the revolver and commanded him to throw up his hands and afterwards led him into the vault.

[1] Appellant contends that the identification is not sufficiently positive to warrant the conviction. With this contention we do not agree. The identification was positive by the witness Rayburn, even though Howison hesitated to be absolutely positive. Furthermore, there is a long and convincing chain of circumstantial evidence before the court, to all of which appellant is strenuously objecting upon appeal.

[2] Rayburn testified that as he approached the bank returning from his luncheon on the day in question, he observed an automobile parked parallel with the curb in the vicinity of the bank. The engine was running and the automobile was distinguishable by the facts that it had recently been repainted and the rear window in the top had been removed, leaving a rather large opening. Rayburn and other persons testified that such an automobile was speeding through the streets of Clovis immediately after the robbery; that two men were in it at the time and one of them was in the rear seat throwing something out of this unusually large opening in the rear. Two witnesses testified that shortly after the robbery occurred and over the course the automobile was driven immediately after the robbery they found numerous "roofing tacks," some of which were admitted in evidence. This automobile was found later in a garage in Fresno and identified and in the back part of it were found a number of roofing tacks corresponding to the tacks found upon the highway. At the time the automobile was driven into this garage, the person who drove it in signed the register: "T. T. Jones." A number of exemplars of defendant's handwriting were admitted in evidence, and two expert witnesses testified that the person who wrote the name "T. T. Jones" upon the garage register was the same person who wrote the handwriting exemplars referred to. Photographs of all these exhibits appear in the record, and it needs no expert to see immediately the strikingly similar characteristics of them all. Some of the evidence objected to upon appeal was introduced to lay a foundation for the introduction of these handwriting exemplars and was clearly admissible for that purpose. It consisted of testimony of employees of banks at Vacaville and Oakland, Cal., who identified defendant as the person who had taken out safe deposit boxes under the names of Tom Ray and T. J. Ryan and who had signed certain entry slips with these names. The slips were then introduced as exemplars of his handwriting. The testimony objected to was not offered to show that defendant had assumed different names, as appellant contends. Incidentally, that was revealed; but the purpose of the testimony was to connect defendant with the signatures and then to use the signatures for comparison with the signatures of the man who placed this automobile in the garage at Fresno which had been identified as the automobile used in perpetrating the robbery.

Defendant was further connected with the possession of this automobile by the following facts to which objection is made as having been improperly admitted: The automobile was identified as having been stolen from a street in Fresno a short time before the robbery was committed. At the time it was stolen it was painted blue and there was a plate-glass window in the rear of the top. It was also equipped with a number of accessories, including two extra tires, an emergency kit consisting of three cans, one for oil, one for gasoline, and one for water, and four rods which were used to support the side curtains of the automobile and other articles. Most of this equipment had been removed from the automobile when it was recovered from the garage in Fresno, and some of it was found in a garage adjoining a house which the defendant had occupied a few days prior to the robbery and was identified by the owner as having been in the automobile at the time it was stolen. In this same garage were found several cans of paint, partially used, and paint brushes which had also been used. The paint in the cans was the same as that applied to the automobile after it was stolen. The owner of the house and garage testified that these articles were not on the premises when the defendant took possession of them. A few days after the robbery defendant left this house without notifying the owner that he intended to vacate it.

[3] There are other facts and circumstances in the record tending to prove the guilt of the defendant, but it is unnecessary to set them all out here; those facts which we have recited abundantly support the verdict of the jury.

[4] It is contended the court erred in refusing to submit the question of defendant's sanity to a special jury. In passing upon this motion, the trial court said that at no time during the trial had there been any doubt in the mind of the court as to the sanity of the defendant. It follows that the motion was properly denied. People v. Stock, 19 Cal. App. 748, 750, 127 P. 798; People v. Hettick, 126 Cal. 425, 426, 58 P. 918.

The other objections made are so lacking in merit as to require no discussion. In conclusion we may add that the record before us is unusually free from error. It is a lengthy record, and, after a careful reading of it, we are of the opinion that great care was used in the preparation and handling of this case and in gathering the evidence and that there is no reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

The information charges that the defendant, in a civil action in which he was plaintiff and Joseph Taylor was defendant, gave false testimony as follows:

"Q. Mr. Chand, at the time you gave to Mr. Taylor the two drafts that you testified about, did you receive from him another paper? A. No, sir; nothing.

"Q. Isn't it a fact that he gave you a bill of sale? A. No, sir; never.

"Q. Isn't it a fact that Mr. Taylor, in his office, gave you a bill of sale? A. Never; he took me to his back room and received two drafts, one $500 and the other $400, and got me to indorse.

"Q. And you testified that you did not receive any bill of sale? A. Nothing, sir; and nobody was there, and he received the two drafts in his back room.

"Q. Do you know a man by the name of J. C. Williams? A. I never been acquainted with him.

"Q. Don't you know, as a matter of fact, that you took Mr. Williams to the office of Mr. Taylor, the defendant, and you instructed him to make the bill of sale in Mr. Williams name? A. I never been acquainted with that party."

The complaint and answer in the civil action were introduced in evidence. The defendant stipulated that "they are the complaint and answer in that action," and that, at the trial thereof, the defendant herein was duly sworn as a witness and gave the testimony set out in the information.

The complaint so introduced alleged that the defendant in that action was indebted to the plaintiff therein "for money had and received from said plaintiff in the sum of $1,075 to and for the use of plaintiff." The answer denied the allegations of the complaint and alleged that:

"As agent and broker for one Marie Smith, defendant * * * sold to plaintiff for the agreed price of $1,000 the contents, that is to say, furnishings then and there in and upon the premises then and there owned by the said Marie Smith, and known as the Queen rooming house * * * in the city of Stockton. * * * At the time and place of the making of the said sale, as alleged, plaintiff made a deposit * * * in the sum of $200. * * * On September 8, 1924, the balance of the purchase money in the sum of $800 was paid to defendant by plaintiff, and an additional sum of $75 was paid at the same place and time by plaintiff to defendant as an adjustment on rentals due from tenants of the 'Queen.' At the said time and place * * * defendant delivered to plaintiff a bill of sale, covering the property just purchased, signed by the said Marie Smith, of the said premises to plaintiff; that defendant at all times acted for and on behalf of his principal, the said Marie Smith, in the said transaction, and not for plaintiff."

[1] It is not contended that the evidence herein is insufficient to show that the testimony admittedly given by defendant is false, but appellant urges that there is no evidence tending to show that such testimony was material in the trial of the civil action. Appellant says:

"There is nothing in the record which would disclose whether or not a demurrer had ever been interposed or sustained to the answer; no showing as to whether or not a motion to strike the answer or a portion of it from the files had been made or granted; no showing that the trial was had upon the issues raised by the affirmative matter set forth in the answer."

[2] The defendant's stipulation that the complaint and answer admitted in evidence "are the complaint and answer in that action" clearly relates to the complaint and answer upon which the action was tried. Had a demurrer to the answer been sustained or any part thereof stricken out, or had the answer been superseded by a subsequent pleading, then such answer would not have been the "answer in that action" at the time the stipulation was made. The answer admitted the receipt by the defendant in that action of the amount of money alleged in the complaint therein. The issue in the action was whether such money was received by defendant for the use of the plaintiff or in payment of the purchase price of the personal property described in the answer. Evidence of the delivery to and acceptance by the plaintiff in that action of a bill of sale of such personal property at the time the money was delivered to the defendant therein would certainly tend to show that the money was given in payment of the purchase price of the property, and not for the use of the plaintiff as alleged in the complaint. The testimony set out in the information therefore was material to the issues raised by the pleadings in the civil action.

"The matter sworn to need not be directly and immediately material. It is sufficient if it be so connected with the fact directly in issue as to have a legitimate tendency to prove or disprove such fact by giving weight or probability to the testimony of a witness testifying thereto, or otherwise." 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 687; People v. Patterson, 64 Cal. App. 223, 229, 221 P. 394; People v. Phillips, 56 Cal. App. 291, 293, 205 P. 40; In re Braynard, 52 Cal. App. 631, 634, 199 P. 576.

[3] "Any testimony which is relevant in the trial of a given case is so far material to the issue as to render a witness who knowingly and willfully falsifies in giving it guilty of the crime of perjury." State v. Miller, 26 R. I. 282, 286, 58 A. 882, 884 (3 Ann. Cas. 943).

PEOPLE v. SHEIK. (Cr. 1199.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 4, 1925.)

1. Criminal law §200(8) — Though misrepresentations made to several persons at same time, conviction may be had on as many counts as there were persons defrauded on different dates.

One making misrepresentations at same time to several persons, to whom he subsequently sold corporate stock on different dates, may be convicted of obtaining property or money by false pretenses on as many counts as there were individuals defrauded.

2. Criminal law §881(2) — One shown to have obtained bank checks by false pretenses cannot complain of conviction for obtaining "money and property"; "property."

One generally charged with obtaining "money and property" by false pretenses, and in detail with obtaining "property," to wit, bank checks, which the evidence shows were cashed and money obtained, cannot complain of conviction for obtaining "money and property" for lack of conformity, within Pen. Code, § 1162, on ground that property and not money was obtained, particularly in view of Civ. Code, § 14, and Pen. Code, § 7, declaring that word "property" includes property real and personal, and that personal property includes money.

Refusal to give requested instruction covered by others given held not error.

5. Criminal law §1169(2) — Admission of evidence without proper foundation held harmless error.

Error in admitting, without proper foundation, records of corporation held harmless where later evidence fully established authenticity of such records.

Erroneous admission in evidence of certain records, from which a date material to inquiry was supplied, held not prejudicial, where same date was established through other sources.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

J. A. Sheik was convicted of obtaining money and property by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Perky & McConnell, of Long Beach, and Clarence S. Hill, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted and sentenced on each of six separate counts of an indictment, wherein he was charged with the crime of obtaining property, or money and property by false pretenses. As to the last three of such counts, the trial court ordered that execution of the sentence be suspended. Defendant appeals from the entire judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The transaction out of which the prosecution of defendant arose concerned the sale of stock in a mining company. In brief, defendant was charged with having made false representations with reference to several separate features connected with the matter, including statements that the corporation whose stock was being sold was under the direct supervision of the Corporation Commission; that no commission or bonus of any kind was being paid to any person for the sale of the stock; that defendant had invested $25,000 of his own money in the stock of the company; and that at the time defendant made the sale of the stock to the several persons named in the indictment $1,000,000 worth of ore was "blocked out" or "in sight."

It is first contended by appellant that the verdict by the jury was contrary to the law and the evidence, in that there was no evidence as to the falsity of the alleged misrepresentations. The evidence received at the trial was voluminous, and it would serve no useful purpose to review the testimony of the several witnesses in order that the alleged misrepresentations might be shown to have been actually made and to have been relied upon by the purchasers of the stock as the inducing cause of their purchase of the same. Suffice it to say that, after a careful reading of those portions of the record to which attention has been directed, this court is convinced that the record, while not demonstrative in its nature, is ample in every respect to warrant the conclusion that, as to each count of the indictment, at least one of such misrepresentations was made by the defendant with the intention and purpose that the persons to whom such misrepresentations were alleged to have been made should act upon them, and by reason thereof be defrauded thereby, and that such design was actually accomplished.

[1] Appellant's next two specifications of error in effect are, that because practically all the misrepresentations were made at the same time and to all the several persons to whom defendant sold the stock, although at different dates, the right did not exist to prosecute defendant under as many counts as there were individuals defrauded, but that there could be but one information or one indictment for one alleged criminal act.

In the case of People v. Brannon (Cal. App.) 233 P. 88, the point thus presented by appellant is fully considered and the authorities reviewed, with the conclusion that (syllabus) "where two or more persons are injured by a single criminal act, there are as many separate and distinct offenses as there were persons injured by the unlawful act." To the same effect is the case of People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 3 P. 597, 52 Am. Rep. 295. It would follow that appellant's point is not well taken.

[2] It is urged by appellant that no judgment of conviction can be rendered "unless the jury expressly finds against the defendant upon the issue or judgment is given against him on a special verdict." In this connection appellant directs attention to the fact that, although the general charge is that defendant obtained "money and property by false pretenses," etc., the details of the accusation against defendant are, in substance, that he obtained "property" by false pretenses, and that the verdict is that he was guilty of obtaining "money and property" thereby, as charged in the indictment.

On the first count of the indictment defendant was charged simply with obtaining "property" by false pretense. As to such count no complaint is made. It is therefore apparent that, at least so far as the first count is concerned, appellant's point is untenable. As to the remaining counts of the indictment, the allegation and the evidence agree in showing that what was actually obtained by defendant consisted of bank checks.

In the case of People v. Tilley, 135 Cal. 61, 67 P. 42, the court gave consideration to a question similar to that suggested by appellant herein. It was there said:

"Further, the form of the verdict is to be regarded as immaterial, provided the intention to convict of the crime charged be unmistakably expressed. People v. McCarty, 48 Cal. 559; People v. Swenson, 49 Cal. 390, 391; People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 448 [50 P. 675]. On the other hand, it is expressly provided that 'No judgment of conviction can be given, unless the jury expressly find against the defendant upon the issue.' Pen. Code, § 1162. Hence there is no room for inference outside the words of the verdict. These must express the intention unequivocally; otherwise, the verdict must be regarded as insufficient. People v. Ah Gow, 53 Cal. 628. And, a fortiori, it must be so regarded, if it be susceptible of a different construction than that of guilty of the crime charged."

While the details of the allegation contained in each of the several counts of the indictment to which exception is taken in substance are that the defendant fraudulently obtained a bank check, the evidence shows, not only the truth of the allegation in that regard, but as well that the check was cashed, and that the person giving the check lost the money represented thereby. It must therefore be said that the defendant was guilty, not only of fraudulently obtaining property, but that he was guilty, also, of likewise obtaining money, as distinguished from property. Moreover, according to section 14 of the Civil Code and section 7 of the Penal Code:

"The word 'property' includes property real and personal. * * * The words 'personal property' include money, goods, chattels, things in action, and evidences of debt."

Considering that the word "property," according to the Code sections just quoted, includes "money," the effect of the criticized verdicts would be that they contained merely a repetition in their language in that the verdicts would then be read that the defendant was guilty of "obtaining money (property) and property by false pretenses," etc.

In the case of People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 50 P. 675, the jury returned a verdict as follows:

"Second. We find a verdict of 'guilty' against all the others named in the indictment, * * * and find a verdict of 'involuntary manslaughter,' 'not a felony,' as charged and laid down by the court under the head of involuntary manslaughter, and pray the extreme mercy of the court in its sentence and punishment, and so say we all."

In that case it was held that, in view of fact that the verdict clearly showed an intention to convict the defendants rather than to acquit them of the charge, the words "not a felony," which were inserted in the verdict, should be rejected as so much surplusage, and the general verdict of guilty of involuntary manslaughter should stand.

[3] In the instant case the intention of the jury in rendering its verdict is unmistakable. It undoubtedly meant to find the defendant guilty in accordance with the charge which had been preferred against him. That in legal conception of the terms employed in its verdict there was a surplusage of words, or, to state the thought otherwise, that more words were used than were necessary to express the meaning which was intended to be conveyed, cannot affect the validity of the verdict.

In this connection it is urged that the defendant cannot be tried for an offense other than that charged against him in the indictment or the information. It need only be said that defendant was charged generally with the crime of obtaining "money and property by false pretenses," that he was tried upon such charge, and that the language of the verdict by the jury is in exact accordance therewith. Defendant could have been neither misled nor injured in any manner by any technical difference which may exist between the language of the details of the accusation as set forth in the indictment and the language contained in the verdict returned by the jury. In such circumstances, to award a new trial to the defendant because of the alleged error to which reference has been had would amount to nothing less than a travesty on justice.

[4] Defendant's next specification of error, in substance, is that the trial court failed to advise the jury that, in order to support a conviction of the offense of obtaining money or property under false pretenses, the evidence must show and the jury must find that the false pretense relied upon was a material cause in inducing the complaining witness to part with his money or property. While the exact rule of law to which appellant refers was not given to the jury in a single instruction, it appears that when the entire body of instructions is taken into consideration the principle was adequately covered; which fact constitutes a complete answer to the alleged error of which appellant complains.

[5] It is next contended by appellant that the rights of the defendant were prejudicially affected because the trial court permitted the prosecution, over defendant's objection, to introduce in evidence the contents of certain records of a corporation without first having laid a proper foundation for the introduction thereof. Although it be conceded that a sufficient foundation was wanting at the time the records were offered in evidence, the error, if any, was later cured by other evidence which fully covered any objection that might have been available to the defendant as to the custody or the authenticity of such records. The original error therefore was harmless, and cannot avail the defendant at this time.

[6] The same thing is true in principle as to the last alleged error of which appellant complains. It had to do with what is claimed was the erroneous admission in evidence of certain records from which was supplied a date which was material to the inquiry. The identical matter having been established by and through other proper sources, the assumed fact that in the first instance the evidence of the date was improperly admitted became immaterial.

No prejudicial error appearing to have been committed by the trial court, it is ordered that the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial be and the same are affirmed.

CALIFORNIA CREDIT & COLLECTION CORPORATION v. BRANDLIN
(Civ. 2836.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Dec. 15, 1925.)

1. Trial $\S$ 252(15)—Instruction submitting issue of want of consideration of note sued on held unauthorized by evidence.

In suit on note given for stock not shown to be worthless in company not shown to be unable to deliver it, the subscription agreement and note being presumptive evidence of consideration, instruction to find for defendant, if there was no consideration, was error.

2. Trial $\S$ 251(7)—Instruction authorizing verdict for defendant for misrepresentations proved over plaintiff's objections, but not alleged in the answer, held error.

In suit on note, instruction authorizing a verdict for defendant on ground of misrepresentations proved over plaintiff's objection, but not alleged in answer as a defense, was error.

3. Trial $\S$ 251(7)—Instruction to find for defendant in suit on note given for stock, if promise to repurchase stock was fraudulent, held erroneous, where answer did not allege promise to be fraudulent.

Oral statement by seller's agents that company would repurchase stock sold was a mere promise, and, where answer in action on note did not allege it to be fraudulent or not intended to be performed, an instruction to find for defendant, if promise to repurchase was false, and induced execution of note, was erroneous.

4. Corporations ⇨82—Promise to repurchase stock by corporation, if in writing, is enforceable.

Promise by corporation to repurchase stock sold by it, if made a part of written contract, or contained in separate writing, is enforceable.

5. Evidence ⇨441(9) — Oral statements of agent held not to vary or add to terms of subscription contract, prohibiting change by agent.

Under a subscription contract, providing that no agent has power to change or alter its terms, mere oral statements of an agent that company would repurchase stock, if purchaser desired to sell, cannot vary or add to the terms of the contract.

6. Corporations ⇨92—That company retained stock to secure payment held not to defeat recovery on note.

Where subscription contract provided that no stock was to issue until fully paid for, and permit to sell stock required certificates to be retained as pledge for payment of notes, fact that corporation retained stock to secure payment did not defeat recovery on note.

7. Trial ⇨253(7)—In suit on note, instruction to find for defendant, if company failed or refused to deliver stock, held erroneous, in view of agreement and evidence to the contrary.

In suit on note given for stock under subscription contract, whereby corporation had a right to retain certificate of stock until paid for, an instruction to find for defendant if company failed or refused to deliver the stock held erroneous, in view of evidence raising inference that company was ready and willing to deliver the stock on payment therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action on promissory notes by the California Credit & Collection Corporation against Henry Brandlin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

J. R. Cunyningham and Daly B. Robnett, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Nathan F. Coombs and Frank L. Coombs, both of Napa, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This action is prosecuted for the recovery of the amount of three promissory notes given by the defendant to the Virden Packing Company, and by it assigned after maturity to the plaintiff. The defendant purchased five shares of the capital stock of the packing company for $500; paying $125 in cash, and giving the three promissory notes upon which the suit is based for the remainder of the purchase price. The complaint is in the usual form, and the answer admits the execution and delivery of the promissory notes, but alleges that the defendant was induced to make the purchase of the stock and give the notes by certain representations made by the agents of the packing company. Most of these alleged representations are mere promises, and it is not alleged that such promises were made fraudulently or without intent to perform the same. More material misrepresentations of fact, which were not alleged, were proved at the trial, and, at the close of the evidence, counsel for defendant moved the court for leave to amend the answer by alleging such misrepresentations. The court did not pass upon the motion, but proceeded at once to instruct the jury. Proof of the misrepresentations which were not alleged was made over the strenuous objections of plaintiff's counsel, and, therefore, it cannot be said that the case was tried by consent upon the theory that those misrepresentations were in issue. The judgment must be reversed on the ground that the court gave certain erroneous instructions, and, since the defendant will doubtless amend his answer before again going to trial, and the evidence at the next trial may be different from that in the record, it is deemed unnecessary to give further consideration to the pleadings or the evidence, except the parts thereof to which the erroneous instructions relate.

[1-6] The instructions hereinafter quoted were given:

"You are instructed that, * * * if you find there was no consideration given by the Virden Packing Company, you will render a verdict for the defendant."

The evidence shows that the notes were given in consideration of the sale to defendant of five shares of the capital stock of the company. There is no evidence that the stock is worthless or that the company is not ready and able to deliver it upon payment of the purchase price, and the written agreement and notes are presumptive evidence of a consideration. There is nothing in the record, therefore, upon which to base a finding of want of consideration.

"If you find that the notes given by the defendant were induced by false and fraudulent representations on the part of the Virden Packing Company, or its agents, the plaintiff in this action is not entitled to collect on the same."

This instruction authorized a verdict for the defendant on the ground of misrepresentations proved over plaintiff's objections but not alleged in the answer as a defense.

"If you find that the Virden Packing Company, through its agents, represented to the defendant that the stock to be given as a consideration for said notes could be turned in at any time to the corporation, and thereby induced the defendant to execute said notes, and that said representations were false and fraudulent, you will render a verdict for the defendant."

Such alleged representation amounted to no more than a promise to repurchase the stock. The answer does not allege that the promise was made fraudulently or without intention to perform. Had the alleged promise been made a part of the written contract, either therein or by a separate writing, it would have been enforceable. Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 P. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013; Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 217 P. 750. The evidence shows a mere oral statement by the agents that the company would repurchase the stock if defendant desired to sell. The subscription contract signed by the defendant contains the following:

"This subscription contract * * * contains the entire contract between the subscriber and the company and no agent or representative of the company, or any other person, has any power to change or alter the terms of this subscription."

Clearly, the mere oral statements of the agents could not vary or add to the terms of the written contract.

"If you find that the Virden Packing Company retained the shares of capital stock which were the subject of the purchase made by the defendant, and that such retention was for the purpose of holding the same as a lien in order to secure the payment of said notes, then, in that case, the Virden Packing Company could not, either by itself, or through the assignment made to the California Credit and Collection Corporation, maintain this action because in that case it would be required to foreclose said stock and exhaust its remedy in that way before it could ask for a personal judgment against the defendant, and in such case you will find for the defendant."

This instruction, under the facts in evidence, was the equivalent of an instruction to find for the defendant. The subscription contract provides:

"It is expressly agreed that no stock is to be issued until the amount of this subscription and note or notes given therefor are paid in full in cash."

The permit of the commissioner of corporations to sell the capital stock of the corporation, printed on the reverse side of the subscription contract, provides that—

"All certificates issued to subscribers in exchange for cash and promissory notes shall be held by the company as a pledge for the payment of the principal amount of said note or notes and the interest thereon."

Certificates for the shares of stock purchased by defendant were not delivered to him, but were held by the company pursuant to the foregoing provisions of the contract and the permit. The instruction was erroneous. Bowman v. Sears, 63 Cal. App. 235, 253, 218 P. 489, and cases there cited; Stern v. McDonald, 47 Cal. App. 79, 85, 190 P. 221.

[7] Other instructions were to the effect that, if the company had "failed or refused to deliver said stock, * * * the said action cannot be maintained, and in such case you will find for the defendant." The company had the right to retain the certificates of stock until it received payment therefor, and there is no evidence that it was not at all times able and willing to deliver the same upon receipt of such payment. The defendant testified that he asked the company to repurchase the stock, and that "they said if I would pay for the other three shares which I had not paid up yet, that would keep them from suing me. They kept on saying that they were going to sue me. They told me that that would give me a share and a quarter. That is the amount that I had paid up. I told them that I didn't want to have anything to do with it at all. * * * They said they wouldn't take it back." There is nothing in this to show a refusal or an unwillingness to deliver the stock upon payment therefor, but rather the opposite inference is to be drawn therefrom.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to permit the defendant to amend his answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by Irene Eldridge against the Clark & Henery Construction Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Martin I. Welsh and Robert H. Schwab, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,500, and judgment entered accordingly, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

The plaintiff, who at the time she sustained the injuries complained of, and for some time prior thereto, lived separate and apart, though not legally divorced, from her husband, and who was of the age of 59 years, and weighed about 175 pounds, resided at No. 1717½ N street, in the city of Sacramento. She was compelled to earn her own living, and to do this was required to leave her home and do the variety of duties incident to general housework. When thus engaged, she earned 50 cents an hour. For about 6 weeks prior to the date of the accident, she had continuously thus been employed.

The defendant, as its name to some extent implies, is engaged in the business of constructing, reconstructing, paving, and repaving of streets and other public thoroughfares.

At the time of the accident, the defendant was engaged in "reconstructing, repaving, and repairing Seventeenth street and alley, and installing curbing at a place near the northeast corner of said street and alley, between N and O streets, on the line with the easterly sidewalk of said Seventeenth street," in the city of Sacramento. It should be stated that N street runs, practically, in a southerly and northerly direction, while the alley referred to runs likewise in an easterly and westerly direction. The work of improving Seventeenth street, as indicated, had been under way for some days prior to the date of the accident in which plaintiff was injured, and the street was, while undergoing improvement, in a condition in which its general use by the public was not entirely safe or convenient.

On the evening of the 12th day of May, 1923, near the hour of 8 o'clock, the plaintiff left her home, intending to attend a dancing party at Oak Park, in the city of Sacramento. Walking west from her home until she reached the southeast corner of Seventeenth and N streets, she turned at said corner and proceeded south on the east side of Seventeenth street toward P street for the purpose of taking a "P Street" car for Oak Park. As she was in the act of crossing the alley between N and O streets, she stepped into an excavation, which had been dug as a foundation for a concrete curb for the sidewalk on the northeast corner of the alley, and fell violently to the ground, striking on her left arm, with the result that she suffered an impacted fracture of the right wrist and bruises upon her body and right limb. She remained prone upon the ground until, a very short time after she had fallen, one Thomas Hall, who was sitting on the porch of a house situated near the alley, having heard her groaning, stepped to where she was lying and assisted her to her feet.

The above embraces a general statement of the circumstances under which the accident occurred. The complaint sets forth substantially those facts in appropriate language, and the defendant by its answer specifically denies all the material facts thus alleged. The answer also sets up as a special defense contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

Points made for a reversal are: (1) That the evidence shows, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, which proximately caused the accident in which the injuries she received were sustained; (2) that the court erred in its rulings allowing certain testimony to be received, and also in its rulings upon certain questions propounded to the jurors on their voir dire examination; (3) that the verdict is excessive.

The plaintiff, after stating the facts which are comprehended within the above statement, testified that at the time she met with the mishap the night was very dark; that at the place where the accident occurred the darkness was intensified by the existence of trees standing near said place; that there was no light or barrier at the point on the sidewalk in the alley where the accident occurred; that when she reached the alley she stepped off and into the excavation, and was thereby thrown to the ground as above described. She stated that, although from the time she was assisted to her feet until she returned home that night she suffered severe pain in her arm, she nevertheless, attended the dance at Oak Park; that she complained to friends that she met at the dance that her arm was painning her severely, and that they advised her to have it bandaged with gauze saturated with arnica; that she sent to the drug store for these materials, and she and her friends placed the bandage around her wrist. She stated that even up to that time she did not realize that any bones in her wrist had been fractured, and that while she took part in the dancing it was necessary for her dancing partner to hold her arm at the elbow so that she would be as free from pain as possible. A few days thereafter, she stated, still suffering much pain from her injury, she called on Dr. Cress at the Emergency Hospital in the city of Sacramento, and the doctor expressed the opinion, after an examination of her wrist, that the bones therein had been fractured. Upon the doctor's advice, she had an X-ray picture taken of the injured wrist, and this sustained the opinion of the doctor as to the nature and extent of the injury. The fracture, she stated, seriously diminished her ability to prosecute the occupations in which she had theretofore engaged as means of making her living, and that, even at the time of the trial, the injury had left her wrist and right hand and arm in a condition which made it inconvenient for her to do the amount of labor of the kind to which she was accustomed and which she was able to do prior to the accident. The plaintiff admitted that, prior to the accident, she had a general knowledge that Seventeenth street, where the accident occurred, was in a "torn-up" condition, although, she stated, she seldom crossed Seventeenth street when going to any point from her home, and that it was her best recollection that the last time that she crossed said street was several weeks prior to the accident. She also testified that she did not see any wooden barrier around the curbing where she fell. She said that she did see a board "lying right down where I stepped. I stepped over the board. I did not step on it because it did not look good to me—I stepped over it."

Thomas Hall, who, as above stated, assisted the plaintiff in getting to her feet from the ground where she had fallen, testified: That he was sitting on the steps of a house on the corner of the alley where the accident oc-curved on the evening that it happened, engaged in conversation with friends. That "there was some noise, something called my attention to a woman down in the alley, I should judge about 3 feet from the curb, where the curb line runs from the property line. I ran to the woman and assisted her to her feet, brought her across to the other side of the alley, asked her if she was hurt. She said something about her arm hurting her. When I arrived where the woman was, she was making a very feeble effort to assist herself to her feet, to get up, and I helped the woman, got her on her feet, and assisted her across the alleyway." He further stated that, after a short interval, she seemed to have recovered from the shock and proceeded down the street. He further testified that he made an inspection of the condition of the alley immediately after he assisted the plaintiff to her feet, and that he saw a board about 2 inches thick and 8 inches wide lying across the sidewalk at the curb, and, as near as he could judge, about 4 feet long. He also stated that he saw no lighted lantern at that point, that it was very dark at that part of the alley, and that the darkness was made the more so by reason of a number of trees with large and heavy branches and foliage at the alley.

Dr. W. W. Cress, city physician of Sacramento, and as such in charge of the Emergency Hospital of said city, who professionally attended the plaintiff, testified that the principal injury suffered by her was that of an impacted fracture of the large bone in the right wrist. He explained that an impacted fracture is where the ends of the bones are driven together, and also stated that such a fracture would be slower to heal with a person of the age of plaintiff than with a younger person. He stated that it was an injury from which much pain would naturally follow; that the plaintiff was attended by him for several weeks, a part of which time was in her visits to the Emergency Hospital, and a part thereof at his own private office, where he treated her in his private and not in his official capacity as city physician. He stated that there was a swelling of the wrist, "injury to the soft part, including the blood vessels and ligaments, tendons, and joint structure. With an elderly person," the doctor continued, "there is much more pain, especially with an impacted fracture so close to the joint." The doctor said that in remedying the fracture there was a very good union of the bone and a very good alignment, but not a perfect alignment. He further stated that she "still has some limitation of motion in the wrist," that the fracture was different from an ordinary one, and that, while she might be able to use the right arm in the performance of labor, she would have to be careful not to overuse it, or, as he stated it, "Up to a certain point she can use it, but beyond that it would do harm." He further stated that there was a little deformity in the wrist when the plaintiff was discharged by him, which was occasioned by a slight thickness of the wrist joint, which, he further stated, goes with cases of that kind. He stated that the plaintiff made 11 visits to his office, and on the last visit, which was the 30th day of July, 1923, he said to her that there was nothing more that he could do for her at that time. He also stated that he kept her arm in a splint for a period of 6 weeks.

The plaintiff introduced in evidence an ordinance of the city of Sacramento entitled "An ordinance to prevent the obstruction of streets, alleys and public places in the city of Sacramento * * * and fixing a penalty for the violation of the provisions of said ordinance." Section 6 of said ordinance provided that:

"Any person by whom or under whose direction or by whose authority as principal, or as contractor, or employer, any portion of a public street, sidewalk or alley may be made dangerous, shall be wrecked, and so long as the danger may continue, maintain, around or over the place so made dangerous, a good substantial barrier, or walk which said barrier or walk shall be constructed in such a manner that it shall be with the approval of the building inspector; and there shall be maintained during every night from sunset until daylight, a lighted lantern or lanterns, around the place so made dangerous."

It was stipulated by counsel that there was no moon on the evening the accident occurred.

The district manager of defendant testified that a watchman was employed to see that barricades and lights were maintained at nighttime on the street while undergoing improvement; such barricades being kept where there were holes or excavations in the street or alley.

The witness Howe, who was in the employ of defendant at the time of the accident as a nightwatchman at the point where Seventeenth street was being improved, and whose duties were to put out and maintain at nighttime lighted lanterns and barricades at places where there were holes or excavations in the street or alley, testified that just before sunset, on the evening of May 12, 1923, he placed and left a lighted lantern reflecting a red light at the point where plaintiff fell; that the lantern was placed at said point because there existed at that time an excavation across the sidewalk portion of the alley which had been dug for the purpose of constructing a cement foundation for a curb. That lantern, he said, was placed in such a position as that it would or could be seen by any one about to cross the alley. Howe further testified that on his "second round" of inspection, which must have been several hours after he (as he testified) had placed the lighted lantern at the alley, he saw a lady at or near the house standing on the corner of the alley, and that she then informed him that a short time before a woman passing along the sidewalk had stepped into the excavation and fallen to the ground.

Two physicians, testifying for the defendant, stated that, a few days before the commencement of the trial of this action, they, one at one time and the other on another and different occasion, examined the injured wrist of plaintiff, and found that the injuries she had suffered had been skillfully remedied, and that the wrist was in excellent condition; that there was no evidence that the injuries or the effects thereof were permanent, nor did they discover any reason for believing that the plaintiff was, at the times of their respective examinations, suffering pain from the injuries she received, although she then complained of suffering pain. One of these physicians, however, stated, as did Dr. Cress, that the fracture had left a slight deformity, due to the thickening of the wrist joint.

[1, 2] The foregoing is substantially all the testimony received at the trial, both for plaintiff and defendant. It will thus be seen that, upon the question whether there was a lighted lantern or any artificial light at the point in the sidewalk where the accident occurred, the evidence is in positive conflict. In fact, while it is true that the night watchman of the defendant stated that before sunset of the day the plaintiff was injured as described by her he placed a lighted lantern reflecting a red light at the excavation in the alley, he did not say, nor did any other witness testify, that such a light was at said place at the time the accident occurred. It was for the jury to resolve the evidentiary conflict upon that question, and the verdict implies that the jury's conclusion as to that matter was that, when the plaintiff met with the accident, there was no light at the point where thus she was injured. The defendant further insists that the evidence without conflict shows that the plaintiff herself was guilty of negligence which constituted the proximate cause of her injuries, for the reason that she was given warning of the unsafe condition of the passageway in the alley before she stepped into the excavation, in that the board above referred to was placed and maintained at or against the excavation for the purpose of preventing just such a mishap as that with which she met, but that, without first making the investigation obviously suggested by the danger warning so maintained, she stepped over or across the board from a position of safety "into a place of unknown quality." The evidence was such as to make this question one entirely within the province of the jury to decide. As seen, both the plaintiff and the witness Hall testified that the board near the excavation was "lying" on the ground. From this testimony the jury would have been well within its discretion, as the triers of the questions of fact, in concluding that the board was not, at the time of the accident, in such a position as to suggest danger at or near the point where it had been placed or left, or at any point in the sidewalk ahead of her, and it is to be assumed that they did so find. In fact, such a finding is necessarily implied from the verdict. Certainly, it is very clear, and it may properly be assumed that the jury so found, that the board was not lying over or upon the excavation, since the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff was that, observing the board "lying" on the ground, she stepped across or over it and into the excavation. The statement of the plaintiff that the "board did not look good" to her, and for that reason she stepped over it, is taken by defendant as disclosing want of care on her part, since, as is the argument, the very fact that it did not "look good" to her was sufficient to lead her to believe that there was some dangerous defect in the sidewalk at or near the place where the board was lying, and hence sufficient to suggest to her mind the necessity for an investigation of conditions thereabout before attempting to proceed further; that, having proceeded on her way without making an investigation, she assumed the risk of any injuries which she might receive through any dangerous defectiveness of the sidewalk. The statement is reasonably capable of different interpretations, in so far as it was intended to express the particular thought in the plaintiff's mind when she conceived it to be safer to step over rather than upon the board. The statement does not necessarily force the inference that the board was placed there as a signal of danger, or that its appearance suggested to plaintiff's mind that there was danger ahead of her on the sidewalk, since, as seen, it was lying flat on the ground. Hence it was for the jury and not for this court to determine what particular thought the plaintiff intended to convey when she said that the board did not "look good" to her and so determine what specific reason induced her to step over rather than upon the board.

[3] It is not clear that counsel for defendant takes the position that the general knowledge, as shown by her own admission, which plaintiff had of the condition of the street itself prior to the accident was sufficient to charge her with knowledge or notice of a like condition of the sidewalk. The cases cited by counsel would seem to imply that such was his contention. Those cases apply the familiar rule that, where a person uses a street or sidewalk which his observation, prudently exercised, would inform him was dangerous, he takes the risk of such injuries as may result to him from open and apparent defects such as his observation ought to have detected and avoided. Slaughter v. City of Huntington, 64 W. Va. 237, 61 S. E. 155, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 459; Moore v. Huntington, 31 W. Va. 519, 8 S. E. 515. Or, as the rule invoked by defendant is stated in Abbott on Municipal Corporations, section 105:

"When the defect is open, a traveler must take into consideration this fact, and, if he is injured, through an attempted use of a highway in a notoriously defective and dangerous condition, he is chargeable with contributory negligence."

The case of Slaughter v. City of Huntington, supra, was where the plaintiff, in the nighttime, while a rain was in progress, the night being unusually dark, attempted to use a street which had been plowed and excavated preparatory to the repavement thereof, and which was in a dangerous condition for use by reason thereof at the time he made such attempt, having full knowledge of such condition of the street prior to and at the time he attempted to use it. In such a case, the rule is that it is wholly immaterial whether there are danger signals or warning signs maintained on the excavated street, since such warnings, while required for those of the public having no knowledge of the dangerous condition of the street or sidewalk, are not designed for those who know about the danger, or have sufficient knowledge thereof to put them on their guard or to charge them with the exercise of such an amount of care as the situation in such a case would require. Buckingham v. Commary-Peterson Co. et al., 39 Cal. App. 154, 162, 178 P. 318, and cases cited.

But a reply to that position would be and is that it does not necessarily follow, from the fact that a street may be torn or plowed up, and is, therefore, unfit for use, preparatory to the contemplated repairs or repavement or reconstruction thereof, that the sidewalk with which it parallels is also likewise to be improved and for that purpose has been put and is in the same condition that the street is in; hence it cannot be declared as an abstract proposition or as a matter of law that one having a general knowledge of the condition of a street which has been left in a defective condition, preliminarily to and for the purpose of the improvement thereof, also, from such general knowledge, has acquired like knowledge of a like condition of the sidewalks paralleling such street, if, in point of fact, such sidewalks are in such a condition, nor can it be held that such knowledge by a person of such condition of a street for the purpose of improvement has the effect of imputing to such person knowledge of a like condition of the sidewalk. It is the statement only of a trite proposition to say that a person having no special interest in the improvement of a particular street, which has been dug up or excavated preparatory to such improvement, might, in passing near or across such street, observe and so acquire general knowledge of the condition thereof and know that it was for that reason unfit for use by the public, and yet not observe or know or even suspect, if such was the fact, that the sidewalks along the street or any part thereof were also to be improved, and for that purpose had been and were "torn up," and hence in such a condition as to make it dangerous to those passing or attempting to pass over it. It is doubtless true that, in some cases where a street is repaved or to be repaved, the sidewalk paralleling it is also to be improved, or a new curb to be installed along the sidewalk, in either of which events the "tearing up" of the sidewalk or the digging of trenches or ditches for the curb is required, but it is also commonly known to be true that there are many instances where streets are improved by a repavement or reconstruction thereof, in which there is no necessity for the improvement of, and no intention to improve, the sidewalks bordering upon such streets or for the installation of new curbs, in which case the sidewalks are left undisturbed or in a condition in which pedestrians may, with the usual safety to themselves, use them simultaneously with the prosecution of the work of repaving or reconstructing the street. It is hence clear that the mere fact that Seventeenth street was plowed or torn up and in an unsafe condition to be used by the public did not itself necessarily afford ground for the inference that the sidewalks with which it parallels were also in the same condition preparatory to the improvement thereof or that the sidewalks were in any way or for any reason in such a defective condition as to render them hazardous to the personal safety of those attempting to use them.

[4] On taking up the examination of the jurors on their voir dire, counsel for plaintiff asked the talesmen, collectively, "if any of you are stockholders in any insurance company that carries any insurance for the Clark & Henery Construction Company, by reason of any personal injuries that might be caused?" to which question objection was made on the usual grounds by counsel for defendant, but overruled by the court. Each of the talesmen returned a negative answer to the question. Defendant cites a number of cases from this and other jurisdictions as in confirmation of his contention that the above indicated line of examination of the jurors on their voir dire was not only improper but prejudicial and compels a reversal. Among the cases so cited is that of Arnold v. Cal. Port. Cement Co., 41 Cal. App. 420, 183 P. 171. The following are the questions propounded to the talesmen in that case:

"Now, if you were sworn as a juror, and during the trial of this case, near the end of it, you should learn that the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, one of these surety companies, was a surety at the time of this accident alleged, or an insurer against any injury to employees, would that in any wise affect your verdict in this case?" Also: "And if it came to your knowledge, if you were a juror in this case, and it came to your knowledge from any source whatever, that the New Amsterdam Casualty Company was a surety for any injury to the employees of the defendant company at the time of this alleged injury, would that knowledge of that fact in any wise influence your verdict in the case?"

The court held that, while "there is a decided divergence of opinion among the courts of the several states as to the right of counsel for plaintiff in a personal injury action to suggest in any way, in the presence of the jury, that an indemnity insurance company is an actual party in interest," the conduct of counsel for plaintiff in that case in asking the questions was improper and prejudicial, citing a number of cases, and upon that conclusion ordered a reversal of the judgment. Among other things, the court, in its opinion, said:

"It is entirely proper for counsel to ask the jurors such questions as may reasonably be necessary to ascertain whether they are free from a bias or interest that may affect their verdict. To this end it is proper for counsel, in good faith, to ask of each juror whether he is interested as an agent or stockholder or otherwise in a specified casualty company. Or he may be asked the broad question whether he is interested in any insurance company insuring against liability for negligence. (Rinklin v. Acker, 125 App. Div. 244 [109 N. Y. S. 125]; Grant v. National, etc., Co., 100 App. Div. 234 [91 N. Y. S. 805].) But counsel must take pains to propound such questions in such a manner as not unnecessarily to convey the impression that the defendant is in fact so insured. It is misconduct on the part of counsel for plaintiff in such actions so to frame his question that it goes beyond what is reasonably necessary to serve the legitimate purpose of eliciting the facts he is entitled to adduce in order to secure a jury free from bias or prejudice, if it is also apparent that the question may fairly be said to have the effect of serving the illegitimate purpose of prejudicing the jury by fixing in their minds the idea that the defendant is protected by insurance against liability for negligence. And if the amount of the verdict is large as compared with the nature of the injuries sustained, or the defendant's liability is a close question, such misconduct is prejudicial and ground for reversal."

It is readily to be observed that there is some difference between the questions asked the talesman in the Arnold Case and the question likewise asked in the case here. In the former case, the questions were not, as in the case here, whether any of the jurors were stockholders in any company "that carries insurance," etc., for the Clark & Henery Construction Company, but, substantially, whether the jurors, should they learn during the course of the trial of the case, or should it come to their knowledge from any source, that a certain named surety company was, at the time of the accident therein involved, a surety for the defendant against any injuries to its employees, would allow that fact in any wise to affect or influence their verdict in the case. The form of the questions propounded in that case itself plainly indicates that the purpose of that line of inquiry was to get before the jury the fact that the defendant therein was not the real party in interest in the defense of the action. This conclusion is sustained by the consideration that the questions so asked were not followed up with an inquiry as to whether any of the jurors were interested as stockholders or otherwise in any or the particular surety company named. It would amount to an unjust imputation against the acumen or good sense of a lawyer to say that the attorney asking those questions would not know that the effect of giving information to a jury in a personal injury case of the fact of the indemnification of the defendant therein by a surety company against injuries caused through his or its negligence would be, if having any such effect at all, to prejudice the defendant's case in the minds of the jury. The very theory upon which the cases have held such an inquiry improper, and, under certain circumstances, prejudicial, is that there is such a strong popular prejudice against surety or other insurance companies that juries trying issues in an action in which it is sought to establish the liability of such corporations are very apt to permit their judgment to be improperly swayed by such prejudice. Another reason given by the cases for the exclusion of testimony in cases of this character, disclosing the fact that the defendant is indemnified by a surety company against liability, is that juries, when in possession of such information, may conclude, without real evidentiary justification therefor, that the defendant was led to the exercise of a less degree of care in prosecuting his business, so far as the personal safety of others was concerned than the law exacts, considering the nature and character of the business. So, as we have in effect stated, it is clear that the questions propounded to the talesmen in the Arnold Case could not have been asked in good faith, or, in other words, were asked for no other purpose than to place before the jury the fact, if it was a fact, that the defendant therein was indemnified against the payment of any damages which might be assessed against it by the jury.

Here the question to the jurors was addressed directly to the proposition of whether they were in any way interested in any surety company, and while it is true that the question also embraced a query as to whether they were stockholders in any company "that carries any insurance for the Clark & Henery Construction Company," thus implying that said company carried indemnity insurance, still, viewing the question as a whole, it is to our minds quite clear that the central purpose thereof was to ascertain whether there existed in that particular any ground for the exercise of a challenge, either for cause or peremptorily, and that the question was therefore asked in good faith. Of course, the "good faith" or "good motive" in the asking of an improper question cannot make it a proper question, but where an improper question propounded to a juror or a witness is thus prompted, it does relieve from the imputation of willful misconduct on the part of the party asking it, in that thus he made a purposed attempt wrongfully to influence the jury.

[5-7] But it would be idle to argue that the question to the jurors in this case does not go beyond the restrictive qualification to the right to ask such a question at all pointed out in the Arnold and other cases dealing with the same proposition, for obviously it did. Conceding, however, as well we may, that the question asked in this case was technically equally as objectionable as were those asked in the Arnold and other cases in which the identical point has been considered and passed upon, still it does not necessarily follow that the judgment herein should be reversed for the error in allowing it. No case has been cited—indeed none can be found—which goes to the extent of holding that, where such an examination by plaintiff is allowed, it is prejudicial per se. To the contrary, many cases hold that there are certain circumstances under which such an examination may properly be allowed and all the cases hold that, where the allowance of that line of examination, either of jurors on their voir dire or of witnesses, involves error, the question whether it is or is not to be deemed to be of sufficient gravity, in its effect upon the rights of the defendant, to require a reversal, is dependent entirely upon the circumstances of each particular case. See Arnold v. Cal. Port. Cement Co., supra; Roche v. Llewellyn Iron Works Co., 140 Cal. 563, 74 P. 147. In the Arnold Case it will be observed, from the excerpt from the opinion therein reproduced hereinabove, the court says:

"And if the amount of the verdict is large as compared with the nature of the injuries sustained, or the defendant's liability is a close question, such misconduct is prejudicial and ground for reversal."

In the instant case, we do not find, nor can it reasonably be said, that the amount of damages assessed is out of proportion to the nature and effect of the injuries sustained, or that the defendant's liability is under the evidence a close question. The testimony of the doctor who treated plaintiff's injuries clearly shows that they were serious, in that, as in effect, he declared, her wrist, perhaps due in a measure to her advanced years, would never regain its normal strength. Thus, since she was required to perform manual labor to support herself, her earning power was to some extent permanently diminished, and her opportunity for securing such employment as she was able to engage in was naturally correspondingly lessened. Other considerations were that she was not able, by reason of her injuries, to work at all for several weeks after she was hurt, a positive loss to one who is required to labor for others to earn a livelihood, and the pain and suffering she was required to endure because of her injuries, in a more or less degree, according to her uncontradicted testimony, continuously to the date of the trial, which was 6 months from the time she was injured. As to the question of the defendant's responsibility for the injuries, the testimony of plaintiff and her witness Hall, as seen, is to the effect that there was no light at the point where she met with the accident at the time that it occurred, that there was no barrier against or about the excavation into which she fell, and that it was very dark at that place at the time; there being no moon that night or at that particular time. That testimony was not contradicted, except in so far as it might be regarded as having been disputed by the testimony of defendant's night watchman that he placed a lighted lantern at the point of the excavation prior to sunset on the day of the accident, but such "contradictory" evidence is of little apparent force, and, according to the jury's estimate of that fact, as exposed by their verdict, they regarded it as of no force at all, when compared to the accepted positive testimony of witnesses that, at the time of the accident, there was no light of any kind at said place. All the foregoing matters are here considered, not that this court can weigh the testimony or has the right to attempt to do so, since that is the function of the jury, but merely for the purpose of showing that, upon the face of the record, the amount assessed by the jury as damages is not disproportionate to the damage done, and that there can be no question under the evidence of the defendant's liability for the injuries sustained by plaintiff, and that from all these well-established facts it is clear that the error in allowing the plaintiff to ask the jurors on their voir dire a question to some extent implying that defendant, at the time of the accident, was indemnified against the payment of any damages which might be assessed against it for injuries to others directly occasioned by its negligence was not productive of a miscarriage of justice.

[8] The same question as the one above considered is in a different aspect also presented. It arose from the following cross-examination of one of the physicians who testified for the defendant as an expert as to the nature, extent, and the general effect of the injuries received by plaintiff:

"Q. In the examination of this plaintiff, were you employed by the Georgia Casualty Company? The Witness: I was employed by Mr. Gibson.

"Mr. Welsh: You sent a report, did you not, to the Georgia Casualty Company?"

"Mr. Welsh: You have a copy of the report in your files. The Witness: The Georgia Casualty Company, 341 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

"Q. You sent the original of that to the company—a report of your examination, doctor? A. Yes, sir."

The cases are not uniform upon the question whether under any circumstances such a line of inquiry in the examination of witnesses in personal injury cases is permissible. There are many cases in which the question is considered, but we will not review them herein. It is, though, quite obvious that it would be highly improper to allow the plaintiff in a personal injury case to show, as an independent fact, having no relation to the other proved facts, that the defendant is protected by indemnity insurance against the payment of any damages which may be awarded against him for injuries directly caused by his negligence. If it is at all competent or legally proper to show the fact, it perhaps would have to be done through cross-examination of some witness as in impeachment of his testimony or by way of the impeachment of some special defense. It has been held to be proper to go into the question for the purpose of rebutting the claim of defendant that employees of a certain department of the business conducted by defendant were under the sole control of another party as an independent contractor with defendant. Barg v. Bousfield, 65 Minn. 355, 68 N. W. 45. As going to the question of the credibility or the weight of his testimony, it would seem that it ought to be proper for plaintiff to show by cross-examination of a physician called by defendant to testify, and who does testify that he had examined plaintiff's injuries and had found that they were less serious in nature and effect than as claimed by plaintiff, that such physician had been specially employed by a surety company by which defendant was indemnified against the payment of any damages awarded against him to make such examination and state the result thereof to the jury. See section 1868, Code Civ. Proc. Such, however, is not the rule in this state, so our decisions seem to hold. McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 264, 269, 191 P. 23; Roche v. Llewellyn, 140 Cal. 563, 74 P. 147. But we do not think that the case should be reversed because of the error involved in allowing the physician thus to be questioned by the plaintiff. This conclusion is founded on the reasons above given for holding that the act of the trial court in allowing the examination of the tentative jurors along the same line could not be held to be of so serious a character as to call for a reversal. In other words, considering the entire record—the nature of the injuries sustained by plaintiff and the effect thereof upon her, the pain and suffering she endured because of those injuries, the ample evidence that defendant's negligence was the cause of her injuries, and the reasonableness, when compared with all the foregoing facts, of the amount of damages awarded her—it cannot justly be declared that the error involved in the ruling permitting such examination has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½. The answers by the doctor to the questions asked by plaintiff added nothing to what was plainly to be implied from the question on the same line likewise asked of the jurors on their voir dire.

[9-12] The next and last point urged by defendant is that the amount of damages awarded plaintiff is excessive. This point has practically been answered above in the discussion of the contentions that error was committed in permitting plaintiff to ask the tentative jurors called to the jury box the question as to defendant's indemnity insurance and the cross-examination of one of the physicians testifying for defendant along the same line. It may be added, however, that, in view of the ordinance of the city of Sacramento expressly superimposing upon defendant the duty of maintaining lights at all dangerous points on the street or sidewalk, it was negligence per se for it to have failed in the performance of that duty. But, regardless of that consideration, if the testimony of plaintiff and her witness, Hall, is true (and we must, in view of the verdict, so accept it, since it is not inherently improbable), the defendant, in failing to maintain a light and proper safeguards about the excavation as a protection to those attempting to use the sidewalk at that point was guilty of gross negligence. We are firmly of the conviction that, under all the circumstances of the case, it would be an unjust invasion of the province of the jury for this court to declare the verdict excessive. Of course, it is to be conceded that the matter of assessing damages in a personal injury case is generally attended with more or less difficulty. The element of pain and suffering, which is proper to be taken into account with other elements, in determining in such cases what would be a just admeasurement of compensatory relief, affords no definite or certain criterion by which the amount to be assigned to that item may be ascertained, and the same is often true, in a less degree perhaps, of other elements of the several which it is competent to consider in making the general award. Hence, in the last analysis, in the general run of cases, the determination by the jury of the amount which will fairly compensate for the loss sustained by reason of the defendant's tortious breach of a duty which he owes to others must be accepted as an honest, fair, intelligent, and just adjustment of the matter. The rule which thus we attempt to state has, perhaps, never been more succinctly, clearly, and forcefully expounded than in Graham & Waterman on New Trials, p. 451 (an old publication, perhaps not now extant), as follows:

"It is clear that the reason for holding the parties so tenaciously to the damages found by the jury in personal torts is, that in cases of this class there is no scale by which the damages are to be graduated with certainty. They admit of no other test than the intelligence of a jury, governed by a sense of justice. It is indeed one of the principal causes in which the trial by jury has originated. From the prolific fountain of litigation numerous cases must daily spring up, calling for adjudication for alleged injuries, accompanied with facts and circumstances affording no definite standard by which these alleged wrongs can be measured, and which, from the necessity of the case, must be judged of and appreciated by the view that may be taken of them by impartial men. To the jury therefore, as a favorite and almost sacred tribunal, is committed by unanimous consent the exclusive task of examining those facts and circumstances, and valuing the injury and awarding compensation in the shape of damages. The law that confers on them this power and exacts of them the performance of the solemn trust, favors the presumption that they are actuated by pure motives. It therefore makes every allowance for different dispositions, capacities, views, and even frailties in the examination of heterogeneous matters of fact where no criterion can be supplied; and it is not until the result of the deliberations of the jury appears in a form calculated to shock the understanding and impress no dubious conviction of their prejudice and passion that courts have found themselves compelled to interpose."

PEOPLE v. NEAL (Cr. 1242.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 4, 1925.)

1. Criminal law § 1053—Failure to except to alleged improper remark of court held to preclude successful complaint thereof on appeal.

Failure to except to alleged improper remark of court held to preclude successful complaint thereof on appeal.

2. Criminal law § 485(1)—Hypothetical question held not improper as uncertain and indefinite.

Hypothetical question, asked physician as to whether defendant would have been able to walk within stated time after operation for abscess of rectum, assuming "there was no evidence that she was suffering from any other ailment," held not improper as indefinite and uncertain as to character of accused's health.

3. Criminal law § 485(1)—Hypothetical question held not improperly allowed because of its form.

Hypothetical question, seeking to elicit expert opinion on question whether defendant would be able to walk five or six days after operation, held not improperly allowed because examiner assumed that "you (witness) had a patient," and that "you performed a minor operation."

4. Criminal law § 473—Exclusion of question asked expert witness held not error.

Where counsel, seeking to show that, because defendant was suffering from an abscess, she could not have been at place of crime, it was not error to exclude expert testimony as to what caused pus which witness testified he had drained from abscess, where court specifically stated that counsel might in another manner show defendant's physical condition aside from the abscess; that being the avowed purpose of question excluded.

5. Criminal law § 1186(4) — Witnesses § 367(1)—Exclusion of evidence affecting credibility of prosecuting witness held error, though not grounds for reversal.

In prosecution for burglary, evidence that conviction of defendant was necessary to a recovery by prosecuting witness of insurance on stolen jewelry held improperly excluded, when tendered on issue of credibility of witness, though such error was not grounds for reversal, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, requiring examination of entire cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Mabel Neal was convicted of burglary, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Fred H. Thompson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was charged in two counts with the crime of burglary. She was convicted upon both counts, and appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying her motion for a new trial.

Appellant's sole defense against both charges lay in her attempt to prove an alibi. There was ample evidence, however, to support each charge, if the jury gave credence to the testimony of witnesses to the effect that they identified appellant as the culprit in each instance. There was some testimony that she was actually present at a place other than the scene of the crimes, but the great burden of her defense was that she was in such a condition, through illness, that it was impossible for her to have gone to the places where the offenses were committed. Specifically, her main defense was that she was so afflicted with an abscess or ulcer of the rectum, or with an anal fistula, as to render impossible a locomotion by her to the scenes of the crimes, both being at a considerable distance from her place of residence. Various physicians testified to a state of affairs in these respects which would have justified the jury in believing that appellant could not have gotten to the places where the two burglaries were committed.

[1] There was evidence at the trial to the effect that a physician on a certain occasion had lanced an abscess in appellant's rectum, and also that after the operation it would have been impossible for appellant to walk. For the purpose of meeting this testimony the district attorney asked another expert witness:

"Assuming, Doctor, that you had a patient between the ages of 25 and 35, that you performed a minor operation for an abscess of the rectum on the 3d or 4th day of August, that on the 9th day of August you called upon the patient, and at that time his pulse was normal, and there was no pus in the wound or abscess, would you say that the patient would be able to walk at that time?"

Appellant's counsel objected to the question on several grounds, one of the objections being that it was indefinite and uncertain as to the character of the condition of health of the assumed person. The trial judge then remarked:

"Well, if you will embrace in your statement that it is a woman. There is no showing made of her suffering from any other condition of ill health."

The point is now made that the last sentence of the judge's statement was an invasion of the province of the jury, and was therefore misconduct. If we grant, for the purpose of argument, that the assailed remark should not have been made, we are to observe that no exception was taken to it at the time and no request was made that the judge direct the jury to disregard it.

"When a judge makes damaging comment in the presence of the jury during a trial, * * * it is the duty of the counsel for the injured party to give the judge the opportunity to obviate the possibility of harm by means of admonition addressed to the jury, if the misconduct * * * is such that its effect may be removed by admonition." People v. Orosco (Cal. App.) 239 P. 82.

Granting again that the remark of the trial judge here was improper, its effect could readily have been eradicated by an admonitory statement to the jury. The claim of misconduct must therefore fall.

[2] Following the comment of the judge to which exception is taken, the district attorney added this to his question:

"Assume, further, Doctor, that this was a lady, and there was no evidence that she was suffering from any other ailment."

Appellant's counsel repeated his objection, and it was overruled. It is contended that the ruling was error, upon the ground that the assumption contained in the amendment to the question was opposed to the actual evidence in the case. No such ground, however, was stated in the objection. The only point made was, so far as this particular point is concerned, that the question was indefinite and uncertain as to "the character of the condition of health" of appellant. We can perceive no indefiniteness or uncertainty in the question in the respect mentioned. Certainly, it was not indefinite or uncertain after the addition was made to it, for it was thereby rendered certain to the point of perfection. The ruling on the objection was therefore proper.

[3] It was objected at the trial, and it is now insisted, that the question of the district attorney which is above quoted, was improper, for the reason that the examiner assumed that "you had a patient," and "you performed a minor operation," and then completed his question upon those assumptions. It is said, in effect, that the witness was not asked for his general opinion as an expert, but for the result in a case assumed to have been handled by him, and that the question was therefore improper. We think the question was not objectionable on the ground stated. It will be observed that the conditions upon which the opinion of the expert was asked were those existing 5 or 6 days after the assumed operation was performed. The assumption as to those conditions was that the "pulse was normal, and there was no pus in the wound or abscess," and it is not contended that there was anything improper in the statement of the situation at that time. Further, the witness to whom the question was addressed had been properly qualified as an expert. When he was put on the stand, appellant's counsel was asked if he would "stipulate the doctor's qualifications." The emphatic response was, "No question in the world about it." Not only was the witness thus heartily vouched for by the defense, but he testified that he had "treated" many cases of ulcer and of abscess of the rectum. Under all these circumstances we think the witness must have understood the question to assume that a properly executed minor operation had been performed for an abscess of the rectum at the time mentioned in it. This last matter becomes one of insignificant import, however, when we recur to the view, already expressed, that the opinion of the witness was mainly to depend upon the correctly stated conditions existing 5 or 6 days after the operation had been performed. Even if we concede, therefore, that the question might have been put in better form, we are convinced that no harm whatever was wrought by it. Under all the circumstances it must be apparent that the expert gave the same answer that he would have given if the question had been unimpeachable.

[4] The record shows the following as having occurred during the direct examination of one of appellant's expert witnesses:

"Q. * * * What was the condition? A. She had an abscess in the tissue adjoining the rectum, which had broken through partly, and under a local anæsthetic I further opened it so that the pus could drain out. * * *

"Q. Well, now, what caused this pus there?"

The question was objected to on the ground that it was immaterial, and the objection was sustained. Then this transpired:

"Mr. Thompson: To show the physical condition of this defendant, your honor.

"The Court: No, that does not show it. You can find out what her physical condition was at the time if you want to.

"Mr. Thompson: Well, I am leading up to that. * * *

"The Court: It is immaterial what caused this abscess."

It is insisted that the court erred in sustaining the objection that the question was immaterial, and this for the reason that counsel expected, by means of the question, to show the physical condition of appellant. The ruling, however, as shown by the remarks of the judge, was not intended to foreclose inquiry into her physical condition. The judge evidently took the view that an answer to the propounded question would not tend to show anything of that nature. We need not pause to inquire whether this view was correct, for the judge, in effect, stated that counsel might show appellant's physical condition by other questions. The matter of making the proof which counsel now says he sought to make by the assailed question was thus left entirely in his hands, and he actually asked questions of the same witness, afterward, as to appellant's physical condition. If we assume, then, for the sake of argument, that the question might have educed something as to appellant's state of health, and that the ruling of the court was therefore technically erroneous, we are bound to say, for the reasons stated, that no harm flowed from the error.

[5] There was evidence to the effect that certain jewelry which was involved under one of the charges against appellant was of the value of $2,000, and that the prosecuting witness under that charge, who was the owner of the jewelry, carried insurance upon it. Appellant sought, on cross-examination of the witness, to show that the amount of the insurance policy on the jewelry could have been collected only upon a conviction of appellant. Counsel stated that he proposed to make this showing for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the prosecuting witness, who had identified appellant as having been at the place of residence of the witness at about the time the jewelry disappeared. The evidence was objected to on the ground of immateriality, and the objection was sustained. It is contended that in its several rulings excluding the evidence the trial court erred. We think the rulings were erroneous. The facts sought to be developed, if proven, would have shown a special and financial interest of the prosecuting witness in the conviction of appellant, which, in the eyes of the jury, might have affected her credibility. In view of the error referred to, we have examined the entire cause, including the evidence, as it touches the conviction under the count now in question, as required by section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, and we are of the opinion that the error complained of has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

Judgment and order affirmed.

CALIFORNIA REAL ESTATE EXCHANGE
v. SEQUOYAH HILLS CO.
(Civ. 5126.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 22, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error — 373(1)—Undertaking not required to effect appeal, filing of notice being sufficient.

Notice of appeal, filed within time provided and in form prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 940, was sufficient to effect appeal without undertaking required before amendment of sections 940, 941, by St. 1921, p. 193, §§ 1, 2.

2. Appeal and error — 439—Power of trial court to vacate judgment held suspended pending appeal.

Appeal taken pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 940, as amended by St. 1921, p. 193, § 1, without filing undertaking, was regular and transferred cause to Supreme Court, and power of trial court pending such appeal to vacate judgment was suspended.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by the California Real Estate Exchange against the Sequoyah Hills Company. From an order denying motion to vacate and set aside a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert Chamberlin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

O. G. Foelker, of Oakland (E. C. Miles, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate and set aside a judgment entered against appellant.

An action was commenced in the superior court in and for the county of Alameda by appellant in which respondent appeared and answered the complaint, filing with its answer a cross-complaint against the former. The action was regularly set for trial by respondent, and, appellant not appearing, the cause was heard and the judgment mentioned entered on August 24, 1923; the court finding, as appears from its decision and judgment, that appellant was duly and regularly served with notice of trial and had knowledge of the time fixed therefor. Thereafter, on February 11, 1924, appellant served and filed a notice of motion to vacate the judgment; the motion being supported by affidavits alleging the failure by respondent to serve notice of the date fixed for the trial of the action. The motion came on regularly for hearing on February 15, 1924, was denied, and this appeal taken from the order.

It is conceded that on October 22, 1923, appellant filed a notice of appeal from the original judgment mentioned to the Supreme Court of the state of California; that if such appeal was perfected it was pending at the time of the making of the above motion and order, and was subsequently dismissed.

It is contended by respondent that the appeal last mentioned was taken in all respects as provided by statute, and that as a result the trial court was without jurisdiction to grant the motion to vacate the judgment, and, by appellant, that no undertaking on appeal having been filed the proceeding was ineffectual for any purpose, and that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

[1] The notice of appeal was filed within the time provided by statute and was in all respects in the form prescribed by section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1921, p. 193). Since the amendment of sections 940 and 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1921, p. 193)—which prior to the amendment provided for the giving of an undertaking on appeal—the filing of such notice is sufficient to effect the appeal without the undertaking previously required. People v. Jackson, 190 Cal. 257, 212 P. 4.

[2] The appeal having been regularly taken, its effect was to transfer the cause to the Supreme Court and to suspend the power of the trial court pending such appeal to vacate the judgment. Parkside Realty Co. v. McDonald, 167 Cal. 342, 139 P. 805; Kinard v. Jordan, 175 Cal. 13, 164 P. 894; Crawford v. Meadows, 55 Cal. App. 4, 203 P. 428; Jack- son v. Dolan, 58 Cal. App. 372, 208 P. 315; 14 Cal. Jur. (Judgments) sec. 84.

1. Statutes ⚡68—"General laws" defined.

"General laws" are those which operate alike upon all persons to whom they apply, and apply equally to all persons in the same category within the jurisdiction of the law-making power on subjects possessing such intrinsic peculiarities as to justify legislative determination that they require special enactments.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, General Law.]

2. Statutes ⚡71—Classification in general law must be proper.

Classification in general law must be founded on reason, not being product of exercise of an arbitrary will, and necessity for such classification must appear.

3. Constitutional law ⚡48—Classification in general law supported by every presumption in its favor.

When classification in general law is attacked in courts, wide discretion of legislative body will be supported by every presumption in favor of reasonable classification, and it will not be set aside merely because in court's judgment it may be unwise or unnecessary to apply certain rules to certain classes.

4. Constitutional law ⚡93(1), 240(1)—Municipal corporations ⚡111(2)—Ordinance regulating jewelry auctions held constitutional.

Ordinance regulating jewelry auctions, providing for granting permits only to established jewelers to auction stock not imported, especially for auction purposes, held valid, not violating inalienable rights clause of Const. 5. Constitutional law ⚡211—Fourteenth Amendment does not take from states right and power to classify subjects of legislation.

It is not purpose of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, in equal protection clause, to take from states the right and power to classify subjects of legislation, and court can declare such classification beyond legislative authority only when it is arbitrary and unreasonable.

*Application to the Supreme Court for habeas corpus was denied December 22, 1925, without filing an opinion.

6. Constitutional law ☞211—When legislative discretion as to classification is subject to review stated.

7. Auctions and auctioneers ☞2—Ordinance prohibiting jewelry auctions at night reasonable.

Provision in ordinance regulating auction of jewelry, which prohibited such auctions between 6 p. m. and 8 a. m., held reasonable, owing to opportunities for fraud in night auctions of jewelry.

Where jeweler, attacking ordinance to regulate jewelry auctions, did not claim he could not comply with provisions therein, requiring certain information as to stock and other matters, held such provision was not sufficiently burdensome to render it unconstitutional.

9. Licenses ☞6(2)—Municipal boards may grant permits as to occupations, which are proper subjects of police regulation.

As to those kinds of occupations or businesses which are proper subjects of police surveillance and regulation, delegation of power to municipal boards or officers to grant or refuse permits will be sustained.

Application by Sam West for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Oakland, to secure release of petitioner from custody. Writ denied.

David J. Aaron and R. C. Young, both of San Francisco (Maxwell McNutt, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., Markell C. Baer, Asst. City Atty., Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., and J. Paul St. Sure, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. The petitioner, Sam West, was arrested by the chief of police of the city of Oakland under a warrant issued in a criminal action wherein petitioner was charged with having violated the provisions of an ordinance of said city relating to the holding of auction sales of jewelry, and he now seeks to be discharged from custody on habeas corpus upon the ground that said ordinance is unconstitutional.

The ordinance in question purports to regulate the retail selling of jewelry at public auction. It provides that "it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation or association to sell, dispose of, or offer for sale, in the city of Oakland, at public auction, or to cause or permit to be sold, disposed of, or offered for sale in the city of Oakland, at public auction, any platinum, gold, silver, or plated ware, precious stones or semiprecious stones, watches or other jewelry, whether the same shall be their own property or whether they shall sell the same as agents or employees of others," but it expressly exempts from its operation judicial sales, those made by executors or administrators, or licensed pawnbrokers, and also sales made "at public auction of the stock on hand of any person, or persons, or corporation, that shall for the period of one year next preceding such sale have been continuously in business in the city of Oakland as a retail or wholesale merchant of * * * jewelry," provided that, in the latter case, before such merchant may hold an auction he must obtain a permit therefor which shall be applied for and issued in the following manner: Said merchant shall, not less than 15 nor more than 30 days previous to conducting such sale, make a written application therefor, under oath, to the city council specifying "the name and address of the applicant, the location and purpose of the sale and its expected duration, and itemizing in detail the quality, quantity, kind, or grade of each item of goods, wares, and other articles to be sold, the wholesale market value thereof, the name of the auctioneer who shall conduct the sale," which application shall then be investigated by the chief of police and a report made thereon by him to the city council as to the character of the applicant and of his auctioneer, "the bona fide nature of the proposed sale," and whether the place where it is proposed to carry on said sale is a proper place. The council must be furnished also with satisfactory evidence that the jewelry proposed to be sold is "a bona fide part of the merchant's stock in trade and not secured, purchased, or brought into said place of business for or in anticipation of said sale." The ordinance then provides that "the council in considering the application and the attending facts shall exercise a reasonable and sound discretion in granting or denying the permit applied for." The ordinance further requires that such sale at pub-

He auction "shall be held on successive days, Sundays and legal holidays excepted, and shall not continue for more than thirty days in all from the commencement of the sale, and shall be permitted only where such merchant is bona fide disposing of his stock for the purpose of retiring from business," and that said auction shall be conducted during the daytime between the hours of 8 and 6 o'clock. Other provisions of the ordinance prohibit the making of false representation as to the previous history, ownership, or quality of the goods to be disposed of; also the activity of "cappers," "boosters," or "shillers," or the offering of any false bids.

It appears that petitioner was eligible, so far as residential qualification was concerned, to obtain a permit to hold an auction sale, having been engaged in the jewelry business in the city of Oakland for 12 years immediately preceding his arrest, but that he refused to comply with the ordinance, in the matter of applying for such permit, upon the ground that said ordinance was void, contending in this respect that said ordinance constituted an unjust discrimination against merchants engaged in the jewelry business, and that the regulatory measures thereof were so oppressive and burdensome as to make it impracticable for him to comply with them without sustaining great financial loss. In this regard petitioner alleges that during the 12 years he has been in said jewelry business he has accumulated a large and valuable stock in trade, which he now desires to dispose of and retire from business; that, since said stock consists of articles of luxury and of personal adornment, it cannot be quickly and profitably sold in the ordinary course of retail business or at wholesale or in bulk, but can be disposed of readily and to the best advantage only under special conditions afforded by public retail auction sale, and that the time required for such sale would necessarily extend over a period of four months; furthermore, he alleges, that those provisions of said ordinance requiring jewelers, before they may sell at retail auction, to file a schedule of the stock proposed to be sold, specifying quality, quantity and grade thereof, and to furnish satisfactory evidence to the effect that only the stock on hand will be disposed of, and which prohibit the holding of the auction during the nighttime, amount to an imposition of disabilities and burdensome conditions not justified by any features of the jewelry business, or by any consideration of the public safety, health, or welfare, and that, inasmuch as similar disabilities and conditions are not imposed upon merchants engaged in other lines of business, an unreasonable discrimination is exercised against those engaged in the jewelry business. In view of those alleged facts, petitioner contends that said ordinance and the provisions thereof above noted are violative of the inalienable rights clause of the state Constitution (section 1, art. 1), also of those clauses thereof declaring that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation" (section 11, art. 1), and that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws where a general law can be made applicable (subdivision 33, § 25, art. 4); also of that portion of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall deny to any citizen within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

Petitioner does not question the authority of the city, in the exercise of its police power, to reasonably regulate the conduct of auction sales generally, but contends, first, that no valid reason exists why jewelry merchants should be subjected to certain burdens and restrictions in disposing of their property at auction while merchants engaged in the sale of other kinds of merchandise are exempted from such burdens and restrictions; and, secondly, that, if such classification may be legally made, the regulatory features of said ordinance are unnecessary for the public welfare, unreasonable, and void.

[1-3] With respect to those constitutional provisions relating to equal protection of laws, class legislation, and uniformity of operation, upon which petitioner relies, it has been held generally in this state, as will be seen from the treatise on constitutional law contained in California Jurisprudence (volume 5, p. 790 et seq.), that general laws are those which operate alike upon all persons to whom they apply, and apply equally to all persons in the same category within the jurisdiction of the lawmaking power (McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 P. 71; Cody v. Murphey, 89 Cal. 522, 26 P. 1081); that, to be general in its scope, an act need not include all classes of individuals, but the requirements of the Constitution are met if the act relates to and operates uniformly upon the whole of any single class validly selected (City of Los Angeles v. Lankershim, 160 Cal. 800, 118 P. 215); that every subject which might have been included need not be covered, but it is sufficient if the subjects covered possess such intrinsic peculiarities as to justify the legislative determination that those subjects require special enactment (5 Cal. Jur. 795; Matter of Application of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 P. 427; In re Martin, 157 Cal. 51, 106 P. 235, 26 L. R. A. [N. S.] 242). It is furthermore held that, in order to be uniform in its operation, a law need not operate universally. It is general if it applies to all of a certain class alike, and operates uniformly upon all persons standing in the same category and upon rights and things in the same relation. The classification must be a proper one, however (Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 S. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; French v. Davidson, 143 Cal. 658, 77 P. 633), that is, the necessity for the classification must appear, and it must be founded upon reason and must not be the product of the exercise of an arbitrary will (Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 P. 604; Darcy v. San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 P. 500). The discretion of the legislative body to make these classifications is very wide, and, when such classification is attacked in the courts, it will be supported by every presumption in its favor (In re Cardinal, 170 Cal. 519, 150 P. 348, L. R. A. 1915F, 850), and will not be set aside merely because in the court's judgment it may be unwise or unnecessary to apply certain rules to certain classes (Title & Document Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 88 P. 356, 8 L. R. A. [N. S.] 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199). Agreeable to these conclusions, it has been held in this state that particular businesses may be classified and regulated (In re San Chung, 11 Cal. App. 511, 105 P. 609; People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 154 Cal. 194, 97 P. 306; State Sav. & Com. Bank v. Anderson, 165 Cal. 437, 132 P. 755, L. R. A. 1915E, 675; Wood v. Krepps, 168 Cal. 382, 143 P. 691, L. R. A. 1915B, 851; Ex parte Sohneke, 148 Cal. 262, 82 P. 956, 2 L. R. A. [N. S.] 813, 113 Am. St. Rep. 236, 7 Ann. Cas. 475).

[4] While the question of the constitutionality of an ordinance of this particular kind, that is, one by which the municipality seeks to regulate the holding of retail auctions of jewelry, does not seem to have been previously passed upon by the courts of the appellate jurisdiction in this state, similar ordinances have been assailed before the courts of other states, upon grounds identical with those now urged by petitioner against the validity of this ordinance, and those ordinances have been held to be constitutional; the effect of the decisions being that the classification of business thus made is not arbitrary or discriminatory, but based upon substantial reason, in view of the object sought to be accomplished by said ordinances. Holsman v. Thomas (Ohio) 147 N. E. 750, 39 A. L. R. 760; City of Roanoke v. Fisher, 137 Va. 75, 119 S. E. 259; Mogul v. Gaither, 142 Md. 380, 121 A. 32; Carlton v. City of Watertown, 124 Misc. Rep. 244, 207 N. Y. S. 339; State ex rel. Cook v. Bates, 101 Minn. 301, 112 N. W. 67.

We agree in the main with the reasoning of those cases, and believe that the conclusions stated therein should be held as controlling here. It is pointed out in those cases that the evils which may flow from the holding of such auctions and the opportunity afforded through them to impose upon and defraud the public are well known; that in many cases such auctions are likely to be attended with abuses, and frequently result in cheating and defrauding the unsophisticated. It is asserted, and, we think, truthfully, that jewelry auctions are often mere schemes for trapping and defrauding the unwary; that the people, in general, are unskilled in the art of determining the purity of gold and silver or the genuineness of diamonds, particularly at a glance under artificial light; and that the sale of those articles under such circumstances in competition at public auction necessarily exposes many persons to misfortunes against which this character of legislation might probably protect them. It is further said that the character of an ordinance such as the one now under consideration tends in some degree to prevent those evils and misdeeds, and therefore is enacted in the interests of public safety and welfare, and not, as has been claimed, as an arbitrary or capricious attempt to interfere with the freedom of trade or as an invasion of the rights of an individual to conduct a lawful business. Furthermore, it is quite clearly demonstrated by those decisions that similar opportunities for practicing fraud and deception of the public do not ordinarily attend the holding of auctions for the sale of other articles of merchandise, and that consequently there are reasons for the application and enforcement of rigid regulations against jewelry auctions that do not exist in the cases of auctions in other lines of business.

[5] Referring more particularly to the decision in Holsman v. Thomas, supra, the ordinance considered there is similar in a number of details to the one involved in the instant case. It required a license to be obtained before an auction of jewelry could be conducted, and only those merchants residing in the city for one year and owning a regular stock of jewelry therein for a period of six months during that year were qualified to obtain said license. It also limited the period of time the auction might continue. In holding said ordinance to be constitutional, the court declared that the mere fact that said ordinance did not include within its scope dealers selling other kinds of commodities did not render it an arbitrary and unreasonable discrimination against those engaged in the jewelry business, nor was its constitutionality impaired because it did not extend over the entire field of possible abuses of like kind. The ordinance, as was shown, did apply with equal force to every seller of jewelry who desired to sell at auction in the city, and consequently there was no discrimination against any one of that class. It was further held that the ordinance was not confiscatory in its effect, and did not deprive the owner of the jewelry of his right to the enjoyment of his property, because he might at any time, without restriction, dispose of his stock through the ordinary course of business, but, if he desired to dispose of his stock at public auction, which was a matter over which the municipality had control, he would be compelled to do so under certain prescribed conditions, and within a limited period during each year, and if, in so doing, he was obliged to suffer some incidental inconvenience and possibly some financial loss on account of the enforcement of certain regulations provided for in the ordinance, the validity of the ordinance was not affected thereby, for the reason that the imposition of those regulations was well within the exercise of the police power of the municipality. Upon this last point may be cited the case of Jeffrey Mfg. Co. v. Blagg, 235 U. S. 571, 35 S. Ct. 167, 59 L. Ed. 364, wherein it was said:

"This court has many times affirmed the general proposition that it is not the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment in the equal protection clause to take from the states the right and power to classify the subjects of legislation. It is only when such attempted classification is arbitrary and unreasonable that the court can declare it beyond the legislative authority. Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 78, and previous cases in this court cited on page 79 [31 S. Ct. 337, 55 L. Ed. 369, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 160]. That a law may work hardship and inequality is not enough. Many valid laws from the generality of their application necessarily do that, and the Legislature must be allowed a wide field of choice in determining the subject-matter of its laws, what shall come within them, and what shall be excluded."

Later on, in another case, in sustaining the constitutionality of certain state legislation regarding the sale of corporate securities, the same court said:

"We think the statute under review is within the power of the state. It burdens honest business, it is true, but burdens it only that under its forms dishonest business may not be done. This manifestly cannot be accomplished by mere declaration; there must be conditions imposed and provisions made for their performance. Expense may thereby be caused and inconvenience, but to arrest the power of the state by such considerations would make it impotent to discharge its function. It costs something to be governed." Merrick v. Halsey & Co., 242 U. S. 568, 587, 37 S. Ct. 227, 231 (61 L. Ed. 498).

In Mogul v. Gaither, supra, the right of the city, in the exercise of its police power, to adopt said ordinance regulating the holding of jewelry auctions was conceded, but the constitutionality of said ordinance was challenged upon the ground that said ordinance, like the one in the instant case, made a distinction in its operation between those engaged in business for one year and those who had not been engaged for that length of time, and, furthermore, like the one before us, said ordinance contained a provision limiting the sale to 30 days. The ordinance was sustained, the court holding it to be apparent that auction sales of the class prohibited might be attended with much greater risk to the public than auction sales permitted upon the conditions named, and that therefore the classification created by the ordinance was not arbitrary, but one that bore a reasonable relation to the object sought to be accomplished by it. In State ex rel. Cook v. Bates (Minn.) supra, a municipal ordinance was declared constitutional which forbade a licensed auctioneer from holding auction sales of jewelry under any circumstances. After discussing the evils which sometimes flow from such auctions, the court said:

"The claim that the ordinance is invalid, because it is 'discriminatory as against a certain business within a certain class,' cannot be sustained. True it is that the ordinance, as a means of policing and regulating the general business of an auctioneer, prohibits the conducting of auction sales of jewelry and watches; but such special sales are liable to be attended with great abuses, and to result in cheating and defrauding the unsophisticated, which is not the case with the general business of an auctioneer. The ordinance applies equally to all auction sales within the city, and it is not discriminatory; and we hold it valid."

In the case of People v. Gibbs, 186 Mich. 127, 152 N. W. 1053, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 830, cited herein by petitioner on another point, the court held in reference to an ordinance regulating jewelry auctions that there could be no serious question raised as to the general power of the city under its charter to enact an ordinance to license and regulate auctioneers and auctions held within its limits, and therein prescribe such regulations as are necessary and appropriate in that connection to eliminate fraud, and to protect the public from annoyance and imposition.

[6] It may be conceded, as petitioner contends, that the question of the reasonableness of an ordinance is, to a certain extent, a judicial one (In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 P. 180), but, as stated in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 31 S. Ct. 259, 55 L. Ed. 328, the scope of the judicial inquiry may not transcend those considerations which are allowed to influence the legislative body in dealing with the matter of the policy of the law which it enacts. And therefore, whether the enactment is a wise one, or based upon sound economic theory, or is the best means to achieve the desired result, are matters for the judgment of the legislative body, and, even though there be a conflict of opinion in relation thereto, it is not sufficient to bring those considerations within the purview of judicial cognizance. Where the legislative action is arbitrary, and has no relation to a purpose which it is competent for government to effect, the limit of legislative power is violated, but, where there is reasonable relation to an object within the governmental authority, the exercise of legislative discretion is not subject to judicial review. The language employed in the decision in In re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 200 P. 593, is in apparent harmony with the rule just stated. There the question arose as to the constitutionality of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) of this state, wherein trustees created by will or by order of court in a judicial proceeding were allowed to sell without a permit securities issued by such trustees, but which act forbade a sale without such permit in case of trustees created under an instrument executed by individuals. The court said:

"We cannot declare a law unconstitutional in the matter of discrimination unless there is no rational doubt that it improperly discriminates between persons similarly situated. We must presume that the Legislature made inquiry to determine whether or not there were evils which required regulation, and that upon such inquiry it was ascertained that the mischief sought to be corrected was being done under the form of trusts created by private individuals and not under the form of testamentary trusts or trusts declared in judicial proceedings."

And in the case of Carlton v. City of Watertown, supra, which dealt with an ordinance regulating jewelry auctions, it was said that the court was a judicial and not a legislative body, and that the duty of determining whether the measure in question was wise and for the best interest of the people was vested in the common council, and not in the court. Continuing, the court said:

"It may be a debatable question whether the evils sought to be remedied will be cured by this act, or whether the medicine is not too bitter and powerful a dose for the disease. Reasonable men might take opposite sides in such a debate. If so, the court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the law-making body. The court can step in only when it is clearly apparent that the law involved is unreasonable and capricious, and when that question is not fairly debatable."

In view of the foregoing authorities, we conclude that the municipality, in making the classification complained of, and in applying the provisions of said ordinance to jewelry auctions only, acted entirely within the lawful exercise of its constitutional power.

[7] We find no merit in the objection made against the provision of said ordinance prohibiting auctions from being conducted "between the hours of 6 p. m. and 8 a. m." In the case of City of Roanoke v. Fisher, supra, this precise question was raised and decided. Evidence was referred to showing "that the public have * * * been frequently deceived and defrauded by the auction sales of such articles as are mentioned in such ordinance [jewelry and diamonds] after usual business hours and under artificial lights, and that this is likely to occur if such sales are allowed, for the reasons that it is more important and necessary for the protection of the purchaser that he be afforded a reasonable opportunity of inspection of such articles, under ordinary conditions and lighting than of other forms of merchandise; that, unless such opportunity is afforded, the purchaser is easily defrauded and misled in his purchase." Other cases holding to the same effect are Alexander v. Enright, 211 App. Div.

146, 206 N. Y. S. 785; Carlton v. City of Watertown, supra; Biddles, Inc., v. Enright, 208 App. Div. 790, 203 N. Y. S. 920, disapproving Robinson v. Wood, 119 Misc. Rep. 299, 196 N. Y. S. 209, holding to the contrary. Counsel for petitioner cites two cases holding such a provision to be unreasonable. In the first case, however, People v. Gibbs, 186 Mich. 127, 152 N. W. 1053, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 830, it will be found that the ordinance contained many rigid restrictions that are not embraced in the ordinance before us, and which amply protected the purchaser against fraud, among them being that the party holding the auction was not allowed to close his place of business within 5 days following such sale, and during that time the purchaser of any article might return the article purchased by him if the same had been misrepresented, demand the return of the purchase price, and collect it from the person conducting the auction or from his bondsmen. Upon a refusal to comply with the purchaser's demand the seller was liable for a forfeiture of license and payment of fine. In view of these and other drastic safeguards inserted in the ordinance for the protection of the buyer, the court said that there was no evidence indicating "what special wrong to the public would or could result from auctions during business hours after 6 p. m., when conducted according to the requirements of said ordinance, justifying their prohibition as a necessary police regulation." (Italics ours.)

Since the Oakland ordinance does not contain any of the exacting requirements noted, we think that the necessity for the clause in the Oakland ordinance in regard to the hours of conducting the sale cannot be considered unnecessary or unreasonable. The other case cited (Hayes v. City of Appleton, 24 Wis. 542) dealt with an ordinance declaring it to be unlawful for an auctioneer to sell any goods "after sundown," and it was said by the court that it was not shown what evil was to be prevented or good promoted by the passage of the ordinance in question; "nor can we judicially see" says the court, "that any restriction of the kind was necessary." It does not appear that this was a jewelry auction case; but, in any event, we think it only necessary to call attention to the fact that this case was decided during the year 1869, before the invention of the electric light, and therefore the reasons assigned in the Virginia case for prohibiting auction sales of diamonds and jewelry with the aid of artificial light did not exist when the Wisconsin case was decided.

[8] The requirement of the Oakland ordinance that the applicant for a permit furnish certain information as to his stock and other matters is not sufficiently burdensome, we think, to render the ordinance in that respect unconstitutional. Petitioner does not claim that those requirements cannot be complied with, and in our opinion they are not any more burdensome than those inserted in similar ordinances which have been sustained. Clein & Ellman v. City of Atlanta, 159 Ga. 121, 124 S. E. 882; Carlton v. City of Watertown, supra; People v. Gibbs, supra.

[9, 10] The contention that said ordinance in effect vests an illegal arbitrary power in the city council in the matter of granting or refusing permits is fully answered by the decisions in the cases in In re Holmes, 187 Cal. 640, 203 P. 398; Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, 41 Cal. App. 520, 183 P. 230; and Parker v. Colburn (Cal. Sup.) 236 P. 921—wherein it held in substance that as to those kinds of occupations or businesses which are the proper subjects of police surveillance and regulation the delegation of power to municipal boards or officials to grant or refuse permits will be sustained. Moreover, it is not to be assumed that the council or officer, in exercising the dispensing power, will act arbitrarily, or otherwise than in the exercise of a sound discretion (Dillon on Municipal Corp. [5th Ed.], p. 937), and, if this petitioner had applied for a permit under the requirements of the ordinance, and been either whimsically or arbitrarily refused such permit, he might then have had recourse to the courts for relief from such unjust or arbitrary action (In re Holmes, supra; Gaylord v. City of Pasadena, 175 Cal. 433, 166 P. 348).

[11] A discussion of the second feature of the ordinance, which deals with the matter of the application for and issuance of permits to auctioneers, is not necessary, for the reason that petitioner is not affected thereby (Ex parte Murphy, 8 Cal. App. 440, 97 P. 199; Id., 155 Cal. 322, 100 P. 1134), and furthermore his petition shows that, when arrested, his auction was "being conducted by a regular licensed auctioneer."

The writ is denied.

VICTORY AUTO PAINTING CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.
(Civ. 5394.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 23, 1925.)

I. Master and servant § 405(2) — Evidence held to show relation of employee and employer.

Evidence held sufficient to show that toolmaker and machinist, asked by foreman of auto painting company to remove hub cap from automobile on which company's employees were working, was employee and not independent contractor, within meaning of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 8 (b).

2. Master and servant § 367—Power of control determinative factor as to whether person is employee or independent contractor.

In determining whether a person is an employee, within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 8 (b), rather than an independent contractor, the determinative factor is who has the power of control as to means and methods by which result is accomplished.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by R. F. Daniels for injuries, opposed by the Victory Auto Painting Company, employer, and the Pacific Employers' Insurance Company, insurer. From an order of the Industrial Accident Commission granting an award, the employer and insurer bring certiorari. Affirmed.

H. C. Kelsey, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for writ of review to determine the lawfulness of an award of respondent commission in an application for compensation benefits under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831).

It appears from the petition that respondent R. F. Daniels sustained an injury to his eye, and thereafter filed an application with the Industrial Accident Commission wherein he claimed that the injury occurred at a time when he was an employee of the petitioner, the Victory Auto Painting Company.

Following the filing of the application, hearing was had, in which the issue was raised of the existence of the relation of employer and employee between the company and the applicant at the time of said injury. The matter was submitted for decision, and on May 29, 1925, the commission rendered its findings to the effect that the injury caused temporary total disability, continuing for a period of three weeks, entitling the employee to $20.83 during said time, exclusive of the waiting period, amounting to $41.66. Thereafter, within the time prescribed by law, petitioners herein, the Victory Auto Painting Company, and its insurance carrier, Pacific Employers' Insurance Company, filed a petition for rehearing. Respondent Daniels also filed a like petition. After hearing, the commission rendered its order denying the same.

[1] The only question here presented is whether Daniels was at the time of his injury an employee of petitioner. While there is a conflict upon the subject, there is sufficient evidence in the record to show that the relationship of employee and employer existed.

It appears therefrom that Daniels was a toolmaker and machinist. He conducted such business in the same building occupied by the Victory Auto Painting Company. During the noon hour of January 19, 1925, certain employees of the latter concern were attempting to remove a hub cap from an automobile, but were unable to do so. Daniels was asked by the foreman of the company to take the cap off and put in his time for the work at the office. While engaged in chipping the cap, a piece of brass struck Daniels' right eyeglass and either the brass or a piece of the eyeglass injured his right eye.

There is evidence to show that Daniels had performed auto repair work on other occasions for the company for which he had charged $2 an hour, and that he intended to make a similar charge for the services which resulted in his injury.

Further evidence is to the effect that, while performing the particular task which resulted in his injury, Daniels was working with the other employees of the company under the direction of its foreman at an hourly wage.

Under section 8 (b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, any person rendering service for another other than an independent contractor is presumed, unless excluded by the act, to be an employee.

[2] In determining in any given case whether a person was an employee or independent contractor, the determinative factor is found in the solution of the question, who has the power of control as to the means and method by which the result is accomplished. Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., 41 Cal. App. 480, 183 P. 178.

We are of the opinion that the award of the commission finds full support in the evidence as above narrated.

The award is affirmed.

LEE v. ZIMMERMAN, Public Adm'r, et al.
(Civ. 5290.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 17, 1925.)

Wills — 67—Heirs of deceased, and not administrator or purchasers at probate sale, are proper parties to suit to impress trust on residue of estate.

In action to impress trust upon residue of estate by virtue of agreement of deceased to give by will or otherwise to plaintiff so much of her property as should remain after expenses of estate had been paid, the heirs of deceased are the necessary and only proper parties, and neither administrator nor purchasers of realty of estate at probate sale are interested.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Jane B. Lee against H. P. Zimmerman, as Public Administrator and personally, the estate of Eva Boyd, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, sustaining a general demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George Goode, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. K. Stahl, of Corona, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An action by appellant for the enforcement of an oral contract by Eva Boyd to make a certain testamentary disposition of her property; said Eva Boyd having died intestate. The heirs of the deceased were not made parties to the action; the persons joined as defendants being the public administrator of the county of Riverside, to whom letters of administration of the estate of the intestate had been granted, and others who acquired by purchase from the estate certain real property, the legal title to which was vested in the intestate at the time of her death; the proceedings mentioned having been so far as appears from the complaint in all respects regular.

The estate consisted of the real property mentioned on which the deceased resided at the time of her death, and certain household effects and garden implements, the whole valued at the sum of $4,000.

The terms of the alleged contract as set forth in the complaint were as follows:

"On or about the 20th of October, 1921, plaintiff agreed with Mrs. Eva Boyd, now deceased, that she would care for her the balance of her natural life, provided the said Eva Boyd would give her by will or otherwise all of the property of which she was then possessed or as much thereof as should remain after being properly cared for, paying her debts, including her last illness and funeral expenses."

"That it was further agreed, in case the small pension of said Eva Boyd of $30 per month was insufficient for household expenses and to keep up the property of said Eva Boyd and other current expenses, then plaintiff should pay up the balance."

It is further alleged that appellant, pursuant to the contract, removed from her residence in San Francisco, which removal entailed considerable loss and expense, and on November 30, 1921, went into possession of the property "in common" with Mrs. Boyd, caring for and nursing the latter, and paying part of the expenses of their "joint residence together," which continued until the death of the intestate on January 26, 1922; appellant being thereafter dispossessed by the public administrator, and that the agreement had been fully performed by appellant. The complaint also alleges facts tending to support the conclusion that the agreement was fair and reasonable; that the consideration moving from appellant was adequate; and prays the decree of the court adjudging her to be the owner of the property of the estate.

A general demurrer in which the defendants joined was sustained, and appellant, having declined to amend, a judgment was entered thereon, from which this appeal was taken.

Assuming, without deciding, that the agreement was one which might be enforced in equity, it is clear from its terms that it was not the intention of the parties that any part of the property owned by the deceased should be specifically devised or bequeathed to appellant, but that the latter should acquire the residue of the estate after payment of the debts, including funeral expenses, and, by necessary implication, the costs of administration. Such being the reasonable construction of the agreement, in view of the circumstances alleged, the action in effect was one to impress a trust upon the residue of the estate and to determine the respective rights of those beneficially interested therein, to which litigation the heirs of the deceased are the necessary and only proper parties, and in which neither the administrator nor the purchasers of property of the estate at a probate sale are interested. Estate of Healy, 137 Cal. 474, 70 P. 455; McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81, 70 P. 1008.

The complaint not having stated a cause of action against the defendants, the demurrer thereto was properly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SCANLON. (Cr. 1287.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 17, 1925. Rehearing Denied Jan. 15, 1926.)

Criminal law — § 1186(4)—Refusal to instruct as to aiding and abetting crime held not reversible error.

Where accused, in prosecution for attempt to commit grand larceny, denied presence at scene of crime, but state's evidence showed he was participant therein, no issue was raised requiring instructions on aiding and abetting crime, and refusal to give them was not prejudicial, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, precluding reversal for misdirection except when resulting in miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Thomas Scanlon was convicted of an attempt to commit grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Resleure, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant and one Castro were tried jointly on an information charging them with an attempt to commit grand larceny. Both were convicted, and Scanlon has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The record is prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The two defendants were seen by two police officers on Mission street at about 8:15 p. m., acting in a suspicious manner, and were followed by the officers as they walked along the north side of Mission street, going east. The defendants passed one Donnelly, who was lying on the sidewalk badly under the influence of liquor; they continued easterly for about 50 feet, then turned back, and while the defendant Scanlon held Donnelly in an upright position Castro went through his pockets. The defendants then left Donnelly where they found him, and walked directly across the street, where the police officers placed them under arrest. The officers searched both defendants and found $2.50 in the pockets of Castro.

Upon the trial the defendant Castro did not take the stand, but the defendant Scanlon testified that he was not on the north side of Mission street on the night in question; that he did not see Donnelly until after the arrest; that he did not take any money from Donnelly and did not see Castro take any; that he was merely engaged in a friendly conversation with Castro, whom he had just met at the time, when he was struck on the head by one of the arresting officers.

The only point raised on the appeal is that the trial court erred in refusing to give two instructions asked by defendant Scanlon, and which read:

"If you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant, Thomas Scanlon, stood by at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed, but did no act to aid, assist, or abet the same, you should find the defendant, Thomas Scanlon, not guilty;" and, "Unless you are satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant, Thomas Scanlon, did some act to aid, assist or abet the offense alleged to have been committed, you should find the defendant, Thomas Scanlon, not guilty, notwithstanding he was present at the time the offense was alleged to have been committed."

The appellant relies on People v. Woodward, 45 Cal. 293, 13 Am. Rep. 176, where the Supreme Court held that it was error to have refused to give an instruction similar to the one first above quoted. There is a marked distinction between the facts of this case and those in People v. Woodward. In the case cited the evidence was that Woodward stood by while some small boys attempted to commit the assault with which they were all charged. There was no evidence that Woodward took any part in or

"aided or abetted" the commission of the crime. Here the evidence of the prosecution is that appellant actually took part in the commission of the crime—not as an accessory, but as a participant. In answer to this the appellant did not, as did Woodward in the case cited, admit that he was present and merely witnessed the commission of the crime by the other defendants, but he denied that he was present, that he witnessed the commission of the crime, and that his codefendant was a party to the crime.

There was therefore no issue in the trial which required either of the requested instructions on aiding and abetting, and the refusal to give them was not prejudicial. For this reason section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution, which was adopted subsequent to the Woodward decision, compels an affirmance, as we are satisfied, upon an examination of the entire record, that the appellant was fairly tried and fairly convicted.

Judgment and order affirmed.

1. Witnesses $\S$ 269(4)—Question as to detective's conversation with witness just prior to latter's identification of accused held improper cross-examination.

In prosecution for robbery, where witness to crime afterward identified accused in hospital, but where prosecution did not introduce conversation between such witness and detective who took him to hospital, and defense did not ask if identification was based solely on recollection of robber's appearance, questions as to whether detective told him why they were going to hospital held not proper subject-matter of cross-examination.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 683(1)—Evidence as to whether detective received money as result of police activities in case held inadmissible.

Where, after prosecution closed case, defense called as witness detective who had taken identifying witness to hospital to identify accused, objection to question as to whether detective had received money from certain insurance company arising as result of police activities in the case held properly sustained.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 655(5)—Court did not usurp function of jury by warning counsel to confine himself to facts proved.

In prosecution for robbery, where accused was not identified until some time after crime, and defense counsel, in argument to jury, started to read of other cases where identifying witnesses had made mistakes, but made no immediate objection to court's phraseology in sustaining objection of prosecution to such argument, in which court warned counsel to confine himself "to the facts proved in this case," held court was not usurping function of jury; such language not holding testimony of prosecution to be conclusive.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 718—Defense counsel in argument to jury could not refer to other cases of which there was no evidence in record.

In prosecution for robbery, where accused was not identified until some time after crime, trial court did not err in refusing to allow defense counsel in argument to jury to read of other cases concerning which there was no evidence in record, in which identifying witnesses had made mistakes.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 825(4)—Instruction as to proof required to convict held sufficient, in absence of tender of additional instructions.

In prosecution for robbery, instruction that defendant is presumed innocent until contrary is proven, and is entitled to acquittal in case of reasonable doubt as to guilt, held sufficient, in absence of showing that additional instructions were tendered and refused.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 655(1)—Remarks of juror could not constitute error of trial court.

Where juror, by remarks during defense counsel's argument, showed her inexperience and ignorance of law as to burden of proof in criminal cases and as to duty of defendant to take stand in his own behalf, but apologized when her statements were ruled irregular, held, matters were not acts of trial court, and could not constitute error on his part.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 925(1)—Remarks of juror relative to accused, made during defense counsel's argument, held not to constitute misconduct.

Where juror, in prosecution for robbery, by remarks during defense counsel's argument as to why defendant did not say where he was, showed her inexperience of law as to burden of proof, and duty of defendant in criminal prosecution to take stand in his own behalf, held, such remarks did not constitute misconduct.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

James Hawthorne was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence M. Booth, of San Jose, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The appellant was convicted of the crime of robbery. He made a motion for a new trial, and the motion was denied. He has appealed from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Mr. McLean, called as a witness by the prosecution, testified that he is a clerk employed with Houston-Gilmore & Company, and at the time of the trial had been so employed for six and a half years. His employers' place of business is located on the northeast corner of the intersection of Post and Stockton streets in San Francisco. On the morning of the 24th of June, 1924, the witness went to his place of business a little after 9 o'clock. As he walked up to the door from Stockton street, he noticed two men standing around the corner in Post street. As the witness walked up to put his key in the door, he turned around to see if the men were interested in him. They evidently were not, because they were reading a paper. As the witness walked in the door, he was forced in from behind, and, when he turned around, there was a gun held on him by one of the men, and who was afterwards designated by the witness as No. 1. That individual ordered the witness to go back to the vault and give him the goods. The witness told him that he did not have the combination, and could not. Two men followed the witness into the store, and the second man the witness designated as No. 2. The witness thereupon proceeded to delineate all of the facts of the robbery. He stated that neither of the robbers was masked, and he delineated what No. 1 did and what No. 2 did. He also stated that, when the three mentioned were in the store a little later Mr. Gilmore, one of the proprietors, arrived. The witness continued to state the story as to what transpired after Mr. Gilmore came in. In giving his testimony the witness mentioned several occasions in which he looked at each of the robbers squarely in the face, and also had other views of each of those men. Continuing his story, the witness stated that later it transpired that No. 1 was William O'Connor, and still later, on October 22, 1924, the witness again saw No. 2 in bed at the San Francisco Hospital, and recognized him, and thereafter heard that his name was James Hawthorne. During his examination the witness fully delineated the facts of the robbery. Later Mr. Gilmore was called as a witness, and testified to all the facts as he remembered them. Among other things, he testified to seeing O'Connor at a later date, and that O'Connor had pleaded guilty, and was serving his time. Furthermore, Mr. Gilmore testified that on the 22d of October, at the same time and place above mentioned, he saw the appellant, and was later informed as to his name. The prosecution called one other witness, Francis X. Lattulipe. That witness testified that he is a detective sergeant of the police department detailed in charge of the police photograph gallery and as draftsman for the police department. He produced a drawing which he had made of the store which had been robbed.

That witness did not purport to give testimony on any other subject.

[1] The first point made by the appellant is that the trial court erred in not permitting cross-examination of the witness Gilmore, and not allowing a certain examination of the witness Bohr, who was called by the defense. There was testimony in the record that Detective Fred Bohr took Mr. McLean and Mr. Gilmore to the hospital. The prosecution did not introduce any conversation held by those persons. In cross-examining the witness McLean and the witness Gilmore the defense did not ask either one if his identification was based solely on his recollection of the appearance of the robber. Neither did the defense ask either of the witnesses if any other person had made any statement to the witness on which the witness in part rested his testimony as to identification. Nevertheless, the defense propounded to Mr. Gilmore these questions:

"Did Fred Bohr tell you why he was taking you out there? Did Mr. Bohr talk to you on the way out about what you should do when you got there? As a matter of fact, Mr. Gilmore, didn't Mr. Fred Bohr tell you at that time that there was a man out there named Hawthorne who was dying, and that he wanted you to go out and identify him before he died?"

[2] The prosecution objected to each question, the objection was sustained, and it is these rulings that the appellant attacks in the first division of the point under discussion. We think there was no error in any one of the rulings, and, furthermore, that the questions were not the proper subject-matter of cross-examination of the witness Gilmore. After the prosecution had closed its case, the defense called Detective Bohr, and propounded to him the question:

"Mr. Bohr, have you received, or did you in the month of December, 1924, receive, any money from an insurance company called Lloyd's, arising as a result of police activities in this robbery?"

The prosecution objected to the question, and the objection was sustained. Under the facts above recited the ruling was clearly correct.

[3] The second point made by the appellant is that the trial court erred in commenting on the evidence in the presence of the jury. In presenting this point some short excerpts are quoted. In arguing the case to the jury one of the attorneys for the appellant started to read about certain cases in which the witnesses had made mistakes in identifying defendants. The prosecution objected, and claimed that counsel should confine their arguments to the matters that were within the record that was before the court. The record shows clearly the contention of the prosecution, the contention of the defense, and that the trial court was ruling on that contention, and nothing more. However, in ruling, the trial court used different expressions, such as "confine yourself to the record"; "to the facts proved in this case"; "to inferences from the facts proven." The appellant argues that the language used by the trial court was in effect to hold that the facts testified to by the witnesses for the prosecution conclusively proved those facts, and that the trial court thus usurped the functions of a jury. Taking the context from which the excerpts are quoted, we think it is quite clear, indeed, that no one present at the trial then thought the trial court was usurping the functions of the jury. Moreover, if either counsel had called the attention of the trial judge to some of the phrases used, no doubt the matter would have been stricken out or modified on the spot.

[4] In the next place, the appellant contends that the trial court erred in limiting the argument of the appellant's counsel. This point reverts to the attempt of the defense to read from books and papers some of the facts regarding alleged mistakes in identification. There was no evidence of course in the record regarding the other cases to which counsel was referring, and there was no error in the trial court holding that the argument should be confined to the evidence that had been introduced.

[5] The trial court instructed the jury, among other things, as follows:

"In every criminal proceeding under our system of criminal jurisprudence, the defendant is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proven, and, in case of reasonable doubt whether his guilt has been satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal."

We do not understand the appellant to contend that said instruction is not a sound statement of the law, but that he complains that the court did not give other and additional instructions on that general subject. However, it is not claimed that the defendant tendered such additional instructions and that the trial court refused to give the same. Under these circumstances the trial court committed no error.

[6, 7] The last point made by the appellant involves the proceedings had when Mr. Cunha, as counsel for the appellant, was arguing the case to the jury. The point is novel. For that reason we state the record in full as it appears in the transcript:

"Mr. Cunha (continuing): * * * There is nothing here to show that Mr. Hawthorne was ever even in San Francisco at that time.

"A Juror: Where was he then?

"The Court: Just a moment, lady. The case has been submitted to you on the facts. You have no right at this time to interfere with the course of this trial. You remain silent and retire to the jury room at the proper time.

"Mr. Cunha: I think, if your honor please, it is important now, on the part of the defendant, for us to request your honor to advise the other jurors to entirely disregard that question propounded to me by the juror in the jury box.

"The Juror: I apologize.

"The Court: The juror has apologized.

"Mr. Cunha: An invasion of the rights of the defendant, and prejudicial conduct, and I request your honor to specifically instruct the other jurors to disregard that incident.

"The Court: Let the remark of the juror be disregarded for any purpose at this time, ladies and gentlemen of the jury. Proceed.

"Mr. Cunha: I am very glad, my dear friends, that that question was asked, for this reason—I take it I will proceed away from that, from the proposition of the question, because that has to be disregarded altogether.

"The Court: Yes.

"Mr. Cunha: But I will proceed with my argument in this manner: The situation might be made, in a general sense, as to where Mr. Hawthorne was upon the day in question, if he wasn't at the scene of the robbery. Now, if that be the fact, and there is some doubt in somebody's mind as to where he was, or some one feels that there should be some proof as to where Mr. Hawthorne was, let me say this to you, that the burden of clearing up any situation of that kind is upon the prosecution in this case and not upon the defense. There is no burden or obligation upon the defendant—I think, if your honor please, we better wait until—

"The Court: What is it?

"Mr. Cunha: Until the ladies—

"The Court: Let us proceed. The time is getting short.

"The Juror: I apologized. I can't do anything more.

"Mr. Stafford: It was just an innocent mistake.

"Mr. Cunha: Oh, I realize that.

"The Juror: But I would tell just where I was.

"The Court: Now, keep in mind, ladies and gentlemen—

"Mr. Cunha: I think a continuance—

"The Court:—that we are here at this trial. I trust there will be no more outbursts of this kind. I understand that emotion sometimes gets away from one, but we should refrain from any flights at this time. The jury will retire at the proper time and deliberate upon their verdict.

"Mr. Cunha: I ask your honor to specifically instruct the jury to disregard that last remark of the juror also. There was another remark just made.

"The Court: What remark?

"Mr. Cunha: I ask the jury be specifically instructed to disregard it. I don't know what it was. Some remark.

"The Court: It has no place here. Proceed."

Looking directly at this incident in the very face of it, it appears at once that the juror was wholly inexperienced as such, and that she was entirely uninformed on those parts of the law of this state which place the burden of proof on the prosecution and not on the defense, and which leave to a defendant to take the stand as a witness in his own behalf or omit to do so, as he sees fit, and that no inference is to be drawn by the jurors because the defendant remains silent. These matters were no act of the trial court, and consequently no possible error on the part of the trial court. The juror said nothing constituting misconduct, but, on the other hand, did all that she could do under the circumstances; namely, she apologized when it appeared that her question or statement, as the case might be, was ruled as being irregular. If there is any real criticism to be made, it is a criticism of the lawmaking power which rendered the incident possible, and not an error on the part of the court or any official acting thereunder.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Marvin Strauss, Charles Sciorplate, and Harry Russell were convicted of robbery in the first degree, and named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, T. E. Parke, and Homer C. Mills, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The three defendants above named were charged jointly by an information consisting of two counts, in the usual form, with having committed robberies in Los Angeles county. The first count charged that on or about the 11th day of January, 1925, they robbed one E. E. Foley of a Nash automobile, a diamond ring, and $19 in money, and the second count alleged that on or about the same date they robbed one Johnny Wilkerson of $3 in money. At the close of the people's evidence, a motion for instructed verdicts of acquittal was made in behalf of appellants, and was overruled. Thereupon two witnesses testified as to the past history and reputation of defendant Strauss for truth, honesty, and integrity, but none of the defendants took the stand. Six separate verdicts were returned by the jury, convicting the respective defendants upon each count of robbery in the first degree. Motions for new trial were presented in behalf of each defendant, which were denied, and thereafter motions in arrest of judgment were made by appellants, and these motions also were denied. This is an appeal by Strauss and Sciorplate from the rulings of the trial court upon said motions, and from the individual judgments and sentences applicable to each appellant, respectively.

[1, 2] We will first consider the claim that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a conviction upon either count. Regarding the evidence, as a reviewing court must, in the light most favorable to support the verdicts, the facts which will now be detailed we think are quite sufficient.

At about 9 o'clock a. m. on the 11th day of January, 1925, Foley and Wilkerson drove the former's Nash sedan automobile into a garage near the corner of Moneta avenue and Forty-Fifth street, in the city of Los Angeles. Before they alighted the defendant Russell and a large man whom they could not identify stepped to either side of the car, ordered them out, searched them at the points of revolvers, and escaped with Foley's machine. A diamond ring and $19 in money were taken from Foley, and $3 was taken from Wilkerson, which however, was returned. A Buick touring car, with side curtains up, which had been standing on the opposite side of the street, immediately followed the Nash in an easterly direction on Forty-Fifth street, north on Main street; both cars turning toward the east on Miles street. As soon as his car left the garage Foley ran into the street to call an officer, and Wilkerson went through Foley's restaurant to Moneta avenue. As soon as the Nash turned onto Forty-Fifth street the two machines sped easterly, the Buick keeping within 7 to 10 feet behind the Nash. Wilkerson testified that Russell drove the Nash away, and that the large man stood on the running board; that the latter would weigh 175 to 180 pounds. This witness also stated that he had known the defendant Sciorplate for some time as a customer of Foley's. It appears that several persons, including a Mrs. Leonard, summoned the police, and that two motorcycle officers, who were in the immediate vicinity, took up the chase. Officer Hansch testified that a number of people ran across the street, saying that there had been a robbery, and that as he called Policeman Bayer and started in pursuit of the fleeing machines, some of those in the crowd indicated the Buick, saying, "That is the car!"; that it was running at the rate of about 55 miles per hour, and when he sounded his siren it increased its speed, but slackened to turn onto Miles street, where it stopped. Hansch stated that as he arrived beside the Buick he discovered two men in the car, and that they at once threw up their hands when they saw him. One of the officers related that at this time he said to Strauss, "This is one stickup job you are not going to get away with," to which Strauss made no reply, but sneered, and that Sciorplate, although present, also made no reply.

It is admitted that the two men arrested in the Buick were the appellants, and that Sciorplate is a large man as compared with Strauss or Russell. Foley's Nash was later found, abandoned, some distance from the scene of the arrest. The verdict indicates that the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants were guilty as charged, and we cannot say that the evidence does not justify that belief. Russell undeniably participated in the robbery. A person corresponding to Sciorplate also took part in it. Russell lived at the same place as Burton. Burton owned the Buick car. This car was the one driven by Strauss and Sciorplate. The conduct of these two appellants is sufficient in itself to convict them. It amounts to more than a confession, and it is corroborated by a number of other incriminating circumstances. The jury were justified in believing that at the time of the robbery the Buick was waiting on Forty-Fifth street opposite the garage; its presence and appearance there has no other reasonable explanation. When it arrived is not shown, but it stood in a convenient location for the use to which it appears to have been put, and its shades were drawn—a circumstance no doubt regarded by the jury as unusual and suspicious. A man of Sciorplate's size participated in the robbery. He rode out of the garage on the running board of the stolen Nash, in the direction of where the Buick was parked, necessarily going in close proximity to the latter, and immediately Sciorplate was with Strauss in the Buick car. This is an inevitable inference from the other circumstances. The last-named car with Strauss driving, as he would naturally do if he had been waiting for Sciorplate, at once started up and followed the Nash so closely as to suggest extreme hazard considering that both cars were traveling at the rate of 55 miles per hour. Bearing in mind that the evidence indicates as clearly as it could without the testimony of any eyewitness to the fact, that Sciorplate had transferred from the Nash to the Buick and that he and Strauss were undoubtedly acting in concert, the credulity of the court is indeed challenged when it is asked to believe that this pursuit was innocent and not intended to assist in the escape of Russell with the Nash car, or when we are asked to say that a jury of reasonable men should have entertained a reasonable doubt that such was the case. It surely was not a mere coincidence that Strauss drove the Buick car at the rate of 55 miles an hour, keeping it within 7 to 10 feet behind the Nash which had just been stolen.

The only logical deduction appears to be that these appellants and Russell planned a scheme to evade capture should pursuit of the Nash be made. The system evidently adopted might well have proven successful but for certain circumstances whose happening they failed to foresee. The Buick car was the property of Burton; the appellants' right to its possession could not be questioned, for Burton and Russell lived at the same address and Burton undoubtedly had loaned the car, possibly knowing to what use it was to be put. At any rate, they were secure in the knowledge that he would uphold them in their assertion that their driving this machine was entirely with the consent of the owner. By driving it at an excessive speed they might reasonably expect to attract the attention of pursuers to themselves as the possible robbers, and thus shield the Nash and its driver by distracting attention from the latter. This they did, then, allowing the Nash to round a corner in advance, Strauss stopped, running his car in to the curb. It could fairly be expected that the officers, supposing that they had overtaken the stolen automobile and the robbers, would make no further pursuit or search. Two persons only committed the robbery, and there were two in the Buick when it allowed itself to be overhauled. Russell in the Nash might reasonably have been thought to have thus been given a clear chance to make his getaway. It is probable that Strauss and Sciorplate, confident that they could not eventually be connected with the robbery, acted with deliberation at this time in giving an appearance of guilt. At any rate, their conduct was most suspicious and damaging to them, as events finally terminated. They at once, and without being asked to do so, put their hands up as a token of surrender, and advanced toward the officers. This is not the demeanor of men conscious of having done no wrong; it is not the conduct of men who have merely committed the offense of violating a minor regulation, such, for instance, as a traffic ordinance. But their incriminating conduct was emphasized by their failure to deny the accusation of having committed a felony which was involved in the officer's statement, to Strauss, in Sciorplate's presence, that "this is one stickup job you are not going to get away with." And yet, without further connection with the robbery, doubtless appellants would have been liberated. They might well have felt secure when the police learned that the car which had been stolen was not a Buick but a Nash and that Burton, the owner of the Buick, knew of and had consented to Strauss and Sciorplate driving his car, they could be charged with no more serious offense than speeding, and in the meantime Russell would have had ample time to escape with the Nash. But the officers insisted upon knowing more about the men whom they had apprehended. In answer to questions Strauss told where he lived. The officers went there accompanied by Mrs. Strauss, entered the apartment, and found the Los Angeles telephone number of a Mr. Burton whom they located, and who proved to be the owner of the Buick car; but Strauss had said that Burton was in Kansas City, and that he (Strauss) had borrowed the car there, and had driven it to Los Angeles. An innocent man would have had no occasion to have falsified as to Burton's whereabouts, or in any other manner. However, the reason for this becomes apparent when we consider that Russell, who had the stolen property in his possession lived at the same place where Burton resided. Of course, Strauss knew that if Burton were located Russell would be almost instantly taken into custody; in conformity with the canny philosophy of Burns, "The best laid plans o' mice and men gang oft agley," their scheme would be punctured and would collapse, and this happened. Bayer and Hansch, the arresting officers, located the address of Burton by the telephone number, went there, and found Russell standing on the front porch, and Foley's diamond ring, and the guns, offered in evidence at the trial, were found in his room. The jury had submitted to its consideration the fact that the appellants, having the Buick car parked with curtains drawn in the immediate vicinity of the robbery, had at once fled, and when given the siren by pursuing officers, had continued their flight; that they had not denied guilt when called upon to do so; that they had so conducted themselves as to be subject to the charge of having intentionally aided in the escape of Russell driving the purloined Nash; that they had falsified in statements to the officers, and were shown to have directly maintained connection with Burton, and indirectly with Russell. These facts are amply sufficient to sustain the verdicts, and there are others which might be pointed out of lesser import, but nevertheless adding certainty, almost to the point of demonstration, to the conclusion already fairly reached.

[3,4] The jury were properly instructed that all persons concerned in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, though not present, are guilty as principals; and that unless they were convinced by the evidence before them to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the appellants did aid and abet in the commission of the offense, they should acquit them. The evidence upon which the verdicts in question were based is largely circumstantial, but as was said in People v. Muhly, 15 Cal. App. 416, 114 P. 1017:

"It rarely happens that circumstances attending the commission of a crime may not, in the opinion of the reviewing court, reasonably be susceptible of an interpretation compatible with the innocence of the person associated with such circumstances; and if one after another of the alleged incriminatory circumstances may be eliminated, they would necessarily cease to have any probative force considered collectively.

"* * * As we understand the Staples Case [149 Cal. 405, 425, 86 P. 886], the rule there laid down followed an analysis of the evidence from which the court was authorized to conclude that there was no evidence warranting the verdict. We do not understand that case to hold that where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify the inference of guilt, the case will be taken from the jury because an inference of innocence might also reasonably have been drawn. Between these two inferences the jury must choose, and it is only where the evidence obviously does not warrant the inference of guilt that the court will interfere."

It was also held in People v. Martinez, 20 Cal. App. 343, 128 P. 952, that where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify the inference of guilt, as found by the jury, the fact that an inference of innocence might likewise be reasonably drawn therefrom does not present a question of law for review by an appellate court, any more than does a verdict based upon direct conflicting evidence; that in neither case will the verdict be disturbed.

[5] It is further insisted that Wilkerson, having immediately regained possession of the money taken from him by Russell, was not robbed, and that therefore a conviction upon the second count of the information was unauthorized. He was ordered out of the automobile, held up at the point of a revolver, and his money taken from him, as alleged, by force and against his will. Had Russell kept the $3, there would have been no dispute upon this point; but it is urged that the robber returned the money to his victim, and that therefore he committed no offense. Russell's generosity seems to have been smitten only by the small amount and Wilkerson's remark that it was all the money that he had, but the appellants seek to mitigate the offense upon the fact of recovery, rather than to explain their counsel and support of one who went prepared to kill had the amount been larger and its theft been met with resistance.

The question presented has heretofore been considered and decided in this state. In People v. Anderson, 59 Cal. App. 408, 211 P. 254, the defendants were charged with having robbed another of a bill of sale to an automobile, a gold watch, money, and other property; Anderson compelled the victim to assign the bill of sale to his machine to the robber, but returned it to him. It was there said:

"Nor does the fact that the defendants returned the property to Litts of itself relieve their act in taking it of the stigma of criminality. It was for the jury to consider that circumstance with the other circumstances in the case in determining the question of guilt or innocence."

In McGinty v. State, 97 Ga. 368, 23 S. E. 831, it was held that—

"Where the offense of robbery is once actually completed by the felonious and violent taking of property from the person of another into the possession of the thief, it cannot be purged by any subsequent redelivery of the property to the owner; and this is true although the thief may have retained possession but a short length of time. 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, §§ 1161, 1163; 2 Russell, Crimes, 104, and cases cited."

The evidence was therefore clearly sufficient to establish the crime charged in the second count, and the return of the money did not have the effect of relieving the defendants of criminal liability.

[6] None of the defendants took the stand, but the trial court gave the following instruction, which appellants contend was reversible error:

"You are instructed that while the defendant in a criminal action is not required to take the stand and testify, yet if he does so, his credibility, and the value and effect of his evidence are to be weighed and determined by the same rules as the credibility and effect and value of the evidence of any other witness is determined."

It is contended that the court, thus, in effect, singled out the defendants for special comment upon a matter which was nonexistent, and yet must have conveyed to the jury the impression that, by failing to take the witness stand, they were not willing to subject themselves to the same rules as those governing the credibility and effect and value of the evidence of any other witness. A general instruction also was given, wherein the jury were told that they were the exclusive judges of the credibility of witnesses, and that the character of witnesses should be taken into consideration in determining their credibility and the facts, as to whether or not they had spoken the truth; that a witness is presumed to speak the truth, but that such presumption may be repelled by the manner in which he testified, his interest in the case, if any, or by evidence affecting his character for truth, honesty, and integrity, or by contradictory evidence. It is argued that coupling the two instructions results in charging matters which have been criticized upon appeal even where a defendant testified. People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 P. 187, is quoted as supporting this contention. There the defendant took the witness stand, and an instruction was given, expressly stating to the jury that—

"Where the defendant offers himself as a witness, in determining his credibility, it is proper to take into consideration the consequences, inducements, and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation."

In other words, it was indicated that the defendant's interest in the case might be expected to cast a doubt upon the credibility of his testimony. The Supreme Court said that it had previously been told "that it is difficult, logically, to attribute the giving of such an instruction to anything other than a purpose to expressly disparage the defendant, 'the very thing that a court has no authority to do, in view of our constitutional provision.'" People v. Emmons, 13 Cal. App. 487, 110 P. 151, is also relied upon. There, the defendant did not take the stand, but the jury were instructed that if the defendant offered himself as a witness he might be cross-examined by counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief. It was said that since it was not a question for the jury as to what could be done had the defendant taken the stand, there appeared to be no conceivable occasion which could arise during a criminal trial for giving an instruction upon this point. Since the defendant in that case did not testify, it was held that the instruction could only be regarded as a suggestion that the only probable reason he did not do so was because, in that event, he might have been cross-examined. It will be observed that the court further instructed the jury that the defendant's "neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him or be used against him on the trial or proceeding." The reasoning of the opinions in these cases hardly applies with equal force to the instruction before us, and yet we have no doubt that under the circumstances here involved its giving was technically an error. The defendant had not offered himself as a witness, and did not testify; there was no occasion or justification for any instruction upon that point unless, if requested, to have informed the jury that the defendant is not required to testify and that his failure to do so must not prejudice him in any way. To go further and add comment upon any consequences which might follow had the defendant chosen to become a witness is to create in the minds of the jury at least a question as to whether or not his not having testified might be attributed to a desire upon his part to avoid such consequences; that is, not to have his evidence weighed and determined by the same rules as that of other witnesses.

However, we consider this a proper case for the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of this state. The evidence of the defendants' guilt is so convincing that we do not think the jury could reasonably have arrived at any other conclusion, even if the erroneous instruction mentioned had not been given. A careful reading of the entire record satisfies us that no miscarriage of justice can result from affirming the judgments from which appeals are here taken.

[7] One other point remains to be considered. It appears that the officer, Brown, was permitted to testify that at Strauss' apartment he found written on a piece of paper the following memoranda: "Mr. Burton, Atlantic 6206." He also stated that he called "Information," and that "that telephone was registered to M. C. Jackson, 319 East Sixteenth street." Before this testimony was given, appellants' counsel objected on the grounds that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial. After a part of the answer had been given, the same objection was repeated, with the additional ground stated that the answer was not responsive to the question.

The first statement made by the officer, that he had found a piece of paper lying on top of the telephone, bearing the writing "Mr. Burton, Atlantic 6206," was clearly admissible; it may be that the rest of the statement made by him should have been excluded as hearsay, but no objection was made upon that ground. All of this evidence was competent, relevant, and very material. This is apparent from our discussion of the evidence bearing upon a point previously considered. It is noteworthy also that the judge, in overruling the objections, remarked that he did not know at that time whether or not the testimony would be admissible, but that it could be stricken out in case it should be found to be objectionable. No motion to strike was made.

[8] The appeals from orders denying the motions in arrest of judgment are dismissed, since such orders are not appealable. People v. Peery, 26 Cal. App. 143, 146 P. 44; People v. Mooney, 132 Cal. 13, 63 P. 1070; People v. Matuszewski, 138 Cal. 533, 71 P. 701; People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 86 P. 1100. The orders denying appellants' motions for new trial are affirmed, and the judgments are affirmed.

HEEP v. BOHAN. (Civ. 5274.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 19, 1925.)

1. Assault and battery ☞35—Evidence held sufficient to support judgment for plaintiff in action for assault.

In action for assault where plaintiff was pushed from defendant's place of business, evidence held sufficient to support judgment for plaintiff.

2. Appeal and error ☞1001(2)—Where evidence sufficient to support judgment, appellate court's opinion as to weight of evidence not ground for reversal.

That appellate court believed evidence preponderated against verdict is no ground for reversal, if substantial evidence supports judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas O. Toland, Judge.

Action by F. H. Heep against E. R. Bohan. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Waters, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

I. R. Rubin and M. G. C. Harris, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of $300 against him in an action for damages for assault. The defendant was in the business of selling paints, and the plaintiff was a builder. Plaintiff had engaged a third person to do some painting on a building which he was constructing and claimed to have paid such third person for his work and the materials used. The materials were supplied, however, by defendant, who caused a lien to be placed upon the building for their value. Plaintiff went to the place of business of the defendant and attempted to compromise with him upon his claim. He explained to the defendant that he had paid the painting contractor and should not have to pay the bill twice. Defendant declined to suffer any loss or to sacrifice his right to a lien. The plaintiff became angry and said, in effect, that he would take the matter up with the district attorney, whereupon defendant ordered him to leave the place.

The evidence of what happened thereafter is conflicting. Plaintiff states that defendant pushed him toward the door, and after he had reached the sidewalk pushed him again, and that he twisted himself in attempting to avoid an anticipated blow, thereby causing injury to his groin from which he suffered severely for several weeks. There is also testimony of a physician that the plaintiff came to him suffering from an injury to the groin on the day of the assault, and that he treated him for several weeks and made a charge of $70 for his services; that such an injury cannot be completely relieved for several months.

[1] This testimony, of course, supports the judgment and really ends the inquiry of this court, for appellant's claim is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the judgment. The defendant admitted placing his hands upon plaintiff and giving him a slight push as he was leaving his store after being ordered out, but contends that the pressure exerted was very slight, and maintains that he never touched plaintiff after he reached the sidewalk, which latter occasion is the one when plaintiff states he suffered injury. In this testimony defendant is corroborated by several witnesses who were in the store at the time.

[2] If we should be disposed to agree with the defendant that the evidence preponderates in his favor, that would not entitle him to a reversal of this judgment. It is not our function to weigh the evidence and decide upon its preponderance; our power with reference to the facts ends upon finding in the record substantial evidence which, if taken as true, would support the judgment. We have pointed out such evidence in this case, and the judgment must be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

LAKE et al. v. HARRIS, Judge of Superior Court. (S. F. 11642.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ☞553(1)—Trial judge must authenticate all papers which are not subject to certification by clerk and essential to determination of appeal notwithstanding there was no reporter present at hearing (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Appellant may proceed on appeal by the alternative method under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, notwithstanding there was no reporter present at hearing of motion or other proceeding, and it is duty of trial judge to authenticate all papers, records, and files which are not subject to certification solely by the clerk, and which are essential to proper determination of appeal.

2. Appeal and error ☞607(1).

Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, as amended by St 1915, p. 206, § 1, authorizes preparation of a record under that section, even when appeal is on the judgment roll alone.

3. Appeal and error ☞117—Order of trial judge striking his certificate from clerk's transcript held not an appealable order.

Where, on appeal, in attempted compliance with Supreme Court rules, § 7, subd. 2, record was prepared in two parts, and certain nonappealable orders were made part of clerk's transcript, which was certified by both clerk and judge, later order of the trial judge striking his certificate from the clerk's transcript held not an appealable order.

4. Appeal and error ⚡82(1)—Special order, made after final judgment, to be appealable, must affect judgment in some manner (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2).

In order that a special order, made after final judgment as contemplated by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, be appealable, such order must affect the judgment in some manner or bear some relation to it, either by way of enforcing it or staying its execution.

5. Appeal and error ⚡571.

Trial judge will not be required to certify record on appeal from an order which is not appealable.

6. Appeal and error ⚡571—Mandamus is proper remedy to compel trial judge to properly authenticate portion of appeal record which could not be certified by clerk.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel trial judge to properly authenticate that portion of record which could not be certified by clerk; clerk being competent only to certify judgment roll and notice of appeal.

Application by Fannie D. Lake and others for writ of mandate to compel T. W. Harris, as Judge of the Superior Court in and for Alameda County, to authenticate a transcript on appeal. Demurrer sustained, and proceeding dismissed.

Anson Hilton, of San Francisco, and Fred W. Lake, of Oakland, for petitioners.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

SHENK, J. Application for writ of mandate to compel the respondent to authenticate a transcript on appeal. Upon the filing of the petition an order was issued requiring the respondent to show cause, if any he had, why an alternative writ of mandate should not issue. No alternative writ has been issued. The matter is submitted on a general demurrer to the petition.

It appears that in an action in ejectment in the superior court in and for the county of Alameda, wherein the Central Savings Bank of Oakland was plaintiff and the petitioners herein were defendants, a judgment was rendered and entered against said defendants and their appeal therefrom is pending in this court. In due time the defendants filed with the clerk of the superior court a notice to prepare the record on appeal. The notice requested the preparation of a transcript of "the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, acts or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate," as provided for in section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. In attempted compliance with the requirements of subdivision 2 of section 7 of the rules of this court the record was prepared in two parts. One was designated the reporter's transcript, in which was incorporated only the phonographic report of the trial. The respondent judge, on the 17th day of September, 1924, certified to the truth and correctness of that transcript.

Prior to the trial certain proceedings were had and taken and certain nonappealable orders of the court were made, the records of which proceedings and motions, consisting of some 21 items, were specially designated by said defendants in their notice to the clerk for inclusion in the record to be prepared. These 21 items were not included in the reporter's transcript, but were set forth in the second part of said record, called the clerk's transcript, in which was also embodied the judgment roll and notices of appeal. This so-called clerk's transcript was also certified by the respondent judge as being true and correct. Both of said transcripts were filed in this court on October 28, 1924, as the record on appeal. Thereafter on the 30th day of March, 1925, counsel for the respondent bank filed in the superior court a notice of suggestion of diminution of record and of a motion to strike from the said clerk's transcript the 21 items referred to and to cancel the certificate of the respondent judge appended to said clerk's transcript on the grounds, among others, "that if any occasion existed for the inclusion of such matters or things in the record on appeal, such matters and things should have been included in the reporter's transcript on appeal; that, although said clerk's transcript on appeal was presented to the court for authentication and certification, the clerk gave no notice to counsel for plaintiff of the fact of such presentation"; that they had no notice that the same were included in the clerk's transcript until March 3, 1925; and that the court erred in executing its certificate, in that the said clerk's transcript was duly certified by the clerk, and that there was and is no authority in law for the certification of the clerk's transcript by the trial judge. Thereafter, on May 2, 1925, the respondent judge granted said motion in part, in this, that he made an order canceling his said certificate, setting forth in said order as the reason for such cancellation:

"That there is no provision of law requiring or authorizing the trial judge to certify the clerk's transcript on appeal, and that the certificate to said clerk's transcript on appeal was executed by the undersigned judge of the superior court [respondent here] through inadvertence. * * *

Thereafter, on the same day, to wit, May 2, 1925, the defendants in the said action, petitioners herein, filed their notice of appeal from the order last above mentioned, referring to the same as an "order after final judgment," and concurrently therewith filed a notice with said clerk requesting that a transcript of the proceedings on said motion for diminution be prepared pursuant to said section 953a. The respondent judge refuses to certify said transcript, first, on the ground that said order is not an appealable order; and, secondly, on the ground that no record can be made up, allowed, or certified in any case or upon any appeal under said section 953a unless a reporter was present at the hearing of the motion or other matter passed upon.

[1] Considering the grounds of refusal in their reverse order, it must be taken as settled that where there is no office for the reporter to perform at the hearing of a motion or other proceeding, and consequently there is no reporter present, nevertheless the appellant may proceed under the alternative method, and it is the duty of the trial judge to authenticate all papers, records, and files which are not subject to certification solely by the clerk, and which are essential to a proper determination of the appeal. Pierce v. Works, 154 P. 852, 171 Cal. 684. The case of Allen v. Conrey, 134 P. 730, 22 Cal. App. 409, relied on by the respondent, was decided before the amendment to section 953a in 1915. By that amendment the scope of the section was enlarged so as to permit an appellant to have the record prepared thereunder; also:

"For the purpose of presenting a record on appeal from any appealable judgment or order, or for the purpose of having reviewed any matter or order reviewable on appeal from final judgment." Stats. 1915, p. 206.

[2] The effect of the amendment was to authorize the preparation of a record under that section, even when the appeal is on the judgment roll alone. See opinion of Supreme Court appended to McKinnell v. Hansen, 167 P. 887, 34 Cal. App. 81, in denying petition for rehearing; also Beckett v. Stuart, 171 P. 107, 35 Cal. App. 796; Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, 194 Cal. 73, 227 P. 715. It is competent for the clerk to certify only the judgment roll and the notice of appeal (Jeffords v. Young [Cal. Sup.] 239 P. 1054; 2 Cal. Jur. 666); and the judge may refuse to certify the clerk's transcript when it comprises only those documents (Christenson Lumber Co. v. Seawell, 108 P. 276, 157 Cal. 405).

[3-5] As to the first ground of refusal, we think the contention of the respondent that the order striking his certificate from the said clerk's transcript was not an appealable order must be sustained. In order that a special order, made after final judgment, as contemplated by subdivision 2 of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, be appealable, such order must affect the judgment in some manner or bear some relation to it either by way of enforcing it or staying its execution. Griess v. State Investment, etc., Co., 28 P. 1041, 93 Cal. 411; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 69

P. 497, 136 Cal. 675; Watson v. Pryor, 193 P. 797, 49 Cal. App. 554; 2 Cal. Jur. 153. The order striking said certificate is but an order in an ancillary or procedural matter prescribed by statute in connection with the preparation of a record on appeal and the making thereof neither added to nor subtracted from the relief granted by the judgment. It is obvious that to compel the respondent judge to certify a record on appeal from an order which is not appealable would be to require a vain and useless thing. This is not the proper function of the writ of mandamus. 16 Cal. Jur. 777, and cases cited.

[6] But it would not follow that because the order striking the certificate is not appealable the petitioners would be without remedy. It was the plain duty of the respondent under the statute on an appeal from the judgment to properly authenticate that portion of the record which could not be certified by the clerk and, as above stated, the clerk is competent to certify only the judgment roll and the notice of appeal. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the trial judge to perform that duty. Schmitt v. White, 158 P. 216, 172 Cal. 554; Waymire v. California Trona Co., 168 P. 563, 176 Cal. 395, 399; 16 Cal. Jur. 831, 832, and cases cited. The difficulties arising in this controversy resulted from at least two deviations from the prescribed practice. First, it was the duty of the stenographic reporter under section 953a to include in the reporter's transcript, in addition to the stenographic report of the trial, "all other matters and things required by the notice" of the appellants to the clerk. This he did not do for he omitted to include therein said 21 several items specified in the notice. And, second, the clerk improperly included in the transcript certified by him the said items which it was not competent for him to certify.

While it may be said that the appellants should not be prejudiced because of mistakes on the part of the reporter and the clerk, since it does not appear that the appellants were in anywise at fault, it may also be said that the respondents should have the opportunity, after notice, to object to the inclusion of the said 21 items or any of them before the same are authenticated by the trial judge as a part of the reporter's transcript, and it appears that they have not had such notice. If the question of the authentication of the record on appeal from the judgment were rightfully before us, it would undoubtedly be proper in the present proceeding to require the trial judge to cause all items specified in the notice to the clerk and not embraced within the judgment roll and notice of appeal to be included in the reporter's transcript and, after notice, to authenticate such transcript. For that purpose an appropriate order could be made by this court transmitting the transcript to the trial court; but, as the question of the authentication of the record on the appeal from the judgment is not presented herein, we deem it improper to issue a writ for the purpose of compelling an authentication of that record. The foregoing suggestion is made to the end that petitioners may take proper proceedings if they be so advised. So far as the present petition is concerned, the demurrer is sustained, and the proceeding is dismissed.

Ex parte GARBUTT. (Cr. 2875.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 26, 1926.)

1. Criminal law — Statute authorizing reimposing death sentence after appeal, in absence of defendant, held valid.

Pen. Code, § 1193, as amended by St. 1923, p. 626, § 1, providing death sentence may be reimposed, in absence of defendant, where judgment imposing death sentence, which had been stayed by appeal, was affirmed, held valid, not depriving defendant of any substantial rights.

2. Criminal law — Statute authorizing appointing day of execution, in absence of defendant, held valid.

Pen. Code, § 1227, as amended by St. 1923, p. 627, § 2, authorizing court, in absence of defendant, to appoint day of execution, where judgment of death remains in force, but has not been executed, held valid, not depriving defendant of any substantial rights.

Application by Harry Garbutt for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the warden of Folsom State Prison, to secure release of petitioner. Writ denied.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli and Walter F. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Harry Garbutt, in whose behalf this application for a writ of habeas corpus is urged, was convicted of murder in the first degree, and the death penalty was imposed. On appeal to this court, the conviction was affirmed. People v. Garbutt, 239 P. 1080. Upon the going down of the remittitur, the trial court followed the procedure prescribed in sections 1193 and 1227 of the Penal Code as amended in 1923, and "reimposed" sentence upon the defendant without requiring him to be again brought before the court for that purpose. The defendant is now confined in the state prison at Folsom, awaiting execution on the date fixed.

[1, 2] It is urged in support of the petition now filed that sections 1193 and 1227 of the Penal Code as amended are unconstitutional and void, in that they permit the trial court to confer particular privileges and impose peculiar restrictions and disabilities upon a class arbitrarily selected from a larger number of persons, all of whom stand in the same relation to the privileges granted and burdens imposed, and between whom and the persons not so favored or burdened no reasonable distinction or substantial difference can be found justifying the inclusion of one and the exclusion of the other. Otherwise stated, the point is that, under the sections supra, the trial court is given the power either to have the defendant personally present when sentence of death is reimposed or to reimpose sentence of death during the absence of the defendant.

On behalf of petitioner several decisions of this court have been cited, among them People v. Sprague, 54 Cal. 92, and People v. Sing Lum, 61 Cal. 538. These cases hold that, by the provisions of the sections supra, as they stood at the time the opinions were handed down, the Legislature conferred upon a defendant the right to be present in court when the order for his execution was made. The identical situation presented by the present petition was considered by this court in Re Application of Spagnoli for a Writ of Habeas Corpus for Isaac Wolfgang, 193 Cal. 472, 225 P. 274, and it was held that the amendment of the sections did not deprive the defendant of any substantial rights. On a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, the decision of this court was affirmed. Wolfgang v. California, 46 S. Ct. 206, 70 L. Ed. —, January 25, 1926.

The petition is denied.

KLEIN v. MILNE et al. (L. A. 8131.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1926.)

1. Trial — 395(5)—Finding probative facts upon which ultimate facts as to negligence were deduced held unnecessary.

Where driver of automobile attempted to pass another while meeting a third, and all three cars were damaged in collision, in action in which each driver alleged negligence of other two, finding that only one driver was negligent was sufficient to respond to issues of negligence; it not being necessary to also find on probative facts from which ultimate facts were deduced.

2. Trial — 395(5)—Amount of damage to automobile held ultimate fact to be deduced from evidence.

In action for damages to automobile, where evidence showed nature and extent of injury and expense of repair work which had been paid, finding that car was damaged to extent of certain sum corresponding to evidence held sufficient; amount of such damage being ultimate fact to be deduced from evidence.

3. Trial — 395(3)—Complainant specifying items of damage entitled to special finding.

Where complainant or cross-complainant pleads both general and special damages, speci-firing items wherein each consists, and they are put specifically in issue, such complainants are entitled to special findings on issues as presented, in order that they may point out precise errors of trial court on motion for new trial or appeal.

4. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 396(2)—Finding lump sum as damages held error, where one item thereof unsupported by evidence.

Where cross-complainant, in action occasioned by collision of three automobiles, alleged several items of damage, including one of damage to his car, but evidence furnished no basis for finding as to such damage, finding of lump sum to constitute amount of recovery was error, since any allowance included therein for damage to car would be unsupported by evidence.

5. Damages $\hookrightarrow$ 188(2)—Evidence held insufficient to furnish basis for finding of damages.

Where cross-complainant, in action occasioned by collision of three automobiles, alleged damage to his car, his statement, admitted over objection, that car "was of no value to me in the condition that it was whatever," would furnish no basis for finding as to amount of such damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by E. A. Klein against Florence B. Milne and others, in which William L. Hovis and others filed cross-complaints. From the judgment, Florence B. Milne and another appeal. Affirmed as to plaintiff, and reversed as to cross-complainant Hovis.

W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, G. E. Sandford, of San Francisco, and Chas. N. Sears, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

A. J. O'Brien, F. W. Murphy, and C. C. Legerton, all of San Francisco, for cross-complainants.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff commenced this action against the defendants and each of them to recover damages for injuries to a certain Nash automobile received in a collision upon the state highway near Kingsburg, county of Fresno, state of California, on or about December 23, 1921. In his first amended complaint the plaintiff alleged that at said time and place his said automobile was being driven and operated by the defendants J. C. May and wife, on and along the highway going in a northerly direction; that the defendant Florence B. Milne was at said time and place the owner and possessor of a certain Chevrolet automobile, and was driving and operating the same along said highway going in a southerly direction; that at said time and place the defendant William L. Hovis was the owner and in possession of a certain Overland automobile, and was driving and operating the same upon said highway following the said Chevrolet car, and hence also going in a southerly direction; that, as the said Chevrolet and Nash cars approached each other along said highway, the said Florence Milne so negligently drove and operated her said Chevrolet car as to drive the same to the east of the center of said highway at a rate of speed in excess of 35 miles an hour; that at the same time the said William L. Hovis, as the said Overland and Nash cars approached each other, attempted to pass the said Nash and Chevrolet cars as they were passing each other, and in so doing so carelessly and negligently drove and operated his said overland car as not to allow a safe distance between said Overland and Chevrolet cars, and also at said time and place drove and operated the same at an excessive rate of speed, to wit, in excess of 35 miles an hour; that the defendants J. C. May and wife, also at said time and place, so negligently and carelessly drove and operated said Nash car that said Chevrolet car and said Overland car, by reason of the negligence and carelessness of each of said defendants, then and there collided with and against the said Nash car, and broke and damaged the same in the specific parts thereof enumerated in the complaint, to the plaintiff's damage in the sums set forth in his said complaint aggregating in excess of $800, for which he seeks a recovery against all of said defendants.

The defendants answered separately, denying negligence and liability to the plaintiff, respectively. The defendant Hovis accompanied his answer with a cross-complaint against the plaintiff and also each of his codefendants, Milne, husband and wife, and May, husband and wife, wherein he averred that the cross-defendants Milne were negligent in the operation of their Chevrolet automobile at the time of said collision whereby both his machine and himself were injured and suffered damages as specifically set forth therein; that the cross-defendants May were at the time of said collision acting as the agents of said plaintiff, Klein, in the operation of the Nash automobile owned by the latter; and that as such the Mays were negligent at the time of said collision; and that both they and their principal, Klein, were liable to said cross-complainant Hovis for the injuries to himself and his machine sustained thereby. Wherefore, the said cross-complainant Hovis prayed judgment against each and all of said cross-defendants for the sum of $5,734.46. The defendant Florence B. Milne also accompanied her answer to the plaintiff Klein's complaint with a cross-complaint against the latter, and also against her codefendants May, for damages to her machine in the sum of $165. To each of these cross-complaints answers were filed, and, the issues being thus made up, the cause proceeded to trial before the court sitting without a jury. At the close of the trial the court permitted the plaintiff to file a further amendment to his complaint to conform to the proofs, and, by stipulation, the answers thereto filed were deemed answers thereto. Thereupon the cause was submitted for decision, and the trial court in due course filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein, after finding the ownership of the respective automobiles to be as averred in the pleadings, it proceeded to find that the defendants Milne so carelessly and negligently operated their Chevrolet car as to collide with and damage the plaintiff's Nash car to the extent and in the sum of $553.90, and also to collide with and damage the defendant and cross-complainant Hovis and also his Overland car to the extent and in the sum of $786.50. The court further found that the defendant Hovis was not negligent at said time and place in the operation of his Overland car; and further found that the defendants May were not negligent at said time and place in the operation of the plaintiff's Nash car.

As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact, the court found that the plaintiff, Klein, was entitled to judgment against the defendant Florence B. Milne for the sum of $553.90, but that, as to the defendants May and Hovis, the plaintiff, Klein, was entitled to take nothing; that the cross-complainant William Hovis was entitled to judgment against the cross-defendants Florence B. Milne and William Milne for the sum of $786.50, but that as against the plaintiff, Klein, and the cross-defendants May he was entitled to take nothing; that the defendants May were entitled to their costs. Judgment was entered accordingly, and from such judgment the cross-defendants Milne only appeal.

[1, 2] The respondents herein have not seen fit to aid this court with any briefs or any argument upon this appeal. The appellants make several contentions. As to their contention that the findings of the trial court, as to the negligence or lack of negligence of the respective parties to the action, are insufficient to respond to the issues presented respectively as to negligence, we are of the opinion that they are each and all without merit. The trial court found clearly and tersely the ultimate facts as to the negligence or want of negligence of the respective parties at the time and place of said collision in the operation of their respective cars. It was not necessary to also find upon the probative facts from which the court deduced the ultimate facts as to the negligence or want of it of the participants in the collision. The appellants make the further contention that, as to the plaintiff, Klein, the finding that his car was damaged to the extent and in the sum of $553.90, is a mere conclusion of law. We do not think so. The amount of such damage and injury was an ultimate fact, to be deduced from the evidence as to wherein such damage consisted. The witness for the plaintiff, May, testified to the details of the injury to the car, the smashed fenders, the injured running board, radiator, and wheels. The witness Sutter also testified as to the extent of the injuries to the plaintiff's car and as to the reasonable cost of the repairs to be made thereon. The finding of the trial court was based upon this and other evidence as to the expense to the plaintiff in making these repairs and that he had paid the bill. The finding corresponded to the foregoing evidence, and was a sufficient finding upon the ultimate facts in issue.

[3-5] A more serious question is presented with respect to the sufficiency of the findings of the trial court with respect to the damages alleged to have been sustained by the cross-complainant Hovis. In his cross-complaint against the appellants herein said Hovis alleges that his automobile, prior to the collision, was of the value of $800 and that by reason of the injuries to it in said collision it was so damaged as to be of the value of but $300. In addition to these general damages to his machine, said cross-complainant also alleges that he suffered special damages by being obliged to hire another car to take himself and wife to a hotel, and being compelled to return to his home by train. These damages he itemizes and places at about $120. In his cross-complaint, said Hovis also alleged that he suffered personal injuries in said collision, the extent of which he details, requiring the services of a physician at an expense of $71.50 and for which personal injuries he demands general damages in the sum of $5,000. The denials of the cross-defendants specifically put in issue these averments as to both the special and the general damages sustained by the cross-complainant Hovis. The findings of the trial court upon the issues thus presented are general and to the effect that Hovis was damaged to the extent of $786.50. We think the trial court was in error in thus making a general finding upon the foregoing separate and specially averred items of damage alleged to have been sustained by the cross-complainant Hovis. Where a complainant or cross-complainant does not in his pleading rely upon a general averment of damages, but pleads both general and special damages, and particularizes the items wherein each consists, and where the defendants or cross-defendants put these specifically in issue, they are entitled to special findings upon the issues as thus presented in order that they may point out the precise errors of the trial court upon motion for a new trial and upon appeal. Franklin v. Franklin, 74 P. 155, 140 Cal. 609; Frascona v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 191 P. 968, 48 Cal. App. 135. The importance of the application of this rule to this particular case consists in the fact that the only evidence which the cross-complainant Hovis presented to the trial court upon the question of the amount of damage to his machine as a result of the collision consisted in his statement, admitted over the cross-defendants' objection, that his car "was of no value to me in the condition that it was whatever." Such a statement would furnish the trial court no proper basis for a finding as to the amount to be awarded the cross-complainant for the injuries to his car; and it would follow that the finding of the lump sum found by the trial court to constitute the amount of the cross-complainant's recovery, if it included any allowance for the damages to his car, would be unsupported by the evidence in the case.

The judgment is affirmed as to the plaintiff, Klein, but is reversed as to the amount there-of awarded to the cross-complainant Hovis.

In re BELL'S ESTATE. (S. F. 11406.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 29, 1926.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡979(2)—New Trial ⚡70—Motion for new trial on conflicting evidence as to heirship held in discretion of court, not reviewable save for abuse.

Proceedings on petition for partial distribution of estate, where will was denied probate on grounds of testator's unsound mind and plaintiff's heirship was contested, held governed by the rule that granting new trial for insufficient evidence to sustain verdict was in court's discretion, and not to be disturbed in absence of showing abuse.

2. New trial ⚡140(3)—Evidence held sufficient to support motion for new trial.

In petition for partial distribution of estate by contested heir, where will was denied probate on grounds of testator's unsound mind, evidence held to support a motion granting other alleged heirs a new trial.

3. Wills ⚡433—Will held admissible as pedigree evidence, and to show testator's regard as to beneficiaries.

In petition for partial distribution of estate, where plaintiff's heirship was contested, it was proper to admit will of deceased over general objection, to show no mention or reference to plaintiff in will, as declarations of testator in last will are admissible both upon question of pedigree and objects of testator's bounty.

4. Evidence ⚡332(7)—Documentary evidence of probate court held admissible to show alleged heir had never been a party thereto.

In application for partial distribution of estate by alleged sole heir, it was proper to admit orders, decrees, and documentary evidence of probate court for limited purpose of showing plaintiff had never been mentioned therein, or a party to any prior probate proceeding.

5. Evidence ⚡383(3)—Documents offered generally and admitted over general objection held in the record for any evidentiary purpose they might serve.

Documents pertaining to probate of estates of plaintiff's alleged parents, being admissible on her claim of heirship and being offered generally and admitted over general objection only, where in record for whatever evidentiary purpose they might subserve, including defendants' claim that the probate proceedings showed plaintiff was estopped to claim heirship.

6. Judgment ⚡735—Proceedings in probate court held not res judicata as to paternity in contested heirship.

Where heirship was contested on application for partial distribution of estate, and records, decrees, and orders in proceedings for probate of will were admitted on question of heirship of plaintiff because she was not mentioned therein, held, such decrees and orders were not res judicata as to paternity of contestants binding on plaintiff, as contestants in the probate proceedings were claiming under the will, and their paternity was not a contested issue.

7. Judgment ⚡958(f)—Failure to instruct as to application of res judicata to probate proceedings held error.

In application by alleged sole heir for partial distribution of estate, where proceedings in probate court were admitted to show alleged sole heir had never been mentioned therein, or a party thereto, it was error for court to refuse instruction that such probate proceedings were not res judicata as to paternity of contestants, an issue not involved in the former proceedings.

8. Evidence ⚡351—Baptismal records held admissible as general evidence as to contested heirship.

In application for partial distribution of estate where heirship was contested, the admission in evidence of baptismal records of church was proper where offered for no limited purpose and objection was only general.

9. Evidence ⚡354(l)—Books of account of college and convent held admissible as general evidence as to contested heirship.

In application for partial distribution of estate where heirship was contested, books of account of denominational college and convent, showing charges for contestant's attendance were made against testator and wife, were properly admitted for general purpose of showing conduct of testator's family, and attitude toward younger members over general objection.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Teresa Bell, deceased. Petition by Viola S. Bell for partial distribution to her, as child of deceased, opposed by Robina Bell Hessel and others. From decree directing partial distribution, and from rulings on motions for new trial, Viola S. Bell appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Rehearing denied; Seawell, J., dissenting.

Leo J. McEnerney and A. L. O'Grady, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

John L. McNab and Bert Schlesinger, both of San Francisco, J. F. Frick, of Lompoc, and J. E. Manning and Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The appellant herein, Viola S. Bell, appeals to this court from certain portions of a decree of the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, in the matter of the estate of Teresa Bell, deceased, and also from two certain orders of said court, the one granting and the other denying certain motions for a new trial in respect to the particular proceeding wherein said decree had been entered and said orders made. In order to an intelligent understanding of the situation, and of the parties, and of the matters presented for consideration upon this appeal, the following preliminary statement is required: Thomas Bell died in the city of San Francisco on October 16, 1892, being at that time a resident of said city and leaving a large estate therein and in other portions of the state of California which he distributed among the beneficiaries named in his will. He left as his surviving widow Teresa Bell, to whom by his will he devised a considerable portion of his said estate. He devised to certain other persons, whom he designated by name therein and called his children, the remainder of his said estate. The said will of Thomas Bell was duly admitted to probate, and thereafter by decrees of both partial and final distribution the estate was distributed to the devisees named therein; the said decree of final distribution being made and entered on or about the 8th day of June, 1917. By the terms of these several decrees, Teresa Bell, his widow, came into the ownership and possession of a large estate. Teresa Bell died on the 11th day of August, 1922. She left a will and several codicils thereto, which will with its codicils was presented for probate in the superior court of said city and county by the executors named therein on August 18, 1922. The admission to probate of said will of Teresa Bell and the several codicils thereto was opposed by several contestants who claimed to be children and heirs of Teresa Bell (but of which contestants the appellant herein was not one), and as a result of such contests and of a trial thereon the said will of Teresa Bell and each of the codicils thereof were found and decreed to be invalid, and the same were denied probate upon the ground that Teresa Bell at the time of the execution thereof was of unsound mind. Thereafter and on March 23, 1923, E. J. Talbott was appointed special administrator of the estate of Teresa Bell, deceased. On October 17, 1923, Viola S. Bell, the appellant herein, filed her petition for the partial distribution to her of a portion of said estate, alleging herself to be a child and next of kin of said decedent. To this petition of the appellant herein an opposition was filed by Robina Bell Hessel, Thomas Frederick Bell, Reginald Bell, and Muriel Bell Hoster; and also by Reginald Bell and Dorothy Bell, as executor and executrix, respectively, of the last will and testament of Eustace Bell, deceased; and also by Dorothy Bell as guardian of the person and estate of Eustace Bell, Jr., a minor. The opposition of these last-named persons to the granting of the said petition of Viola S. Bell was based upon their denial that said Viola S. Bell was either a daughter or an heir of Teresa Bell, deceased, or was entitled to any portion of her estate; and was also based upon the affirmative plea that Viola S. Bell was estopped to claim such relationship and heirship. In support of said last-named plan, said contestants set forth in hæc verba certain records, orders, and decrees in the matter of the estate of Thomas Bell and also of Teresa Bell, deceased, theretofore made and entered and of the making, entry, and effect of which it was alleged that Viola S. Bell had at all times full knowledge. Coupled with their said opposition to the granting of the petition of Viola S. Bell, the said persons also presented and filed their joint petition for the partial distribution of a portion of the estate of said Teresa Bell, deceased, to them and each of them as the sole surviving children and heirs, or representatives of a deceased child and heir, of Teresa Bell. To the foregoing opposition to her said petition Viola S. Bell filed an answer denying the averments thereof; and also filed an opposition to the petition of the above-named persons for partial distribution to them of any portion of said estate, which said opposition was based upon her denial that Thomas Frederick Bell, Muriel Bell Hoster, Robina Bell Hessel, Reginald Bell, or either or any of them, was a child or heir at law of said Teresa Bell, deceased, and upon her averment that Thomas Bell and Teresa Bell were husband and wife; that Thomas Bell died intestate in the year 1892, leaving estate which was the common property of Teresa Bell and Thomas Bell; that Thomas Bell left surviving him as his next of kin and heirs at law his wife, Teresa Bell, and one child, namely, Viola S. Bell.

Other petitions for partial distribution were filed by various persons claiming a right thereto, to all of which, in so far as they disputed the right of Viola S. Bell to a share in said estate as the daughter and heir of said decedent, she filed answers putting in issue the averments thereof. When the pleadings were thus made up and the particular issues thus presented were ready for trial, the said Viola S. Bell demanded and was accorded a jury trial thereon, and such trial was had upon the following six special issues submitted to the jury, to wit:

"Is Thomas Frederick Bell a child of Teresa Bell, deceased? Is Robina Bell Hessel a child of Teresa Bell, deceased? Is Reginald Bell a child of Teresa Bell, deceased? Is Muriel Bell Hoster a child of Teresa Bell, deceased? Was Eustace Bell, now deceased, a child of Teresa Bell, deceased? Is Viola Bell a child of Teresa Bell, deceased?"

The jury returned a verdict in which each of the foregoing special issues was answered in the affirmative, whereupon a decree was made and entered in accordance therewith adopting the findings and verdict of the jury upon the special issues above set forth and also embodying full and detailed findings of fact upon the averments set forth in the pleadings of the respective parties in their several applications for partial distribution and in their several oppositions to the respective applications of each other. The trial court, however, by its said decree denied all of the foregoing petitions for partial distribution in said estate upon the ground that no general administrator of said estate had as yet been appointed. Upon the entry of said decree, the foregoing persons, who had appeared in opposition to the petition for partial distribution in said estate presented by Viola S. Bell, gave notice of intention to move to set aside the said verdict and to vacate the said decree in so far as the said verdict and decree purported to find and decree that Viola S. Bell was a child of Teresa Bell, deceased, and to grant a new trial upon that particular issue; said motion being made and based upon all of the usual grounds and being supported by affidavits as to certain of the several grounds thereof requiring such support. To said motion Viola S. Bell responded with counter affidavits by herself and other persons; and she also on her own part gave notice of intention to move to vacate and set aside said verdict and decree in so far as the same found and decreed the contestants of her said application to be the children of Teresa Bell, deceased. When these several motions came on to be heard and were respectively submitted for decision, the trial court made and filed its order granting the motion of the said contestants of the right of said Viola S. Bell, as her child and heir, to share in the estate of Teresa Bell, deceased, and in so doing expressly based its order upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the said verdict and decree in so far as said decree purported to find or adjudge: (1) That said Viola S. Bell is a child of Teresa Bell, deceased; (2) that Thomas Bell died leaving him surviving Viola S. Bell as one of his children; (3) that Viola S. Bell is not estopped from asserting her claim to distribution; (4) that Viola S. Bell is entitled to one-sixth of the estate of Teresa Bell, deceased.

The trial court also and at the same time, but by a separate order, denied the said motion of Viola S. Bell for a new trial generally and without specifying the particular grounds of such denial. From the portions of said decree adverse to her contentions in her pleadings and upon the trial and from the making and entry of each of the aforesaid orders upon the two motions for a new trial, Viola S. Bell has taken and prosecuted the present appeal.

[1] Upon that portion of her said appeal which relates to the action of the trial court in granting the motion of the respondents for a new trial, her contention is that the trial court was in error in its conclusion that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict and decree in so far as it was found and decreed therein that she was a child of Teresa Bell, deceased. The record presented both upon the trial and upon the motion for a new trial based upon that ground is voluminous, and an examination thereof shows that it presents a degree of doubtfulness and a sharpness of conflict such as are rare even in family controversies such as this. Charges and counter charges of perjury, of the instability of witnesses, and utter unreliability of particular testimony, abound. The purposes, motives, and conduct of persons both living and dead, whose lives and actions are interwoven in the tapestry of this remarkable case, are veiled in mystery as to the meaning of which we only gain occasional glimpses between the lines of the cold record before us. It is a case wherein the impressions gained by the trial judge from the vantage of the presence and appearance and actions and utterances of the parties and witnesses before him would be invaluable in the formation of judicial convictions as to where the truth lay. In such a case this court ought not to overthrow the determination of the trial court to grant the motion for a new trial upon the specified ground in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of discretion or of the existence of such bias or prejudice on the part of the trial judge as would interfere with a just and impartial balancing of the evidence in the case. We do not find that such exists in this case, nor do we think that a detailed or extended review of the facts of the case would be either profitable or expedient in view of the fact that another trial is to be had upon the particular issue as to which a new trial has been granted herein.

[2] The appellant's next contention upon her appeal is directed against that portion of the decree herein which adjudges that the respondents herein are children and heirs, or the representatives of deceased children and heirs of Teresa Bell, deceased, and entitled as such to share in her estate; and also against the order of the trial court refusing to grant her motion for a new trial upon that issue. In support of this contention the appellant urges that the evidence in the case, which the trial court found by its said order to be insufficient to support that portion of the verdict and decree which finds and adjudges that appellant is a child and heir of Teresa Bell, is also insufficient to support that portion of said verdict and decree which finds and adjudges that said respondents are children and heirs, or representatives of a deceased child and heir of Teresa Bell, deceased. This contention has no merit, for the all-sufficient reason that the evidence which was offered in support of the claim of the appellant to be the child and heir of Teresa Bell, deceased, differed in many material aspects from the evidence offered in support of the like claim on the part of the respondents. A single illustration will suffice. In the case of the appellant there was not a particle of evidence connecting her with the family household of the Bell home prior to a time when she was 6 or 7 years of age; while in the case of certain of the respondents there was evidence which referred directly to the place and time and circumstances attending their birth in that home. The evidence offered and admitted in opposition to and in support of the claim of heirship of these respective claimants differed materially in another respect which may as well be considered and disposed of here. The respondents herein in their opposition to the appellant's application for partial distribution set forth in their pleading the successive papers, proceedings, orders, and decrees in the matter of the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased, and also certain prior proceedings in the estate of Teresa Bell, deceased, and predicated thereon their plea that the applicant, Viola S. Bell, was estopped to claim relationship or heirship with respect to either Thomas or Teresa Bell. On the other hand, Viola S. Bell, in her answer and opposition to the asserted claims of relationship and heirship with respect to Thomas and Teresa Bell, pleaded that she was the only child and heir of Thomas and Teresa Bell and that none of the respondents was a child or heir of either Thomas or Teresa Bell.

[3] Upon the trial the appellant herein testified in support of the foregoing averments of her answer and opposition at least in respect to the paternity and maternity of some of said respondents. When she had rested her case in chief the respondents offered in evidence the last will of Thomas Bell, deceased, wherein he had left his estate to certain trustees for the "support and maintenance of my children Thomas Frederick Bell, Mary Teresa Bell, Robina Bell, Muriel Bell, Reginald Bell and Eustace Bell"; and wherein also and after these trusts were satisfied he had devised one-third of his estate to his wife, Teresa Bell, and directed that "The remainder of my estate shall be divided among my children share and share alike, that is to say to Thomas Frederick, Mary Teresa, Robina, Muriel, Reginald and Eustace." No mention in said will was made of the name or existence of Viola S. Bell. To the admission of this will of Thomas Bell in evidence the counsel for Viola S. Bell offered the general objection that it was "immaterial, incompetent and inadmissible," which objection the court overruled. We are of the opinion that the trial court did not err in so ruling, for the reason that the declarations of a testator in his last will are admissible both upon the question of pedigree and upon the question as to whom he regards as the proper objects of his bounty. Estate of Morrison (Cal. Sup.) 242 P. 939, and cases cited. The appellant practically concedes this by her own offer of the rejected will of Teresa Bell, deceased, for the same purpose. Thereupon the respondents offered in evidence various papers, proceedings, and orders in the course of the probate of the said last will of Thomas Bell, deceased, to the admission of which a like objection was urged and overruled.

[4, 5] One of the purposes urged by the respondents in favor of the admission of these proceedings in the course of probate of the Thomas Bell estate was that of showing that at no time during the course of the probate thereof, covering a period of about a quarter of a century prior to the year 1917, did it appear that Viola S. Bell was ever mentioned or referred to as one of the children or heirs of Thomas Bell, deceased, or was ever served with process or that she was ever required or ever sought to participate in any way in the proceedings for the disposition of his estate among those entitled thereto; and that this sort of evidence was relevant and admissible when taken in connection with the testimony and admission of Viola S. Bell that she was at all times during the period of the probate of said estate aware that such proceedings were pending and proceeding in the courts and that their purpose was the disposal of the estate and properties of him whom she claimed to be her father, among others than herself who claimed to be his children; and that such documentary evidence was admissible as having some more or less material bearing upon the validity of her said claims and upon her own credibility and good faith in their belated assertion. And the respondents make the same claim as to the proceedings had and the papers and records presented in the matter of the estate of Teresa Bell, deceased, prior to the appearance of the appellant as a claimant therein to practically the whole of said estate. It is true that the respondents herein in their pleadings in opposition to the appellant's said claim set forth the proceedings in both estates as the basis of an alleged estoppel based thereon. The documentary evidence of such proceedings, however, when offered in evidence, were offered generally and were objected to generally as immaterial, irrelevant, and inadmissible for any purpose whatever. Being admitted generally and over this objection, they were properly in the record for whatever evidentiary purpose they might subserve. The trial judge in his charge to the jury instructed that body, and, we think, properly, that Viola S. Bell was not estopped in the assertion of her said claims, and we must assume that the jury obeyed that instruction in its consideration of said evidence; and we may also assume, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the trial judge, in granting the motion for a new trial, was actuated by no change of mental attitude with respect to that feature of the case or that he did so from any other view of the value of such evidence than that of its bearing upon the credibility and good faith of the appellant's present assertion that she is the only child and heir of Thomas and Teresa Bell, and upon her present claim predicated thereon, that she is entitled to have distributed to her a portion of the latter's estate.

[6] Sufficient has been set forth herein to indicate that, in our opinion, no reversible error was committed by the trial court in granting the motion for a new trial upon the issue presented by the appellant's application for partial distribution to herself of a portion of this estate; and its order in so doing upon the ground stated will therefore be affirmed. With respect to the order of the trial court denying the appellant's motion to have the decree of the court set aside and a new trial granted as to the respondents' application for partial distribution to themselves of portions of the said estate, some of the same questions are discussed and a number of different problems are presented. With respect to the evidence offered by the respondents in the form of the records and proceedings in the course of probate of the estates of Thomas and Teresa Bell, the respondents argue that the orders and decrees of the court in which such proceedings were pending, in so far as they relate to the status of said respondents as the children and heirs of both Thomas and Teresa Bell, are res judicata, and that both the appellant in assailing and the trial court and jury in passing upon their present claims as to being the children and heirs of Teresa Bell are therefore bound thereby.

[7] We have hereinbefore held these records and proceedings in these two estates to have been admissible in opposition to the appellant's claim and to her evidence in support thereof for the limited purpose above outlined, but a different question is presented when the respondents urge that such evidence is available on behalf of their own claims to heirship as res judicata. That they did so urge and argue during the course of the trial the record sufficiently shows, and because of that insistence the appellant presented certain instructions having relation to the effect to be given to the aforesaid evidence, with the request that they be given to the jury. The court refused to give these instructions, and the appellant on her motion for a new trial contended, and now contends, that the trial court committed prejudicial error in so doing. The jury was sought to be instructed by these offered instructions that the statements or recitals in the several petitions, orders, and decrees in each of said two estates, to the effect that the respondents herein, or any of them, were children of Thomas or Teresa Bell, or both, were not to be taken by them as evidence that these respondents, or any of them, were in fact children of Thomas or Teresa Bell and were not to be considered as res adjudicata upon that question. With respect to some, at least, of these offered and refused instructions, laying aside as insufficient merely technical objections as to defects in form, we are of the opinion that they were correct in point of law and that they should have been given. Take, for example, the following requested instruction:

"I instruct you that any statement or declaration made by Thomas Frederick Bell, Reginald Bell, Robina Hessel, or any petition filed by them, either in the estate of Thomas Bell or in the estate of Teresa Bell, that they are children of either Thomas Bell or of Teresa Bell, must not be considered by you as evidence that they are children either of Thomas Bell or of Teresa Bell."

Such petitions had been offered and received in evidence, and such self-serving statements had been contained therein; and hence the foregoing instruction was a correct one as a matter of law. We are further of the opinion that the several orders and decrees in the matter of the estate of Thomas Bell, whether of partial or of final distribution of the estate of said decedent in accordance with the terms of his will and which contain statements giving the names of said respondents and containing recitals that they are his children, do not constitute res adjudicata as to the paternity of said respondents which would be binding upon either the appellant, the court, or the jury in the instant proceeding; and this for the obvious reason that the persons named in the last will of the decedent Thomas Bell would be entitled to have his estate distributed to them as his devisees under said will, whether or not they were his children; and hence that such recitals were not necessary to the making or validity of such orders or decrees. They were not therefore res adjudicata. Code Civ. Proc. § 1911; Estate of Heydenfeldt, 127 Cal. 456, 59 P. 839; Estate of Freud, 134 Cal. 333, 66 P. 476; Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 P. 298, 60 P. 974, 66 P. 982; Herman on Estoppel and Res Adjudicata, § 275; Wells on Res Adjudicata, § 295. The recent decision of this court in Estate of Barton, 238 P. 681, contains nothing inconsistent with the principle declared in the foregoing authorities, nor do we think that any of the other cases cited by respondents either overthrow it or interfere with its application to the instant case. We are therefore of the opinion that the statements and recitals in the several orders and decrees of partial or of final distribution in the matter of the estate of Thomas Bell were not res adjudicata as to the status of the respondents herein or any of them as the child or children of Thomas Bell, and that the appellant's offered instructions herein embraced a correct statement of the law in that regard and should therefore have been given. Nor do we think that the prejudicial effect of the refusal of the trial court to give the foregoing offered instructions was cured by other instructions which the trial court did give, or that the brief instruction which was given upon the subject of estoppel obviated the evil effect of the court's refusal to give an express instruction upon the subject of res adjudicata.

[8] The appellant further contends that the trial court erred in the admission in evidence of certain baptismal records of St. Johns Church, showing the baptism upon certain dates of Robina Bell, Reginald Bell, Muriel Bell and Eustace Bell. The appellant concedes that these baptismal records were competent and admissible to prove the fact and date of the baptism of the persons named therein, but assigns another and an unlawful purpose in their offer and admission in evidence. The purpose for which these records were offered was not stated or limited at the time of their admission, nor did the objection thereto require or suggest such limitation. They were, therefore, properly admitted in evidence. It is significant to note that the trial court in its charge to the jury, in dealing with this particular evidence, instructed that body that these certificates of baptism were "evidence only of the fact that the persons named in said certificates were baptized at the dates specified therein." No error was therefore committed either in their admission or in the consideration of them by the jury for the limited purpose outlined in the instructions of the court.

[9] The appellant next contends that the trial court erred in permitting the introduction in evidence of the books of account of St. Marys College and the Convent of Holy Names in Oakland, showing charges made against Thomas or Teresa Bell for the board and tuition of one or other of these respondents and the payment of such charges by the person against whom they were made upon such books of account. We are of the opinion that these books of account were properly admissible as tending to show the course of conduct of the Bell family and those who were the parental heads thereof with respect to the younger members of the family. These records were offered generally and were only subjected to the usual and general objection. They were therefore admissible over said objection. If those objecting to their admission generally desired that their purpose be confined to a narrower scope, they should have made manifest that desire either in the form of their objection or in requested instructions to the jury. Not having done either of these, we find no merit in their present contention in that regard.

The appellant's next contention is that the trial court was in error in its refusal to admit in evidence the will of Teresa Bell, offered by appellant for the purpose of showing the declarations of the maker of said will that certain of the respondents were not her offspring. Prior to said offer, it had already been shown in evidence that by the judgment of the trial court in the proceedings for the probate of said will in the matter of the estate of Teresa Bell, deceased, the said will had been declared invalid for the reason that the maker thereof was of unsound mind at the time of the purported execution thereof; and that such judgment had become final. In such a state of the record we are satisfied that while the offer of this rejected will of Teresa Bell comes within the rule above stated admitting the declarations of testators regarding pedigree, we are of the opinion such a will would no more be admissible to prove the declarations of the maker thereof as to who were her children than would the statements of the maker herself be admissible after it had been judicially declared that she was of unsound mind. Moreover, it would seem that the appellant herein was in no wise injured by the court's refusal to admit in evidence the statements contained in said document, since the maker thereof therein declared that she had "no children."

The appellant makes certain further contentions as to errors alleged to have been committed by the trial court in its rulings upon questions propounded to various witnesses. We shall not deal with these in detail for the reason that to do so would unduly extend this opinion. We shall assume that as to these alleged errors they would probably be avoided upon the retrial of this cause.

It is our conclusion and decision that the order of the trial court granting the motion of the respondents for a new trial be and the same is hereby affirmed, and that the order of said court denying the motion of the appellant for a new trial be and the same is hereby reversed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; LENNON, J.; SHENK, J.; LAWLOR, J.; CURTIS, J.

SEAWELL, J. I concur in that portion of the opinion which affirms the order of the lower court granting respondents' motion for a new trial, but I am disposed to dissent from that portion of the opinion which reverses the order of the trial court denying appellant's motion for a new trial. That the respondents were the children or the descendants of children of Thomas and Teresa Bell there seems to be no substantial room for doubt. If any error was committed as to the rule of the application of res adjudicata as to their status, or the doctrine of estoppel, it was harmless error and clearly falls within the contemplation of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

In determining whether subject-matter embraced in body of act is sufficiently referred to in title, court will look to history of particular legislation to which act in question relates.

3. Statutes §225—Statutes, relating to need for and building of state buildings, should be read together.

St. 1911, p. 1855, appointing commission to investigate necessity for new quarters for state library, Supreme and appellate courts, and St. 1913, p. 389, providing for erection and equipment of state buildings for state purposes, should be read together and construed as intended merely to amplify unit of structural area to be used for state purposes.

4. States §132—Expenditures, under later act, held intended to be devoted to same purpose as former acts, which were supplemented.

Since body of St. 1925, p. 726, declares it is supplemental to St. 1911, p. 1855, and St. 1913, p. 389, providing for erection of state buildings, whatever appropriation and expenditure is provided for was intended to be devoted to same general purpose as that contemplated by preceding acts, though title merely provides for completion of construction and equipment in furnishing state buildings.

5. Statutes §123(2)—Provision in act for change in state capitol building held embraced in title.

Provision in St. 1925, p. 726, supplementing St. 1911, p. 1855, and St. 1913, p. 389, providing for erection of certain state buildings, providing for making changes in state capitol building, was germane to object and purpose of former acts, and was embraced within title which provided for completion of construction and equipment and furnishing of state buildings.

Application for writ of mandate by W. F. McClure, as Director of the Department of Public Works of the State of California, prayed to be directed to Ray L. Riley, as Controller of the State of California. Writ granted.

Wesley E. Marten and Dixwell L. Pierce, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert W. Harrison, Chief Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein, in his capacity as director of the department of public works of the state of California, has applied for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent herein, as controller, to audit and draw his warrant for the payment of certain claims for work done and material furnished in connection with the construction and equipment of the state buildings now in course of construction in the city of Sacramento; the said respondent having refused to audit and approve said claims. The facts as set forth in the petition herein are admitted by the answer of the respondent, and the only question presented for our determination is as to whether or not the act of the Legislature (Stat. 1925, p. 726) constitutes a valid appropriation of the moneys of the state of California available for the payment of such claims. The act reads, in part, as follows:

"An act appropriating the sum of three hundred thousand dollars for the completion of construction and equipment and furnishing state buildings in the city of Sacramento for state purposes.

"The people of the state of California do enact as follows:

"Section 1. The sum of three hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended in completing the construction, equipment and furnishings of state buildings in the city of Sacramento for state purposes, for laying out and beautifying the grounds, and also for the rearrangement of the state capitol building. This appropriation is in addition and supplemental to the funds heretofore provided for that purpose by an act entitled 'An act to provide for the issuance and sale of state bonds to be known as "state building bonds,"' etc. Stat. 1913, p. 389.

[1] The objection which the respondent urges against the validity of the foregoing act of 1925 is that said act violates the provision of the Constitution (article 4, § 24), which provides that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title; and also violates a further provision of the Constitution (article 4, § 34) to the effect that no bill making an appropriation of money, except the budget bill, shall contain more than one item of appropriation and for one single and certain purpose, to be expressed therein. In approaching the determination as to what scope and meaning shall be given to the foregoing provision of the state Constitution, it is to be borne in mind that the rule of interpretation to be applied to these sections is well settled and is conceded by the respondent herein to be substantially that set forth in 36 Cyc. 1017, as follows:

"3. Construction of Provisions. The provisions of the various Constitutions relating to the subject-matter and titles of acts should be construed liberally to uphold proper legislation, all parts of which are reasonably germane on the one hand, and to prevent trickery on the other hand. The restrictions requiring the subject of an act to be expressed in its title should be reasonably construed, considering substance rather than form, to require the expression in the title of the general object, but not the details or incidents, or means of effecting the object sought, and to include the subject and not the purpose of the act and the reasons which brought about the enactment of it by the Legislature."

The foregoing rule is fully upheld by the following authorities: Inhabitants, etc., of Montclair Tp. v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147, 2 S. Ct. 391, 27 L. Ed. 433, 434; Mills v. Carleton, 30 Wis. 409; Hannibal v. Marion Co., 69 Mo. 576; State v. Ranson, 73 Mo. 86; People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 635; San Francisco, etc., R. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 60 Cal. 12; Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 228, 24 P. 383; Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 636, 29 P. 251; Ex parte Cohen, 104 Cal. 530, 38 P. 364, 26 L. R. A. 423, 43 Am. St. Rep. 127; In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 114, 90 P. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75; Reclamation Dist. v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 677, 154 P. 845; People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 394, 156 P. 451; Bassford v. Earl, 172 Cal. 660, 158 P. 124; Estate of Wellings, 192 Cal. 519, 221 P. 628; 1 Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) p. 202.

[2-5] In determining whether the subject-matter embraced within the body of a legislative act is sufficiently referred to in its title, in conformity with the foregoing rule of interpretation, we are entitled to look to the history of the particular legislation to which the act in question, when read as a whole, relates. The city of Sacramento is and for many years has been the state capital, and the main structure therein which has during these past years been occupied by the various offices and activities of the state government which have been located at the state capital, has commonly been known as the "state capitol building." This building, however, is in reality but one of a unit of state buildings at the capital used for the foregoing purposes and known as state buildings. The Legislature adopted in the year 1911 an act (Stat. 1911, p. 1855), reciting the inadequacy of the portion of the state capitol building, so-called, devoted to the accommodation of the state library and the Supreme and appellate courts, and, by the terms of said act, appointed a commission to investigate the necessity for the erection of additional buildings for the housing of these institutions, and to report to the Legislature of 1913. This commission duly reported as required by the terms of said act, and apparently in accordance with its recommendations the Legislature adopted the act of 1913 (Stat. 1913, p. 389) providing for "the erection and equipment of state buildings in the city of Sacramento for state purposes," providing for the issuance and sale of bonds in a sum not to exceed $3,000,000 for such purposes, and appointing a board consisting of the Governor, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and the state librarian to supervise the construction and equipment of the state buildings to be thus provided. The issuance and sale of said bonds, the acquisition of suitable land adjacent to the state capitol grounds, and the erection of the state buildings contemplated by said act have been carried forward and the buildings are now nearing completion. It is a significant fact that such buildings have been so designed and are being so constructed as to provide new and ample quarters for the state library and for the Supreme and appellate courts, and that the original purpose for which the erection of such state buildings was contemplated has thus been carried forward consistently to the present time. It thus appears to us that the foregoing several legislative acts should be read together and should be construed as intended merely to amplify the unit of structural area to be used for state purposes. That the new buildings still in course of construction are separated by a short space from the old unit is an immaterial circumstance. They occupy lands adjacent to those occupied by that unit and they are as much a part of it as though they had been merely wings or annexes of the original structure. Had they been built as such, no doubt could have arisen that whatever changes were required to be made in the original unit or structure in order to carry to completion the purposes for which the new buildings were designed would be within the legislative purpose as expressed in the acts of 1911 and 1913. The act of 1925, while providing in its title "for the completion of construction and equipment and furnishing state buildings in the city of Sacramento for state purposes" is by the body of said act expressly declared to be supplemental to the former acts, and the conclusion seems irresistible that said last-named act, both in title and substance, has reference to the unit of state structures used and to be used for state purposes in the city of Sacramento, and that whatever appropriation or expenditure is provided for in said act was intended to be devoted to the same general purpose as that which was contemplated by the preceding legislative enactments. This being so, it would seem to follow that the inclusion in the body of the act of 1925 of a provision for the making of such structural changes in the original unit, commonly known as the state capitol building, as were made necessary by the amplification of that unit and by the removal to quarters in the new and amplified unit of those institutions and activities for the accommodation of which they were from the beginning designed would be germane to the single object and purpose contemplated by the former acts and would be embraced within the title of the final and supplemental act intended, as it obviously was, merely to provide an additional appropriation for the fulfillment of the foregoing original design.

If the foregoing reasoning be correct, it would follow as a necessary sequence therefrom that the subject-matter found in the body of the act of 1925 is fairly embraced within its title; that but one appropriation is provided for therein: and that the clause therein providing for an expenditure in part of such appropriation "for the rearrangement of the state capitol building" is germane to the purpose contemplated by its title, as well as by the provisions of the previous enactments of the Legislature above referred to and having the same general purpose in view. Having arrived at this conclusion, it is unnecessary to determine whether the act in question would or would not be valid if the foregoing clause relating to the rearrangement of the state capitol building were to be stricken from the act.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

We concur: LENNON, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LAWLOR, J.; CURTIS, J.

WASTE, C. J. I concur in the order directing a writ of mandate to issue, but solely for the reason that the two claims for work done, and which are the subject of our consideration, appear to have been properly incurred in the completion of construction of the two state buildings provided for by the act of 1913 (Stat. 1913, p. 389). I do not agree with my associates that the statute here under consideration should be construed to permit the expenditure of money appropriated by it "for the rearrangement of the state capitol building." We have before us, tested by its title, an act appropriating the sum of $300,000 for the completion of construction, and equipment, and furnishing state buildings in the city of Sacramento for state purposes, the erection of which was the sole objective of the bond issue provided by the act of 1913, supra. Any matters of legislation contained in the body of the act not bearing on the completion of construction, equipment, or furnishing of those buildings, should go out. Const. art. 4, § 24; Spier v. Baker, 120 Cal. 370, 373, 52 P. 659, 41 L. R. A. 196. Unless that be done, the act, in my opinion, falls within the inhibition of article 4, § 34, of the Constitution, which provides that any bill making an appropriation of money, except the budget bill, shall contain only one item, "and that for one single and certain purpose to be therein expressed."

BLETHEN v. PACIFIC MUT. LIFE INS. CO.
OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 11543.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1926.)

1. Insurance ⇨199—Wills ⇨5—Insurance policy is property which may be sold or assigned or bequeathed.

An insurance policy, in contemplation of law, is property which may be sold, assigned, or bequeathed by owner.

2. Insurance ⇨586—Named beneficiary's interest, where right to change beneficiary is reserved, is not a vested right.

Named beneficiary's interest in policy, in which insured may change beneficiary, is not a vested right, but an expectancy of an incomplete and inchoate gift, revocable by insured, which does not vest as a right until death.

3. Husband and wife ⇨249—Proceeds of insurance policy, paid for out of community assets, are community property.

Proceeds of insurance policy, premiums on which have been paid out of community assets, are community property.

4. Husband and wife ⇨265—Wife's interest in community property mere expectancy, though protected by statute.

Husband is owner of community property, and wife's interest therein is mere expectancy protected by statutory provisions as Civ. Code, § 172, limiting husband's power of disposal, with right to wife on death of husband to avoid any conveyance necessary to protect her interest in property conveyed in derogation of her rights.

5. Husband and wife ⇨265—Husband's gift of community property without consent of wife is not void but voidable.

Husband's gift of community property, without consent of wife, is not void, but voidable.

6. Husband and wife — 265—Wills — 6—Effect of attempted disposition by will or gift by husband of more than his share of community property stated.

Attempted disposition by will or gift, initiated by husband during his life, but not completed until his death, of more than half of community property vests property in donee subject to being avoided at wife's election.

7. Husband and wife — 265—Insurance company, without notice of wife's claim, may pay proceeds of policy to beneficiary, donee of husband, without wife's consent.

Husband's gift of insurance policy, premiums on which had been paid from community property, to a beneficiary other than his wife and without her consent, is valid, but may be avoided by wife's assertion of her right to one-half of proceeds, and insurance company, without notice of wife's claim, is justified in paying beneficiary proceeds of policy as person rightly entitled thereto, and, after having so done, is not liable for half of such proceeds in suit by wife.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth B. Blethen against the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California and another. Judgment for plaintiff, against named defendant, and it appeals. Reversed.

R. S. Gray, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clinton G. Dodge, of Oakland, for respondent.

H. S. Craig, of Oakland, for respondent Alice M. Scott.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ in support of appellant's contention, for Association of Life Ins. Presidents.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover part of the proceeds of a life insurance policy, upon the ground that the same constituted community property.

Briefly stated, the facts of the case set forth in the record, are these: In 1900, George W. A. Blethen and plaintiff intermarried. Subsequent thereto, in December, 1914, the appellant, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California, a corporation, issued to Blethen two policies of life insurance in the sum of $4,000, respectively. One of these policies was permitted to lapse. In the other policy, Blethen's sister, Alice M. Scott, was designated as beneficiary, apparently for the purpose of securing a sum of money loaned to Blethen. This is the policy involved in controversy here. Under a power reserved in this policy to change the beneficiary, Blethen substituted his wife for the sister as beneficiary in February, 1918. The Blethens, however, separated in September, 1919, and subsequent thereto, in October, 1920, in contemplation of divorce proceedings to be prosecuted by the wife, a property settlement was entered into between the husband and the wife. This settlement provided, among other things, that Blethen's future earnings should be regarded as his separate property. Neither in said settlement nor in the interlocutory decree of divorce, which followed, was any specific disposition made of said policy of life insurance. About the time of the entry of the decree of divorce, however, Blethen substituted his adopted son, Hooper, a minor, as beneficiary under the policy. Some time subsequent thereto, without the knowledge or consent of Mrs. Blethen, said policy was again changed so as to make it payable to Blethen's sister, Alice M. Scott. No final decree was ever entered in the Blethens' divorce action. Blethen died in February, 1922, and a short time thereafter his sister, the beneficiary under the said policy, who had possession thereof, applied for and obtained from said insurance company the necessary blanks to be used in the preparation of the proof of death of the insured and of a claim for the insurance money. Shortly thereafter, a law firm, acting on behalf of Mrs. Blethen, sent said insurance company a letter, under date of March 2, 1922, informing said company of the status of said divorce proceedings, and stating that at the time of the same there was an agreement between Blethen and his wife that the insurance policy proceeds should be applied for the benefit of their adopted son, Hooper, but that they had received information to the effect that the beneficiary named in the policy was Alice M. Scott. Information was requested as to what person was in fact named beneficiary in said policy at the time of the death of Blethen. The letter closed with the sentence:

"We represent Mrs. Betty Blethen, the widow, on whose shoulders now falls the rearing of this boy."

Replying to this letter, the insurance company stated that it was advised of the death of Blethen, and had furnished the necessary blanks to Alice M. Scott, the beneficiary named in the policy at the time of the death of Blethen; that the information contained in the letter with reference to the divorce proceedings of the Blethens was the first it had heard of the same; that it had not seen any agreement made by Blethen with his wife with reference to the insurance policy, and, if there was any such agreement, they would be pleased to have furnished forthwith a certified copy thereof. Receiving no response to this letter, the insurance company again wrote the said law firm and requested to be advised definitely whether or not the widow of Blethen claimed any interest in the policy or proceeds thereof, either in her individual capacity or as the guardian of Hooper Blethen, who, as previously indicated, was the beneficiary named in the policy just prior to the naming as beneficiary of the sister of Blethen, Alice M. Scott. Said law firm, under date of April 6, 1922, replied to the last letter of the insurance company, stating in effect that they did not see what they could do for their client, as the assured had the right to change the beneficiary without the consent of any one, and "there seems to be nothing that we can do except to let you follow your regular course." A short time after the receipt of this letter, on April 11, 1922, said insurance company, in accordance with the terms of the insurance policy, paid all the moneys due thereunder, amounting to the net sum of $3,431.66, to Alice M. Scott, the beneficiary therein named at the time of the death of Blethen, the insured.

About the middle of February, 1923, after the lapse of some 10 months, Mrs. Blethen, who was then acting upon the advice of her present attorney, wrote said insurance company to the effect that it was no doubt familiar with the recent case of New York Life Ins. Co. v. Bank of Italy, 214 P. 61, 60 Cal. App. 602, where it was held that, when the premiums were paid from the funds of the community, the husband could only dispose of one-half of the policy, the remainder being the property of the surviving widow. Under these circumstances Mrs. Blethen, so the letter stated, was entitled to the sum of one-half of the policy, and demand was thereby made for the payment of the same. In response to this letter, the insurance company called attention to the correspondence previously had with Mrs. Blethen's former attorneys, and gave the full details of the settlement made with the beneficiary, Alice M. Scott, but declined to make any additional payments upon the said policy to the plaintiff, Mrs. Blethen. After some further correspondence, the substance of which is not material, Mrs. Blethen, on May 17, 1923, commenced this action against the insurance company and made Alice M. Scott a party defendant thereto. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the insurance company for a share of the proceeds of the policy proportionate with the amount of the premiums paid from the community funds. Judgment of nonsuit was rendered in favor of the defendant Alice M. Scott, from which judgment no appeal has been taken by the plaintiff. Defendant insurance company appeals from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff and the judgment of nonsuit in favor of the defendant Alice M. Scott.

The principal question presented by this appeal is whether or not a surviving wife may maintain an action against an insurance company to recover her community interest in the proceeds of a life insurance policy issued to her husband and made payable to a beneficiary other than the wife, without the wife's consent, the premiums of which have been paid out of community funds, after the insurance company, in good faith, without notice of adverse claim thereto, has made full payment on the policy to the beneficiary designated in the policy.

At the very outset we are confronted with respondent's contention that this question has been already answered and determined by the recent case of New York Life Ins. Co. v. Bank of Italy, 214 P. 61, 60 Cal. App. 602, which will hereafter be referred to as the Bank of Italy Case. In that case a policy of life insurance was issued by the New York Life Insurance Company upon the life of one Charles J. Newman. The policy reserved to the insured the power of changing the beneficiary. At the time of the issuance of the policy, and at the time of the death of the insured, the defendant, Ella J. Newman, was the wife of the insured, and Layo Newman, a brother of the insured, was made, without the wife's consent, the beneficiary under the policy. Conflicting claims to the proceeds of the policy having been made upon the insurance company after the death of the insured by Layo Newman, as beneficiary, and Ella Newman, as the wife of the insured claiming her community share of the same, the insurance company impleaded all the claimants and paid the proceeds of the policy into court to be disposed of according to the respective rights of the claimants. The insurance company was thereupon dismissed as a party, and the action thereafter proceeded upon the issue joined between the widow and the brother of the deceased. It was conceded that all the premiums on said policy had been paid out of community property. The court held that the surviving wife was entitled to one-half of the proceeds of the policy, as they were community assets, one-half of which belonged to the surviving widow. It will be noted that the insurance company, having impleaded the claimants and paid out the proceeds of the policy into court, was dismissed from the action, and no question of the rights of the surviving wife against the insurance company was raised or decided. Indeed, in denying a rehearing of the case, the court expressly refused to discuss the right of an insurer to make payment to a beneficiary, provided such payment be made prior to any notice of adverse claims, saying, in this behalf:

"No such question was here involved, as the insurance company had impleaded the parties and paid the proceeds of the policy into court. Whatever our views might be on the subject, the expression thereof would be purely dicta and of no value. * * * Whatever questions other than the ones decided might possibly arise between the different parties to the contract of insurance, they were not before us, and are in no manner affected by the decision."

In the petition for a hearing by the Supreme Court after a decision by the District Court of Appeal, which was denied, the only points presented concerned the paramountcy of the surviving wife's claim to one-half of the proceeds as against a beneficiary to whom the gift had been made without the consent of the wife.

The respondent, relying upon certain phrases in the Bank of Italy Case, argues that the gift of the proceeds of the insurance policy by the husband, without the consent of the wife, was a nullity and that the rights of the beneficiary never vested in more than one-half of said proceeds, inasmuch as the rights of the wife arose immediately upon the death of the husband. In other words, it is insisted that the community interest of the wife in one-half of the proceeds never vested in the beneficiary, Alice M. Scott, and the insurance company was not justified in paying over to the beneficiary the entire proceeds of the insurance policy.

The sole question decided in the Bank of Italy Case was that, as between the wife and the beneficiary named without her written consent, the wife was entitled to one-half of the proceeds of an insurance policy the premiums for which were paid out of community funds. This case therefore so strongly stressed by counsel for respondent, cannot be said to be determinative of the question involved in the instant case. On the contrary, the broad scope attempted to be given that case by counsel for respondent was expressly repudiated by the court upon its denial of a rehearing.

A review of the previous decisions of this court, dealing with the respective rights of the husband and wife in community property, and the effect of a husband's attempt to make a gift of more than his share of the community property, will not support the contention of the respondent that the gift to the beneficiary of the proceeds of the insurance policy in the instant case was an absolute nullity, and that the wife's interest in one-half thereof vested in her, eo instante, upon her husband's death. On the contrary, we think that the previous rulings of this court are directly against the contention of respondent as made in the instant case.

[1-3] An insurance policy in legal contemplation is property.

"It could be sold, assigned, or bequeathed by the owner thereof. Its pecuniary value to its owners was as great as though they held a promissory note of the company for that amount, payable upon the same conditions. It was a chose in action, and upon its satisfaction by a payment of the amount specified the title to the money so paid followed the title to the policy." In re Dobbel, 38 P. 87, 104 Cal. 432, 43 Am. St. Rep. 123.

The interest of a beneficiary named in a policy in which the insured may change the beneficiary is not a vested right, but merely an expectancy of an incomplete and inchoate gift, which is revocable at the will of the insured and which does not become vested as a right until fixed by death. Jory v. Supreme Council, 38 P. 524, 105 Cal. 20, 29, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17; Hoeft v. Supreme Lodge, Knights of Honor, 45 P. 185, 113 Cal. 91, 33 L. R. A. 174. The proceeds of an insurance policy, the premiums to which have been paid out of community assets, are community property. New York Life Insurance Co. v. Bank of Italy, supra.

[4, 5] The husband is the owner of the community property, and the interest of the wife therein is but a mere expectancy. Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308, 311; Tolman v. Smith, 24 P. 743, 85 Cal. 280; Spreckels v. Spreckels, 48 P. 328, 116 Cal. 339, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Spreckels v. Spreckels, 158 P. 537, 172 Cal. 775; Winchester v. Winchester, 165 P. 965, 175 Cal. 391; Estate of Brix, 186 P. 135, 181 Cal. 667; Dargie v. Patterson, 169 P. 360, 176 Cal. 714; Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 218 P. 22, 191 Cal. 601. Certain statutory limitations for the protection of the wife have, however, been placed upon his power of disposal.

Thus, by section 172 of the Civil Code, the husband is expressly prohibited from giving away any part of the community personal property without the written consent of the wife. This restriction on the husband's power of disposal does not, however, vest any interest in the community property in the wife. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 158 P. 537, 172 Cal. 775. If a gift is made by the husband in contravention of the statute, the gift is not a nullity. On the contrary, the property vests in the donee, subject to a right on the part of the wife to have one-half of the gift revoked. If, after the gift is made, the wife gives her consent, the requirements of the statute are fulfilled, and no further action is required to make it a valid and effective gift. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 158 P. 537, 172 Cal. 775; Dargie v. Patterson, 169 P. 360, 176 Cal. 714; McDougald v. First Federal Trust Co., 199 P. 11, 186 Cal. 243, 245. In short, a gift of community property by the husband during his lifetime without the consent of his wife is not void but voidable.

"The limitation upon the husband's power to make a gift * * * depends upon two questions of fact: The absence of a valuable consideration, and the absence of her written consent, both of which may have to be proven by collateral evidence. The gift, when made, immediately vests the property in the donee subject to her right of revocation. She may give her consent at any time during her life, and if she does the gift becomes absolute with respect to her. The provision was manifestly intended solely for the benefit of the wife. If she seeks to assert such right, it is incumbent upon her to show that the facts exist upon which it depends. The conclusion seems inevitable that the gift is not absolutely void with respect to her but only voidable by her upon proof of the facts necessary to that end." (Italics ours.) Spreckels v. Spreckels, 158 P. 537, 172 Cal. 775. See, also, Dargie v. Patterson, supra.

It is insisted by respondent, however, that these cases refer to transfers made by the husband during his lifetime, and that, in the instant case, the transfer takes effect upon the death of the husband. Jory v. Supreme Council, supra. We do not think this distinction is substantial or material. Particularly is this true in view of the well-established rule that a gift by a husband by testamentary disposition of more than his half of the community property is not void, but only voidable at the election of the wife. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 158 P. 537, 172 Cal. 775.

"The limitation upon the husband's testamentary power contained in the Code was not understood to vest in the wife, during the marriage, any interest or estate whatever in the community property, but merely to constitute a restriction upon the husband's power. If the husband undertook to dispose of all of the community property by will, giving the wife less than one-half thereof, such disposition was not absolutely void, but had the effect of putting her to her election whether to take under the statute or under the will. If she took the latter provision, the disposition in the will of the remaining portion of the property was thereby affirmed and made valid. Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 346; Estate of Stewart, 15 P. 445, 74 Cal. 98, 104; Estate of Smith, 40 P. 1037, 108 Cal. 119; Estate of Vogt, 98 P. 265, 154 Cal. 509. The testamentary disposition in such a case, therefore, was voidable but not absolutely void. If it had been void, in the extreme sense, the logical result would have been that a mere election by the wife would not transfer the remainder of her statutory half to the other beneficiaries under the will, but that a conveyance by her would be necessary. It has always been understood that her election is sufficient for that purpose and that the will, in that event, operates to transfer the property."

[6] An attempted disposition by will by the husband of more than his half of the community property vests the property in the donee subject to being avoided at her election. If this be true, it necessarily follows that a gift initiated during the life of the husband, but not completed and consummated until his death, must be said to take effect, vesting the property in the donee subject to being avoided by the wife at her option. Although it is true that a wife cannot be deprived of her half of the community property without her consent, yet, under the reasoning of Spreckels v. Spreckels, 158 P. 537, 172 Cal. 775, until she does declare her intention of refusing to acquiesce in the husband's gift, the property vests in the donee or beneficiary under the will.

Under the California theory of community property, the husband remains the owner of all the community property until his death, at which time the rights of the wife immediately ripen, and she becomes entitled to one-half of the community property, with the right to avoid any conveyance so far as is necessary to protect her interest in any property conveyed by her husband in derogation of her right to a one-half interest. Dargie v. Patterson, supra. However, until the wife elects to establish her community right by the assertion of her rightful claim, the gift by the husband is valid. As to her the gift is a nullity only when she elects to treat the same as a nullity. The rule that the gift of a husband of community property is valid until avoided by the wife, applicable to community property in general, is applicable to the proceeds of an insurance policy, the premiums of which have been paid out of community funds.

[7] It follows that a gift by a husband of an insurance policy to a beneficiary, other than his wife, is a good and valid gift until avoided by the wife by an assertion of her right to one-half of the proceeds, and the insurance company, until it has been made aware of the wife's claim, is justified in delivering to the beneficiary, as the person rightfully entitled thereto, the proceeds of the policy upon the death of the insured husband. The insurance company having contracted with the husband, and having promised to pay the proceeds of the policy to whomsoever he designated, in the absence of notice of any adverse claim, could do nothing but fulfill its contract. In short, until the wife had given notice of her claim to one-half of the proceeds, thereby asserting her statutory right of avoiding the gift ab initio (Dargie v. Patterson), all of the parties to the contract of insurance were entitled to deal with the subject-matter thereof as if the gift were absolute.

No notice of any adverse claim to the proceeds of the insurance policy was given by the wife to the insurance company prior to the payment of the proceeds to the beneficiary. The correspondence between the insurance company and the plaintiff's former attorneys shows merely that she was inquiring on behalf of her adopted son, and that she did not purport to claim anything under the policy until some 10 months after the insurance company had paid the money to the beneficiary under the policy.

The insurance company having fulfilled its contract according to its terms, prior to notice of any claim adverse to the beneficiary, has satisfied its obligations under said contract. The wife of the insured has no rights now against the insurance company.

Respondent points out that, as consequences of the rule just enunciated, wives who are ignorant of their husbands' affairs may fail to present their claims adverse to the beneficiary, or a beneficiary, by connivance with officials of the insurance company, may defraud a wife of her one-half share in the proceeds. There must be placed, however, on the other side of the scales, as consequences apt to flow from a contrary rule, the serious impairment of the usefulness of life insurance policies, necessarily resulting from the almost intolerable burden which would be placed upon insurance companies of determining in each instance, prior to the payment of the policy, whether or not the premiums were paid out of community funds, and, if so, what proportion was so paid, as well as the burden of investigating any change which may have occurred in the marital situation and relations of the insured. While judicial conclusions are not ordinarily controlled by the consequences which may flow therefrom, yet, if consequences be weighed, from a practical point of view, the balance is in favor of the conclusion herein reached. This conclusion, which gives effect to the expressed intention of the parties to the contract in controversy, is, we think, in harmony with a sound public policy having for its purpose the promotion of the free writing of life insurance.

Whatever rights the respondent may have as against the beneficiary under the insurance policy under the rule laid down in the case of Dargie v. Patterson, supra, need not be discussed here, as no appeal has been taken by the plaintiff from the judgment of nonsuit in favor of the defendant Alice M. Scott. Judgment is reversed.

In re HEARST'S ESTATE.

HEARST et al. v. RILEY, State Controller, et al.

(S. F. 11378.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1926.)

Taxation — 903—Payments on inheritance tax account cannot subsequently be credited against interest due on date of payment.

Payments by executors, made and accepted on principal amount of inheritance tax, under St. 1917, p. 880, as shown by receipt, before total amount under section 16, subd. 2, or amount of interest under section 7, could be ascertained, held not applicable to interest eventually found due on tax as of date of payment, and where so applied reimbursement under section 11, subd. 3, was authorized.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Phebe A. Hearst, deceased. Petition by William R. Hearst and others, executors, against Ray L. Riley, as Controller of the State of California, and John E. McDougald, as County Treasurer of the City and County of San Francisco, for instructions and order as to computation of interest on inheritance taxes. From the order fixing the method of computation and the balance of such taxes and interest due, the executors appeal. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Nathan Moran, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Dion R. Holm and Leo C. Lennon, both of San Francisco (Wesley E. Martin, of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, fixing the method of computation of interest on inheritance taxes and the balance of such taxes and interest due.

On the 13th day of April, 1919, Phebe A. Hearst died testate in the county of Alameda, being at the time of her death a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, and leaving an estate in California and elsewhere, including New York, South Dakota, and Mexico. In due time the will was admitted to probate. The inventory was presented by the executors to the appraisers, one of whom was the inheritance tax appraiser, on October 2, 1919. Because of the magnitude of the estate, its scattered properties, and various other problems arising in connection with the appraisal, the report of the inheritance tax appraiser was not filed until August 27, 1923. No question of delinquency, laches, or procrastination on the part of the representatives of the estate or of the inheritance tax appraiser is suggested or involved herein. All parties appear to have proceeded with diligence.

For the purpose of the payment of inheritance taxes the estate was appraised at $8,418,506.18. By order of court duly made on September 13, 1923, the amount of inheritance taxes due the state, inclusive of the tax on certain transfers made in contemplation of death and exclusive of the tax on the value of a certain contingent interest secured by bond, was fixed at the sum of $1,020,671.63, of which amount the sum of $949,101.04 was chargeable against the residuum of the estate. On the same day, to wit, September 13, 1923, the court, upon petition of the executors, made its order fixing the rate of interest to be paid on the inheritance tax. In and by this order the court found that the inheritance tax appraiser had been unable to complete and file his report until the 27th day of August, 1923, by reason of causes of delay which were unavoidable, and that such unavoidable causes of delay would not be removed until such time as the court should make "its order confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser with an allowance of a reasonable time thereafter within which to compute the amount or amounts of interest which may be due upon the various devises, legacies, and transfers upon which such taxes may be payable." Also, on the same day, the court made an order:

"That the penalty of 10 per cent. per annum imposed by subdivision (1) of section 7 of the Inheritance Tax Law of the state of California, Statutes of 1917, for nonpayment or delay in payment of the said tax be not charged upon the inheritance taxes found to be due in the above entitled estate, but that interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum be charged upon the said taxes from the expiration of 18 months after the death of the said decedent until the cause of delay in such payment be removed, and the date at which such cause of delay will be removed is hereby fixed and specified as 10 days from and after the date whereupon this court shall make its order confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser herein, filed on the 27th day of August, 1923."

The report of the inheritance tax appraiser was thereupon confirmed. Within the 10-day period the executors tendered to the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco the sum of $52,249.96, which, with simple interest computations, was the amount they claimed to be the balance due the state. The treasurer refused to accept said amount in full settlement and demanded an additional sum in accordance with his method of computation. On the 31st day of October, 1923, the executors filed in said court a petition for instructions and order as to computation of interest. It was alleged in said petition:

"That petitioners have made the following payments on account of inheritance taxes due the state of California, in accordance with receipts on file in the office of the clerk of this court and proceeding, to which receipts reference is hereby made and the same are deemed incorporated by reference herein: September 24, 1920—$2,260 in accordance with an order of court fixing inheritance taxes on certain money legacies under the will of decedent, the same being within 18 months after her death and no interest accruing thereon. October 13, 1920—$500,000 for account of William R. Hearst, residuary legatee and devisee, the same being within the 18 months' period and no interest accruing thereon. December 8, 1921—$100,000 for account of William R. Hearst, residue. April 14, 1922—$100,000 for account of William R. Hearst, residue. April 20, 1922—$50,000 for account of William R. Hearst, residue. May 26, 1922—$100,000 for account of William R. Hearst, residue. September 8, 1922—$50,000 to pay balance of taxes due from William R. Hearst on residue; remainder to apply on taxes due from various legatees. February 16, 1923—$1,691.75 for account of Elizabeth S. Apperson. February 27, 1923—$126,031.96 for account of the five minor grandchildren of decedent and the following legacies: Elbert C. Apperson, Randolph Apperson, A. Flint, Edward R. Clark."

It was further alleged that the above mentioned payments, and each of them, "were made as and for payments on account of principal of tax due from the respective devisees and legatees to the state of California, and not to apply upon interest, if any, which should thereafter be found due to the state of California; that the receipts issued by the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco and taken by the executors covering the said payments and each of them" were in the form more fully set forth by reference and incorporated in the record; "that the printed forms of receipt so issued have a line or lines for the entering and charging of interest and that no part of said sums, or any of them, were credited to interest, nor was any claim made that any part of said sums so paid would be credited to interest or otherwise than upon principal," and that the petitioners made such payments and each of them to apply upon the principal amount of said taxes until the same should be fully paid.

The state controller filed his answer to said petition, wherein he admitted that payments were made as alleged by the petitioners, admitted that the receipts issued by the treasurer bore the notations alleged by the petitioners, but averred affirmatively that the treasurer, "when issuing receipts to the petitioners, did so with the understanding that all payments made were to apply first on account of the interest accrued to the date of said payments, and the balance thereof on account of principal." After a hearing upon said petition and answer, the court on the 27th day of February, 1924, made its order, wherein it found that the payments made by and through the executors, as evidenced by the receipts, "were not applicable in the manner intended and claimed by the said executors, nor on account of the particular devisees or legatees specified by the said executors, and that all such payments were applicable generally on account of interest and principal on inheritance taxes due upon devises, legacies, and transfers, made by the said decedent, and that all such payments were properly applied by the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, first to the interest that had then accrued as of the date of the installment payment; and, second, the balance, if any, to the reduction of the principal sum of such taxes and all of them." It was further found that the amount tendered by the executors was incorrect, and that the amount due the state at the time of payment as specified by the order of court was the sum of $60,511.76, whereupon the executors paid the latter sum to the treasurer under protest, and they prosecute this appeal from the order decreeing that said sum was the amount due the state. They here seek to have said order modified by directing the reimbursement to them of the sum of $8,261.80, the same being the difference between the amount tendered by them and the amount fixed by the court and paid under protest.

The record presents an imposing array of figures, but the problems presented are of law and not of accounting. It is the contention of the appellants, first, that the method adopted by the city and county treasurer and the state controller for the application of the advance payments by appellants resulted, in effect, in an unauthorized compounding of interest as against the various beneficiaries under said will; and, secondly, that if such a method may be adopted under present law it was not pursued in this instance for the reason that all receipts issued by the treasurer and countersigned by the state controller show that the said payments were at the time of the issuance of said receipts applied exclusively to principal. On behalf of respondents it is conceded that "the state is inhibited from compounding interest, or charging interest on interest" but it is insisted by them that such was not done in this case.

The order fixing 7 per cent. on deferred payments was made in conformity with section 7 of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 880), which was in force at the time of the death of decedent. The pertinent portion of that section is as follows:

"Sec. 7. (1) All taxes imposed by this act, unless otherwise herein provided for, shall be due and payable at the death of the decedent, and if the same are paid within eighteen months, no interest shall be charged and collected thereon, but if not so paid, interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum shall be charged and collected from the time said tax accrued. * * * (2) The penalty of ten per cent. per annum imposed by subdivision (1) of this section for the non-payment of said tax, shall not be charged in cases where, in the judgment of the court, by reason of * * * unavoidable cause of delay, the estate of any decedent, or a part thereof, cannot be settled at the end of eighteen months from the death of the decedent; but in such cases seven per cent. per annum shall be charged upon the said tax from the expiration of said eighteen months until the cause of such delay is removed. * * *

Concerning the first two payments and their application solely to principal there is no controversy, for the reason that no interest thereon had as yet become chargeable. Receipts therefor were issued, signed by the treasurer and countersigned by the controller, showing application to "Amount of Tax." In the form of receipt was a line to show payment, if any, to "Amount of Interest." This line in each case was left blank so that each receipt indicated unquestionably that the payment was applied to principal. Prior to the order of September 13, 1923, finding that the delays in the ascertainment of the amount of tax were unavoidable, and fixing the rate of interest, seven different advance payments were made on account of said inheritance taxes as above indicated. The aggregate of these payments exceeded the amount of the principal on the tax chargeable against the devisees and legatees under said will in accordance with the report of the inheritance tax appraiser. Upon each of said seven payments a receipt similar in form to the receipts for the first two payments was issued, also signed by the treasurer and countersigned by the controller, wherein the whole amount of such payment was applied to "Amount of Tax," and the line providing for an application of any portion of the payment to "Amount of Interest" was left blank, showing no application of any portion of said payment to interest at the time the receipts were issued. To their answer filed November 8, 1923, to the petition of appellants "for instructions and order as to computation of interest," the respondents attached a schedule wherein and whereby they sought and do now seek to apply on account of interest, retroactively as of the time of payment of each of the aforesaid seven payments, the portions thereof that would amount to interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and to apply the balance to the account of principal retroactively as of the date of such payment. They assume to justify their action on the ground that it is the method of procedure followed in ordinary commercial practice.

As defined in the testimony of one of the respondents' witnesses, and upon which testimony the order complained of must largely rest, said commercial method consists in this, that when a payment is made the accrued interest is computed on the entire unpaid balance up to the date of payment, and the payment is applied first to the reduction of interest and the balance, if any, to the reduction of principal. But the undisputed facts disclosed by the record do not permit the respondents to square their action with this definition of said commercial method. In the first place it was not possible to ascertain the amount of the unpaid balance of principal at the time of any of said seven payments, for the reason that the inheritance tax appraiser had not as yet filed his report, and it was upon the confirmation of this report that the amount of the tax first became ascertainable (Stats. 1917, p. 896, § 16 [2]), and, secondly, the rate of interest at the time of any of said payments was not fixed. It is difficult to perceive how a payment could thus be split when neither the unpaid balance of principal, upon which the accrued interest must be computed, nor the rate of interest was possible of ascertainment at the time of payment. It is true that at the time of the respondents' retroactive computation in November, 1923, the total amount of principal and the interest rate were certain, but they were not liquidated nor possible of ascertainment until the court confirmed the report of the inheritance tax appraiser and fixed the rate of interest in September, 1923, which was long after the said seven payments had been made. The same witness testified for respondents that to constitute compound interest it is necessary that there be stated rests at which the interest is computed and added to the principal. He further testified on cross-examination, after making and comparing computations, that the results in money and in the amount of interest to be paid were exactly the same by the said commercial method as by compound interest.

It is obvious that to apply the compound interest method or the said commercial method there must be available at the time of the application of payment by the debtor an ascertained principal upon which to compute the interest and a certain rate of interest, neither of which was present at the time of the payments by the appellants. Whatever may be the proper definition of compound interest or of the commercial method, the result of the computation of the respondents as made in this case was to charge interest on interest, a result which, if effected, the respondents concede was unauthorized. If the appellants had not been diligent in anticipating the demands of the state and had retained the entire amount of the principal until the amount of such principal became determined by the confirmation of the report of the inheritance tax appraiser and the court fixed the rate of interest under the statute, it would scarcely be contended that they would be liable for more than the amount of the principal and simple interest thereon to the date of payment. Having exercised such diligence, it is clear that they should not be subjected to exactions except the same be clearly authorized by statute or by agreement of the parties, and no such authorization is here shown.

The course of action of the respondents in issuing the receipts for the money when and as paid constitutes another reason why they should not now be permitted to contend that said receipts do not mean what they purport to mean on the face thereof. In each instance they indicated that the payment was applied to the "Amount of Tax" in the full amount paid, and of the application of no portion of the same on "Amount of Interest," although the form of receipt plainly contemplated that if any portion of the payment were to be applied to interest the amount should be stated in the space provided for that purpose. The appellants had the right to rely on the receipts as issued, and when so relied upon under the circumstances here shown, the respondents may not question their effect. See Seward v. Fiskens, 210 P. 378, 122 Wash. 225, 27 A. L. R. 1208.

The order appealed from, in so far as it imposes upon the devisees and legatees under said will, whom the appellants represent, the payment complained of, lacks support in the record. On the contrary, the undisputed facts support the appellants' contentions.

The said order is therefore modified by reducing the amount chargeable as against the appellants to the extent of $8,261.80, and the lower court is directed to order reimbursement to appellants of that sum in accordance with the requirements of subdivision 3 of section 11 of said act. Stats. 1917, p. 891. The said order is otherwise affirmed.

NOBLE v. NOBLE et al. (S. F. 11057.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1926.
Petitions for Modification and Rehearing Denied March 1, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1078(1).

Specification of alleged errors not mentioned in appellants' briefs may be treated as abandoned.

2. Appeal and error ⇨694(1).

Specifications of insufficiency of evidence to support findings are unavailing, where evidence is not produced on appeal.

3. Trusts ⇨373—Findings held not to show that trust property could not be identified.

In action to recover a trust fund, findings that trustee without knowledge, consent, or ratification of cestui que trust sold trust property, and deposited proceeds to his own credit, for which he rendered no accounting, held not to show claim that trust property was so intermingled with property of trustee that identity thereof could not be traced.

4. Trusts ⇨244—Representatives of trustee, leaving a solvent estate, stand in no better relation to trust property than trustee himself would have occupied.

Where trustee leaves a solvent estate with no creditors, his heirs or personal representatives stand in no other or better relation to trust and properties thereof than trustee would have occupied if living.

5. Trusts ⇨354—Depositing of proceeds of trust to personal credit of trustee held not to relieve trustee of duty of rendering account or to relegate trustor to position of general creditor.

The trustee of an express trust, by converting corpus of trust into money and depositing proceeds in own name to his personal credit, cannot thereby relieve himself of duty to render an account of his trust and relegate trustor to position of a general creditor of himself or of his entirely solvent estate.

6. Trusts ⇨359(2)—Beneficiary of trust may proceed in equity to recover trust against fund with which his trust money has been intermingled.

When a trustee mingles trust money with his own funds, the beneficiary is not, on death of trustee, relegated to position of an ordinary creditor of his estate, but may proceed in equity uity against the fund with which his trust money has been intermingled.

7. Trusts ⚡244—Liability of trustee for negligence in handling trust property not part of corpus of trust which cestui can impose upon trustee's estate.

Trustee's responsibilities, arising out of negligent handling of trust property, is a personal liability, enforceable against his estate, but does not form part of corpus of trust property which cestui is entitled to follow into hands of executors.

8. Trusts ⚡348—Cestui entitled to recover entire amount of proceeds of trust property traced into hands of executors of trustee's estate.

In action to recover trust property, where trustee, without knowledge, consent, or ratification of cestui que trust, sold trust property, and deposited proceeds to his own credit without rendering an accounting, cestui held entitled to receive without diminution the amount so deposited and traced into hands of executors of trustee's estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action to establish a trust by Floride Noble against Edward B. Noble and another, trustees in the stead of Patrick Noble, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified.

See, also, 239 P. 51.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Mervyn R. Dowd and John E. Bennett, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. [1, 2] This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action brought by her against the defendants who are sued in the capacity of trustees in the stead of her deceased brother, Patrick Noble, to have a trust impressed upon the properties of his estate in the hands of said defendants as executors thereof. The appeal is upon the judgment roll and bill of exceptions which does not purport to set forth all of the evidence in the case. The appellants specify in said bill 10 alleged errors of law committed by the trial court in the course of the trial of the cause, but, as none of these is mentioned or commented upon in the briefs of appellants' counsel, they may be treated as having been abandoned upon appeal. The appellants also specify a number of respects wherein the evidence is asserted to be insufficient to support the findings of the trial court, but, since the evidence has not been produced upon this appeal, these specifications are also unavailing. The matters to be discussed upon this appeal are thus much simplified, and are in fact reduced to but two inquiries: First, as to whether the findings support the judgment establishing the trust for any amount whatever, and, second, whether the findings support the judgment to the full extent of the plaintiff's claim; and, if not, to what amount or extent? The facts required to be collated from the findings as necessary to the determination of these two questions are few and simple. The plaintiff was, in the year 1908, the owner of a certain piece of improved real estate in the city of Santa Monica in this state of the admitted value of $7,500. She was a young and inexperienced woman, and the sister of Patrick Noble, an elder brother, a lawyer, and a man of business and affairs, who came to her in that year with the suggestion that she convey said property to him without consideration, but with the understanding that he was to hold the same in trust for her, to render it productive of good interest, and to return it to her whenever she should want it or he should no longer wish to handle it. He was to have full control of the property to manage as he saw fit, and to sell or exchange for her benefit if he so desired. Having the fullest confidence in her brother, the plaintiff made the conveyance, and thereafter for about two years continued to live upon the property, and to collect and keep for her own use the rents and avails of the property, amounting variously to from $75 to $125 a month. In 1910 Patrick Noble exchanged this property for a house and lot in San Francisco, the rents and issues whereof from that time forth he collected and kept. There were other transactions between the parties growing out of the estate of their deceased mother, and also involving the care and support of a younger brother, which it is not necessary here to review for the reason that the findings do not show these to be material to a determination of either of the questions involved in this appeal. In the year 1919 Patrick Noble sold the San Francisco property for the net sum of $3,684.14, which sum he deposited in his own name in a commercial account which he had theretofore established with the Anglo-California Trust Company, and upon which he drew and made deposits for his own purposes up to the time of his death, which occurred in October, 1920. For some time prior to his death Patrick Noble also maintained both a savings and a commercial account with the Mission Bank, and at the time of his death he had in said savings account the sum of $462.22, and in said commercial account the sum of $1,430.47. He was also the owner during his lifetime and at the time of his death of bonds in various corporations of the aggregate value of $26,112.12 and of real estate of the value of $5,500. He left no creditors, and by his will devised his estate to his son and heir, with defendants herein named as the executors thereof. For some years prior to his death the plaintiff had from time to time suggested to Patrick Noble that he convey back to her the trust property in the form in which it then was, but he had always put her off with the statement in effect that everything was all right, and that he did not wish her to be troubled or to be troubled himself about the matter. The plaintiff was aware of the transaction by which the Santa Monica property had been exchanged for the San Francisco real estate, and had consented thereto; but she was entirely unaware that the San Francisco property had been sold by Patrick Noble or that he had received and intermingled with his own accounts and properties the sum received therefor until after his death. She then brought this action, with the result that the trial court determined and decreed that the defendants, as executors of the estate of Patrick Noble, deceased, are trustees of plaintiff's property standing in his stead; that the value of the property of plaintiff originally impressed with said trust was the sum of $7,500, less certain advances made by Patrick Noble during his lifetime, amounting to $1,416.43, leaving a balance of $6,083.57, which the defendants as the trustees and executors of his estate were directed and decreed to pay over to plaintiff in fulfillment of said trust.

[3-5] The first contention which the appellants urge upon this appeal is that, since the findings herein show that Patrick Noble in his lifetime so intermingled the property of the plaintiff held by him in trust with his own properties that the identity thereof can no longer be traced, the plaintiff cannot recover in this form of action, but has thereby been relegated to the position of a general creditor of his said estate, and that, not having filed a claim against his said estate in the capacity of such creditor, as required by law, she cannot recover any sum whatever in the present action. We are not satisfied that the findings herein are susceptible of the interpretation which the appellants would have us place upon them. The answer of the defendants denies in detail and in its entirety the averments of plaintiff's amended complaint as to the creation and existence of any such trust as is set forth therein. The trial court found that the allegations of the plaintiff's amended complaint were true, and that the denials and affirmative allegations of the defendants' answer were untrue. The trial court further found that on or about October 20, 1919, Patrick Noble, without the knowledge or consent or subsequent ratification of said plaintiff, had sold the trust property then situated in San Francisco for the sum of $4,000, the net of which amount he had deposited in the Anglo-California Trust Company to the credit of his own account in that bank, and for which he had rendered to the plaintiff no accounting. The findings go no further, and much of the argument which the appellants predicate upon Patrick Noble's subsequent withdrawals of practically the whole of this deposit is based upon fragmentary excerpts from the evidence which has not in its entirety been embraced in the record before us. We would be loath to hold that the mere deposit by a trustee of the moneys of his cestui que trust in his own personal account would constitute such an intermingling of the trust funds with his own funds as to obliterate the corpus of the trust and relegate the cestui que trust to the position of a mere general creditor of the trustee's estate. We are cited to no authorities that go to the extent of so holding, and we are satisfied that none such exist. But, aside from this insufficiency of the findings to furnish a basis for the appellants' contention, we are not satisfied with their statement of the law governing such a case as this. The appellants strongly rely upon the case of Lathrop v. Bampton, 31 Cal. 1733, 89 Am. Dec. 141, as sustaining their contention that, when a trustee has commingled with his own funds the corpus of the trust, the right of the trustor to assert the special lien of the original trust against the general estate of the trustee is thereby lost. We do not so read that case, since in that case it appeared that the estate of the trustee was insolvent, and the utmost that the court can be credited with holding is that the cestui que trust under such circumstances could be given no special lien upon the trustee's insolvent estate which would be superior to that of any other creditor therein. It is not necessary to even discuss the obvious equity of such a holding, but such a holding has no application to the facts of this case wherein the trustee left a solvent estate with no creditors, and wherein his heir or his personal representatives cannot be conceived as standing on any other or better relation to the trust and the properties thereof than that which the trustee himself would have occupied if a living defendant in this action. Neither can we conceive of a state of the law by which a trustee of an express trust by the mere process of converting the corpus of the trust into money and depositing the same in his own name and to his personal credit in his bank could thereby relieve himself of his duty to render an account of his trust and relegate his confiding trustor to the position of a general creditor of himself or of his entirely solvent estate. We are cited by the respondent to another very early case in our decisions which seems to set forth the true rule in a situation similar to that presented by the case at bar.

[6] It is the case of Gunter v. Janes, 9 Cal. 643. It was therein held that, when a trustee mingles trust moneys with other funds of his own, the beneficiary is not, upon the death of the trustee, relegated to the position of an ordinary creditor of his estate, but may proceed in equity against the fund with which his trust moneys have been intermingled. In the opinion of the court upon rehearing, the court makes perfectly clear its position with respect to such a transaction on the part of a trustee; and in so doing quotes the language of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Docker v. Somes, 2 Myne & Keen, 655, as being distinguished with clearness, justice, and force. The court points out the distinction to be borne in mind in cases where the rights of creditors of the deceased trustee are involved as against those wherein the contest is solely between the cestui que trust and the administrator of the deceased trustee. We find no different rule laid down in any of the later decisions of this court to which we have been referred. The case of Estate of Harrison Arms, 199 P. 153, 186 Cal. 554, cited by the appellants, is clearly distinguishable as to its facts from the case at bar, since it appears that the trust property involved in that case was with the full and long-continued consent of the trustor so commingled with the property of the trustee that no part of it could be definitely traced or segregated from that of the trustee, while as to the law the court confines its discussion to the scope of the early case of Lathrop v. Bampton, supra, to the effect that the trustor "has in such a case no special lien upon the general estate of the trustee which is superior to that of any other creditor." In the case of Elizalde v. Elizalde, 66 P. 369, 70 P. 861, 137 Cal. 634, also cited by the appellants, it appears that the controversy was one between the alleged trustor and other creditors of the deceased trustee, but even in such a case the court cites with approval the following language used in Lewin on Trusts, 894:

"If a trustee pay trust money into a bank to the account of himself, not in any way earmarked with the trust and also keeps private moneys of his own in the same account, the court will disentangle the account and separate the trust from the private moneys and award the former specifically to the cestui que trust," —and this, says this court, it will do even if the trustee, after so mingling the funds, has drawn therefrom from time to time, since it will be presumed that the moneys so drawn were from his own portion of the fund rather than from the moneys held by him in trust. The most recent utterance of this court touching this subject is that found in Newport v. Hatton (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 987, wherein it was held that—

"When the money or property of the trustor can be traced into a particular fund or deposit, where it remains, though mingled with other money, the beneficiary may seek to follow the specific personal property and enforce the trust. Though the identical pieces of coin cannot be ascertained, yet if there is so much belonging to the trust in a general heap of private and trust funds, the cestui que trust is entitled to take so much out."

That this court evidently thought that the foregoing doctrine was in harmony with its holdings in the case of Elizalde v. Elizalde and Estate of Harrison Arms, supra, appears from the citation in support thereof. We therefore conclude that the findings in the instant case are sufficient to sustain that portion of the judgment of the trial court which holds that the plaintiff was entitled to have imposed upon the estate of Patrick Noble a trust for some portion of the original corpus of the trust of which he had become the trustee without the necessity of presenting a claim against the estate of such trustee.

[7, 8] A more difficult question is presented when we come to consider the extent to which the plaintiff is entitled to go in her assertion of a right to impose the entire amount and value of the original trust property upon the estate of said trustee. By the findings of the trial court it is expressly found that, while the value of the original property of the plaintiff transferred in trust to Patrick Noble was $7,500, it has also found that the property so taken in trust was subject to a mortgage to the amount of $1,416.40, which the trustee had paid off out of his own funds. It has further found that the said trustee had, with the consent of the trustor, exchanged said property for other property situate in San Francisco. The court then proceeds to find that Patrick Noble negligently suffered this last-named property to fall into disrepair to such an extent that the rental value thereof was greatly diminished, and that such disrepair continued to the date of the sale thereof for the gross sum of $4,000. It is true that the trial court also finds that said Patrick Noble did not intend that the trustor should suffer loss through his negligent handling of the trust property, and that he intended to stand responsible to her for the value of the trust property as he received it, but this latter finding does not change the situation which arises out of the fact that he sold the property for but $4,000, and that the sum remaining as a result of said sale, viz. the sum of $3,684.14, constituted all of the corpus of said trust which had come into his hands as a result of such sale, and also constituted all of the money representing such corpus of the trust property which had been deposited by him to his own account in his bank, and which was in any way identifiable as constituting the trust property in his hands. His responsibility to his cestui que trust arising out of his negligent handling of the trust property, while doubtless existent, was a personal liability which would properly form the foundation of a claim against his estate, but it could not be said to form a part of the corpus of the trust property which the plaintiff would be entitled to follow into the hands of the executors of the deceased trustee's estate. As to such a liability the plaintiff would be relegated to the remedies provided for the violation of trust obligations in the ordinary course of law. 39 Cyc. pp. 513, 514, and cases cited. On the other hand, we think the plaintiff would be entitled to receive without diminution the entire remaining corpus which she had succeeded in tracing into the hands of those upon whom his estate had devolved. This amount, as we have seen, was the sum of $3,684.14, which the trial court found to be the net amount deposited to his bank account by the trustee after the sale of the trust property. The judgment should have been confined to said sum. It is therefore so modified as to order, adjudge, and decree that the defendants, as trustees and executors of Patrick Noble, deceased, and his estate pay unto plaintiff in pursuance hereof the sum of $3,684.14, together with costs taxed at $78, and that the plaintiff herein recover her costs upon this appeal.

DALEY v. IRWIN. (Civ. 5279.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 23, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 8, 1926.)

1. Principal and agent ⇨177(4)—Buyer of barley held not entitled to consequential damages for breach of warranty, where drivers had knowledge.

Buyer of barley seed was not entitled to consequential damages, where his drivers continued to receive and plant it after discovering breach of warranty of quality, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2020, 2295, 2316, 2320, 2332, and section 2319, subd. 1; they being his agents and having information as to quality of seed ordered.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1061(3)—Defeat of counterclaim in action for breach of warranty held in effect general damages for plaintiff.

In action for breach of warranty of barley seed where plaintiff was nonsuited but after admitting he received barley defeated defendant on counterclaim for contract price thereof on claim that it was worthless, he was not entitled to nominal or general damages, which he first claimed at time of oral argument, since defendant's defeat on counterclaim was in effect general damages for breach of warranty of quality of personal property as provided in Civ. Code, § 3313.

3. Appeal and error ⇨709, 901—Appellate court not required to make independent investigation, where appellant did not show judgment appealed from contrary to statute.

Where plaintiff complained of provision in judgment awarding costs to defendant, but cited no statutory provisions showing he had been injured, and record did not show whether purported judgment was ever entered or recorded, appellate court was not called upon to make independent investigation.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

Action by George R. Daley against I. Isaac Irwin, doing business under the fictitious name of Irwin & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, for appellant.

William G. Mirow, J. Clyde Hizar, and Sloane & Sloane, all of San Diego, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is a second appeal in the above-entitled action. Daley v. Irwin, 56 Cal. App. 325, 205 P. 76. The general facts are fully stated in that decision and need not be repeated. After the first appeal had been decided, the case was tried again in the trial court sitting with a jury. When the plaintiff rested and before the defendant commenced to introduce any proof, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit. The motion was granted and a judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed and has brought up a bill of exceptions.

Before proceeding further, it becomes necessary to advert to the peculiar condition of the pleadings. In his complaint the plaintiff pleaded the making of the contract with the defendant for the purchase of a large quantity of barley for seed. He pleaded facts showing that the defendant warranted the seed as re-cleaned. Thereupon he pleaded a breach of the contract by delivery of uncleaned barley. He followed those allegations with numerous allegations of consequential damage. However, he did not insert any allegations regarding nominal damages or regarding general damages. The defendant interposed an answer containing certain denials and also certain new matter. He also interposed a cross-complaint alleging by the use of a common count the sale to the plaintiff of goods, wares, and merchandise in the sum of $1,390.04. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint by alleging:

"Answering the allegations contained in paragraph 2 of the said cross-complaint, the plaintiff denies that he is indebted to the defendant in the sum of $1,301.31, or $88.73 interest. Admits that he has not paid for 292 sacks of barley seed purchased from the defendant at the agreed price of $1,275.01, but alleges that the said barley seed was valueless for the purpose for which it was purchased as more fully appears from the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint contained."

On the trial of the case the plaintiff assumed the burden of proof. He called witnesses and elicited testimony to prove the allegations of his complaint. To a great extent the evidence was the same as the evidence on the first trial as reported in Daley v. Irwin, supra. However, on the second trial Mr. Daley testified flatly that he did not have a foreman employed; that Romero, Bennett, Ramos, and Long each brought the necessary farming implements and teams, and each was directed to plow the ground and seed it with barley. He further testified that he told each of them that he had purchased the seed from Irwin & Co.; that it was not dirty barley, but was clean barley; and that when they needed barley for seed each one was to direct Daley's truckman, Edge, or another truckman, Cooper, to bring barley or to call up Daley's house and ask Mrs. Daley to have barley sent to the ranch. He also testified that if Ramos, Romero, Bennett, or Long, was going to town, and if the driver should be in need of grain, the person so going to town should bring back barley. The plaintiff also called as witnesses Cooper, Edge, Ramos, and Romero. Each one testified that he opened one or more sacks, and that each sack contained barley that had not been recleaned. Cooper, Ramos, and Romero testified that the barley was so dirty that it would not go through the drills. Complaint was made by the drivers to the truckmen, and the truckmen examined sacks of grain and found the same conditions. Immediately after ordering the seed from Irwin & Co., the plaintiff went to Imperial Valley and did not return to the ranch for three weeks. During that time the dirty barley was received by the planters, and much of it was planted, without any express notice to the plaintiff that the seed that was being delivered was dirty. When the plaintiff returned to his ranch, he found that the drivers were receiving and planting dirty barley and were having a great deal of difficulty in getting the drill to plant. Thereupon he stopped them from using the seed received from Irwin & Co., purchased seed elsewhere, and proceeded to finish the planting.

[1] In getting seed from the defendant the foregoing facts show that the driver was an agent (Civ. Code, § 2295); each agent was bound to use ordinary diligence to inform the plaintiff as to his acts in the course of the agency (Civ. Code, § 2020); each had the actual authority to receive from Irwin & Co. recleaned barley and to plant recleaned barley on the plaintiff's ranch (Civ. Code, § 2316); each had the necessary authority to see that the barley delivered for seeding was recleaned barley or to refuse to plant it (Civ. Code, § 2319, subd. 1); and in so doing to stop work if necessary (Civ. Code, § 2320). In the discharge of the foregoing duties notice to the drivers was notice to their principal. Civ. Code, § 2332; Barrett v. Metropolitan Contracting Co., 172 Cal. 116, 155 P. 645; Trentor v. Pothén, 46 Minn. 298, 49 N. W. 129, 24 Am. St. Rep. 225, 228; Daley v. Irwin, supra. Notwithstanding that the drivers from the very beginning knew the condition of the seed that was being delivered, they neglected to report the condition to the plaintiff and proceeded to plant it. Under such facts the plaintiff was not entitled to recover consequential damages. Williston on Sales, p. 860; Daley v. Irwin, supra.

[2] So far as consequential damages are concerned, it is clear that there was no error in granting the motion for a nonsuit. At the time of the oral argument the appellant presented for the first time the contention that the appellant was entitled to recover at least nominal damages. At the same time we understood him to claim that he was entitled to recover general damages. Civ. Code, § 3313. While those contentions might have merit in many instances, we think that the contentions are not supported by the record in this case. Immediately after the nonsuit was granted the court and jury proceeded to hear the issues as presented by the cross-complaint and the appellant's answer thereto, and the jury brought in a verdict in favor of the appellant and against the defendant on the cross-complaint. It will be observed that the appellant's answer to the cross-complaint admitted the delivery to him of 292 sacks of barley and that it had not been paid for and that it was worthless. The verdict of the jury implies a finding in favor of the appellant on each of those allegations. They are in effect a finding in favor of the appellant of general damages in the sum of $1,275.01. That was the whole demand which the appellant had made in his pleading.

[3] At the time of the argument and in a supplemental brief, the appellant complains of the provision in the judgment of $353.80 costs in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. He cites no statutory provision or authority showing that he has been injured. The record before us shows an appeal from a judgment entered on the 19th day of June, 1922. It shows a document called "Judgment on Verdict in Open Court," recorded June 15, 1922; but said document does not purport to be a judgment except it is so named. The record also discloses what purports to be a judgment of nonsuit, dated June 16, 1922, but it does not appear whether such instrument was ever entered or recorded. The paper last mentioned purports to award costs in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. It is merely by argument that we can say that such paper is the judgment appealed from. Assuming that it is, the appellant does not attempt to show to this court that the judgment for costs was not in accordance with the provisions of the statute. People v. Singh, 182 Cal. 457, 480, 188 P. 987. This court is not called upon, under such circumstances, to make an independent investigation.

The judgment is affirmed.

SPALDING v. SPALDING et al. (Civ. 2966.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 14, 1925. Rehearing Denied Jan. 13, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 11, 1926.)

1. Divorce ⇨276(4)—Letters held to show that parents held property in trust for son in furtherance of fraudulent scheme to defraud divorced wife.

Letters from parents to son held to show that parents, who participated in son's fraudulent scheme to defraud divorced wife held property either in trust for son or pursuant to an agreement that they were to have a life estate therein.

2. Frauds, statute of ⇨118(3)—Trusts ⇨21(1)—Letters from parents to son held sufficient to declare trust or satisfy statute of frauds, if property was held under oral agreement.

Letters from parents to son relative to improving property and acknowledging remittances from son held sufficient declaration of trust, if property was held in trust, and sufficient to satisfy statute of frauds, if property was held under oral agreement that it was to be transferred to son on their death.

3. Judgment ⇨929—Decree of foreign court directing conveyance does not affect title, but is sufficient basis for action to compel conveyance.

While decree of foreign court directing conveyance of property to divorced wife does not of itself affect title to land, it is sufficient basis for an action in courts of state in which land is situated to compel such conveyance.

4. Divorce ⇨275(2)—Divorced wife, having foreign judgment directing conveyance of real estate, entitled to conveyance, where parents had conveyed property to son for valuable consideration, and subsequent conveyance to them was fraudulent.

Divorced wife, having foreign judgment directing husband to convey real estate, held entitled to property conveyed to husband by parents for a valuable consideration, and reconveyed by husband to parents without consideration to defeat wife's rights.

5. Divorce ⇨276(3) — Amendment of complaint to conform to proofs made at trial should have been allowed, in view of letters sustaining proposed amendment.

6. Pleading ⇨127(2)—Answer held not admission that son furnished all money for purchase and improvement of real estate.

Where complaint alleged that defendant delivered to his parents large sums of money for purchase and improvement of real estate, allegation in answer that defendant furnished specified sums of money as gifts held not an admission that defendant furnished all the money used in purchasing and improving property.

7. Divorce ⇨276(5)—Divorced wife who recovered one-half of real property ordered conveyed by foreign judgment is entitled to deficiency judgment for balance.

Where divorced wife obtained foreign money judgment against husband providing for conveyance of real property in satisfaction thereof, and in action thereon was awarded one-half of real property, she was entitled to deficiency judgment for balance.

8. Equity ⇨39(1)—Court of equity should adjust rights of all when all parties to controversy are before it.

It is the duty of a court of equity when all of the parties to the controversy are before it to adjust the rights of all, and leave nothing open for further litigation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Mattie J. Spalding against John B. Spalding, T. B. Spalding, and Dora M. Spalding, wherein John Bostwick Spalding and Robert Blaine Spalding, as executors of Dora M. Spalding, deceased, and Elizabeth Blanche Spalding, as successor in interest of said Dora M. Spalding, were substituted for Dora M. Spalding, and John Bostwick Spalding, as executor of Thos. Benton Spalding, also known as T. B. Spalding, substituted for T. B. Spalding. From a judgment for insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Orville R. Seiter, of Chicago, Ill., and Francis O. Hoover, of Modesto, for appellants.

A. J. Carlson, of Modesto, and W. Coburn Cook, of Turlock, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff against defendant John B. Spalding and his parents, T. B. Spalding, and Dora M. Spalding. Both of the parents died prior to the entry of judgment, and their executors were substituted as parties defendant. The pleadings, findings, and judgment cover 288 pages of the printed transcript. A general statement of the case will be taken from the findings, and only such parts of the pleadings will be set out as are necessary to an intelligible discussion of the questions raised by the appeal.

The court found that plaintiff was married to defendant John B. Spalding December 25, 1894; that the issue of the marriage is one child, a daughter; that June 3, 1904, plaintiff filed in the circuit court of Kenosha county, Wis., her petition for a divorce from said defendant; that he was personally served with process in the action, and appeared therein in person and by attorney; that judgment therein was entered July 12, 1904, granting plaintiff a divorce, and requiring said defendant to pay plaintiff certain sums as alimony and for the maintenance of the child of the parties; that the judgment for alimony and maintenance was modified from time to time by said circuit court; that on the 16th day of December, 1918, the plaintiff filed her petition in said court and cause, praying for a division of the property of said defendant; that said defendant "entered his general appearance in said cause, and by his attorneys filed an answer to the merits of plaintiff's said petition"; that a trial of the issues raised by said petition and answer was had, and said circuit court entered judgment and decree ordering said defendant forthwith to pay plaintiff the aggregate sum of $30,016.60 and in full satisfaction thereof, "within five days from the date of said judgment and decree to execute, acknowledge, and deliver to plaintiff, Mattie J. Spalding, a valid conveyance under the laws of the state of California * * * of and to the hereinafter described real estate"; that said defendant has not paid any part of the judgment or executed said conveyance; that said judgment and decree has not been "set aside nor reversed on appeal nor amended nor modified." The real estate referred to consists of 53.9 acres of land in the county of Stanislaus, state of California, standing of record in the names of T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding. The court in this case further found:

"That defendant John B. Spalding, on or about September 1, 1906, conceived the fraudulent scheme and intention of hindering, delaying, and defrauding plaintiff of all rights, demands, claims, and causes of action accruing and to accrue to plaintiff against said defendant John B. Spalding under said judgment of July 12, 1904, entered by said circuit court of Kenosha county, Wis., and such amendments as might subsequently be made thereto; and in pursuance of said fraudulent scheme, intent, and purpose, and with the actual knowledge of and participation therein by defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding, parents of defendant John B. Spalding, defendant John B. Spalding, between May 1, 1909, and July 1, 1915, and while defendant John B. Spalding was insolvent, and without consideration, transferred and delivered to the defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding large sums of money, to wit, thousands of dollars, which said moneys were transferred and delivered as aforesaid, to be used, and which were used, in the part payment of the purchase price of certain hereinafter described real estate, and for the payment of certain hereinafter mentioned mortgage notes evidencing money borrowed and used in the payment of part of the purchase price of the said property, and for improvements thereon; * * * that the total amount of money so expended by and through the said T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding for the purchase of the said property and for improvements thereon as hereinabove set forth was $15,000; and that the total amount of money given, transferred, and delivered to T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding by the defendant John B. Spalding in pursuance of said fraudulent scheme, intent, and purpose of defrauding plaintiff, Mattie J. Spalding, as aforesaid, and with the knowledge of and participation therein by defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding, as hereinabove set forth, and in the manner hereinbefore stated in this paragraph, was the sum of $7,500; and that the said $7,500 so paid, transferred, and delivered by the said John B. Spalding to the said T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding, in the manner and for the purposes hereinabove set forth, constituted and amounted to one-half of the total amount of money so expended by and through the said T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding for the purchase of the said real property and the improvement thereon as hereinabove set forth"; that the present value of said real estate is $26,000; "that on the 20th day of May, 1917, defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding executed and delivered their deed of grant, bargain and sale, under seal, for a recited money consideration, conveying said real estate to the defendant John B. Spalding. And that thereafter, on the 20th day of May, 1917, defendant John B. Spalding, in the furtherance of his fraudulent scheme, intention, and purpose to defraud the plaintiff, Mattie J. Spalding, as aforesaid, and with the actual knowledge and acquiescence thereof and participation therein by defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding, executed and delivered his deed of grant, bargain, and sale, attempting to convey said real estate to the defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding in joint tenancy; that said deed of John B. Spalding was executed and delivered without consideration therefor, and while defendant John B. Spalding, was insolvent; that at all times from September 1, 1906, to the date hereof, defendant John B. Spalding, in pursuance of his fraudulent scheme, intention, and purpose to defraud plaintiff, Mattie J. Spalding, as aforesaid, and with the knowledge and acquiescence thereof and participation therein by T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding, has secreted and concealed, and is now secreting and concealing, the title to all of said defendants' property by having the legal title to same taken and stand in the name or names of a third person or persons, with the result thereof that during all of said time, and particularly during the time said real property was being purchased, as aforesaid, and on May 20, 1917, and at the date thereof, none of the property of defendant John B. Spalding was or is subject to legal process and, by reason thereof John B. Spalding was and is insolvent; that at all times from July 12, 1904, to the date hereof, plaintiff was and is an existing creditor of the defendant John B. Spalding; that said defendant has no property or assets of any kind within the state of Wisconsin or the state of California, or elsewhere, other than the said real property"; that neither T. B. Spalding nor Dora M. Spalding at any time "made, executed, published, declared, or delivered in writing any declaration in substance or in effect that they or either of them were holding the legal title in the said real property or any part thereof for the use or benefit of the defendant John B. Spalding subject to a life interest in the favor of T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding or either of them; * * * and that neither the said T. B. Spalding nor Dora M. Spalding in any manner accepted any express trust as last above referred to; and that the equitable beneficial title or right to the said real property has not nor has any equitable beneficial title or right to any part thereof become vested in the defendant John B. Spalding by reason of any alleged express trust as last hereinabove referred to; and that all the rights of the said John B. Spalding and of the plaintiff herein in and to the said real property arise out of the matters and things hereinabove stated other than said alleged express trust;" and that said judgment of said circuit court "was, at the time of the trial of this action, and is, a valid, subsisting and final judgment in all respects." Judgment was entered on the findings, adjudging that defendant Elizabeth Blanche Spalding, as successor in interest of Dora M. Spalding, is the owner of an undivided half of said real property and that defendant John B. Spalding is the owner of an undivided half thereof, and directing the latter to convey his interest therein to plaintiff in accordance with the provisions of the Wisconsin judgment. Plaintiff has appealed from the judgment in so far as it adjudges Elizabeth Blanche Spalding to be the owner of a half interest in the property, and fails to adjudge that John B. Spalding is the owner of the whole thereof, and to direct that he convey the whole thereof to plaintiff, and also in so far as it fails to direct the entry of a deficiency judgment in favor of plaintiff against John B. Spalding.

T. B. and Dora M. Spalding were residing in the state of Illinois in the year 1907 and prior thereto. During that year T. B. Spalding went to Mexico, and later in that year his wife joined him there. From Mexico they removed to Victoria, British Columbia, and later to California, where, November 8, 1909, they entered into an agreement to purchase the land involved in this action for the sum of $5,309. The sum of $1,000 was paid upon the purchase price at the time of the execution of the contract, and the remainder was to be paid in three equal installments, payable two, three, and four years, respectively, after the date of the agreement. An expensive dwelling house and other valuable improvements were placed upon the land during the succeeding years, and on March 7, 1915, T. B. Spalding wrote the defendant John B. Spalding that "the ranch has all been paid for, the debt is all wiped out."

Dora M. Spalding testified that she and her husband paid for the land with their own money; that they had about $9,000 when they came to California; that she carried $6,500 in "large bills" in a belt around her waist; that defendant John B. Spalding sent his parents money "the same as the other children did. He never sent it expecting to ever get it back, and there was no account made of it, and never gave him anything to show that he had given him (T. B. Spalding) money, and it was put in the main lot of money that we had, and there was no thought we would ever have to account for what he gave him nor how much. * * * We have never made any profit to amount to anything; nothing like the land—that much land ought to pay. We have made something, but that was very little." Robert B. Spalding, a son of the last-named witness, testified that shortly before the purchase of the land he saw at least $5,000 in the possession of his parents, and that he made his father a gift of $500 in 1911 and $1,000 in 1912. Defendant John B. Spalding testified, in substance, that he had owned no property subject to execution, in his own name, since the year 1908, except an automobile; that "there was no understanding between himself and his father and mother * * * that the property at Turlock was being purchased for him or that he should ever have any greater interest in the same than the other children; that from 1908 to 1916 he practiced medicine at Kenosha, Wis.; that he had a large and lucrative practice; that he sent from time to time sums of money to his parents * * * in California; that he did not keep any record of the money he sent to his parents; * * * that, since his parents left Decatur, Ill., they had been in need of financial assistance, and he had continuously from 1908 up until the time of the trial contributed to their support"; that he could not approximate the amount of money he had sent them; that he sent them $500 in 1910, "hardly any" in 1911, and that "purely as a guess" he would say that he sent them $1,500 in 1912 and $1,500 in 1913. There is undisputed testimony to the effect that, after the judgment of divorce was granted, defendant John B. Spalding stated that he would never own any property in his own name; that he would put his property in his parents' names, and that in the year 1916 he stated to the daughter of himself and plaintiff, "I have been making a good deal of money, and I have put it in some property out west; my parents are living there. * * * It will be your home some day." From numerous letters admitted in evidence, written to defendant John B. Spalding by his parents, it appears that he sent them, in round numbers, $3,600 in 1912, $3,100 in 1913, $1,000 in 1914, and $300 in 1915. He admitted having sent them $500 in 1910. There are no letters covering the years 1910 and 1911, and he testified that he sent them "hardly any" money in 1911. He and his parents seem to have written each other frequently, but only the letters of the parents appear in the record. These letters cover nearly 300 pages of the transcript, and only the most material parts thereof will be quoted.

The father wrote the son, at the times indicated, as follows: February 10, 1909:

"We rely on your ability to manage our affairs as we are helpless to do it."

January 20, 1912:

"I need not assure you that we turn to you as the sunflower turns to the sun. Your health and happiness and prosperity are our bounty and blessing. The deep divine love and obligation I feel inspire me with an energetic ambition to build here a home that will be a haven and home and bounteous support and solace for you and yours as soon as possible. * * * I am shaping everything for your future convenience and comfort—because our age and enfeebled health admonish us that the end is but a few years ahead. * * * The development of this place is my remaining life work, and I am all the time distressed by the consciousness that the load you are compelled to carry across the thin ice may result in all our ruin."

February 23, 1912:

"As soon as debt is paid must inclose tank. * * * The yard is neglected from not being piped. * * * These two necessary things you have ordered done frequently, but we could not spare money from other pressing necessities. * * * It is our purpose to develop it (the property in controversy) and hold it as your country seat after we shall pass away."

April 17, 1912:

"Mattie's letter amuses me. * * * Don't answer her letters nor let her know anything about you or yours. If she knew about this place and this beautiful house and ranch, she would try to make you trouble."

August 12, 1912:

"I shall be very economical in the expenditure of every dollar you remit."

October 20, 1912:

"I deeply feel your amazing nobility and goodness to us, and when, in a very short time we shall be laid to eternal rest we hope to have reared in the beautiful home a monument that will doubly endear us to your memory."

October 23, 1912:

"As soon as all hay is removed will give you an itemized statement of everything. * * * You make suggestions about banking and keeping stub records. Why, don't you think all that is alphabet to me? I can trace by my bank books every dollar since I left Mexico. * * * Be careful of your health—for you and I must not lie down till we get things established."

November 5, 1912:

"Your interest here is sacred and will be safeguarded by any legal instrument you dictate. * * * You certainly merit solace and sympathy, and you can trust us for all both imply and everything material besides that we possess."

November 25, 1912:

"I wrote you a few days ago advising first the purchase of cows and sows, but since the rec't of this reinforcement I have decided to go to Modesto to-morrow and pay $500 on the mortgage."

Undated letter:

"We haven't spent a dollar from the proceeds of the place, but applied all on the place and all we have and could get, and four years of unremitting menial toil with never a dollar we could call our own, and now your letter criticizes and condemns because we don't buy cows with an occasional remittance of $25. * * * I never had and will never submit to a nagging boss. If you don't want to furnish money for this place—don't want to stock it so something can be derived from it, then don't do it. I would vastly prefer death to perpetual servitude. I can get me a salaried position that will be an infinite relief to me both physically and financially. You can have my job whenever you want it."

March 23, ———:

"Will give you acct of everything in full in a few days. * * * Your dream about Bob and Myrtle, like all dreams, may be taken by reverse. * * * They know the place is to pass to you, and that fact is settled, and will never be questioned. Mom is as loyal to you and your interest as I am, and both of us are too honorable and grateful to you to entertain any other thought than the one that has been settled and always since existed. When you come out we will execute instruments in writing—which I have always insisted as the proper and more business like way to transact important business. * * * I want to live long enough to see you comfortably fixed raising hens, hogs, hay, and dairy products."

March 7, 1915:

"There isn't one man in one hundred, if indeed any other besides yourself, so handicapped as you, who could have carved out of an overburdened profession the surplus thousands you have saved and sent out and invested here in this place. * * * I shall within a few weeks execute a deed or document defining our mutual status and understanding conveying to yourself and heirs this ranch after the death of myself and wife. It should have been done a long time ago."

T. B. Spalding rendered to John B. Spalding frequent itemized accounts of expenditures made upon the place, and apparently followed the latter's directions relative to the improvement and management thereof.

In undated letters to defendant John B. Spalding, but evidently written during the period of time covered by the foregoing letters, Dora M. Spalding stated:

"I ask myself many times each day, what we would have done if it hadn't been for you, and what you are doing for us, and I hope you will feel the time and work that we have put in on the home will at least pay you back in cents and dollars, if nothing else, if you decide not to live in it in years to come."

"Why haven't you answered my letter about fixing the bathroom up-stairs? Pop (T. B. Spalding) won't let me have it done without you write and tell me to have it done. Also about the fence. The chickens are eating up everything now."

"I am sorry you wrote to Pop the way you did, for it has stirred him all up, and he didn't sleep all last night, and thinks maybe it would be best to sell the place so you could get your money out of it, as you don't seem to be satisfied the way he has been doing and has been working and doing more than he is able to do. All for what? Something to eat and a place to sleep."

"Nothing could provoke me under any circumstances to use my position to transfer any part of the place to anybody for any price. I haven't a relative that would be low and mean enough to countenance it. All Pop and I have done here from the beginning has been done with a view to your finally owning and making this your home."

In a letter to her daughter, dated April 13, 1913, Dora M. Spalding stated:

"He (John B. Spalding) certainly has been very noble to put in all his earnings for a home for us in our old age, but I don't feel that he is losing anything by it, as it will be worth considerable more money when it will be turned over to him that what he has put in it."

There are no letters from John B. Spalding to his parents in the record, and what he may have written them can only be inferred from their letters to him.

[1-3] In the light of the court's finding, based upon ample evidence, that the parents knowingly participated in their son's fraudulent scheme to defraud plaintiff of her rights and claims under the Wisconsin judgment, the foregoing letters point unerringly to the conclusion that the parents held the property either in trust for their son or pursuant to an agreement and understanding, based upon a sufficient consideration, that they were to have a mere life estate therein, and that the whole thereof was to pass to the son upon their deaths. If they held the property in trust for the son, the letters are a sufficient declaration thereof. Lynch v. Rooney, 112 Cal. 279, 44 P. 565; Taber v. Bailey, 22 Cal. App. 617, 135 P. 975. If the parents held the property under an oral agreement that it was to be transferred to the son upon their death, then their letters were sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds. Cal. Jur. 902 to 905. Such a contract may be specifically enforced. Barry v. Beamer, 8 Cal. App. 200, 96 P. 373. If the defendant John B. Spalding is the equitable owner of the property, it may be subjected to the claims of the defendant. Williams v. Coleman (Cal. App.) 233 P. 397. While the decree of the Wisconsin court directing a conveyance of the property does not of itself affect the title to the land in this state, it is a sufficient basis for an action in the courts of this state to compel such conveyance. Redwood Investment Co. v. Exley, 64 Cal. App. 455, 221 P. 973.

[4] The complaint alleges that—

"On the 20th day of May, 1917, defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding for a good and valuable and adequate consideration, conveyed said real estate to said defendant, John B. Spalding; and that in the furtherance of the fraudulent designs and intentions of the defendant John B. Spalding, as aforesaid, and with the actual knowledge and acquiescence thereof and participation therein by defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding, as aforesaid, the defendant John B. Spalding on the 20th day of May, 1917, without consideration, conveyed said real estate to the defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding."

It was stipulated by the parties that these allegations be deemed denied. John B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding testified that both of said deeds were executed without consideration and as parts of a single transaction, "and for the purpose of creating in T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding a joint tenancy with the right of survivorship in said lands and premises instead of a tenancy in common." The written conveyance from the parents to their son is presumptive evidence of a consideration. The court failed to find upon this issue, but found merely that the deed was executed and delivered "for a recited money consideration." If there was a "good and valuable and adequate consideration" for the conveyance from the parents to the son, as alleged, then the whole title to the property thereby became vested in him, and the parents acquired no interest therein by the subsequent fraudulent conveyance to them, and consequently the judgment should have awarded the plaintiff the whole property.

[5] Plaintiff duly moved the court for an order permitting her to amend her complaint, to "conform to the proofs made at the trial," by alleging that "on or about January, 1909, defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding, orally contracted and agreed with defendant John B. Spalding, * * * in consideration of defendant John B. Spalding furnishing the necessary money to complete the purchase of the hereinbefore described real estate and to make the improvements to be created thereon, * * * the defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding would execute and deliver to defendant John B. Spalding such document or instrument in writing as would vest the fee-simple title to all of the hereinbefore described real estate in defendant John B. Spalding upon the death of defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding"; that John B. Spalding furnished large sums of money for the alleged purpose; and that, subsequent to said oral agreement, and in consideration of the furnishing of said money, T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding "promised and agreed in writing that the defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding would execute such document or instrument in writing as would vest the fee simple title to said real estate in defendant John B. Spalding upon the death of defendants T. B. Spalding and Dora M. Spalding." The motion was denied by the court. The statements quoted herein from letters written by the parents are amply sufficient to support the allegations of the proposed amendments to the complaint. While the trial court has a wide discretion in granting or refusing leave to file amendments to conform to the proofs, it is deemed that, in view of the necessity of a retrial, it will be in the interest of justice to permit plaintiff to amend her complaint by alleging the facts set forth in the said proposed amendments.

[6] Appellant contends that the answer admits that all the money used in the purchase and improvement of the property was furnished by John B. Spalding. This contention cannot be upheld. The complaint alleges that John B. Spalding delivered to his parents "large sums of money, to wit, thousands or dollars," for the purposes of and which were used by his parents "in the payment of the purchase price of certain hereinafter described real estate and * * * for improvements thereon and for cultivating and raising crops thereon, * * * and for the general operation and development of such property." Clearly this is not an allegation that John B. Spalding furnished all the money which was used for such purposes. The answer denies that John B. Spalding furnished said sums of money for the purposes alleged and alleges "that said ——— sums of money constituted gifts from the defendant John B. Spalding" to his parents "to be used by them as they saw fit." This affirmative allegation in the answer is not an admission that John B. Spalding furnished all the money used for the alleged purposes. For like reasons, appellant's contention that the findings show that John B. Spalding furnished all the money used in purchasing and improving the property is not sustained by the record.

[7] Appellant further contends that since the court found that defendant John B. Spalding was the owner of only an undivided half of the property, she should have been given a deficiency judgment for the difference between the amount of the Wisconsin judgment and the value of such undivided half of the property. In her complaint plaintiff prayed for a judgment to the effect that said defendant was the owner of the property, and that he be required to convey the same to her, and for "such other relief as may seem just and equitable." Prior to the entry of judgment she was granted "leave to file brief upon the question of entry of deficiency judgment." That question, therefore, was properly before the court for decision. The Wisconsin court found that the value of the property here involved was $30,000, and that "both the beneficial and equitable title" thereto was vested in said defendant, and the judgment therein provides:

"First. That defendant John B. Spalding forthwith pay to the plaintiff, Mattie J. Spalding, the sum of $25,000 as a judgment of and for final division and distribution of the estate of said John B. Spalding; that the costs of this proceeding, taxed against defendant John B. Spalding in the sum of $16.60 be paid by defendant to plaintiff forthwith; and that defendant John B. Spalding also forthwith pay to plaintiff, Mattie J. Spalding, as suit money in this behalf the sum of $5,000, $3,500 of said amount being for attorney fees and $1,500 of said amount being for disbursements; that this order shall have the same force and effect as a judgment at law, and shall vest in plaintiff, Mattie J. Spalding, the vested and unconditional right to have and recover from defendant John B. Spalding the aggregate sum of $30,016.60, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date hereof.

"Second. That in full satisfaction of the aggregate sum of money heretofore ordered to be paid by defendant to plaintiff, to wit, $30,016.60, as and for a judgment for final division and distribution of the estate of defendant John B. Spalding, including costs and suit money, defendant John B. Spalding shall, within five days from the date hereof, execute, acknowledge, and deliver to plaintiff, Mattie J. Spalding, a valid conveyance under the laws of the state of California, in form according to schedule at the foot hereof, of and to the hereinbefore described real estate of defendant John B. Spalding, situated in the county of Stanislaus, state of California, and that, on the default and failure of defendant John B. Spalding to execute said conveyance in manner and form as herein provided, execution may issue on this judgment without further order of court."

[8] It thus appears that plaintiff was given a money judgment for $30,016.60 and interest thereon, and that defendant was ordered to convey the property to plaintiff in full satisfaction of the money judgment. If the defendants in this action had succeeded in establishing their allegation that John B. Spalding had no interest in the property, he could not have satisfied the money judgment by executing a mere empty form of conveyance. It seems equally clear that, if he is the owner of only an undivided half of the property, a conveyance thereof to plaintiff cannot operate as a full satisfaction of such money judgment, but in such case a money judgment in favor of plaintiff should be given. "It is, indeed, the duty of a court of equity, when all the parties to the controversy are before it, to adjust the rights of all and leave nothing open for further litigation." Swan v. Talbot, 152 Cal. 142, 147, 94 P. 238, 240 (17 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1066); Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 474, 111 P. 360. If it finally be determined that John B. Spalding is the owner of only an undivided half of the property, then, in addition to a judgment requiring him to convey such undivided half to plaintiff, she will be entitled to a money judgment for the difference between the amount of the Wisconsin judgment and the value of such undivided half of the property as fixed by the Wisconsin court.

The parts of the judgment appealed from are reversed, and the trial court is directed to permit the plaintiff to amend her complaint as herein indicated.

PEOPLE v. HART et al. (Cr. 1255.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 21, 1925.)

Criminal law §1131(4)—Where appellant, at whose request argument of case was continued, failed to appear, held that appeal would be dismissed.

In view of Pen. Code, § 1253, where case on appeal was set twice for oral argument and continued on request of defendant, who on third call failed to appear, and appeal had not been perfected by filing statement and application required by section 1247, appeal will be dismissed.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

George Hart and Myrtle Kinney were convicted of burglary, and they appeal. Appeals dismissed.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellant Kinney.

PER CURIAM. No briefs were filed on behalf of defendants. The case was set twice for oral argument, and was continued because of letters of request from defendant Hart. On the third call of the case no appearance was made on behalf of defendant Hart, but Edward J. Kelly, appearing for defendant Kinney, was granted time, which has expired, in which to file a brief. Mr. Kelly informs the court by letter that he admits that the appeal of Kinney has not been perfected by the filing of the statement and application required by section 1247 of the Penal Code. Apparently, so far as the record shows, the same defect exists in the appeal of Hart.

Because of the facts above stated, and because of the failure of defendant Hart to appear when the case was called for argument (Pen. Code, § 1253), the appeals are dismissed.

NORMAN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5242.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 22, 1925.)

1. Mandamus §167—In absence of denial of material facts alleged in petition or new matter, no issue of fact is raised by the pleadings.

Where answer to writ of mandamus contained no substantial denial of any material facts alleged in petition, and did not set forth any new matter, which, if true, would defeat petitioner's right, the only question is whether facts alleged in petition are sufficient to entitle petitioner to writ.

2. Divorce §221—Court has no power to compel wife to pay costs of producing prisoner in another county at trial of divorce action.

The court has no power, in divorce action, to order a wife, whose husband is in prison under conviction for felony, to pay expense of producing him at trial of the action.

Original application for writ of mandate by Jennie L. Norman to compel the Superior Court of California in and for the County of Los Angeles, and Ira F. Thompson, Presiding Judge thereof, to proceed forthwith with the trial of a certain case. Writ granted.

T. J. K. MacGowen, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. Neal Ames, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Application for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, Ira F. Thompson, judge, to compel respondent to forthwith proceed with the trial of a certain action pending in said court.

[1] Petitioner, Jennie L. Norman, instituted, in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, an action for divorce against her husband, John W. Norman. Subsequently, the defendant in said action was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, a felony, and sentenced by the court to confinement in the state prison at San Quentin for the period prescribed by law. Thereafter, and while said defendant was still confined in said prison under said judgment of imprisonment, said divorce action came on for trial. After two short continuances, said action was again set for trial on the 2d day of October, 1925, at which time the defendant, through his attorney, moved the court, after due notice of the hearing of said motion had been given to the plaintiff in said action, for an order requiring plaintiff to pay to the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles the sum demanded by said sheriff for the necessary expense in bringing the defendant from said state prison to the county of Los Angeles and for his return to said prison, on the ground that said defendant was a necessary witness at said trial and a party to said action. Thereafter and on the 27th day of October, 1925, the court granted said motion, and further ordered that the defendant, John W. Norman, be brought from said prison to be present at the trial of said action, and that at the conclusion thereof he be returned to said prison. Said order provided that said action be continued from day to day until the money required for the transportation of said defendant from said prison and return was paid by plaintiff to the sheriff as provided by said order, and that, upon its payment, after proper notice given, the court would set said divorce action for trial. The plaintiff refused to pay the money to the sheriff, as ordered by the court, or any money whatever, but has requested the court to set said cause for trial, and the court has refused to do so. The matter comes before us on an original petition for writ of mandate, directed to the trial court, before which said action is pending, and the judge thereof, requiring said court to forthwith proceed with the trial of said action. Said petition sets forth the facts substantially as recited above. To this petition respondents have interposed a demurrer. The only real issue raised by the demurrer is as to the sufficiency of the petition to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for. The answer contains no substantial denial of any of the material facts alleged in the petition, nor does it set forth any new matter which, if true, would defeat petitioner's right to the writ if she is entitled to the same upon the facts stated in the petition. There is therefore no issue of fact raised by the pleadings. The proceeding, therefore, will be considered by us on the facts as alleged in the petition. The only real question presented is whether such facts are sufficient to entitle petitioner to the relief prayed for.

Petitioner contends that the court was without authority to make the order of date October 27, 1925, and that her failure to comply therewith furnishes no legal reason for the court's refusal to proceed with the trial of said divorce action.

[2] Assuming for the purpose of this proceeding only that the court has power in a civil action to order a prisoner, confined in a prison or jail situated in a county other than the county in which said action is pending, to be produced at the trial of said action, either as a witness or for the reason that he is a party thereto, yet we think it well settled that the court has no power to order in a divorce action the wife to pay the costs of producing such a prisoner at the trial of said action. The precise question was before the court in the case of Eisenring v. Superior Court, 34 Cal. App. 749, 168 P. 1062. The trial court in a divorce action had made its order "requiring the wife at a time specified therein to pay the husband suit money and alimony pendente lite." On her refusal to do so, she was cited to appear and show cause why she should not be punished for contempt. She then instituted prohibition proceedings against the superior court, in which the action was pending, to restrain the enforcement of said order. In such proceedings the district court held that said order was void and issued a permanent writ of prohibition against said superior court enforcing the same. The court said:

"The contention of petitioner is that this order is void, and hence the court had no jurisdiction to proceed against her as for contempt for failure to comply therewith. We are in full accord with this contention. Concededly authority to make such order finds no support at common law; hence, if authority therefore exists, it must be by virtue of some statutory provision. Section 137 of the Civil Code provides that, 'when an action for divorce is pending, the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself and her children, or to prosecute or defend the action.' Clearly the power of the court under this provision is restricted in the exercise thereof to the wife, and no similar provision is made in favor of the husband. To our minds, this section measures the power of the court in the matter of allowing suit money and alimony pendente lite; and, as said in [State] Hagert v. Templeton, 18 N. D. 525, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 234, 123 N. W. 283, 'was intended to be exclusive and to embrace the entire subject-matter of the allowance of alimony pendente lite.' In Groth v. Groth, 69 Ill. App. 68, it is said: 'If alimony from a wife to a husband is a proper thing upon circumstances, legislation is necessary to authorize it. * * * The statute gives her—not him—alimony. To give it to him is not to administer existing, but to make new law.' To like effect is Greene v. Greene, 49 Neb. 546, 59 Am. St. Rep. 560, 34 L. R. A. 110, 68 N. W. 947; Glynn v. Glynn, 8 N. D. 233, 77 N. W. 594; Brenger v. Brenger, 142 Wis. 26, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1050, 19 Ann. Cas. 1136, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 387, 125 N. W. 109; Hoagland v. Hoagland, 19 Utah, 103, 57 P. 20."

A hearing of the Eisenring Case in the Supreme Court was denied, and it has never been reversed or modified to our knowledge, and we think it contains a correct expression of the law as to the power of the court to make an order in a divorce action, requiring the wife to advance funds to the husband for the purpose of the latter prosecuting or defending said action.

Let a peremptory writ issue.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; HOUSER, J.

McARTHUR v. KLUCK et al. (Civ. 5280.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 26, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 18, 1926.)

1. Landlord and tenant ☞213(5)—Tenant failing to pay rent accruing cannot recover advance rent paid covering last five months of term.

Tenant defaulting in rent payments under lease for years, who, on receipt of three days notice demanding rent, surrendered premises, may not recover rents covering last five months of term paid in advance on execution of lease.

2. Appeal and error ☞1071(6)—Failure to make findings of fact as to counterclaim held harmless.

In action for rent due under lease, in view of finding that defendants could not recover advance rent paid to cover last five months of term, any error in trial court's failure to find facts with reference to defendant's counterclaim for such advance was harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

Action by Ethel S. McArthur against William Kluck and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for appellants.

E. R. Simon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. Defendants appeal from a judgment against them for the amount of rent due under a lease in which they were lessees. The plaintiff was the lessor. While defendants were in possession of the leased farm land, which is situated in Imperial county, Cal., they defaulted in the payments of rent for several months, amounting to about $800. In response to a notice preceding an unlawful detainer action, they surrendered possession of the premises to the lessor.

By the terms of the lease the lessees agreed to pay $8,000 for the land from April 1, 1920, to July 31, 1923. The provision of the lease which is pertinent to the only substantial issue upon the appeal is as follows:

"Parties of the second part shall pay to party of the first part, as rental for the land hereinbefore described, the sum of $8,000, payable as follows: $1,650.00 in cash at the date of the execution of this lease, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, to be applied as follows: $400.00 to apply on the rent accruing during the first year of said lease, and the sum of $1,250 as full payment of the rent accruing for the last five months of said term, the remainder of said rental being payable in monthly installments. * * *

[1] There was no dispute between the parties as to the amount of rent due from the defendants at the time the premises were surrendered up to the lessor, but defendants set up a counterclaim for the $1,250 paid by them at the time of the execution of the lease, and which was paid "as full payment of the rent accruing for the last five months of said term." Defendants' claim is in effect: Where, at the time of the execution of a written lease, the tenant pays to the lessor a certain sum, which is stated in the lease to be in full payment of the rent for the last five months of the term, and thereafter, upon the tenant's failure to pay rent accruing, the lessor serves a three days' notice, demanding the payment of the rent due or the surrender of the premises, and the tenant thereupon surrenders the premises, and the lessor takes possession thereof, the tenant may recover the advance rent so paid covering the last five months of the term.

The trial court decided against the defendants and appellants upon this proposition, and such determination is supported by the case of Curtis v. Arnold, 43 Cal. App. 97, 184 P. 510, in which it is said:

"From the facts of the present case, and our review of the foregoing authorities, we reach the conclusion that plaintiff in this action is not entitled to recover any portion of the fund of three thousand dollars paid at the time of the execution of the lease. If the money be regarded as given in consideration of the covenants of the lease when paid, the title thereto passed to the lessor (Ramish v. Workman, supra [33 Cal. App. 19, 164 P. 261]; Dutton v. Christie, supra [63 Wash. 372, 115 P. 856]); if it is to be regarded merely as an advance payment of rent, the lessor is entitled to retain it (Galbraith v. Wood, supra [124 Minn. 210, 144 N. W. 945, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1034, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 609]. See, also, citations under this case, found in 50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1034; Ann. Cas. 1915B, 609, 613)."

In the case of Harvey v. Weisbaum, 159 Cal. 265, 267, 113 P. 656, 657 (33 L. R. A. [N. S.] 540, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1115), it was said:

"The fact that rent was to be paid in advance might have been the controlling factor in the mind of the lessor when he executed the lease and delivered the possession of the premises to the lessee. The consideration for the advance payment is not only the use of the premises for the month during which the lessee is to use them under the lease, but the conveyance by way of lease and the obtaining possession of the premises. The lease is an interest in real property passing from the lessor to the lessee. In many cases the landlord may have expended more money than the advanced rent, and for the very reason that he is receiving rent in advance. It may have been the very inducement to the lease."

There are also numerous authorities in other jurisdictions which are cited in the briefs which are in harmony with the foregoing decisions in this state.

[2] The only other point raised upon the appeal is that the trial court made no findings of fact with reference to the counterclaim of defendants. The trial court treated it as a cross-complaint, and granted plaintiff's motion for a nonsuit as to it. If it be regarded as a counterclaim, it is obvious that no harm was done appellants by the failure to find thereon in view of the above determination as to the law applicable to the facts alleged therein. Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 662, 664, 67 P. 1061, 57 L. R. A. 213; People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 564, 5 P. 263, 6 P. 481.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re GADINA'S ESTATE.

McKENZIE v. McLEAN.

(Civ. 5415.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 24, 1925. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 18, 1926.)

Wills  465—Separation of unpunctuated holographic will into sentences by trial court held to express intent of testatrix.

Separation of a holographic will, neither punctuated nor capitalized, into sentences by trial court, so as to transfer bonds and money to nephew instead of niece, held to express intent of testatrix, especially in view of evidence as to relationship between each of them and testatrix.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Petition for final distribution of the estate of Hannah Gadina, deceased, by John R. McLean, individually and as executor of the last will and testament of deceased, contested by Annabell McKenzie. From decree of final distribution, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Bianchi, A. R. Cotton, and John M. Lewis, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. J. Paulsell and Frederick W. Crawford, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a decree of final distribution. The respondent John R. McLean was the executor of the last will and testament of Hannah Gadina, deceased, and a legatee and devisee thereunder. His petition for distribution was contested by the appellant here, who is also a legatee under said will and who contended for a construction of the will different from that announced in the petition for final distribution. The issue upon that question is the only matter involved upon the appeal.

Deceased was the aunt of both parties hereto. Her holographic will was neither punctuated nor capitalized. In constructing it the trial court separated it into sentences and announced that such separation seemed the natural and proper one beyond any doubt. The will is as follows:

"In the name of God amen I Hannah Gadina with good health and sound mind do declare this to be my last will and testament I am not under the influence of any one I give to all my nephews and nieces to each one fifty Dollars five hundred Dollars liberty Bonds I give to the masonic home in Decota California I give five hundred Dollars to the Nazarene Church in San Francisco I ive all my wering aperial to Mrs Ida McMillan of Los Gatos, I give two musical instruments to my nephew John R. McLean, I give all my jewelry to my niece Christy to her youngest daughter, my watch and chain all family pictures and navil Banner to my nephew John R. McLean all my furniture I give to my niece AnBell McKenzie all money in Banks Gass and Electric Bonds all my real estate of every description I give to my nephew John R. McLean I name said John R. McLean excuter without bonds I put my hand and Seal this day third of January 1922 Colma San Mateo County State of California Hannah Gadina."

About all the bequests, through and including the one of "two musical instruments to my nephew John R. McLean," there is no dispute between the parties. Following that bequest the trial court, in effect, punctuated the will so that it read as follows:

"I give all my jewelry to my niece Christy; to her youngest daughter, my watch and chain. All family pictures and naval banner to my nephew John R. McLean. All my furniture I give to my niece, Annabell McKenzie. All money in banks, Gas and Electric bonds, all my real estate of every description, I give to my nephew, John R. McLean. I name said John R. McLean executor without bonds."

We can only say with the trial court that this seems to us the natural and obvious intent of the instrument and to express the intent of the testatrix. This impression of the document itself is strengthened, we think, by the testimony in the record. Contestant and appellant sought to prove, by testimony regarding the relationship of the parties, that it was more reasonable to suppose that the testatrix intended to express herself thus:

"I give all my jewelry to my niece Christy; to her youngest daughter, my watch and chain, all family pictures and naval banner. To my nephew, John R. McLean, all my furniture. I give to my niece, Annabell McKenzie, all money in banks, Gas and Electric bonds. All my real estate of every description I give to my nephew John R. McLean."

We think she did not succeed in so proving. She testified that the relationship between herself and her aunt was always friendly and cordial, and she narrated incidents which would have a tendency to prove this. On the contrary, the respondent introduced a letter to himself in which the testatrix stated that contestant was keeping herself very busy about her (testatrix's) affairs, but that it would not do her any good; that she (testatrix) thought less of her every day. There was also the testimony of respondent that contestant and deceased had not been congenial, and this was corroborated by the testimony of the minister and friend of deceased, who visited frequently at her home and appears to have had her confidence. There was evidence that the deceased depended upon her nephew for advice in her affairs, and that he wrote to her frequently and often, at her request lived at her home and did repair work upon her property. Her letters to him show confidence and affection.

Although there is a conflict in the evidence upon the relationship of the parties, there is a preponderance of evidence in favor of respondent, and this also supports the determination of the trial court.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA EDISON CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5167.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 22, 1925.)

1. Master and servant ⚡385(18)—Employee cannot take advantage of own delay in refusing operation.

Under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 11, subd. (e), an employee cannot take advantage of his own delay in refusing to be operated on for injuries which militates against probable beneficial results of operation so as to penalize his employer, who was willing to provide for treatment as advised by competent, expert medical authority.

2. Master and servant ⚡385(18)—Commission must determine reasonableness of employee's refusal to submit to operation.

Under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 11, subd. (e), injured employee cannot have benefits of compensation, unless he submits to medical treatment that may reasonably be regarded as offering some benefit, if not entire relief, and hence it is the duty of the commission to determine whether employee's refusal to submit to an operation is reasonable or not.

3. Master and servant ⚡405(6)—Finding on issue of reasonableness of employee's refusal to submit to operation must be based on expert testimony.

In determining question whether employee's refusal to submit to operation, required by Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 11, subd. (e), was reasonable, there must be a finding on this issue, based on expert medical or surgical advice.

4. Evidence ⚡19—Industrial Commission cannot take judicial notice of what is involved in "Hibbs" or "Albee" treatment.

The Industrial Accident Commission, in hearing to determine compensation for injuries to employee, cannot take judicial notice of what is involved by the "Hibbs" or "Albee" treatment, since such treatment is not a matter of common knowledge, and since Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 11, subd. (e), requires finding on reasonableness of refusal to submit to operation to be based on expert testimony.

5. Master and servant ⚡405(6)—Rules of evidence before Industrial Commission same as in trial courts.

The rules of evidence which obtain in hearings before the Industrial Accident Commission in determining reasonableness of employee's refusal to submit to an operation, required by Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 11, subd. (e), are the same as those which prevail in trial courts.

6. Evidence ⚡19—Judicial knowledge may be taken on issues of medical treatment, where they are subjects of common knowledge; but, where known only to medical experts, they must be proved by competent evidence.

Where issue pertains to medical or surgical treatment, the nature or effect of which are subjects of common knowledge, such matters are within the rule of judicial knowledge; but, where the matter is not one of common knowledge, but known generally only to medical experts, it must be proven by competent evidence like any other issue of fact.

7. Master and servant ⚡405(6)—Evidence held insufficient to justify finding refusal by compensation claimant to submit to operation was not unreasonable.

Without compliance with Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 19, subd. (c), as to use by Industrial Commission of excerpts from expert testimony in other cases, and without evidence as to risk involved in submitting to "Albee" or "Hibbs" operations, advised by medical experts, there was no competent evidence on which commission could base award on finding that refusal of employee to submit to operation was not unreasonable.

Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act by Oliver R. Harris, employee and claimant, opposed by the Southern California Edison Company, employer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for injuries, the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled, and case remanded to Commission, with directions.

Roy V. Reppy and E. W. Cunningham, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Upon application of the petitioner, a writ of review was issued by this court for the purpose of reviewing an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California, in favor of one Oliver R. Harris and against the Southern California Edison Company, the petitioner herein.

The record includes a stipulation of facts, from which it appears that on March 6, 1923, while in the employ of the petitioner herein as a lineman, Oliver R. Harris fell from a high tension electric pole, thereby suffering an injury to his back. Hospital and medical attention was promptly furnished by his employer. Within 3 weeks Harris had recovered sufficiently to engage in light work for his employer, in which work he continued for some 4 weeks when he suffered a wrench to his back which caused him to desist from further labor. From that time, which was about May 1, 1923, and until his hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission, which took place in February, 1925, Harris was incapacitated for work due to the condition of his back. At intervals during this period of almost 2 years Harris was examined by some four or five surgical experts, and for limited periods received more or less irregular medical and surgical attention.

It further appears from the record that in May, 1923, an expert surgeon, one Dr. John Dunlop, gave Harris a most careful examination, apparently calling to his aid all that was known to modern surgery in the treatment of such cases. Dr. Dunlop unhesitatingly advised that Harris submit to a surgical operation, which in the doctor's opinion would result in considerable relief, if not entire recovery, to Harris. A short time after the examination made by Dr. Dunlop, one Dr. W. W. Richardson, a surgical expert, was called in to examine Harris, and he confirmed the finding of Dr. Dunlop and joined in Dr. Dunlop's recommendation that an operation be performed. Again in January, 1924, Dr. Dunlop was consulted, and upon making a further examination recommended that Harris submit to the proposed surgical operation, which was known in the profession as the "Albee" operation. Also, during the year of 1924, Harris was given a careful examination by Dr. H. W. Spiers and Dr. W. B. Bowman, eminent orthopedic surgeons, both of whom recommended that Harris submit to the Albee operation.

In February of 1925, another expert surgeon, one Dr. John C. Wilson, was called in, apparently by the Industrial Accident Commission. His findings in the case corresponded with those of the other experts; however, in the matter of the proposed operation, Dr. Wilson's report contains this statement:

"A permanent disability very frequently follows an injury of this type, but I believe that the patient could be improved by treatment. Complete recovery depends entirely upon the treatment that is followed. A spinal fusion by either the Hibbs or Albee method would not in ordinary circumstances be advisable in a case of as long standing as this. In view of the fact that this man is totally disabled and has not, according to his statements, improved with the ordinary conservative treatment, I believe that a spinal fusion should be done in this case. The patient has nothing to lose and everything to gain. He could not be any worse after an operation than he is at the present time, and fixation, as you know, does benefit these cases very much."

It will be noted that, while Dr. Wilson advised the operation proposed by the other experts, he attaches a qualification as to its efficacy, based upon the fact that at the time he made his examination and report the case was one of long standing. The report made by Dr. H. E. Southworth, assistant medical director of the Industrial Accident Commission, who apparently was in close touch with the case from its inception, and who was advised of the findings and recommendations of the various experts called in to examine Harris, also recommended that Harris submit to the proposed operation. The only qualification contained in Dr. Southworth's report is that found in the following sentence:

"It must be borne in mind that a Hibbs or Albee operation is not always followed by prompt and satisfactory relief."

[1] It appears from the record that the petitioner herein repeatedly offered to provide, and urged the recommended operation, but from the outset Harris refused to consent to the operation. Apparently these offers by his employer were more or less coincident with the examinations made by the several experts, hence Harris must justify his refusal, if at all, upon the conditions as they existed at the time of his first or early refusal, and not upon the conditions as they existed in January, 1925, 22 months after the injury occurred, and at which time, by reason of the "long standing of the case," Dr. Wilson expressed some doubt as to the extent of the beneficial results that might be obtained from the operation at that time. For if the delay in the operation militated against the probable beneficial results, Harris cannot take advantage of his own conduct and thus penalize his employer, who stood ready at all times to provide him with such treatment as competent expert medical and surgical authority advised.

Subdivision (e) of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, p. 842, reads as follows:

"No compensation shall be payable in case of the death or disability of an employee if his death is caused, or if and so far as his disability is caused, continued or aggravated, by an unreasonable refusal to submit to medical treatment, or to any surgical treatment, the risk of which is, in the opinion of the commission, based upon expert medical or surgical advice, inconsiderable in view of the seriousness of the injury."

Measured by the provisions of the foregoing section, the petitioner herein urges that the following finding made by the commission is not supported by the evidence in the record:

"(3) The refusal of the employee to submit to surgical treatment offered by the employer was not unreasonable."

It must be admitted that there is nothing in the record which can support the conclusion that there was any risk involved in the proposed operation. Aside from the report of Dr. Wilson, the expert medical and surgical advice offered in evidence is unanimous in the opinion that Harris would benefit by the operation. Some of the experts go so far as to express confidence that there would be an entire recovery from the injury. Dr. Wilson's report, while recommending the operation, does throw some doubt upon the probability of beneficial results, but it must be kept in mind that this doubt is based upon the fact that some 22 months had elapsed between the time of the injury and Dr. Wilson's examination, and the fact that an operation had not been performed previous to Dr. Wilson's examination is wholly due to the refusal of Harris.

[2, 3] Apparently the Legislature in enacting the compensation law did not intend to permit a person to secure its benefits, unless he submitted to medical and surgical treatment that might reasonably be regarded as offering some benefit if not entire relief; hence it became the duty of the commission, under subdivision (e) of section 11 of the act, to determine whether Harris' refusal to submit to the operation was reasonable or not. But in determining this question, which is of a judicial nature, the commission is not permitted to arrive at its conclusion from any preconceived ideas of the members of the commission. There must be a finding upon this issue, based upon "expert medical or surgical advice." The only "expert medical or surgical advice" before the commission, so far as the record discloses, holds to the opinion that the "Albee treatment" or "Hibbs operation" would prove beneficial to Harris even if it did not result in his entire recovery; that no injurious consequences would flow from the operation even if the expectant hopes were not fully realized. There is no suggestion in this "expert surgical and medical advice" in the record that there is any risk involved in the operation, unless, as urged by the learned counsel for the respondent, the commission may take judicial knowledge of what is involved in the operation known as the "Albee" or "Hibbs" treatment.

The record nowhere discloses the nature or character of this proposed treatment, nor whether it could be classified as a major or a minor operation; nor is there any evidence to show what if any inconvenience or pain would be suffered by the patient, or to what extent, if at all, he would be confined to his bed as a result of the operation.

Counsel for respondent concedes that the record furnishes little aid for the determination of these questions, for his brief contains the following statement:

"The record is unfortunately meager, so that we are troubled at times with a dearth of evidence upon crucial points. One of the important questions which the record is silent upon is as to the nature and seriousness of the Hibbs or Albee operation. These matters are within the judicial knowledge of the respondent commission inasmuch as a considerable number of cases of this sort have come before it in the past. We believe we are justified in informing the court, through its judicial knowledge, of the nature of the operations, and accordingly submit the following statement which has been prepared by the office of the medical director of respondent commission for this purpose."

Following this statement appears a detailed explanation of the nature and character of the operation known as the "Albee" treatment.

[4-6] We cannot agree with respondent's contention that the commission may take judicial cognizance of what is involved in the "Hibbs" or "Albee" treatment. The rules of evidence which obtain in hearings before the Industrial Accident Commission, so far as the present instance is concerned, are the same as those which prevail in the trial courts of this state. William Simpson Construction Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. App.) 240 P. 58.

Where the issue pertains to medical or surgical treatment, the nature, effect, or result of which are the subjects of common knowledge, such matters are within the rule of judicial knowledge, as for instance, the court will take judicial notice of the nature, purpose, and effects of vaccination. Viemeister v. White, 179 N. Y. 235, 72 N. E. 97, 70 L. R. A. 796, 103 Am. St. Rep. 859, 1 Ann. Cas. 334. Also that syphilis is a serious disease. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Goodman, 10 Ala. App. 446, 65 So. 449. But where the matter is not one of common knowledge, but known generally only to medical experts, it must be proven by competent evidence just as any other issue of fact. 15 R. C. L. p. 1129; 23 C. J. p. 148; Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 25 S. Ct. 358, 49 L. Ed. 643, 3 Ann. Cas. 765; Royer v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 259 Pa. 438, 103 A. 276. That the nature, character, and effects of the treatments known as the "Hibbs" or "Albee" treatment are not matters of common knowledge cannot well be refuted.

Another answer to respondent's contention that the finding in question will have support in the judicial knowledge which the commission will take as to the "Hibbs" or "Albee" treatment is the fact that the Legislature saw fit in adopting the "Compensation Act" to provide that the basis for such a finding must be "expert medical or surgical advice." Section 11, subd. (e) Compensation Act.

[7] It is suggested by respondent that, while no testimony was offered on this question at the hearing in the instant case, the commission was in other similar cases, advised by medical authority of the nature and character of the "Hibbs" or "Albee" treatment, and calls attention to subdivision (c) of section 19 of the Compensation Act, which reads as follows:

"(c) The commission may receive as evidence, either at or subsequent to a hearing, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, the following matters, in addition to sworn testimony presented in open hearing: * * * (7) Excerpts from expert testimony received by the commission upon similar issues of scientific fact in other cases and the prior decisions of the commission upon such issues; provided, however, that transcripts of all testimony taken without notice and copies of all reports and other matters added to the record, otherwise than during the course of an open hearing, be served upon the parties to the proceeding, and opportunity be given to produce testimony in explanation or rebuttal before decision is rendered."

But the record does not show that there was a compliance with the provisions of the foregoing section, for, manifestly, to meet its requirements it would be necessary to attach to or make a part of the record in the instant case any such excerpt of expert testimony received in any other case, and in addition it would be necessary to have it appear in the record that copies of such testimony were served upon the parties in this proceeding.

Hence the conclusion seems inevitable that, for the purpose of supporting the finding in question, there was no competent evidence before the commission as to the nature, character, or risk involved in either the "Albee" or "Hibbs" treatment, and, in fact, no evidence from which the commission could properly find that—

"The refusal of the employee to submit to surgical treatment offered by the employer was not unreasonable."

The able brief filed on behalf of the respondent cites a number of cases from other states which deal with the question here involved. However, in examining these cases, we find little of aid, for the reason that, where the court sustained the refusal of the claimant to submit to the proposed medical or surgical treatment, there is evidence in the record which either shows conclusively or in conflict that the proposed treatment involves risk or suffering. While some of these cases arise in states having provisions similar to subdivision (e) of section 11 of our Compensation Act, others are from states which have no such provision, and the question is considered entirely from the general standpoint of the reasonableness of the claimant's refusal.

In view of the provisions of the California Compensation Act, we do not feel that it will be of aid in the instant case to consider or discuss in detail any of the authorities cited in respondent's brief. For the reasons heretofore indicated, the award is annulled and set aside. The case is referred back to respondent commission, with the instruction that, in making its award, there be excluded therefrom any compensation for disability, so far as caused, continued, or aggravated by unreasonable refusal of the employee to undergo the recommended operation.

SILVA-BERGHOLDT CO. v. J. H. FLICK-INGER CO. (Civ. 2955.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 19, 1925.)

1. Sales ☞77(2)—Contract calling for payment of season's opening price of association for fruit held not to require buyer to pay service charges of association.

Where contract required buyer of pears to pay season's opening price of certain association, to which seller belonged, plus specified percentage, and resolution of association establishing opening price designated certain sum per ton as service charge, which went to association, in view of fact that pears in question were released from association contract and sold by seller to buyer without rendition of any service by association, buyer was not bound to pay such service charge, in absence of evidence that seller had to pay such charge to association.

2. Sales ☞181(12)—Trial court not bound to accept figures of buyer as to amount of defective pears among those sold to it, in view of evidence.

In action by seller against buyer to recover purchase price of pears, in view of evidence as to amount of pears which were defective, court was not bound to accept buyer's figures, based on records of its factory as to amount of defective pears, and finding that 3½ tons were unfit for canning purposes was not error.

3. Sales ☞360(2)—Allowing buyer credit for freight paid on defective pears held proper.

In action by seller against buyer to recover price of pears sold, allowing defendant credit for money paid as freight on defective pears, which expense was incurred before defendant was required to inspect them, was proper.

4. Sales $\S$ 360(2) — Refusal to allow buyer credit for expense and labor in peeling defective pears for canning held proper.

In action by seller against buyer to recover price of pears, on court's finding on sufficient evidence that defect in pears could have been detected by inspection and examination at time of delivery, refusal to allow buyer credit for expenses and labor in peeling defective pears for canning was proper, regardless of provision in contract of sale that buyer might charge all costs paid or incurred in connection with delivery of defective fruit thereof back to seller.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by the Silva-Bergtholdt Company against the J. H. Flickinger Company. From the judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Bohnett, Hill & Campbell, of San José, for appellants.

Raglan Tuttle, of Auburn, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant has appealed from the judgment of the trial court herein in favor of the plaintiff.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff sold the pears growing upon its lands in the year 1923 to the defendant at the agreed price, of 25 per cent. "over season's opening price of the Pear Growers' Association"; that "the Pear Growers' Association's opening price for the season of 1923 was $50 per ton for said pears, plus $2.50 a ton service charge," and that plaintiff delivered to defendant 65½ tons of pears; that the total purchase price of such pears was the sum of $4,263.68, of which only $3,174.61 had been paid. The prayer is for judgment in the sum of $1,089.07.

The answer admits the contract and the opening price of $50 a ton, but denies that the service charge of $2.50 a ton, fixed by the association, is applicable to the contract of the parties to this action, and alleges that only 129,206 pounds of pears were delivered; that, of such quantity, 20,460 pounds "were wormy, or otherwise defective, were not according to contract, were not fit for use, and could not be, and were not used by defendant"; that "defendant incurred expense, by way of freight and labor upon said defective pears * * * in the sum of" $248.72; that defendant deducted from the purchase price of the pears the sum of $36.99 for the rental of fruit boxes to the plaintiff; and that the defendant has overpaid plaintiff $100.76. Defendant filed a cross-complaint for the recovery from plaintiff of the said sum of $100.76.

The court found that "the Pear Growers' Association's opening price for the season of 1923 was $50 per ton for said pears, plus $2.50 a ton service charge"; that plaintiff delivered to defendant 65½ tons of pears; that the total purchase price thereof was $4,257.50; that the pears, upon their arrival at defendant's cannery were by defendant "inspected, examined, accepted, and weighed"; that "the presence of worms in said pears and the wormy condition of the same could, at the time of the delivery of the same and at the time when they were examined and accepted by defendant, have been detected and discovered by an inspection and examination of said pears"; that at the time of such delivery 3½ tons of the pears were "wormy and unfit for canning purposes" and that the defendant is entitled to credit therefor at the purchase price thereof; that the remainder of the pears were "in accordance with the terms of the contract"; that the defendant paid out freight on the wormy pears in the sum of $17.09 and is entitled to credit for that sum; that it paid out for labor upon the wormy pears the sum of $77.21, but is not entitled to credit therefor; and that it is entitled to credit for $36.99 for rental of lugboxes. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for $801.31.

[1] The plaintiff is a member of the California Pear Growers' Association. It appears that members are under contract to market their fruit through the association, but that it may release specified fruit of a member, in which case he may sell direct to the buyer. A witness, who was assistant secretary of the association, testified: That a service charge of 5 per cent. is made on the selling price of fruit marketed through the association. That all members of the association and all canneries were notified of the opening prices of 1923. That "the price to the members is $50 net. That is the price that the members get. The association gets the $2.50. The original notification to the members would have been exactly the same thing — $50. The notification to the canneries carries the $52.50, notification. * * * The members know there is a charge of 5 per cent. * * * There is no sale by a member to a cannery only on the special grade and special price. * * * The pear growers' agreement calls for a release for eastern shipment, or release to special cannery at a special grade and a special price." The pears involved in this suit were released by the association, and the plaintiff made the sale thereof directly to the defendant, "without the interposition of the Pear Growers' Association, or any of its agents." Plaintiff notified the association that the sale had been made, but the association had no "communication with the Flickinger Company relative to these pears." Another witness, who was secretary and manager of the plaintiff and also a director of the association, testified:

"The season's opening price of the Pear Growers' Association was later established, subsequent to the date of the contract, as $50 per ton, plus a service charge of $2.50 per ton, f. o. b. point of shipment."

This testimony is substantially in the language of the complaint and of the findings. Since the sum of $2.50 mentioned in the resolution of the association establishing the opening price of pears for the season of 1923 is designated as a service charge, which the evidence shows goes to the association where pears are marketed through it, and since the pears here in question were released and sold by the plaintiff directly to the defendant, without the rendition of any service relative thereto by the association, it does not appear upon what theory it can be held that such service charge is a part of the "season's opening price of the Pear Growers' Association." In respondent's brief it is said:

"As a member of the association, respondent was compelled to pay over this $2.50 a ton to said association."

There is no evidence, however, to support this assertion. The opening price of "$50 per ton, plus $2.50 service charges," was fixed as the price of pears which were not released, and had no application to such pears as were released from the pooling agreement. It cannot be presumed, in the absence of evidence upon the question, that members were required to pay the association a service charge upon the sale of pears which had been released, and with which sale the association had nothing to do. The appellant therefore is entitled to have the sum of $155 deducted from the amount of the judgment.

[2] The evidence is conflicting as to the total weight of the pears delivered, but, since there is ample evidence to support the court's finding in favor of plaintiff upon that issue, the finding cannot be disturbed.

The defendant introduced evidence sufficient to support a finding that 20,460 pounds of the pears were defective and unfit for canning and were a total loss. Such evidence was to the effect that the defective condition of the pears could be discovered only by cutting them in half, and hence was not discovered until they were in process of preparation for canning. A few of the defective pears were spotted, but "most of them were wormy." Plaintiff introduced evidence to the effect that the pears were carefully inspected before shipment and the defective ones thrown out, that the presence of worms in pears may be readily detected by inspection, and that those shipped were in good condition and free from worms. Shipments were made July 31st and August 1st, 2d, 4th, and 6th. Defendant's superintendent inspected the pears upon their arrival at the cannery. He testified that he "gave them the regular inspection"; that "the pears themselves looked very good, and, as we had always had satisfactory pears from Mr. Bergholdt, I did not really search for wormy holes in the stem end"; that he was "not sure" that he could have detected the evidence of the worms by "the right kind of search"; that "you have to make a pretty close inspection" to detect them. Four carloads of the pears were stacked in the ripening shed and one was placed in cold storage. As the pears in the shed ripened, they were sorted from day to day, and the riper ones were weighed and taken into the cannery. On some days all or a part of those taken to the cannery were not packed immediately, but were held over until the following day. Defendant's records show that from the 7th to the 18th days of August the pears which had been placed in the ripening shed were taken into the cannery as follows: 7th, 1,153 pounds; 8th, 2,649; 9th, 8,688; 10th, 6,687; 13th, 11,547; 14th, 16,266; 15th, 16,224; 16th, 19,070; 17th, 7,541; 18th, 4,236. Defendant's superintendent testified that a few worms were discovered in the pears on the 7th, but that no record was kept of the weight of the wormy pears prior to the 13th, "because we did not think there would be very many." Commencing with the 13th, defendant's records show the weights of defective pears as follows: 13th, 404; 14th, 697; 15th, 1,695; 16th, 2,874; 17th, 1,082; 18th, 5,988; 20th, 365. The record for September 4th and 5th shows that the pears which had been placed in cold storage, weighing 22,055 pounds were taken to the cannery, and that 3,469 pounds of them were unfit for canning and were thrown out. On the 8th of August the defendant wired plaintiff that there was "quite a large proportion of wormy pears" and on the 13th wrote to the same effect. Plaintiff thereupon sent one of its foremen to investigate the matter. The foreman testified that he arrived at defendant's cannery on the 15th; that he there looked at the pears in several lug-boxes, and that they "did not show the sign of worms," but that he saw worms in some pears "they said were our pears out in the wastage department. They figured up the percentage up to the date I had been there; it ran between 5 and 7 per cent."

The court found that 3½ tons, or about 5½ per cent. of the pears were defective. Appellant contends that there is no contradiction of the evidence produced by defendant to the effect that 20,460 pounds of the pears were defective. The court, however, was not bound to accept those figures. At the time plaintiff's foreman visited the cannery, nearly half of the pears had been weighed and taken into it. If the defective pears then "ran between 5 and 7 per cent." it would not be unreasonable to infer that the remainder would probably run in about the same proportion. No satisfactory explanation was given of the steady increase in the percentage of defective pears from August 7th to September 5th. The court may have believed, and reasonably so from the evidence, that pears which were 15 per cent. wormy could not pass the inspection of experienced fruit men.

[3, 4] The court properly allowed the defendant credit for the amount paid as freight on the defective pears, because that expense was incurred before defendant was required to inspect the fruit. The court found, on sufficient evidence, that the presence of worms in the pears could have been "detected and discovered by an inspection and examination" thereof at the time of delivery, and refused to allow the defendant credit for expense and labor thereafter incurred in peeling the 3½ tons of defective pears for canning. If, as the court found, an inspection of the pears would have disclosed their wormy condition, no reason appears for thereafter incurring expense in preparing them for canning. Appellant relies on a provision of the contract between the parties that the "buyer may reject * * * any delivery, containing fruit * * * not complying with specifications, * * * and may charge the same and all costs, freight, or expenses paid or incurred in connection with the delivery thereof back to seller, and deduct such amounts from any amount due to seller." It is a sufficient answer to say that the expense of peeling the pears for canning is not an expense "paid or incurred in connection with the delivery" thereof.

The judgment is modified by deducting from the amount thereof the sum of $155, and, as so modified, it is affirmed; appellant to recover costs of appeal.

75 Cal. App. 642

PEOPLE v. ATTEMA. (Cr. 1267.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District. Division 1, California. Dec. 18, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 15, 1926.)

1. Criminal law ☞742(3)—Weight of testimony of state's witness, intoxicated at time of murder, held for jury.

Evidence of mental condition of state's eye-witness when murder was committed held such that jury might reasonably conclude that he was not incapacitated by intoxication to receive correct impressions of facts, so that weight of his testimony was for jury.

2. Homicide ☞214(3)—Statements in dying declaration held admissible, though not strictly res gestæ.

Declaration by deceased, containing material facts concerning dispute with defendant, circumstances leading to murder, and expressions of belief that he could not recover, held to justify admission of statements therein as to subject of dispute, though not strictly res gestæ.

3. Criminal law ☞655(4)—Court held not to have prejudiced defendant nor unduly restricted examination of jurors by admonishing counsel against undue prolongation.

In murder prosecution, remarks of court during examination of jurors, admonishing counsel against undue prolongation thereof, but assuring them that all time necessary would be allowed, held not prejudicial to defendant or his counsel, nor erroneous as unduly restricting examination.

4. Criminal law ☞823(9)—Instruction partially stating rule as to burden of proof in homicide cases held not prejudicial error.

Instruction, during examination of jurors, that when prosecution proves homicide beyond reasonable doubt, burden shifts to defendant to show alleged self-defense, held not prejudicial error, though but partial statement of rule as to burden of proof in homicide cases, where court stated rule fully and correctly in language of Pen. Code, § 1105, in instructions at conclusion of trial.

5. Criminal law ☞822(1)—Charge free from error, if as whole it correctly states law.

If entire charge as a whole correctly states the law, it is free from error, though selected passages therefrom state a proposition, without setting forth exceptions or qualifications in its application to particular case.

6. Homicide ☞339—Error in excluding evidence of deceased's statements contradicting subsequent dying declaration cured by subsequent admission.

Error in excluding testimony that deceased made statements to witness contradicting statements in subsequent dying declaration admitted in evidence was cured by subsequent admission of such testimony when witness was recalled.

7. Criminal law ☞730(8)—Remark of prosecuting attorney that it was unfortunate for accused to have to manufacture story held prejudicial error.

In murder prosecution, where counsel for accused asked leading question of accused's wife as witness for defense, in effort to elicit answers to questions she did not understand because of her imperfect knowledge of English, prosecuting attorney's remark, "It is unfortunate for them to have to manufacture a story here," held prejudicial error, notwithstanding its retraction and court's instructions.

8. Criminal law ☞730(8)—Refusal of instruction that facts, referred to in argument, that defendant was arrested and charged with offense, could not be considered as evidence, held reversible error.

In murder trial, involving close questions of fact, on which evidence was sharply conflicting, statement by attorney for prosecution in argument that, "a crime is committed; the officers * * * arrest the man, just as they did in this case; * * * he is brought before a committing magistrate upon a complaint, and the magistrate passes upon whether * * * there is sufficient evidence to believe that the defendant charged is guilty"—had prejudicial effect, which could only be removed by instruction, which court refused, that facts that defendant had been arrested and charged with offense and information filed could not be considered as evidence and created no presumption against him.

9. Criminal law ⚡715—Permitting state's attorneys to illustrate course of bullet by pointing revolver held not abuse of discretion.

In murder prosecution, trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting prosecution's attorneys to illustrate their contention as to course of bullet, by placing themselves in certain positions before jury, with one pointing revolver, which was in evidence, at an angle toward the other.

10. Criminal law ⚡823(9)—Instruction on burden of proving self-defense held not error, in view of instructions on reasonable doubt and presumption of innocence.

In murder prosecution, instruction that if proof tended to show defendant guilty of first or second degree murder, burden of proving self-defense devolved on him, held not error, where court fully instructed as to reasonable doubt, presumption of innocence, and necessity of proving every essential fact beyond reasonable doubt, exclusive of every reasonable hypothesis consistent with innocence.

11. Criminal law ⚡761(16)—Instruction held erroneous, as assuming that deceased's statement was dying declaration.

In murder prosecution, instruction that jury could consider evidence as to dying declaration and its effect and meaning held erroneous, as assuming that statement was dying declaration, and not clearly advising jury as to their power to determine such fact and weight and credit to be given it.

12. Homicide ⚡18(1)—That shooting was accidental would not exculpate accused, if it occurred in course of attempt to commit felony.

While accused was entitled to have theory of accident considered by jury in murder case, fact that pistol was discharged accidentally while in his possession would not exculpate him, if it occurred in course of attempt to accomplish felonious purpose; and instruction to acquit him if fact of accidental discharge was found was properly refused.

13. Criminal law ⚡1144(14)—Refusal of instruction not to consider fact of accidental discharge of pistol on issues of intent to kill, motive, or self-defense, held not assumed to be prejudicially erroneous.

Though fact of accidental discharge of pistol while in defendant's possession was irrelevant in murder case on questions of intent to kill, motive, or self-defense, instruction not to consider such fact in determining such issues was not required, and appellate court cannot reasonably assume that it was applied to them or that its refusal was prejudicially erroneous.

14. Criminal law ⚡1163(1)—Injury requiring reversal must appear affirmatively after examination of entire cause or from nature of error itself.

Mere fact of error or misconduct does not make prima facie case for reversal, which must be overcome by showing that no injury could have resulted, but such injury must appear affirmatively after examination of entire cause, including evidence, or from nature of error itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Atte Attema was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

E. D. Crawford and Randall O'Neill, both of Gilroy, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. C. Coolidge, Dist. Atty., and J. P. Fitzgerald, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Jose, for the People.

CASHIN, J. Appellant was charged in the superior court in and for the county of Santa Clara with the crime of murder, was convicted of manslaughter, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial has appealed, urging as grounds for reversal that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, that the conduct of the court and the prosecuting attorney was prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant, and assigns as error rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence and in giving and refusing to give instructions.

Appellant, with his wife, Carrie Attema, was, on November 8, 1924—the date of the commission of the crime charged—residing in the city of Gilroy. On that day the funeral of their minor child took place, and among those in attendance were Patty Sheridan—with the murder of whom appellant was charged—and Terry Sheridan, his brother. After the funeral appellant and his wife returned to their home, being followed shortly thereafter by the Sheridan brothers, both of whom were, according to the evidence, under the influence of intoxicants. While all were gathered in the kitchen of the dwelling, a dispute arose between appellant and the deceased, the subject of which and the exact position and movements of the parties present are questions on which the evidence is conflicting. The surviving eyewitnesses of the affair agree that, following the dispute, appellant ordered the deceased and his brother to leave the dwelling, which they refused to do, whereupon appellant went to an adjoining room, the floor of which was several inches higher than the kitchen, being reached by a step from the latter, and reappeared at the door between with a revolver in his hand and repeated the order to leave. A struggle for the possession of the revolver followed, in which the deceased and his brother participated. Either immediately before or during the scuffle the revolver was discharged, inflicting injuries upon deceased, from which he died during the evening of the same day.

[1] The only witness for the prosecution who was present at the time of the infliction of the injuries was Terry Sheridan, whose testimony was marked by many uncertainties, attributed by appellant to an incapacity to receive at the time correct impressions of the facts as they occurred, and which, he contends, were of such a character as to destroy as a matter of law the credibility of the witness. The latter admitted the fact of his intoxication on the occasion mentioned, but gave in the main a coherent account of the events as he remembered them. While he could not recall the subject of the dispute, he testified to the fact of its occurrence, the orders by the appellant that the witness and the deceased leave the dwelling, their failure to obey, followed by appellant's act in procuring the revolver, that the weapon was discharged from the doorway mentioned while the deceased was standing within the kitchen, a distance of two or three feet from appellant, but making no aggressive movement toward the latter, and that the struggle for the possession of the weapon occurred after its discharge. With the above exceptions he was unable to recall the position or movements of those present immediately before or after the shot was fired, nor with certainty the place where the struggle occurred, whether in the kitchen or the room adjoining.

It is contended in connection with the testimony of this witness that the course of the bullet, as described by the physician who performed the autopsy, shows conclusively that the revolver was discharged during the struggle for its possession, the discharge, according to the testimony of appellant and his wife, following an attack by the deceased, thus refuting the testimony of the witness Sheridan and corroborating that of the defendant. According to the physician, the bullet entered the body of the deceased to the right of and below the navel, its course being downward and in the direction of the median line. This testimony, however, is not inconsistent with that of the witness Sheridan, who did not testify that the deceased was facing appellant directly at the time of the shot, and does reasonably support the conclusion that appellant was then standing in the doorway mentioned some inches above the position of the deceased.

We cannot say that the circumstances related by the witness were improbable, or that his inability to remember the subject of the dispute or in detail the position or movements of all the parties present indicated a degree of intoxication rendering him incapable of receiving correct impressions of the facts or an intention to mislead by falsely stating his recollection thereof. The evidence of his mental condition at the time was such that the jury might reasonably conclude that the witness was not incapacitated in the particulars mentioned, and the weight to be given to his testimony was a question for their determination. People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 553, 89 P. 124; People v. Niino, 183 Cal. 126, 190 P. 626.

[2] Certain statements by the injured man, made shortly after the occurrence, as testified by Neyens, a witness for the prosecution, were admitted in evidence as the dying declaration of the former. It is urged by appellant that this testimony was incompetent, in that the statements related were not of material facts concerning the cause and circumstances of the homicide, or made under the belief of impending death. While the statements referred to certain facts connected with the subject of the dispute which were not strictly a part of the res gestæ, and which might, upon specific objection or motion, have been rejected (People v. Farmer, 77 Cal. 1, 18 P. 800; People v. McFarlane, 138 Cal. 481, 71 P. 568, 72 P. 48, 61 L. R. A. 245; Est. of Huston, 163 Cal. 166, 124 P. 852), the declaration made, as testified by the witness, contained the material facts concerning the dispute, with the circumstances leading to the infliction of the fatal wound, which, taken in connection with expressions of his belief that he could not recover, were sufficient to justify the admission of the statements in evidence. People v. Yokum, 118 Cal. 437, 50 P. 686; People v. Lee Sare Bo, 72 Cal. 623, 14 P. 310; People v. Lem Deo, 132 Cal. 199, 64 P. 265.

[3] During the course of the examination of the jurors as to their qualifications the court admonished counsel in the case against the undue prolongation thereof, assuring them, however, that all the time necessary would be allowed; and thereafter during such examination, upon objection by appellant to the correctness of a statement by the prosecuting attorney of the rule as to the burden of proof in homicide cases, instructed the jury as to such rule as follows: "I am telling you in advance that in a murder case, when the prosecution has proved the homicide beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty to your minds, then the burden shifts to the defendant to show, if his defense is self-defense, the burden shifts to him to show the self-defense"—the admonition as to the restriction of the examination and the instruction being assigned as errors.

[4, 5] The remarks of the court in the first instance contained nothing which can reasonably be said to have prejudiced appellant or his counsel in the minds of the jury, nor did the court thereby unduly restrict the examination. The instruction, being but a partial statement of the rule as to the burden of proof in homicide cases (Pen. Code, § 1105), would, standing alone, in view of the inference which might reasonably have been drawn from the proof offered by the prosecution supporting the conclusion that the crime was manslaughter, without the qualifying words of the section, have been prejudicially erroneous (People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 296, 22 P. 207), had not the court in its instructions at the conclusion of the trial stated the rule fully and correctly in the language of the section. In determining the propriety of an instruction the entire charge must be considered, and if as a whole it correctly states the law it is free from error, notwithstanding that selected passages therefrom may state a proposition without at the same time setting forth the exceptions or qualifications to which it is subject in its application to the particular case. People v. Del Cerro, 9 Cal. App. 764, 100 P. 887; People v. Warren, 130 Cal. 678, 63 P. 87; People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 97 P. 871.

[6] Objection by the prosecution to the testimony of the witness Butrone that the deceased, approximately 15 minutes before the declaration admitted in evidence as his dying declaration, made certain statements to the witness tending to contradict the facts stated in the subsequent declaration mentioned, and to show that the latter was not made under a sense of impending death, was sustained. Upon the witness being recalled the testimony was admitted without objection. While this evidence was admissible in the first instance (People v. Lawrence, 21 Cal. 368), the error was cured by its subsequent admission (People v. Woody, 48 Cal. 80; People v. Ross, 115 Cal. 233, 46 P. 1059).

[7] The wife of appellant was sworn as a witness for the defense. It appears from the record that an effort was made to conduct her examination in the English language, which she understood imperfectly, and in which she expressed herself with difficulty, finally making necessary the employment of an interpreter. In the course of her direct examination and before the interpreter was sworn, counsel for appellant, in his efforts to elicit answers to questions which the witness seemed not to understand, asked a question which in form was leading, and to which an objection upon that ground was sustained; whereupon the prosecuting attorney interjected the remark, "It is unfortunate for them to have to manufacture a story here." Appellant's counsel immediately objected to the remark, and, without expressly assigning it as misconduct, requested the court to admonish the attorney and to instruct the jury to disregard the remark, which request the court granted.

The foundation for appellant's complaint of the conduct mentioned was by the objection and request sufficiently laid, and it remains to be considered whether such conduct was prejudicial. The testimony as to the circumstances of the shooting was sharply conflicting, and, had the version of appellant and his wife been accepted by the jury, the trial might fairly have resulted in an acquittal. The statement tended to discredit the only witness for the appellant who was present at the homicide, and whose testimony in corroboration of that given by the accused might reasonably, other things being equal, have been sufficient to convince the jury that the shot was fired in self-defense, or to create in their minds the reasonable doubt which would have necessitated a verdict in his favor. The remark was of a character and made under such circumstances as to fairly support the contention that its effect was not only prejudicially harmful, but was one not removed by its retraction or the instructions of the court. People v. Frank (Cal. App.) 236 P. 189; People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 P. 266; People v. Caldwell, 55 Cal. App. 280, 203 P. 440; Smith v. Rothschild & Co., 13 Ga. App. 293, 79 S. E. 88.

[8] Appellant contends that he was in other respects prejudiced by the conduct of the attorneys for the prosecution. During the argument by the latter, in referring to appellant, it was said:

"A crime is committed; the officers go out and arrest the man just as they did in this case; they take him to jail; he is brought before a committing magistrate upon a complaint, and the magistrate passes upon whether or not a crime has been committed, and whether or not there is sufficient evidence to believe that the defendant charged is guilty, and if there is he holds that defendant to answer before the superior court for trial."

Appellant excepted thereto, pointing out that the foregoing was not a statement of the evidence, and requested the court to so instruct the jury, the prosecuting attorney stating in reply, "The pleadings are in the case, and that is a part of the pleadings." The court not having instructed the jury as requested, appellant at the close of the trial offered an instruction in effect that the fact that the defendant had been arrested and charged with an offense and that an information had been filed could not be considered as evidence and created no presumption against him. This instruction was refused. The only apparent purpose of the statement was to suggest that the jury might properly infer from the determination of the committing magistrate and the preliminary proceedings described that a crime had been committed of which appellant was guilty. The only case called to our attention wherein the effect of the refusal of such an instruction has been considered is that of People v. Delucchi, 17 Cal. App. 96, 118 P. 935, in which it appeared that the proposed instruction was in substance included in others given at the trial, the court, by fair implication from its opinion, holding such an instruction to be proper. In cases where, as here, close questions of fact are to be determined on which the evidence is sharply conflicting, suggestions that matters without the record should be considered by the jury may reasonably be said to have had a prejudicial effect, which could only be removed by an instruction of the court which, in the instant case, was not given.

[9] The attorneys for the prosecution in their argument illustrated before the jury their contention that the course taken by the bullet after striking the body of deceased proved that the shot was fired while the deceased was standing in the position described by the witness Sheridan, by placing themselves in certain positions before the jury, one pointing the revolver at an angle toward the body of the other. Appellant objected to the illustration, and requested an instruction that the jury disregard the argument. The court overruled the objection, refusing the instruction. Appellant urges that the methods of the prosecution constituted prejudicial misconduct, and that the court erred in its ruling in that connection. Whether the method of argument described should be used is a question within the sound discretion of the court (State v. Simmons, 78 Kan. 852, 98 P. 277; State v. Williams, 168 N. C. 191, 83 S. E. 714; 16 Corp. Jur. 894). Unlike the object used in People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 221, 48 P. 75, for the same purpose, the revolver was here in evidence, and the use of the body of the assistant district attorney as a figure in the illustration cannot reasonably be said to have misled the jury. We perceive nothing prejudicial therein in view of the evidence in the case, and cannot say that the court abused its discretion in permitting it.

[10] As stated above, the court instructed the jury as to the burden of proof in trials for murder in the language of section 1105 of the Penal Code, adding that if the prosecution in its direct case established the killing of the deceased by the defendant, and the proof tended to show that the defendant was guilty of murder either of the first or second degrees, then the burden of proving that he took the life of the deceased in self-defense devolved upon him; further stating that the proof might shift back to the people if the testimony of the defendant—if he should establish that he had done the killing in self-defense. Appellant urges that the foregoing incorrectly stated the law, in that it is not incumbent upon the defendant in such cases to prove or establish the defense, but only to produce such evidence as will create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged. People v. Roe, 189 Cal. 548, 564, 209 P. 560. The court, however, fully instructed as to reasonable doubt, the presumption of innocence, and that every fact and circumstance essential to establish guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt exclusive of every reasonable hypothesis consistent with innocence. These instructions fully covered the point urged by appellant, and have been held to be sufficient. People v. Anderson, 105 Cal. 32, 34, 38 P. 513; People v. Hawes, 98 Cal. 648, 653, 33 P. 791; People v. McClure, 148 Cal. 418, 83 P.

437; People v. Hopper, 42 Cal. App. 505, 183 P. 836; People v. Bannon, 59 Cal. App. 50, 209 P. 1029.

[11] Instructions proposed by appellant and refused, stating the rule as to the right of one to maintain by force the possession of his own premises against aggression, and that he is not bound to retreat therefrom to avoid the aggressor, while proper, were substantially given by the court in its instructions to the jury, the latter covering every material portion of those proposed. The court instructed as follows with reference to the statements of the deceased admitted in evidence as his dying declaration:

"You may likewise take into consideration the evidence concerning the declaration, the dying declaration of the deceased, and you may take into consideration in contradiction of that dying declaration and what effect it has and what was the meaning of it."

Appellant in this connection offered instructions correctly stating that, whether statements admitted as a dying declaration were in fact made under a sense of impending death, or entitled to credit and weight, were questions for the jury (People v. Singh, 182 Cal. 457, 476, 188 P. 987; People v. Thomson, 145 Cal. 717, 723, 79 P. 435), and that such declaration might be impeached by evidence of other statements of the deceased inconsistent therewith (People v. Lawrence, 21 Cal. 368, 372; People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 538, 66 P. 794). The testimony was such that, from the declaration itself, together with the circumstances under which it was made, the jury might reasonably have inferred that the declarant was not under a sense of impending death, or that his statement was not entitled to full weight and credit. The court's instruction assumed that the statement was a dying declaration, and did not clearly advise the jury as to their power to determine the fact and the weight and credit to be given it, instructions as to which appellant was entitled.

[12] Requested instructions by appellant, first, that if the jury found that the revolver was accidentally discharged by him such fact should not be considered in determining his intent or motive or on the issue of self-defense; and, second, the fact being found, that he should be acquitted were refused. While appellant was entitled on the theory of accident to have the question considered by the jury (People v. Hubbard, 64 Cal. App. 27, 32, 220 P. 315), as there stated, the mere fact that the shooting was accidental would not necessarily exculpate him (People v. Searle, 33 Cal. App. 228, 164 P. 819; People v. Sidwell, 29 Cal. App. 12, 154 P. 290; People v. Sellar, 57 Cal. App. 195, 207 P. 396), the homicide not being excusable though caused by the accidental discharge of the pistol while in his possession if such discharge occurred in the course of his attempt to accomplish a felonious purpose. The second proposed instruction was, therefore, properly refused. Wheatly v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 39 S. W. 672; State v. Benham, 23 Iowa, 154, 92 Am. Dec. 417; Hollywood v. State, 19 Wyo. 493, 120 P. 471, 122 P. 588, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 218; Sanders v. State, 16 Ala. App. 511, 79 So. 504; Ford v. State, 71 Neb. 1042, 98 N. W. 807, 115 Am. St. Rep. 591.

[13] Though the fact of the possession of the weapon was relevant in connection with the other evidence in the case in determining the question of intent to kill, the fact of its accidental discharge was without relevancy on the issues mentioned; and in this connection the first proposed instruction might properly have been given. The latter fact, however, if found, was one requiring no special direction by the court as to its proper consideration by the jury; and we cannot reasonably assume that it was applied to the issues mentioned, or that the refusal of the instruction was prejudicially erroneous. Other rulings and instructions given or refused are urged as grounds for reversal, all of which we have considered, and conclude without discussion here that the rulings were correct, that the instructions complained of state the law, and that those refused were fully covered by those given.

[14] It remains to be considered whether the errors and conduct heretofore discussed were of such character and effect as to require the reversal of the judgment; it being the rule that the mere fact of error or misconduct does not make out a prima facie case for reversal which must be overcome by a showing that no injury could have resulted (People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 P. 1042), but such injury must appear affirmatively after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, or from the nature of the error itself (People v. Mazzurco, 49 Cal. App. 275, 193 P. 164; People v. Chapman, 55 Cal. App. 192, 203 P. 126).

In the instant case, as stated, the evidence was sharply conflicting as to the acts of the participants immediately preceding the discharge of the weapon, the questions of fact to be decided being close and difficult, and, with weight and credit given to the testimony for the defense, unaffected by remark or argument not finding support in the evidence, might fairly have led to an acquittal; or as against such testimony, had the jury been instructed as to their power to determine whether the statements of the deceased received in evidence constituted his dying declaration, and, if so found, the weight and credit to be given thereto, the same verdict might reasonably have been the result. After a careful examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that the conduct hereinbefore considered, with the refusal of the instructions mentioned, did as a reasonable probability have a determinative effect upon the jury in arriving at their verdict, and resulted, the whole case considered, in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is reversed.

RATTO v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF CITY OF SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO et al.
(Civ. 5441.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 23, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚡159(1)—Clerk's certified determination of sufficiency of recall petition final.

City clerk having certified, under St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 128, that recall petition "has a sufficient number of qualified electors or voters," his determination is final.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡159(1)—Clerk's determination of sufficiency of recall petition not judicial, and court of equity may be resorted to in case of fraud.

City clerk's duty, under St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 128, being to ascertain solely from records of registration whether recall petition is signed by requisite number of qualified voters, is not judicial, and court of equity may be resorted to in case of fraud.

3. Municipal corporations ⚡159(1) Trustees without discretion as to calling election on submission of certified recall petition.

St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 128, vests no discretion in city trustees as to calling special election, if petition for recall submitted by clerk states grounds for recall, and sufficiency of number of signatures is properly certified by clerk.

4. Mandamus ⚡154(5)—Allegation of petition for mandamus to compel calling of recall election that recall petition stated grounds for recall sufficient.

Allegation of petition for writ of mandate to compel city board of trustees to call special election for their recall that recall petition "contained a statement of the grounds on which the recall was sought" held sufficient; sufficiency of grounds, which are intended solely for information of electors (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 128), not being question for trustees or courts.

5. Mandamus ⚡3(4)—Petitioner held without plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law, and proceeding entertained, in exercise of appellate court's original jurisdiction to avoid delay.

Petitioner for writ of mandate to compel city board of trustees to call a special election to determine whether they shall be recalled, have no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law, and appellate court, to avoid delay, will entertain proceeding in exercise of its original jurisdiction.

Original application by D. W. Ratto for writ of mandate to the Board of Trustees of the City of South San Francisco and the members thereof. Demurrer to petition overruled, and fact questions referred to the superior court to take testimony and report.

See, also, 245 P. 1112.

J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for petitioner.

Leo R. Friedman, of San Francisco, John F. Davis, of South San Francisco, and A. J. Scampini, City Counsel, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. A petition has been filed herein for a writ of mandate to compel respondents, as members of the board of trustees of the city of South San Francisco, to call a special election to determine whether respondents, as such members of said board of trustees, shall be recalled. Respondents have demurred to the petition upon grounds of insufficiency of facts, uncertainty, ambiguity, unintelligibility, and want of jurisdiction of the court. An answer has also been filed.

In support of the demurrer respondents contend that the petition fails to allege the specific number of votes cast at the last general municipal election or the number of valid signatures attached to said recall petition, and that, therefore, it cannot be determined from said petition whether or not a valid recall petition has been filed; that there is a failure to set forth the grounds on which the recall was sought; that respondents, as members of such board of trustees, are not subject to mandamus, for the reason that they are vested with "a power of determination, coupled with an exercise of discretion in the calling of recall election"; that the petition fails to allege that petitioner is without a plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law, and, furthermore, does not set forth the reasons which warrant the exercise of the original jurisdiction by this court.

[1] The city of South San Francisco is organized under the general law as a city of the sixth class. The general law relating to the recall of elective officers of incorporated cities and towns (Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 128) provides that—

Within 10 days from the filing of the recall petition "the clerk shall examine and from the records of registration ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified voters, and he shall attach to said petition his certificate showing the result of said examination."

[2] This, the petition alleges, the city clerk has done, and a copy of his certificate is set forth in the petition, showing that said recall petition "has a sufficient number of qualified electors of voters * * * as required by law." Having so certified, his determination upon this point is final. Watts v. Superior Court, 36 Cal. App. 692, 173 P. 183; Good v. Common Council, 5 Cal. App. 265, 90 P. 44. But in this connection it should be stated that his duty is not judicial (Wright v. Engram, 186 Cal. 659, 201 P. 788); he is not clothed with authority to receive extraneous evidence of the contents of the petition, his duty being to ascertain from the records of registration whether or not the petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified voters (Beecham v. Burns, 34 Cal. App. 754, 168 P. 1058; Williams v. Gill, 65 Cal. App. 129, 223 P. 559; Chester v. Hall, 55 Cal. App. 611, 204 P. 237); and if fraud has been committed, a court of equity may be resorted to as the proper forum to determine such questions under appropriate proceedings (Williams v. Gill, supra).

[3] The statute further provides that—

"If the petition shall be found to be sufficient, the clerk shall submit the same to the legislative body of the city or town without delay, whereupon that body shall forthwith cause a special election to be held. * * *"

It will be observed that under the statute no discretion is vested in the trustees as to the question of calling such election (Good v. Common Council, supra; Sidler v. City Council of Bakersfield, 43 Cal. App. 349, 185 P. 194), providing the petition contains the statements required by the statute (Sidler v. City Council of Bakersfield, supra), and is properly certified by the clerk as to the number of signatures. The only statement the statute requires to be contained in said petition is one showing:

"The grounds on which the removal or recall is sought, which statement is intended solely for the information of the electors."

[4] The petition before us alleges, "That said (recall) petition contained a statement of the grounds on which the recall was sought," and since, as already pointed out, the grounds of recall are intended solely for the information of the electors, the question of the sufficiency of those grounds is not one for the trustees or the courts. Laam v. McLaren, 28 Cal. App. 632, 153 P. 985. Consequently, the form of allegation adopted by the petitioner herein is legally sufficient.

[5] Answering the other points raised by the demurrer, it appears from the nature of the proceeding that petitioner has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law; and, in order to avoid delay, this court has already concluded to entertain the proceeding in the exercise of its original jurisdiction. For the foregoing reasons the demurrer is overruled.

Certain affirmative allegations are made in the answer, however, which raise questions as to matters of fact upon which findings are necessary to be had before this proceeding may be finally determined. It is therefore ordered that the matter of ascertaining the truth of those allegations of fact be referred to the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of San Mateo wherein said city of South San Francisco is situate, and, when the findings of that court are entered thereon, that the same be forthwith transmitted to the clerk of this court for further proceedings by this court.

The ultimate questions of fact thus referred to said superior court for trial and decision are embodied in the affirmative allegations set forth in subdivisions (a), (b), (c), (d), and (f) of paragraph V of said answer, and are as follows:

(a) How many, if any, of those who have signed said recall petition are not qualified electors in and of said city of South San Francisco?

(b) Was that section of said recall petition purporting to have been circulated by one Eugenio Lombardi, and containing 28 signatures, circulated by him or by some other person, and how many, if any, of the names attached thereto were signed out of the presence of said Lombardi?

(c) How many, if any, of the purported qualified electors whose names appear on said recall petition, exclusive of those referred to in the two preceding paragraphs, did not add to their respective signatures their occupations, and places of residence by street and number or other designation thereof?

(d) How many, if any, of the purported signatures to said recall petition were not signed by qualified electors of said city of South San Francisco, but were signed to said petition by persons other than those bearing said names?

(f) How many, if any, of the signers to said petition in writing, withdrew their names therefrom prior to the time said city clerk affixed his certificate thereto?

Lastly, if any of the signatures challenged by respondents upon the grounds hereinabove stated are found to be illegal, is the number remaining equal to at least 25 per cent. of the entire vote cast within said city at the last municipal election for the office of trustee?

The allegations contained in subdivision (e) of said paragraph V of said answer are too indefinite to warrant findings being made thereon.

It is further ordered that the clerk of this court certify to copies of the petition and the answer herein, which copies shall be furnished by petitioner herein and that said certified copies attached to a certified copy of this order be forthwith transmitted to the clerk of the superior court of said county of San Mateo.

It is further ordered that the submission of all other matters connected with this proceeding in this court be and the same is hereby set aside, and matter continued until the further order of the court.

BICE v. HAROLD L. ARNOLD, Inc., et al.
(Civ. 4110.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 17, 1925.)

1. Sales ~~467~~—Conditional sale contract expressly reserves title, and does not confer mere lien, lost by negligence in taking possession after default.

Conditional sales contract expressly reserves title, with absolute forfeiture of right to possession on breach of any condition specified therein, and does not confer mere lien, which may be lost by negligence in tracing or taking possession of property after default in payment of installments and removal of property from state.

2. Sales ~~473(1)~~—Bona fide purchaser from vendee under conditional sale contract gets no valid claim to property.

Even bona fide purchaser from vendee under conditional sale contract before performance of conditions gets no valid claim to property.

3. Sales ~~469~~—Plain provision reserving title in seller until payment of price controlling, unless qualified or set aside by other clear and unambiguous language.

Plain and definite provision in contract for purchase of automobile that title shall remain in seller until purchase price is paid is controlling, unless, by clear and unambiguous language, it is elsewhere qualified or set aside.

4. Sales ~~468~~—Conditional vendor retains title, while conditional vendee receives only forfeitable right of possession.

Vendor under conditional sale contract retains title, not a mere lien, while vendee receives only forfeitable right of possession, until he has performed conditions precedent to passing of title, and, under Penal Code, § 504a, is guilty of embezzlement, if he attempts to dispose of property by bill of sale to another; such contract not being a sale, but only an agreement to sell.

5. Chattel mortgages ~~6~~—Agreement of conditional vendee to pay deficiency if owner retook possession and sold car held not to make contract a mortgage.

Agreement by purchaser of automobile on installments, evidenced by notes, to pay any deficiency if owner retook possession of and sold car as authorized by contract under certain circumstances, held not to require that instrument be construed as mortgage; transaction being no less an agreement to sell upon condition because promise to pay purchase price is absolute or evidenced by vendee's note.

6. Sales ~~480(4)~~—Owner of car removed from state by conditional vendee held not negligent in failing to locate and recover it promptly.

Evidence held to show that agents to whom owner of automobile, removed to California from another state by conditional vendee, intrusted collection of installments and recovery of property, used every known available means to assert owner's rights, and that neither they nor owner were appreciably negligent in failing to locate and recover property promptly after becoming aware of its presence in California, so as to preclude owner from reclaiming it on discovery in hands of purchaser from such vendee, where owner complied with all legal requirements of state from which it was removed.

7. Estoppel — 75—Owner of car removed from another state by conditional vendee held not estopped to assert claim against purchaser from vendee by failure to place name as legal owner on attached certificate.

Where buyer of automobile on conditional sale contract removed it to California from another state, contrary to contract, owner cannot be held accountable for failure to place his name upon certificate attached to car as legal owner, in compliance with Motor Vehicle Act 1915, § 8, as amended by St. 1919, p. 199, § 7, and is not thereby estopped to assert claim to car as against purchaser from such buyer, who had no bill of sale, though he had license in his own name as "registered owner"; mere possession of car being no indicia of ownership.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by D. F. Bice against Harold L. Arnold, Incorporated, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against certain defendants they appeal. Affirmed.

C. L. Kilgore, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ford & Bodkin and Jos. J. Herlihy, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. On June 16, 1920, the respondent and one James A. Gallagher, both residents of the state of Washington, entered into a contract in writing, at Yakima, in said state, for the purchase by Gallagher of a Hudson automobile, by virtue of which agreement the latter sold to respondent another machine for $800, which amount was credited as initial payment upon the Hudson. Gallagher made no further payments, but soon absconded, and, when respondent ultimately located his car, it was in the possession of appellant Rider, who claimed to have purchased it from Harold L. Arnold, Incorporated, at Los Angeles, under a conditional sale contract, which, in turn, the Arnold Company had transferred to the Pacific Finance Corporation. Respondent thereupon instituted an action against Rider and said corporations for possession of the Hudson car, or its value, and damages. Gallagher was also made a party defendant, but, failing to locate him, the plaintiff dismissed as to him. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and this is an appeal therefrom.

The contract between respondent and Gallagher constitutes the principal grounds of controversy, and we quote the material portions thereof, as follows:

"Studebaker Conditional Sale Contract.

"Date—June 16, 1920.

"Town—Yakima.

"State or Province—Wash.

"To Dr. D. F. Bice:

"I, the undersigned, purchaser, do hereby acknowledge having this day received from you one Hudson motor car cabriolet model, * * * for which I agree to pay you $1,700.00 of which I now pay you $800.00 and agree to pay you $900 as the balance of the purchase price of same, said balance being payable in installments evidenced by promissory notes. * * *

"* * * It is agreed that the title to, ownership in and right of possession of said motor car are vested in you until said indebtedness and all other sums of money payable to you * * * shall have been fully paid to you in money, at which time ownership shall pass to me.

"It is further agreed that * * * if any of my indebtedness shall become due and remain unpaid in whole or in part, or if said motor car is removed or attempted to be removed from the state in which I now reside, or to be disposed of or if I shall sell or incur or shall attempt to sell or incur said motor car, or in case of misuse or abuse thereof, or whenever you shall deem the debt insecure, the full amount unpaid hereunder, including any notes given, shall become due and payable forthwith, and you may, without any previous notice or demand, and without legal process, enter any premises where said motor car may be found and take possession thereof, after which you may, at your option, make such disposition of said motor car as you shall deem fit, and all payments made by me may be retained by you as liquidated damages for the use of said motor car while in my possession and not as a penalty. Or said motor car may be sold with or without notice either at public or private sale and the proceeds, less the expense of taking, removing, holding, and selling said motor car, shall be credited upon the amount unpaid hereunder; or without such sale there may be credited upon the amount unpaid the fair market value of said motor car at the time of repossessing same, and in either event, in consideration of the use and depreciation of said motor car, I promise and agree to pay the balance forthwith. * * *

[1] Appellants' first point is that this contract conferred upon respondent no more than a lien upon the Hudson car, and that he was negligent in tracing or taking possession of the machine, after the breach of contract as to payment of installments, and removal from the state, as a consequence of which the alleged lien was lost. They cite authorities in attempting to support this claim, each of which involve contracts in the nature of chattel mortgages or leases, and which for apparent reasons are not in point. In these cases the contracts were given to secure the payment of deferred installments, or else they provided that, in the event of default, the vendor should be obligated to sell the property "rendering to the borrower all surplus" of the proceeds of such sale after satisfying his lien. The vital distinction between such instruments and that here under consideration is that they passed title to the vendee, whereas in conditional sales the title is expressly reserved, with absolute forfeiture of the right to possession upon a breach of any condition specified in the contract. Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 P. 858, 1 Am. St. Rep. 60, is illustrative of this distinction, though relied upon by appellant herein. It was there said:

"Palmer and Rey were bound to resell the property if they repossessed themselves of it. They could not have kept it as an owner; and not only so, but they were bound to resell for the benefit of the St. Clairs. The provision is, that if they retake they shall sell 'to the best advantage, rendering to said borrower all surplus, if any, after paying the price agreed upon and the expenses of removal and sale.' This is not a feature of an executory contract of sale. It is the chief characteristic of a mortgage, and is the very sum and substance of proceedings for foreclosure." (Italics in original.)

[2] And it was further said:

"It is settled in this state that even bona fide purchasers from the person to whom personal property is delivered under an executory contract of sale get no valid claim to the property. (Kohler v. Hayes, 41 Cal. 455; Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 598.) This is in accordance with the great preponderance of authority elsewhere. Harkness v. Russell [118 U. S. 663] 7 S. Ct. 51 (30 L. Ed. 285). The reason is, that in such cases the title to the property does not pass, and the maxim, Nemo plus juris, etc., applies."

Marker v. Williams, 39 Cal. App. 674, 179 P. 735, also held:

"It is the established law, under our court decisions, that the vendee under a conditional sale of personal property, until the conditions are performed, has no interest in the property which he can transfer, as against the vendor, even to an innocent purchaser, for value. He cannot divest the conditional vendor of his interest by any act or omission to act not authorized by such vendor."

The same rule is announced in the following cases: Rodgers v. Bachman, 109 Cal. 552, 42 P. 448; Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 474, 46 P. 339; Lundy Furniture Co. v. White, 128 Cal. 179, 60 P. 759, 79 Am. St. Rep. 41; Harter v. Delno, 49 Cal. App. 729, 194 P. 300.

[3] The contract in suit expressly provided that Bice should have any one of three alternatives upon Gallagher's breach of its conditions, to wit, that (1) he might retake the car and retain all amounts previously paid as liquidated damages for its use; (2) sell the car with or without notice and apply the proceeds as a credit upon any remaining unpaid balance; or (3) allow the fair market price of the car as such credit, without a sale. In neither of these events would Bice be required to pay Gallagher any amount. This agreement expressly provides that the title shall remain in the conditional vendor until the purchase price shall have been paid, with interest. This plain and definite provision is controlling, unless by clear and unambiguous language it is elsewhere qualified or set aside.

[4, 5] The right of the conditional vendor upon a conditional sale contract such as that before us is not a mere lien. He retains title, while the conditional vendee receives only a forfeitable right of possession until he has performed the conditions required as precedent to its passing, which is usually the payment of the purchase price. It may not be inappropriate to say here that, strictly speaking, this form of contract is not a sale of any kind, but only an agreement to sell. The conditional vendee gets nothing more than a conditional right of possession. If he attempts to dispose of the property by executing a bill of sale to another, he is guilty of embezzlement. Penal Code, § 504a. The security retained by the seller is not a lien, but is a reservation of title. 35 Cyc. p. 653. The transaction is not less an agreement to sell upon condition because the promise to pay the purchase price is absolute, or is evidenced by a note of the conditional vendee, just so it is not given in payment. Van Allen v. Francis, supra. This meets the contention of appellants that, because the conditional vendee has agreed to pay any deficiency resulting in case the owner should repossess himself of, and sell, the car, as provided by the sale contract, the instrument must be construed as a mortgage. Many other authorities to the same effect are cited therein.

[6] But appellants insist that they were innocent purchasers for value, and that respondent, well knowing that his property had been removed to the state of California, did not attempt to recover it for a period of about five months after becoming aware of its presence in California, and six weeks after locating it in this state; further, that respondent enabled Gallagher to perpetrate a fraud upon appellants, in that he failed to require the registration of the car in the name of the legal owner in this state, and that because of this alleged gross negligence respondent should be estopped to assert his claim upon the car. It should be noted at the outset that, although respondent was advised through his agents, the automobile sales company, at Yakima, that the automobile had been transported to San Francisco, yet there is nothing to indicate that he at any time knew how to locate it. Gallagher surreptitiously left the state of Washington with the machine, without any mention of such intent, but on arrival in this state he opened correspondence with the sales company, and repeatedly wrote them, promising "from day to day and from week to week" that he would make payments required by his contract, and offering various excuses for having failed in the past to do so. Each time he wrote he intimated that he had been in different parts of the state of California. When it became apparent that Gallagher was not acting in good faith, the sales company wired him at his last-known address in San Francisco that he must make a payment of at least $300 by return mail, or the car would be taken up, and inquiry was then made as to its whereabouts. After some delay, they received a telegram from Gallagher, stating that he had been away, and that upon his return he found two telegrams from them. He assured them that he was not attempting to avoid payment, and that he would soon remit or return the car. Soon thereafter it was learned that he had checked out of his hotel at San Francisco, and search was immediately instituted by all the means available to respondent to locate both Gallagher and the machine. The car had been insured against loss by theft, transportation, embezzlement, pilferage, fire, robbery, and contract sale. The sale contract by which respondent retained title had been duly filed with the county recorder in accordance with the laws of Washington, and the insurance policy bore a record of said contract and of the legal ownership of the Hudson car. The sales company at Yakima, the prosecuting attorney, and the insurance company were enlisted in the search. An attorney at San Francisco and a detective agency, as well as the police of both states, were also employed to assist in locating the machine and its missing driver, and the motor vehicle department of California, who were also notified, finally located the car at Los Angeles, where it developed that Gallagher had sold it to appellant Harold L. Arnold, Incorporated, who, in turn, had transferred it to appellant Rider, under a conditional sale contract.

From the foregoing facts it is apparent that respondent's agents with whom he entrusted the responsibility for collection, and, later, recovery of the property, exercised every known available means to assert his rights and to enforce the terms of the contract, and that no appreciable degree of negligence could be held to have been attributed to either of them. As we have heretofore stated, respondent was the owner of more than a mere lien on the property—he retained the absolute title, the automobile was his property, and his contract constituted a valid conditional sale. Had Gallagher stolen respondent's machine in Washington and transported it to California, it could not successfully be contended that the latter would be precluded by any failure to locate it from reclaiming the same upon discovery; and, having complied with all legal requirements of the state of Washington in protecting his title to the car, he is in no different or less advantageous position.

[7] But it is asserted by appellants that the Arnold Company should be protected as an innocent purchaser, because, it is claimed, the respondent failed and neglected to place his name upon the certificate attached to the Hudson car as legal owner, in compliance with the provisions of section 8 of the California Motor Vehicle Act of 1915, p. 402, as amended by Stat. 1919, p. 199, § 7. We fail to understand how Bice can be held accountable for an omission or fault in an instrument of whose existence he not only had no knowledge, but had every reason to suppose would never be executed as long as his title to the property in question lasted. He did not know that the car would ever be brought into California. In fact, he had expressly forbidden Gallagher from taking it from the state of Washington, and hence under no circumstances could he be expected to perform a duty imposed only by the laws of this state. Of course, he had nothing to do with the securing of the certificate here, or with any omission therefrom. It is true that for about six weeks before he took steps to secure possession of the car Bice was apprised of the fact that Gallagher claimed to be living at the Stewart Hotel in San Francisco, but knowing of Gallagher's hotel address is quite a different thing from information as to the whereabouts of the Hudson machine. Besides, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the mere fact having been known to Bice that the car was in California was notice to him that it was being operated on the highways, and, if not so operated, it did not require a license. In the absence of definite information respondent might reasonably infer that, should Gallagher secure a license, he would comply with the law and fill in the blanks properly and truthfully. On the other hand for aught Bice knew, the Hudson was in storage or at a repair shop.

In each of the cases cited by appellants some act of the owner who was held to have been estopped in some way participated in the deception of the estoppel asserter.

"In order that the real owner of personal property may be estopped to assert his title against one who has dealt with the apparent owner on the faith of his apparent ownership or authority over it, something more is required than mere possession on the part of the apparent owner since merely intrusting a third person with possession does not constitute holding him out as owner. The owner must go further and do or omit to do some act of a nature such as to mislead persons as to their true possession of the title. The person alleging estoppel must have acted and parted with value upon the faith of such apparent ownership or authority so that he will be the loser if the appearances to which he trusted are not real." C. J. pp. 1178, 1179.

Mere possession of the Hudson car by Gallagher constituted no indicia of ownership. That possession was not profitably affected by way of making out an apparent title in him by his having a certificate without the name of the legal owner stated therein, and with an utter absence of the customary bill of sale from Gallagher's alleged vendor. Nothing which Bice did or omitted to do could have deceived the Arnold Company, had they used ordinary care to inquire into Gallagher's title before purchasing the car from him. Considering the law heretofore stated regarding the futility of attempting to alienate the owner's title by the conditional vendee, and in view of the prevalence of interstate transportation of stolen automobiles, we do not think that appellant Arnold Company displayed that degree of vigilance that would warrant it in charging negligence against one who had legally retained and protected his title to the property, and sought by every available means to locate and reclaim it, as did respondent.

As we have shown above, Gallagher agreed in writing with respondent that the automobile should not be removed from the state of Washington. Soon thereafter he absconded with the machine, and it appears that he was apprehended by an inspector of the motor vehicle department, who required that he register the vehicle as a nonresident. Gallagher thereupon obtained a license in his own name as "registered owner," but no mention was made to the department, or appeared on the application or license, of the name of the legal owner. It was testified that the Arnold Company "would assume" from the license that the registered owner was the legal owner. However, it appears that, when said company negotiated the trade with Gallagher, he stated that he had exchanged a carload of oil for the Hudson car in Washington, but, when asked if he had a bill of sale, he frankly replied that he had none. No further inquiry was made as to the name of the person from whom he acquired the machine; nor did the Arnold Company attempt to ascertain whether or not Gallagher was then in fact its legal owner.

In Parke v. Franciscus, 194 Cal. 284, 228 P. 435, it was held that the claimant was estopped to recover possession of an automobile which his conditional vendee had transferred to an innocent purchaser. It there appeared that one McNabb delivered to Green the possession of a Buick automobile, under a conditional sale contract, and retained the registration certificate. Green thereafter sold the machine to Franciscus, and McNabb sold and assigned his contract to Parke and Brown, but did not give them a bill of sale, nor the registration certificate. Green and an agent of McNabb caused the car to be re-registered in the name of Franciscus, who thereafter received a certificate from the motor vehicle department, with no knowledge that Parke and Brown claimed any interest in the Buick. Failing to collect on said contract, the latter instituted a claim and delivery action against Franciscus, who answered, alleging that he was an innocent third party purchaser, for value, and that the plaintiffs had conferred upon McNabb and Green apparent title and power of sale, and that therefore they were estopped from asserting title or right of possession as against the defendant, Franciscus. In affirming judgment for the defendant, the Supreme Court quoted section 8 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915, as amended by Acts 1919, p. 191, and then said:

"The nature of motor vehicle traffic requires that there be a more certain indicia of ownership than mere possession for the protection of the general public in case of accidents or violations of the law and to prevent fraud upon innocent purchasers. In order to effectuate this purpose registration and identification of motor vehicles is required. The 'legal owner' and the 'registered owner' upon the face of the certificate identify the vehicle. Upon the sale and transfer of 'ownership' in a vehicle already registered the act requires the transferor and transferee to enter into a joint statement of the transfer endorsed upon the reverse side of the certificate of registration. It is also provided that the legal owner sign such statement which shall be forwarded to the department and upon the payment of a fee the vehicle shall be registered in the name of the transferee. * * *

"Therefore, the failure of appellants to obtain the certificate of registration properly indorsed by themselves and McNabb and to forward it together with an application for re-registration to the department within ten days renders their title invalid as against the respondent.

"* * * There is no authority in this jurisdiction on the point whether a claimant in an action for claim and delivery must show compliance with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act. The cases in which the section is involved assume that the effect of the provision is to preclude the passage of title, but refuse to allow it to be invoked where the facts justify the application of estoppel. Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304 [204 P. 848]; Chucovich v. San Francisco Securities Corp., 60 Cal. App. 700 (214 P. 263).

"* * * It is well settled that negligence, that is, careless and culpable conduct, is as matter of law equivalent to an intent to deceive and will satisfy the element of fraud necessary to an estoppel. Venice v. Short Line Land Co., 180 Cal. 447 (181 P. 658). Of course, the neglect, to operate as an estoppel, must be in respect to some duty owing to the party asserting it." (Italics ours.)

In the case at bar there was nothing in the nature of a bill of sale to Gallagher or signature of the legal owner upon the certificate which he held; nor did he sign as legal owner the certificate by means of which the machine was re-registered to Arnold. The sole indicia of ownership possessed by Gallagher or transferred by him was his nonresident certificate as "registered owner," to which respondent was a stranger. At that time the act required that:

"Upon a transfer of the title or interest of a legal owner or owners in or to a vehicle registered under the provisions of this act as hereinbefore required, the person or persons whose title or interest is to be transferred and the transferee shall write their signatures with pen and ink upon the certificate of ownership issued for such vehicle, together with the address of the transferee, in the appropriate spaces provided upon the reverse of said certificate."

It was held in Parke v. Franciscus, supra, that the requirements of the act last quoted amounted to more than safeguards to the people at large, and that they must be observed, else the transfer of title is incomplete. But the only title or interest in the Hudson car which could be conveyed was in Bice, since Gallagher had but the possession, the right to which he had forfeited by his own fraud and flight. It should at once have become apparent to the Arnold Company that the space provided for signature of the legal owner was blank, yet even the admission of Gallagher that he had no bill of sale did not prompt them to seek the source of his asserted interest in the property. Hence Arnold, and in turn the Pacific Finance Corporation, as did Parke and Brown in the cited case, purchased and received merely a valueless form of conditional sale contract. And this, too, while Bice was in diligent search of his car, which refutes any contention that his "neglect" operated to estop him from claiming the machine through any duty that he owed appellants. Rider therefore acquired no interest from Arnold, since Gallagher, who had defaulted to Bice, could convey no interest to Arnold.

We conclude that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PACIFIC HOME BLDG. REALTY CO. v. DAUGHERTY, Commissioner of Corporations. (Civ. 5031.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 17, 1925.)

1. Certiorari ☞49—Answer to petition not permissible.

Return is required to petition for writ of review; mere answer not being permissible.

2. Certiorari ☞42(8)—Filing demurrer proper. Filing demurrer to petition held proper.

3. Certiorari ☞70(5)—Question raised by demurrer decided, where judgment of dismissal rendered.

Where judgment of dismissal was rendered after hearing on petition for certiorari, questions which might have been determined on demurrer could be decided on appeal; such questions being presented on motion to dismiss.

4. Certiorari ☞28(3), 29—When writ will issue stated.

Writ of certiorari will issue where there is shown excess of jurisdiction by officer, board, or tribunal whose action is sought to be reviewed, and never to correct mere error in exercise of jurisdiction legally existent.

5. Licenses ☞22—Commissioner of corporations will not be compelled by certiorari to issue permit for sale of contracts.

Where commissioner of corporations had granted permits as to sale of contracts by certain corporation, certiorari will not lie to compel issuance of permit for further sale; his action not being in excess of his jurisdiction, as set out in Corporate Securities Act, §§ 3 and 4, which is only question to be determined in such proceeding.

6. Licenses ☞22—Ground for refusal of permit by commissioner of corporations not considered in application for certiorari.

Where corporation sought certiorari to compel commissioner of corporations to issue additional permits to sell contracts after other former permits had been granted, question of whether any change had occurred which warranted refusal would not be considered by court; such decision being within jurisdiction conferred on commissioner by law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. W. Guerin, Judge.

Certiorari by the Pacific Home Building Realty Company to review an order of Edwin M. Daugherty as Commissioner of Corporations. From an adverse judgment, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Andrews & Brooks, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney and John W. Maltman, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

WORKS, J. Petitioner made his application to the superior court for a writ of review against defendant. The writ issued, but judgment was rendered dismissing it, upon answer to the petition for the writ and after hearing thereon. Petitioner appeals from the judgment.

So far as its averments are material to a disposition of the appeal, the petition for the writ alleged that appellant is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of this state; that it was organized on November 18, 1922, for the purpose of engaging in the real estate and building business, and particularly for the purpose of operating under what is known as the Ritchey simplified and combined features plan in selling real estate and in the building of homes on the installment plan, under which the company sells to the home purchaser contracts in units of $1,000, and agrees within a specified time, and upon a certain amount being paid in, to purchase for him a lot, and thereafter to build for him a home, expending for him practically the amount of money paid by him into the company, less a commission for its work; that prior to the incorporation of appellant those who organized it had incorporated an earlier corporation, with a capitalization of $20,000, for the same purposes as those for which appellant was later organized; that this earlier corporation had applied to respondent, the commissioner of corporations, for a permit to sell its stock and to dispose of its contracts; that respondent ruled that the capital stock of the earlier corporation was too small, and that a new corporation must be formed with a capital of at least $50,000, from which capital the new corporation would be required to set aside $10,000 as a reserve fund, to be held subject to the written order of respondent; that thereafter, and in accordance with this ruling of respondent, appellant was organized; that thereafter, and on November 22, 1922, pursuant to application therefor, respondent issued to appellant a permit to sell its stock and $20,000 worth of its contracts; that on May 10, 1923, respondent issued to appellant an amended permit directing the establishment of a reserve fund in accordance with the previous ruling of respondent and providing for its accumulation; that thereafter the reserve fund was duly accumulated; and that thereafter, and on October 8, 1923, respondent, upon application for leave to sell an additional $1,000,000 worth of its contracts, issued to appellant a permit authorizing it to sell $250,000 worth thereof; that at the time of the issuance of this latter permit an officer of the corporation department notified appellant that its plan was just and legal, but that it was advisable to see whether its contracts could be sold successfully to the public; and that, if they were so sold successfully, then a permit would be granted to sell the additional $750,000 worth of contracts mentioned in the application; that, relying in good faith upon this representation, appellant proceeded immediately to employ, and did employ, trained salesmen, opened an office, and solicited business from the public, with the result that between October 11 and December 29, 1923, it had sold all the contracts authorized by respondent's two permits to be sold, and was unable to do further business until a supplemental permit was granted allowing it to proceed therewith; that on October 28, 1923, appellant filed with respondent its application for a permit to sell the remaining $750,000 worth of its contracts specified in its previous application for leave to sell $1,000,000 worth thereof; that on January 21, 1924, and without any further examination into appellant's business than such examination as was made in connection with appellant's earlier application, respondent refused the permit requested by the application of October 28, 1923; that respondent, through his investigation, and by the permit granted by him on November 22, 1922, and by the amended permit granted by him on October 8, 1923, found that the business carried on by appellant is not unfair, unjust, or inequitable; that appellant intends fairly and honestly to transact its business; and that the certificates it proposes to issue and the methods it proposes to use were not such as in the opinion of respondent would work a fraud upon the purchaser; that nothing has occurred since the granting of the amended permit above mentioned that would work a fraud upon the public, nor have any improper acts been committed by appellant or its officers; that the contract for which application to sell securities was made is the same contract that has been passed upon by respondent; and that appellant is in a solvent financial condition and able to carry out all of the agreements by it made in its contract with the home purchasers; and that, by reason of the refusal of respondent to grant the last permit applied for by appellant, it has been forced to discontinue its business, having completed the sale of all its securities under the permits previously granted by respondent, its business force is being disorganized, and great loss is threatened to its stockholders by its failure to be able to continue the business. Attached to the petition as exhibits were copies of the various papers mentioned in it. The prayer of the petition was that a writ of review issue commanding respondent to certify to the court all of the proceedings had in the matter of the application which respondent refused to grant, and that, upon a hearing, respondent be ordered to grant the permit requested.

[1-3] It is not necessary to state the nature of the return which respondent made to the writ, or to determine whether it was sufficient as a return, or was a mere answer, the latter not being permissible in a proceeding for a writ of review. 4 Cal Jur. tit. "Certiorari," § 65. The questions argued in the briefs all turn upon the sufficiency of the petition for the writ, and we shall determine them as if a demurrer to the petition had been interposed. Under the practice in such a proceeding the filing of demurrer is proper. Id. § 59. In fact, questions which may be determined on demurrer may also be presented on motion to dismiss the proceeding (Id.), and a judgment of dismissal was rendered here.

[4-6] The writ of review will issue where there is shown an excess of jurisdiction by the officer, board, or tribunal whose action is sought to be reviewed, and never to correct mere error in the exercise of a jurisdiction which is legally existent. Id. § 4. It is contended by appellant that respondent's lack of jurisdiction to make the assailed order is demonstrable on several grounds. The first of these is thus stated in appellant's brief:

"When the commissioner of corporations has rendered a decision, that a business is fair, just, and equitable, and that the intention is to fairly and honestly transact it, and that the securities to be issued and the methods to be used will not work a fraud upon the purchasers thereof, and has issued a permit to a company to carry on its business and, relying upon the decision and permit, property rights have become involved, a contract has been made which cannot be broken by the state without cause."

In answering this contention little more is necessary than to state a part of the provisions of sections 3 and 4 of the Corporate Securities Act. Stats. 1917, p. 673; Deering's Gen. Laws, Ed. 1923, Act 3814. Section 3 provides:

"No company shall sell, * * * or offer for sale, negotiate for the sale of, or take subscriptions for any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner [of corporations] a permit authorizing it so to do. * * *"

A part of section 4 follows:

"Upon the filing of such application, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to examine it and the other papers and documents filed therewith, and he may, if he deems it advisable, make or have made a detailed examination, audit, and investigation of the applicant and its affairs. If he finds that the proposed plan of business of the applicant is not unfair, unjust, or inequitable, that it intends to fairly and honestly transact its business, and that the securities that it proposes to issue and the methods to be used by it in issuing or disposing of them are not such as, in his opinion, will work a fraud upon the purchaser thereof, the commissioner shall issue to the applicant a permit authorizing it to issue and dispose of securities, as therein provided, in this state, in such amounts and for such considerations and upon such terms and conditions as the commissioner may in said permit provide. Otherwise, he shall deny the application and refuse such permit and notify the applicant in writing of his decision. * * *"

It will be observed that appellant does not contend that a corporation need not apply to the commissioner, successively and as frequently as it may desire to sell blocks of its securities, for a separate permit to sell each block, or that the commissioner has not jurisdiction to receive such successive applications. The contention is, in effect, that he has jurisdiction to grant or refuse the first of such a chain of applications, but only to grant those which may follow the first. This is, without doubt, the contention made, considering solely the question of jurisdiction, and that is all we can consider in determining whether appellant was entitled to the writ of review. It will not do to say in such a proceeding as this that the commissioner may not refuse later permits, after granting the one first made, unless conditions affecting a disposition of the first application have later changed. It is for the commissioner to determine whether the conditions have changed. If he reaches an incorrect conclusion upon that question, it is obvious to us that his determination is merely error, and is not in excess of his jurisdiction. Plainly, he may reject applications which follow the first upon some grounds, and whether those grounds exist is a matter for him alone, so far as the mere question of jurisdiction is concerned. No matter how flagrantly he may err upon such a point, he is utterly free from check or interference by means of the writ of review. If we traverse appellant's statement of its first point, it appears conclusively that our estimate of the situation is correct. After a corporation is granted a permit to make sale of its first block of securities, upon due ascertainment of its standing by the commissioner, its business may become unjust, unfair, and inequitable. Such a change might easily come about, without making a search for other possibilities, because the capitalization of the corporation is too small to sustain the burden of a further sale of its securities. Here, for instance, was a $50,000 corporation which had already "sold" $270,000 worth of its contracts, and was desirous of negotiating them to the further extent of $750,000. Further, after its first application a corporation might abdicate its original intention fairly and honestly to transact its business. This could transpire, for instance, by its directorate falling under the control of a majority composed of persons of notorious dishonesty or want of capacity. It is not necessary to pursue the traverse further. The petition here alleges that none of these imagined changes had occurred in the present instance, but the averment boots nothing. Whether they had occurred was, again, for the commissioner to say, under the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon him by law, and the allegation that they had not occurred is not for us in such a proceeding as this. Appellant was not justified in arranging its business upon the supposition that further permits would be granted to it merely because some permits had already been granted. Necessarily, there must be a cessation of such grants somewhere, and the law has conferred jurisdiction upon the commissioner to determine when the point of saturation has been reached. Under all these circumstances it is plain to us that the state made no contract with appellant when the commissioner granted its earlier applications for leave to sell its securities.

Another point made by appellant is thus couched:

"The respondent exhausts his power after once deciding as to whether a business is unjust and cannot reverse his decision without cause. His action in ruling on this matter is a judicial decision and the rule of stare decisis and res adjudicata applies."

It is argued, also, under a separate head, that appellant's petition presented grounds for the granting of the writ of review. These points are answered by what we have said above.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. INDRIERI. (Cr. 1292.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 21, 1925.)

1. Embezzlement — 44(1).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of embezzlement.

2. Criminal law — 1169(1)—Admission of evidence that alleged embezzled money was not repaid not limited to time before arrest was not prejudicial, in absence of showing that jury misunderstood it.

Testimony that money alleged to have been embezzled by accused had never been paid, not in terms relating to what had been done after arrest of accused, held not prejudicial, in absence of showing that jury understood it as being addressed to time subsequent to arrest and of application to have testimony limited.

3. Criminal law — 1137(5)—Objection to evidence held waived by defendant later testifying to same facts.

Objection to testimony that accused had never paid money alleged to have been embezzled, not in terms relating to what had been done after arrest, held waived, where defendant later testified that he had not repaid money.

4. Criminal law — 755½.

Reading by trial court of Pen. Code, § 512, while instructing jury in embezzlement prosecution, held not contrary to constitutional inhibition to instructing concerning matters of fact.

5. Criminal law — 1172(7)—Altering Instruction as to owner's demand of money embezzled to include demand by others, left it more favorable to accused than he deserved.

In prosecution for embezzlement, where requested instruction required jury to find demand had been made for money alleged embezzled by its owner or his wife, addition of words or any one acting under their authority held not prejudicial error; altered instruction being more favorable than accused was entitled to, as proof of demand is not always necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

A. F. Indrieri was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Penn Cummings and Thomas F. Lopez, both of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was convicted on a charge of embezzlement. He made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial.

On the 28th day of January, 1925, and for some time prior thereto, Mr. J. O. Traber was an attorney at law located at Fresno and engaged in the practice of the law at that place. The defendant was not an attorney at law admitted to practice in the courts of record of the state of California, but he had offices with Mr. Traber. As stated in testimony by the defendant, he was not a law partner of Mr. Traber, but he was a business partner. Mrs. Markese, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Zero, was one of the clerks in the office. The defendant is an Italian, but speaks the English language, as shown by his testimony contained in the transcript. Some time prior to the 28th day of January, 1925, an action was commenced in the superior court of Fresno county entitled Louis F. Ryan v. Jack Zero and Lucy Zero, His Wife. It was a suit in equity brought by the plaintiff to obtain a decree declaring terminated a certain contract for the purchase and sale of real property. Among other things, it was alleged in the complaint that the purchaser had made default in the payment of an installment of $300 which had become due and payable under the terms of the contract. Shortly after the defendants in the civil action had been served with a copy of the summons and complaint, they called at the office where the defendant was located. Mr. Zero is an Italian, and so little informed that he testified through an interpreter. Mrs. Zero also testified through an interpreter. Christine Delicci, a daughter, and Mr. Simone, a friend, both speak English, and testified without the assistance of an interpreter. The conversations held in the lawyer's office were conducted at least in part in English and in part in Italian. Mrs. Delicci in those conversations acted as interpreter, as she understood what was said in the Italian language and also what was said in the English language. The negotiations included several calls at the office occupied by the defendant. Mrs. Delicci testified that on one occasion Mrs. Zero, Mr. and Mrs. Delicci, and Mr. Simone attended. There they found the defendant, Mr. Traber, and Mrs. Markese. All participated in the conversation that followed. At that time the defendant advised Mrs. Zero that it would be necessary to deposit in court $300. Thereupon Mrs. Zero borrowed the money from Mr. Simone on a promissory note. Mr. Simone handed the money over to the defendant. The defendant put the money in his pocket. She also testified that this visit was brought about by reason of a message which the Zeros had received from the defendant on the previous day. Mrs. Delicci repeatedly stated that in reply to questions propounded to him the defendant said that he would take the money up to court "in just a minute," and "right in a minute." Mr. Delicci testified regarding the same conversation. He said that the defendant told Mr. Simone to give the Zeros $300

so they could give it to the defendant to take up to court. Mr. Simone gave the money to Mrs. Zero, and she gave it to the defendant. The defendant said he was going up to court to deposit it "at that moment, just within five minutes of that time." The defendant said he wanted the money in cash. The witness asked the defendant if he wanted the witness to go with him to court, and the defendant said he would go alone. He said he would go himself in five minutes; he would deposit it. Several of the witnesses present stated that on each visit that the Zeros made to the office that Mr. Traber was present. Mr. Traber testified that he was present when Mr. and Mrs. Zero called regarding the defense of the civil case Ryan v. Zero. Among other things, he testified as follows:

"We had been employed in that case. Mr. Indrieri at that time was working in my office. He wasn't a lawyer, but he was working out of my office. He brought in the business, and I attended to it. In preparing our answer in that matter there was $300 yet to be paid on the contract. At that time I was acting as the attorney for the Zeros, and am yet. After looking over the pleadings in the case, I told Mr. Indrieri that it would be necessary in order that we could win out in the case that $300 be procured by the Zeros and turned over to us so that we could deposit that with the clerk of the superior court in the case of Ryan v. Zero. At that time I told Indrieri to have the Zeros come into the office and arrange the payment of the money. On the 28th or 29th they came in. After some talk in Italian, the defendant told me that Mr. Simone was willing to loan these people the $300 to deposit with the court. Later Mr. Simone drew his check for $300, and the defendant said, 'No, I don't want that, I want cash money.' Thereupon Mr. Simone and another gentleman went out and brought back $300 in currency, and placed it in front of Indrieri. He took out his billfolder, and put the $300 into it. February 2, 1925, the defendant told me that he was going to Los Angeles to bring his wife and children up to Fresno. During the afternoon of that day I said, 'Well, now Alec,' that is what I called him 'I got to appear in this case for the Zeros before you will get back, and I have got to deposit that with the clerk.' The defendant said, 'Well, I will be back by Thursday, and you will not have any use for that money before Thursday, and then I can pay it to you.' He didn't give me the money. The answer was due on the 2d of February, but I had gotten two days' extension to the 4th day of February. I never saw Mr. Indrieri after that day until to-day. I never got the money from him."

On cross-examination he testified:

"I never deposited the money in court because it never came into my hands. Mr. Indrieri took it. The answer was filed on the 11th of February."

On the evening of the 2d day of February the defendant left Fresno for Los Angeles, and thereafter, on the 23d day of February, he was arrested in Kansas City. He testified that at that time he was on his way to New York City. There is no evidence in the record that in the meantime he communicated with Mr. and Mrs. Zero as to his whereabouts. He testified that he deposited the money January 29, 1923, in the Pacific Southwest Bank in his own name, and that at the time he was arrested he had $1,600 or $1,700 in his pocket, and at the date of the trial he had $300 to pay into court in the case of Ryan v. Zero when he received a court order to do so.

[1] The appellant contends that the evidence was wholly insufficient to show that appellant appropriated to his own use any of the money deposited with him by the Zeros. In that connection the appellant contends that the record does not show facts constituting an actual misappropriation, and that it does not show a constructive misappropriation because there is no evidence of a demand made on the defendant by anybody, unless by Mr. Traber, and that the conversation delineated by Mr. Traber did not constitute a demand. Furthermore the defendant was the authorized custodian of the funds, and Mr. Traber was not, nor was Mr. Traber the attorney, and, consequently, he was not authorized to make the demand. Conceding that there is some evidence in the record which would support the appellant in making these respective contentions, nevertheless, if the jury believed the evidence which we have recited, the jury was entitled to bring in a verdict against the appellant. If, as claimed by the appellant, the defendant was the custodian of the funds, the acts done and performed by the defendant thereafter in taking the money out of the state would support the conclusion of the jury that such act on the part of the defendant was an embezzlement. People v. Fisher, 16 Cal. App. 271, 275, 116 P. 688. Moreover, there was some evidence in the record to the effect that Mr. Traber was the attorney, and that the defendant was merely an associate in business with Mr. Traber. Under this theory of the evidence Mr. Traber was entitled to make a demand, and the conversation delineated by him was such that the jury was entitled to treat that conversation as a demand and a neglect or refusal to comply therewith.

[2, 3] The second point made by the appellant is that certain evidence was received erroneously over the objection and exception of the appellant. During the presentation of the case for the prosecution Mrs. Zero, Mr. Zero and the county clerk were each asked if the money had been paid. Each replied that it had not been. The question as addressed to each witness was general, and did not in terms relate to what had been done after the arrest of the defendant. The objection interposed was general. The defense made no application to have the testimony limited to the time transpiring between the date that the defendant received the money and the date of his arrest. No objection was made on the ground that the question was too broad or that it extended to any facts that had occurred since the date of the arrest. There is nothing to show that the jury understood the testimony as being addressed to a time subsequent to the arrest of the defendant. Even though the jury did so understand it, we think the point was waived. Later, after the prosecution had closed its case, the defendant took the stand. One of the first questions addressed to him by his attorney was:

"Q. In the action of Ryan v. Zero, have you ever deposited that money in court? A. I did not."

[4, 5] In instructing the jury, the trial court read section 512 of the Penal Code. The appellant now claims that in so doing the trial court committed error, as the reading had the effect of instructing them concerning matters of fact, contrary to the constitutional inhibition. This contention is not clear. On the contrary, the instruction was a part of the law of this state, and did not purport to state facts, and no error was committed by reading it to the jury. The appellant asked an instruction, to which the trial court added the language which we have italicized, and then gave it to the jury:

"You are instructed that, if no proof has been introduced of a demand having been made upon the defendant by Mr. Jack Zero, or his wife, or any one acting under their authority, for the return of the $300, then you will acquit the defendant."

There was no error in altering the instruction. After it was altered, the instruction was more favorable to the appellant than the appellant was entitled to. It implied that proof of a demand is always necessary in every embezzlement case. That is not the law. People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 P. 372; Ex parte Vice, 5 Cal. App. 153, 156, 157, 89 P. 983.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In determining whether statement, in application for permit to issue securities, as to profits of quicksilver mine was false, cost of furnace cannot be deducted as operating expense, and admission of evidence thereof held prejudicial error, requiring reversal.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 807(1)—Refusal to instruct that application for permit to issue securities must be considered in entirety held erroneous.

In prosecution, under Corporate Securities Act, $\S$ 14, for making false statements, in application for permit to issue securities, as to profits of quicksilver mine, refusal of instructions to consider all of the testimony and all the statements of accused in application in determining whether he intended a misrepresentation, as argumentative, held improper.

Appeal from Superior Court Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

R. A. Boggess was convicted of violating the Corporate Securities Act, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

See, also, 228 P. 448, 194 Cal. 212.

E. S. Bell, of Oakland, and George E. Foote, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction for an alleged violation of section 14 of the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 680). The information filed against the defendant charges—

"that the said R. A. Boggess, on the ——— day of April, A. D. 1920, in the said county of Sacramento, in the said state of California, and before the filing of this amended information, did then and there willfully and unlawfully and feloniously file and cause to be filed in the office of the commissioner of corporations of the state of California an application of Alpha Quicksilver Company, a corporation, for a permit to issue securities; that in said application was contained and embodied the following statement concerning the property held by such company: 'During the time Boggess had absolute charge of the operations at the mine in 1900—1 and 2, he made it pay net over $7,000 per month, net over all mine operating expenses, quicksilver selling at an average of $45.00 per flask'; that said statement, so contained and embodied in said application as aforesaid, is and was false, and that said defendant so made said statement in said application with knowledge of its falsity; that at the time said statement was filed, or caused to be filed as aforesaid, the said R. A. Boggess was an officer, agent, and employee, of said Alpha Quicksilver Company, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

A prior trial of this cause was had resulting in a judgment of conviction, which judgment was upon appeal reversed by the Supreme Court of this state. People v. Boggess, 194 Cal. 212, 228 P. 448. As the facts presented upon this appeal are in most particulars identical with those involved in the former appeal, we may refer to the recital of the facts contained in the opinion of the Supreme Court, and also quote therefrom.

As to the meaning of the charge contained in the information, there is a wide divergence of the claims made by the prosecution and the interpretation thereof insisted upon by the defendant. The theory of the prosecution appears to be that, if during the period of time mentioned the net profits of the mine for any one month was shown to be less than $7,000 net over operating expenses, then and in that case the falsity of the language set forth in the information was established. This theory is succinctly set forth in respondent's brief as follows:

"In regard to the measure of proof sufficient to support the verdict in this case as to the false statements, if we direct our attention to the first year mentioned (1900) a showing that as to any one of the months thereof there was not a net production of $7,000 in value would be and is sufficient to support the verdict."

[1] On behalf of the appellant, it was insisted in the trial below and upon appeal here that the quoted language set forth in the information, when taken in connection with other statements contained in the application, does not admit of any such construction, and that the period of time embraced in the quoted language must be restricted to the months when the defendant had absolute charge and not to all the months included within the years referred to, and also, that the whole statement, when read together, shows that the defendant did not intend to convey the idea that for each and every month of the period of time in question the mine produced $7,000 net. The Supreme Court, in its opinion referring to this matter, states the substance thereof as follows:

"* * * That 'in' the year 1898-99, when the mine was acquired by him, he had sole charge of the 'construction and development' work, and 'in 1900' he put it on a net paying basis of $7,000 net per month. Of course, the words and phrases employed in the statement, in its entirety, must be taken in their ordinary meaning, and so taken the word 'in,' as used in the application with reference to the operation of the mine in the year 1900, may be said to indicate 'inclusion within the limits of the time expressed * * * "In" is * * * common in the sense of "during the course of." Webster's New International Dictionary. Therefore that portion of the application may be read and understood as meaning that he put the mine on a net paying basis of $7,000 per month some time during the course of the year 1900, rather than during the entire period of that year."

The evidence in the case at bar also sets forth the same typographical errors in the statement submitted by the defendant to the corporation commissioner as are commented upon in the opinion of the Supreme Court, to which we have referred. The evidence upon which the prosecution relied in the former case is practically the same as that relied upon on this trial. We quote again from the opinion of the Supreme Court:

"The case of the prosecution consisted largely, if not entirely, of evidence as to what was the yearly production of the mine, from which its monthly production was arrived at by dividing the total production of the year by the number of months in the year. Part of the evidence of the prosecution, as to the production of the mine, was embodied in a bulletin of the state mining bureau containing statistics showing the quicksilver production of the state as a whole for the years 1900, 1901 and 1902, together with statistics of the quicksilver production of the individual counties in those years. The production shown by these statistics was a yearly production, and not the production per month. The evidence shows that the statistics in this bulletin were compiled from the reports of the various mine owners for each year as to the quantity and value of the production. The statistics for Lake county, where the mine in question is located, shows a production in 1900 of 3,165 flasks, valued at $127,345; in 1901 of 4,395 flasks, valued at $211,324, and in 1902 of 3,611 flasks, valued at $161,568. These statistics did not purport to show the individual production of any mine situated in Lake county. It was shown in evidence, however, that the statistics in this bulletin were based in part upon a report sent in by the defendant, as to the production of the mine in question in the years 1900 and 1901. This report showed a production of the mine in question for the entire year 1900 to be 1,300 flasks, without stating the value thereof. It was the defendant's claim that, in the early part of the year 1900, while he was using an 8-ton furnace, the production was, on account of the limited capacity of the furnace, much lower than at a later period of the same year, when he was using a 40-ton furnace, and that he put the mine upon a net paying basis of $7,000 net per month after the installation of the larger furnace in September, 1900. The report for the year 1901, during which time the larger furnace was in operation, shows a production of 2,000 flasks, worth $100,000."

As to the cost of production, the evidence appears to be the same in both cases, and we hereby adopt the following statement contained in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the former case as applicable to this, to wit:

"The evidence offered by the prosecution, as to the cost of the production of quicksilver at the mine in question, which, of course, was necessary in order to determine the net profit, consisted in a large measure of general estimates to the effect that the average cost of production was about $30 per flask, throughout the quicksilver mines of the state, but this evidence did not relate to, nor purport to bear directly upon the actual cost of labor, fuel, and other operating expenses of the mine in question. It was an undisputed fact in the case, that the cost of quicksilver production varies greatly at different mines throughout the state, and to such an extent that the cost of production at one mine may be twice as great as at another mine. True, there is other evidence, consisting of general estimates of the cost of production at the mine in question, based upon the probable number of men employed, the probable amount of cordage consumed as fuel, and a general assumption of a sum of money to be added for necessary development work. But it was shown by the testimony of several witnesses, testifying without contradiction upon behalf of the defendant, that the actual number of cords of wood consumed as fuel in the production of quicksilver at the mine in question from September, 1900, to May, 1901, was only two cords per day, which amount is only one-third of the number of cords estimated by the witnesses for the prosecution to be necessary to the operation of the furnace. There is also evidence, uncontradicted, on behalf of the defendant that many men employed at the mine received but $2.50 per day, whereas the prosecution's witness estimated the probable cost of labor at the mine at $3 per day for all of the men employed. There was further evidence to the effect that the mine was comparatively dry, very little timbering was necessary, and that it was favorably located for cheap mining, in that it was not far removed from rail transportation; that wood for fuel grew in abundance, and that there was plenty of water for domestic purposes, steam, etc. Upon behalf of the defendant, there was offered and received in evidence an excerpt from 'Mineral Resources of the United States, Department of Interior, United States Geological Survey,' which stated that, 'under ordinary circumstances, quicksilver could be produced in California at a cost of $3 per ton or ore mined and smelted.' And the defendant himself testified that the maximum cost of producing quicksilver at the mine in question, under the conditions existing there, was $3 per ton of ore, and that the cost of production per flask of quicksilver was but from $10 to $12 per flask.

"In short, there is direct and positive evidence in the record adduced upon behalf of the defendant tending to show that during several months of the years designated in the application, the mine did actually pay over $7,000 net per month over operating expenses. On the other hand, there is evidence consisting of general estimates tending to show that, during the said years, the mine did not pay $7,000 net per month. It is apparent, from a perusal of the evidence adduced upon the entire case, that the guilt or innocence of the defendant hinged upon the solution of a perplexing problem, which necessarily depended in a large measure upon a close consideration of a hypothetical situation developed by the evidence of the prosecution, as against an actual situation developed by the direct evidence of the defense."

In corroboration of the claims of the defendant of the production of the mine from September, 1900, to 1901, the testimony of the witness Bryant is to the effect that he hauled on an average during that period of time from 280 to 300 flasks of quicksilver per month. This testimony is also corroborated by the testimony of the witnesses Buchanan and Dunfield. The witness Dunfield was in charge of the condenser at the mine for a period of 6 months commencing in the fall of 1900. This witness testified that there was a large run of quicksilver during that period of time. The testimony of the witness Roeth, referred to in the opinion of the Supreme Court, showing a production of 273 flasks in the month of November and 304 flasks in the month of December, 1900, and 257 flasks in January, 265 flasks in February, 255 flasks in March, and 188 flasks in May was excluded upon the second trial, for reasons which we will hereafter consider, and is not taken into account in considering the testimony showing the production of the Abbott mine at any time during the period when the defendant admits he was in absolute charge.

The defendant testified that he intended to refer only to the time when he had absolute charge of the mine, and also testified to a considerable extent as to the period of time during the years mentioned when he did have absolute charge. A considerable portion of appellant's brief is devoted to the subject of absolute charge and what is meant by that term. We do not think it necessary to review this argument, as the term "absolute" has a clear and definite meaning, and would carry with it the idea of being able to direct and control the operation of the mine as the defendant thought best, without let or hindrance or direction by any other person and that he was free to do what he thought best in conducting mining operations. The statement from which the alleged false extract is taken contains references to other records and to other statements made by the defendant more than 20 years prior to the application for permit to sell stock involved in this action, from which it appears that the defendant at that period of time made the statement that the mine in question had shown a profit of more than $7,000 per month for a considerable period of time, and, if this statement made at that time is correct, and the defendant upon this trial testified that it is true, it would appear to be clearly established that for some several months the mine was actually producing the amount claimed by the defendant. People's Exhibit No. 4, being a report made by the defendant to the California State Mining Bureau of February 23, 1901, reads:

"The Abbott mine, however, produced about 1,300 flasks during the year 1900 and as an additional furnace was installed in that year, we are now producing at the rate of 3,600 flasks a year."

The defendant also testified that in 1900, after the 40-ton furnace was put in operation during the months of November and December, the mine produced 600 flasks. This would leave 700 flasks as the production of the 8-ton furnace from January 1 to November 1 of the year 1900. The defendant further testified that from November 1, 1900, to May 1, 1901, the mine produced on an average of 270 flasks per month. It is argued by counsel for appellant that there is not a scintilla of evidence contradicting this testimony. Our attention has not been called to any, and we have not found any, such evidence.

For the year 1901 the state mining bureau shows a report of the production of the Abbott mine of 2,000 flasks. To offset this testimony, the defendant introduced testimony to the effect that the ownership of the mine was changed on May 4, 1901, and that the report did not cover the entire year, only the period of time that elapsed after the change of ownership. The testimony of the witness Ansel, introduced by the prosecution, was to the effect that the cleanups worked out about 12 pounds of quicksilver per ton of the ore handled by the 40-ton furnace during a period of about 18 months. The testimony of the witness Forstner, also a witness for the prosecution, was to the effect that the ore ran from 50 to 16 pounds of quicksilver per ton, which would average about 8 flasks of quicksilver per day. This testimony has been erroneously quoted as 5 or 6 flasks per day.

If believed by the jury, there is plenty of testimony in this case, as shown by the records referred to, in the exhibits offered by the prosecution, and the testimony on the part of the defendant, to establish the fact that for a considerable period of time during the years mentioned in the statement alleged to be false that the Abbott mine was actually producing the quantity of quicksilver claimed by the defendant. This made it important to inquire into and determine the cost of producing quicksilver. It appears from the report of the United States Geological Survey introduced as one of the exhibits in this case that, under ordinary conditions during 1901, quicksilver was produced in California at a cost of $3 per ton of ore mined and smelted. This the defendant claims is corroborative of his own testimony. The witness Gibson, another witness for the prosecution, testified that he produced quicksilver from the Abbott mine, the one operated by the defendant, at a cost of $10 a flask when he was operating the same with an 8-ton furnace. This is corroborative of the testimony of the defendant. There was also testimony introduced by the prosecution that the cost of producing quicksilver was in the neighborhood of $30 or $35 a flask, which, if true, might show that the Abbott mine never produced $7,000 net during any month of the period when the defendant was in absolute charge. The testimony was also conflicting as to the number of men employed, running all the way from 32 to 60 in number. In this connection it may be well to state that the testimony of a large number of witnesses was based solely upon recollection of occurrences taking place more than 20 years prior to the date of the day on which they were giving testimony. The testimony as to the number of men employed and as to all the items of cost entering into the operation of the mine, of the various witnesses, was based upon statements, and not upon actual experiences in operating either the Abbott mine, or any other quicksilver mine, during the time covered by the charge contained in the information. The quantity of quicksilver produced by the mine as shown by the reports and the testimony of the defendant, and of the employees who handled the quick-silver, as we have stated, if believed by the jury, would support the defendant's assertions. Based upon the evidence introduced in the case which supports the defendant's theory, the following tables contain a summary of production costs, based upon the number of men estimated to be employed during a 6-months' period of time the defendant claims to have had absolute charge of the operations of the Abbott mine.

We are not unmindful of the fact that it is for the jury to determine both the accuracy or nonaccuracy of the figures submitted to it for consideration and of the truth or falsity of the testimony of the various witnesses. We have simply set forth the testimony showing that the guilt or innocence of the defendant rests upon mathematical calculations based upon testimony which, in turn, rests upon estimates as we have heretofore stated, and thus necessitates an examination of the rulings of the court in the admission and exclusion of testimony during the course of the trial and also alleged errors in the refusal to give requested instructions to the jury by the court.

[2] The first assignment of error in the admission of testimony is that of overruling the objection of the defendant to the testimony of the witness Bradley, founded upon a book entitled, "Quicksilver Resources of California, Bulletin 78, Covering the Production of Quicksilver of the County of Lake for the Years 1900, 1901, and 1902." This testimony was to the effect that in the year 1900 there was produced in Lake county 3,165 flasks; in 1901 4,395 flasks; and in 1902, 3,611 flasks. It does not appear that any effort was made to show the production of the Abbott mine further than the Abbott mine was the principal producer of Lake county for those years. We do not find in the admission of this testimony any prejudicial error that would justify a reversal of this cause. The evidence was not connected with the Abbott mine, and, no effort having been made to connect it with the Abbott mine other than as above stated, the defendant should have moved the court to strike out the testimony. This not having been done, and the testimony as it stood showing a larger production for Lake county than that claimed for the Abbott mine, and also that the Abbott mine was the principal producer, it is a matter of argument to the jury as to whether the testimony was or was not as favorable to the defense as to the prosecution. This being true, we cannot say that its admission, even though erroneous, amounts to prejudicial error.

[3] In assignment of error No. 4 we think the record presents a more serious objection. Over the objection of the defendant, the prosecution was permitted to introduce a number of deeds relating to the title of the Abbott mine. There does not appear to have been any issue whatever raised as to the title to the Abbott mine and where it rested at the time the defendant filed his application with the corporation commissioner, as alleged in the information. The record of the deeds concerning the devolution of the title to the Abbott mine shows that in March, 1915, based upon an execution sale some time previously, the Abbott mine was conveyed by the sheriff of Lake county to one Willson for the sum of $2,500. In answer to the objection of the defendant, counsel for the prosecution stated:

"Now, by tracing it on down, to show the title to the Alpha Quicksilver Mining Company, I also show by putting in that evidence—show that Mr. Boggess was thoroughly acquainted and conversant with this land in question, and has been for many years, knowing, and has been in charge."

Opposing this, the defendant's counsel queried:

"Wherein does the fact that McKelley, sheriff of Lake county, made a deed to the man Willson, show any intent in years afterwards? How is the defendant to be charged by the fact that the property was sold to Willson in 1909 or 1908, and, subsequently, Boggess bought it from Willson? Where does that go to prove any knowledge on the part of Boggess—when he bought it from Willson, show any knowledge—that he did not produce $7,000 in 1901 and 1902?"

The objection was overruled; the court stating that it was not admitted to show any judgment. The defense counsel then asked:

"Do I understand, now, the court, that the introduction of these deeds is limited to the purpose of showing the title, and not for any other purpose—It is limited to that?"

"The Court: Well, any purposes they are material for, not limiting the purpose of it. They are admissible to show the title. Now, then, if the jury, from that, draws the inference of knowledge of the conditions there by the defendant, they are entitled to draw such inference as the instrument itself justifies them in drawing, but it is not admitted for the purpose of showing the judgment. It is not material for the purpose of showing the judgment at all."

Further deeds were introduced showing that the defendant subsequently bought the property for the sum of $6,500. There was no question made at any time that the defendant was not familiar with the property, and the fact that the sheriff's deed showed a consideration of only $2,500 paid by the purchaser upon execution should not have been admitted for the purpose of allowing the jury to draw an inference that a statement of the production of the mine at a period some 14 or 15 years anterior to its execution, and before operations on the mine had ceased and the premises closed down, was false.

[4] Under assignment of error No. 8, the transcript shows that the witness Forstner was asked as to the average market price of quicksilver during the years 1901 and 1902 and 1903, which question was objected to by the defendant on the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and the court, in overruling the objection, stated:

"In the statement it is charged that during the time Boggess had absolute charge himself in 1900, 1901, and 1902, he made it pay 'net' over the mine operating expenses; quicksilver selling at an average of $45 per flask, $7,000 per month. Now, that is the whole statement he is charged with as having been false, and they have a right to show what portion of it is false or if any of it is false."

Under the charge contained in the information, the ruling was erroneous, as the defendant is not charged with having asserted that quicksilver was selling at $45 a flask, but that the mine netted a certain sum when quicksilver was selling at a certain price, but the record shows that the question was afterwards withdrawn, and, as a proper instruction was afterwards given by the court to the jury, we do not think that the erroneous statement of the court made to counsel when overruling the objection could have been seriously considered by the jury, or, at least, to the extent of influencing prejudicial action on their part. We therefore confine ourselves simply to the statement that the remarks of the court did not correctly interpret the charge.

[5] The next assignment of error which we will consider is that of the exclusion of the testimony of the witness Roeth. The transcript shows that the witness Roeth was a member of a quicksilver company that purchased quicksilver produced by the Abbott mine during the years 1900, 1901, and 1902; that it was the custom or practice of the quicksilver purchasing company to make out monthly settlement sheets, upon which settlements were made and payments made to the companies from which quicksilver had been purchased; that these settlement sheets were by the secretary of the purchasing company submitted to the witness Roeth, who made a private memorandum of the quantity of quicksilver purchased and the sums paid therefor. It appears that the records of the company engaged in purchasing quicksilver had been lost or destroyed, and upon this showing the defense sought to introduce the private memorandum made by the witness Roeth. No authority has been called to our attention supporting the introduction of such testimony, and we think it objectionable on the ground that private memorandum was of no more effect or validity than would have been a statement by the witness Roeth that the secretary of the company had told him of the monthly production of the Abbott mine and of the sum of money paid therefor.

[6] The next objection which we deem it necessary to consider is that relating to the items of expenditure permitted by the court to go to the jury in order to determine the operating expenses. As heretofore stated, a 40-ton furnace was installed upon the premises and put in operation late in the fall of 1900. When the defendant was on the stand, the defendant was asked the following question:

"Well now, can you give us some idea of what it cost to construct this furnace?"

To which question the defendant objected on the ground that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial. The court overruled the objection, and, in so doing, stated as follows:

"The cost of putting the tunnel there, and the tunnel is there yet. You offered evidence of that, showing the cost of development. That is there yet. * * * Part of the cost of operating the mine, and it would go to show whether there was a profit or not, what they paid out for the operating of the mine, and what they sold their ores for. That was just as much a part of the operating cost as the picks and shovels. It would be necessary to have the furnace; it was necessary to have the furnace, apparently, to operate the mine. They built it, and you have offered the evidence of the cost of the fuse, and caps, and powder, and wood."

We think it is almost axiomatic that the cost of building a furnace cannot under any conditions be considered as an operating expense. As said by counsel for appellant, the ruling of the court simply left it to the jury to say that, if the appellant expended $60,000 in 1900 in building a furnace, it should be considered as a part of the operating expenses of the mine. This, of course, would exclude the possibility of the mine having produced the sum of $7,000 net over and above operating expenses during the period of time the defendant admits he had absolute charge of the premises. A somewhat similar question was presented to the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Eastern Railroad Co., etc., v. Rogers, 124 Mass. 527, where it was held that interest on money borrowed to build an uncompleted portion of the leased lines of the railroad could not be considered as an operating expense. In the case of Union Hollywood Water Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 184 Cal. 535, 195 P. 55, a somewhat similar question was also presented for determination. It was there contended that receipts of bonuses in the sum of $14,877 paid by owners of tracts of land proposing to subdivide the same for the purpose of having the company extend its pipes to such subdivisions should be considered as a part of the revenue from the operation of the plant by the water company. The court said:

"We cannot agree with this contention. The mains laid in the proposed subdivisions were clearly a part of the plant of the plaintiff, and the money expended in so doing was a part of its capital investment. The same thing is true of the pipes laid from the mains along the streets to the property line of the consumers and of the meters attached thereto. They were a necessary part of the water system, and the expenses thereof were a part of the capital investment and went to make up the total cost of the plant."

The furnace under consideration was a necessary part of the capital investment, and, just as said in the Hollywood Case, necessarily became a part of the capital investment, and constituted no part of the operating expenses of the Abbott mine. It is not necessary to say that the mine could not be operated without a furnace any more than it would be to say that railroad trains cannot be operated until a railroad track is first built, but it does not follow that the cost of running a train involves a capital investment in the building of a railroad line. It may be also said that the question of dividends or profits to the owners of the plant in question is an entirely different proposition from operating expenses. For, while the receipts may exceed the operating expenses, if the capital invested is large, the dividends available might be very small, even though the operating receipts considerably exceed the operating expenses. The jury, as we have said, were given an item of capital expenditure in the sum of $60,000 (the evidence showing that sum as the approximate cost of the furnace), which should have been excluded from their consideration, and from the fact, as we have heretofore shown, there was evidence which, if believed by the jury, entitled the defendant to a verdict, the conclusion is unavoidable that prejudicial error resulted from the admission of this testimony.

[7] It is also urged that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the following instruction requested by the defendant:

"I instruct you that in arriving at a verdict in this case you should take into consideration with all the other testimony all of the statements contained under the heading of 'General Statements' in the letter of January 29, 1920, and all of said statements should be read together in arriving at the meaning and purpose and intent of the defendant in making the alleged false statement charged in this case, and I further instruct you that, after a careful consideration of all of the statements contained in said letter and all of the other testimony offered in the case, unless you find beyond a reasonable doubt and a moral certainty that defendant is guilty of said charge, your verdict must be not guilty. Indorsed: 'Argumentative; refused.'"

We think that the instruction is not argumentative, and, while ordinarily instructions which tend to give undue prominence to any piece of testimony should not be given, yet in this case, where the prosecution relies upon an extract taken from a lengthy statement in a letter written by the defendant, which letter, as we have shown, contains other matters explanatory of the alleged false statement, we think the defendant was entitled to have the jury instructed to consider the whole statement. The fact that there was a sharp divergence in the interpretation given by the prosecution and the defense to the extract taken from the defendant's statement, and the further fact that the language alleged to be false is ambiguous as to whether it does or does not limit the period of time to the months the defendant was in absolute charge, and also the fact as to whether the defendant intended to include each and every month as producing $7,000 net, or only for a certain period of time, was to be determined by the jury, entitled the defendant to the instruction asked for. In the determination of what was meant by the defendant in the quoted extract, all the statements contained in the letter of which it was a part should be considered. While we think the instruction should have been given, we do not need to rule that its refusal constituted prejudicial error necessitating reversal, because for other reasons stated herein such order must be made.

The appellant assigns numerous remarks by the court during the course of the trial as prejudicial error, but, on account of the conclusions to which we have already arrived, it seems unnecessary to consider such assignments of error.

The question of the statute of limitations presented by the appellant has been definitely adjudicated by the Supreme Court in the case of Doble v. Superior Court, 241 P. 852, and need not be considered herein.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

John D. McDermott was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Homer C. Mills, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Carleton Bainbridge, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant and appellant was convicted upon an information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, charging him with having willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, by means of force and fear, robbed, stolen, taken and carried away from the person, possession, and immediate presence of Edward A. French and Charles Kellogg the sum of $3,400. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for new trial, upon two grounds: (1) That the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict and judgment; and (2) that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that it lay within their province to determine whether or not the principal witness for the people was an accomplice.

[1] The following instruction, the giving of which is assigned as error, will first be considered:

"The court instructs the jury that an accomplice is one who, knowing that a crime is being committed, willfully and with criminal intent intentionally aids, abets, and assists another in the commission of such crime or criminal act, and whether or not one is an accomplice as defined in these instructions is for the jury to determine from all the testimony and circumstances in the case."

[2] We think it clear that upon the facts here presented this instruction should not have been given. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the people's witness, Sová, was the principal actor in the robbery of French and Kellogg, and that if the accused participated in it as testified by Sová, the latter was an accomplice in the crime. In fact, it was admitted both by the people and by the defense, and the testimony of every witness, including Sová himself, established, to the point of demonstration, that he robbed the bank, was caught with the money in his possession, and at once confessed. When the question as to whether or not a witness is an accomplice, under the evidence, is not disputed, it is one of law for the trial court, and it is its duty so to instruct the jury. People v. Howell (Cal. App.) 230 P. 991. In People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 433, 436, 119 P. 901, 902 (39 L. R. A. [N. S.] 704), the Supreme Court said:

"Whenever the facts themselves are in dispute, that is to say, whenever the question is whether the witness did or did not do certain things, which, admittedly, if he did do them, make him an accomplice, the jury's finding, upon familiar principles, is not disturbed. But where the facts are not in dispute, where the acts and conduct of the witness are admitted, it becomes a question of law for the court to say whether or not those acts and facts make the witness an accomplice."

[3] And so in the instant case the jury should have been instructed that Sová must be regarded as an accomplice. That question should not have been left to it to determine. However, it must be presumed that the jurors observed and applied the instructions given them. In other instructions the definition of an accomplice was correctly stated, as also was the rule that the defendant may not be convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, and that the corroborating evidence is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the crime and the circumstances thereof; and further, that such corroborating evidence must tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. Hence it is inconceivable that the erroneous instruction given in any way prejudiced any right of the appellant.

[4] We now proceed to consider the other ground urged for reversal, to wit, the claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment. It is conceded that this point is not well taken if the testimony of Sova was so corroborated as to meet the requirements of the law for a conviction in such cases.

It appears without contradiction that on the afternoon of May 22, 1925, as the president of the First Exchange State Bank, in the city of Los Angeles, was leaving his office for luncheon, he met the defendant at the front door of the bank; that the latter had previously had some negotiations with him for the exchange of real estate, and defendant on the occasion in question stated that he desired an interview; that the president of the bank then said that he would return shortly, whereupon appellant remarked that he would wait for him at the bank. Two tellers of the bank, French and Kellogg, who are named in the information, were the only other persons present at the time. McDermott entered and stepped to a counter, and began to use a telephone which was there maintained for customers' use.

As appellant stood at the telephone, a man, thereafter identified as Robert Sova, walked in the front door, masked the lower half of his face with a handkerchief which he wore about his neck, menacingly pointed a revolver at first one and then another of the three persons present, and commanded, "Stick up your hands!" Sova then ordered appellant to pull down the window shades, which he did, then lined up the tellers and McDermott, with their faces toward the wall, and, rushing behind the counter, hurriedly rifled money drawers, from which he stole a large sum of money, and departed through the rear doorway. French then immediately placed his foot upon the burglar alarm, and seized the telephone to call police officers, but, on second thought, left this duty to McDermott, who completed the call. French then took a revolver and ran out through the front door, in search of Sova, whom he saw trying to state a Chevrolet automobile on East 110th street; he shouted to two men who stood near the machine, "That is the man—get him," whereupon one of the men—who later proved to be a Mr. Johnson, and who knew both French and McDermott—noticing that Sova was covering Johnson's companion with a gun, disarmed Sova, entered the machine, and was driving it toward the bank, when he met McDermott, who was running down the street and shouting, "That is my car," Johnson, thinking that the car had been stolen, called to McDermott, "Don't shoot, Mister," but stated that, although McDermott appeared to be much excited, he was not armed. When the party arrived at the bank the officers were there, and Sova was arrested, the money was recovered, the Chevrolet delivered to appellant, and Sova was taken to the sheriff's office, where he made a written statement. Appellant remained at the bank for a short period of time, then left, but he returned to the bank in about half an hour. In the statement made by Sova shortly after his arrest he assumed entire responsibility for the robbery, and made no mention of McDermott, but stated that he, Sova, was attempting to escape in the Chevrolet, which he noticed standing on the street.

On May 27th Sova made a second statement, wherein he implicated McDermott for the first time, stating that the latter originated the scheme to rob the bank, talked it over with him on the 21st, drew a sketch of the premises, and furnished the machine; that each of them procured a revolver, one of which Sova stole from the Flintridge Country Club. Appellant was arrested on May 29th, and an information was filed charging him as we have heretofore noted. Sova was also charged with the same offense, but had not been tried at the time of the proceedings brought here for review. Sova reiterated in his testimony the statements which he made on May 27th, but in greater detail. He testified that he first met McDermott through a man named Jim, at Tonopah, Nev., while working at a mine; that he did not know any one by the name of Pete; that Jim had since been in Los Angeles, but had returned to Nevada; that McDermott induced him to join in a plan to make some money, saying, "We will go and rob a bank;" that there would be about $15,000 available; that when they went to the bank McDermott told Sova that the latter could do the job, as McDermott had a mark on his lip, and that he would be more easily identified. Sova then swore to all of the details of the holdup, of the escape and his arrest, as we have recited them. It was proven by other witnesses that the only "Jim" known to have been seen with Sova in Los Angeles was James Doyle, the owner of the automobile service station visited by Sova, and who was a witness for the prosecution, but he testified that he had never been at a mine in Nevada; that there was in fact a "Pete" working at his station at the time of the trial whom Sova knew, but that he, also, had not been at Tonopah. McDermott, it appeared, had been engaged in the real estate business in the vicinity of the bank for a period of about two years; he had negotiated for a sale or trade of Santa Ana property for the president of the bank, and the latter's property was still open for a trade at the date of the robbery.

[5] Aside from the testimony of the accomplice Sova, the following constitutes the principal evidence tending to corroborate his story of the appellant's participation in the commission of the crime. Sova's hat and coat were found in the Chevrolet sedan belonging to McDermott. This must be regard-as corroborating that part of Sova's testimony in which he said that he rode to the place where the car was parked by McDermott in the latter's car, and that the witness left his hat and coat in the car while he committed the robbery; it appears from the testimony that Sova did not wear his hat and coat while in the bank committing the crime. The witness Johnson testified that after the robbery he told appellant, in effect, that it might be thought that he was implicated in the robbery, and that he made no denial of such assertion. Again, there was evidence that McDermott speeded his car, disregarding a siren by officers, and passed his home, pursued by them; that they found it necessary to crowd his car to the curb to stop him; and this in spite of the fact that it appears that the appellant knew the officers, and that he saw them coming. One Doyle testified that appellant was at the witness' auto park on the day before the robbery, in company with Sova, and that these two remained there together in McDermott's car for at least an hour. Yet, when McDermott saw Sova at the bank immediately after the robbery without a mask he gave no sign of recognizing him. Doyle also said that McDermott had owed him money, and when asked to pay had replied, "Jim, I am going to get you that money if I have to take a gun and go out and get it." Another circumstance which the jury was entitled to regard was the fact that McDermott parked his car in the rear of the bank; he admitted that there was ample room in front of it. There were several other facts of lesser importance having some tendency to prove a consciousness of guilt on the part of appellant. Although the corroborating evidence is not conclusive of his guilt, we think it was sufficient. The testimony, independent of that of the accomplice, need not be sufficient to convict. People v. Blunkall, 31 Cal. App. 778, 161 P. 997; People v. Sullivan, 144 Cal. 471, 77 P. 1000.

JONES v. COULTER. (Civ. 4676.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 11, 1925.)

1. Evidence $\S$ 413, 448—As general rule, parol evidence not admissible when relating to construction of written contract, but admissible when relating to execution, authenticity, or delivery of instrument.

As a general rule, parol evidence is not admissible when it relates to the construction to be given a written contract, but it is admissible when it relates to the execution, authenticity, or delivery of the instrument, or whether the delivery was absolute or conditional.

2. Evidence $\S$ 431—Parol evidence admissible to show that recorded instruments were not those which plaintiff signed.

Parol evidence was admissible to show that deeds signed contained neither name of grantor nor that of grantee, nor even description of property, but were executed in blank.

3. Deeds $\S$ 32, 39—A deed executed in blank is void, and passes no title.

Where deeds signed by plaintiff were blank, and contained neither a grantor, a grantee, nor a description of the properties, they were nullities, and passed no title to one whose name was subsequently inserted as grantee without written authority.

4. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 116(5)—Name of grantor or grantee or description of property cannot be inserted by agent for grantor, unless agent's authority be in writing.

Under statute, name of grantor or grantee or description of property cannot be inserted in a blank deed by an agent for the grantor, unless agent's authority be in writing; and, if such authority be not in writing, agent's insertion of such matters does not pass title thereto.

5. Quieting title $\S$ 44(4)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that grantee executed power of attorney to grantor for purpose of restoring grantor to full control and ownership over property.

In suit to quiet title, where defendant claimed under deeds, which plaintiff claimed were mistakenly completed and recorded, evidence held to show that power of attorney, given by defendant to plaintiff, was executed to restore plaintiff to full control and ownership of properties and rectify mistake.

6. Estoppel $\S$ 88(1)—When party estopped to assert title to property stated.

To estop one claiming title to property, party, making admission by declarations or conduct, must be apprised of true state of title, admission must be made with express intention to deceive, or with such careless and culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud; other party must be destitute of all knowledge of true state of title and means of acquiring such knowledge; and he must have relied upon such admission and be injured, if its truth be allowed to be disproved.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estoppel.]

7. Estoppel $\S$ 88(1)—Grantor's execution of mortgage and mortgage notes in grantee's name under power of attorney, intended to rectify mistake, in completing deeds, held not to estop to deny grantee's title.

Where agent, through mistake, filled in blanks and recorded deeds, and grantee, to rectify mistake, executed power of attorney to grantor, held, that grantor by thereafter signing grantee's name to mortgage notes and mortgage was not estopped to deny grantee's claim of title.

8. Frauds, statute of ⚭116(10)—Ratification of agent's act in inserting description of properties and names of grantor and grantee could only be made in writing subscribed by principal.

Where plaintiff's agent, without authority, filled in blank deeds executed by plaintiff, inserting names of grantor and grantee and description of properties, such act could be ratified by plaintiff only in writing, in view of Civ. Code, § 2310, and statute of frauds.

9. Joint tenancy ⚭8—Joint tenant entitled to interest in property purchased by cotenant with proceeds of jointly owned property.

Daughter was entitled to some interest in property purchased by mother, who caused title thereto to be conveyed to herself and daughter as joint tenants, and which was purchased with the proceeds from sale of property owned by mother and daughter jointly.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by Hattie L. Jones, also known as Hattie L. Lindau Jones, also known as Hattie L. Lindau, against Fannie B. Coulter, also known as Fanny B. Coulter. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Weber & Crawford and Hedley Richmond, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Le Roy M. Edwards, of Los Angeles, and Willard M. Conklin, of Santa Monica, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to five separate parcels of land in Los Angeles county. Defendant, the daughter of plaintiff, claims that she and her mother own the land as joint tenants. The answer not only denies plaintiff's allegation of entire ownership, but alleges, as conduct on the part of plaintiff estopping her from asserting sole ownership, that the latter, subsequently to the time when she signed certain blank deeds presently to be mentioned, not only treated the properties as jointly owned by herself and defendant, but that she also, as defendant's attorney in fact, executed several promissory notes secured by mortgages upon the properties, and that in this way she obligated defendant personally, as well as incumbered the latter's joint title to the lands. The trial court found all of the issues in favor of plaintiff and entered judgment for her accordingly. Defendant appeals.

The situation as to one of the pieces of property—lot D in block 87 of the city of Santa Monica (referred to in appellant's brief as parcel No. 1)—differs radically from that of the remaining four parcels (referred to in appellant's brief as parcels Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5). We shall consider the questions presented by this appeal with respect to the latter parcels of land before taking up those relating to the former.

Parcels 2, 3, 4, and 5.

The facts testified to by plaintiff and her witnesses respecting parcels 2, 3, 4, and 5 are substantially these: On August 7, 1920, and for some time prior thereto, plaintiff was the sole owner of these four parcels of land. On the last-mentioned date plaintiff, being in poor health and about to enter a hospital, was desirous of making some provision for the disposition of the properties in the event of her death. For that purpose she and defendant called upon the vice president of the Ocean Park Bank, George A. Neilson, and sought his advice. Though the evidence does not directly disclose that defendant saw and heard all that was done and said upon this occasion, it is a fair inference from all of the evidence that she did see and hear everything. Plaintiff was advised by Neilson to prepare deeds conveying the property to some third person, who, upon being vested with the title, would immediately convey the same to plaintiff and defendant as joint tenants. It, doubtless, was Neilson's idea that if this suggestion were followed all the title to the properties, in the event that the mother predeceased the daughter, would vest in the latter under the right of survivorship. While he thus was advising plaintiff to convey the properties to some third person, Neilson pointed to the cashier of the bank, Arthur H. Meng, and said that Meng would act as the third party to whom the properties could be deeded, and that, then, Meng could deed them back to plaintiff and defendant as joint tenants. Plaintiff assented to this suggestion and thereupon Neilson procured two printed forms of deeds, with blank spaces left in them for filling in the names of the grantor and grantee and the descriptions of the properties. None of the blanks was filled in, but plaintiff, at Neilson's suggestion, signed her name to each instrument as a blank form of deed. When she signed the two documents, plaintiff, so she testified, said to Neilson:

"These deeds are not to be made a matter of record; they are to be held in the vault until such time as I pass out, if I do."

Neilson had no written authority to fill in the name of the grantor or that of the grantee or the description of any of the properties; indeed, he had no authority in writing of any nature whatsoever. After signing these blank forms of conveyance, plaintiff, accompanied by defendant, left the bank. Thereupon Neilson caused his stenographer to fill in plaintiff's name as the grantor and Meng's name as the grantee, in each of the blank forms of deed which plaintiff had signed, and likewise the description of each of the properties now found described therein. Neilson then procured Meng to execute two deeds purporting to convey the properties to plaintiff and defendant as joint tenants. Through an error on the part of some clerk in the bank the four documents were recorded in the office of the county recorder. They were recorded August 10, 1920. It seems that before the instruments were placed on record a notary public in the bank attached his notarial certificate to each of the two documents which plaintiff had signed, although the latter had not appeared before him for that purpose, nor had she ever acknowledged to him her signatures to the two blank forms of conveyance. Plaintiff, according to her testimony and that of Neilson, returned to the bank on August 14, 1920, accompanied by her daughter, and then discovered that the instruments, contrary to her instructions, had been recorded. She testified that upon making this discovery she upbraided Neilson and asked him what should be done to meet the unexpected situation. Neilson suggested that defendant execute to her mother either a quitclaim deed or a power of attorney. Neilson is not a lawyer. His suggestion that defendant might execute a power of attorney to her mother seems to have been based upon the idea that if that expedient were adopted then plaintiff, notwithstanding the recording of the deeds, could deal with the properties during her lifetime just as though she were still the sole and absolute owner thereof. Defendant, who was willing to adopt either of the suggestions made by Neilson, executed to her mother a power of attorney. Defendant paid no consideration for any of the titles which the deeds from Meng purported to vest in her as a joint tenant, nor were any of the deeds delivered to her. According to plaintiff's testimony, the recorded documents were turned over to Neilson as soon as the power of attorney was executed. Plaintiff testified that it was never her intention to deliver any deed to defendant or to divest herself of any of the title during her lifetime.

At all times subsequent to August 14, 1920, plaintiff handled the properties the same as before, paying all taxes herself, collecting all the rents and paying all interest accruing upon certain promissory notes which were secured by mortgages previously executed and which were incumbrances upon the properties at the times when the above-mentioned instruments were signed. Thereafter these existing mortgages, as they matured, were renewed, or new ones were given, and the old mortgages were discharged of record. These new mortgages and the notes secured thereby were executed as the joint mortgages and notes of plaintiff and defendant; the former signing her daughter's name as the latter's attorney in fact under the power of attorney which had been given her. Defendant never received any part of the proceeds of these notes. Though defendant, as a joint maker of the notes, is personally obligated thereon, the trial court found that the value of the mortgaged properties is "amply sufficient to protect and take care of the full payment of said notes"; that "plaintiff is solvent and able to meet any and all indebtedness represented by said mortgage notes"; and that "there is no evidence that defendant will ever be called upon to make good the principal or interest upon any of said notes, or to pay any portion thereof."

Some time in the year 1921 plaintiff and her daughter became estranged, and in the month of July of that year the latter revoked her power of attorney. The trial court found that upon the execution of the power of attorney plaintiff understood and believed that it had the force and effect of revesting her with and restoring to her "complete ownership, title, and possession in and to" the parcels of land; that "the acts and conduct of plaintiff subsequent to August 14, 1920, with respect to the above-described real property, were made in pursuance to such belief"; and that plaintiff, "immediately upon discovering that said power of attorney had been revoked, realized for the first time the true situation with respect to her property and immediately instituted" this action.

Practically the only issue as to which there is any substantial conflict in the evidence is that which relates to the reason for giving the power of attorney. Defendant testified that the deeds were not recorded by mistake; that it was plaintiff's intention, when signing the blank deeds, that her daughter should become a joint owner of the properties; that the power of attorney was given before either knew that the deeds had been recorded; and that it was given for the purpose of enabling the mother to handle the properties for the daughter's benefit, in the event that the latter should be absent from the state. On these issues the court found in favor of plaintiff; the finding being that on August 14, 1920, defendant, "at the suggestion of the said George Neilson, and with the intent and purpose of correcting the error made by said George Neilson in recording the aforesaid deeds, and for the purpose of restoring to and in plaintiff the full and complete ownership, possession, and control of all of the above-described real property, * * * executed and delivered to plaintiff a full general power of attorney, giving to plaintiff full general power and control with respect to, and over all, the above-described real property."

Plaintiff's oral evidence respecting the circumstances under which she signed the blank forms of conveyance was admitted by the trial court over defendant's earnest objection that plaintiff should not thus be permitted to impeach the validity of her own deeds—documents which, at the time of the trial, appeared upon their face to be valid, duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded instruments of conveyance, with the names of grantor and grantee and descriptions of the properties duly inserted therein.

[1, 2] The first point made by appellant is that the court committed grievous error in receiving oral evidence of the circumstances under which respondent executed the blank forms of deed. In support of this contention appellant asserts that the evidence violates the elementary rule that parol evidence may not be received to contradict or vary a written instrument of conveyance in the absence of a plea that, through mistake, accident, fraud or undue influence, the instrument does not correctly set forth the true agreement of the parties. The objection is devoid of merit. Appellant's claim of title rests entirely and exclusively upon such title, if any, as her grantor, Meng, received under the blank forms of deed signed by respondent. The sole purpose of the parol evidence was to show that the recorded instruments are not those which respondent signed—that the ones which she signed contained neither the name of a grantor nor that of a grantee, nor even the description of any property; whereas, those which now appear of record, and upon which appellant relies to show title in her, do contain the name of a grantor and of a grantee and descriptions of the properties. The parol evidence did not relate to the construction of the instruments, but to their execution and authenticity; that is to say, it was not the purpose of respondent's evidence to show that the recorded deeds to Meng did not correctly embody the understanding of the parties, but to show that those instruments were not the ones which she signed—that those which she signed were mere blank forms of conveyance, and that as such they were and are absolute nullities. "As a general rule," says the court in Verzan v. McGregor, 23 Cal. 343, "parol evidence is not admissible when it relates to the construction to be given to a written contract; but such evidence is admissible when it relates to the execution or authenticity of the instrument, or to its delivery, or whether the delivery was absolute or conditional. In such cases, the execution and acts of delivery being mostly a matter in pais, oral declarations of intentions connected with the execution and delivery may properly come in as part of the res gestæ." Addressing itself to a situation substantially analogous to that presented by the record before us, the court, in Vaca Valley, etc., R. R. v. Mansfield, 84 Cal. 566, 24 P. 147, says:

"It was competent, therefore, for the plaintiff to prove all the facts and circumstances connected with the deed in question, and to show whether it was a valid deed or not."

[3] There can be no doubt as to the utter invalidity of the instruments under which appellant's grantor, Meng, deraigned his purported title. The blank deeds signed by respondent and subsequently filled out under Neilson's direction, with Meng's name inserted as the purported grantee, were mere nullities. According to the great weight of authority, a deed executed in blank is void and passes no title. Wunderlin v. Cadogan, 50

Cal. 613, and cases cited infra. As was said in Whitaker v. Miller, 83 Ill. 381:

"There must be, in every grant, a grantor, a grantee and a thing granted, and a deed wanting in either essential is absolutely void."

In the instant case each of the instruments signed by respondent was wanting in all three of these essentials to a valid deed.

[4] Though the decisions of other jurisdictions are not in entire harmony upon the question, it has been definitely decided in this state that under our statute of frauds the name of the grantor or grantee or a description of the property cannot be inserted by an agent for the grantor, in the absence of the latter, unless the agent's authority be in writing. If the authority of the agent be not in writing, his insertion of the name of grantor or grantee or description of the property does not pass the title. Upton v. Archer, 41 Cal. 85, 10 Am. Rep. 266; Vaca Valley, etc., R. R. v. Mansfield, supra; Harris v. Barlow, 180 Cal. 142, 179 P. 682. See, also, Lund v. Thackery, 18 S. D. 113, 99 N. W. 856. In Upton v. Archer, supra, the court says:

"* * * As it could not become the plaintiff's deed until the name of a grantee was inserted, that act could not be performed by an agent, in the absence of the plaintiff, unless his authority was in writing."

[5] The next point urged by appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that she executed the power of attorney for the purpose of restoring respondent to full control over the properties and to complete ownership thereof, and thus to correct the mistake made by Neilson when he permitted the deeds to be recorded. Respondent and Neilson both testified that such was the purpose and the only purpose, for which the power of attorney was executed. Appellant, it will be recalled, testified that she executed that document solely for the purpose of enabling her mother to handle the properties in the event that she, appellant, should be absent on a trip. If this were all, the problem would be simple indeed, for we, then, would be confronted with nothing more than a mere substantial conflict in the evidence, which clearly would not warrant an appellate court in disturbing the finding. It seems, however, that respondent testified that she saw the recorded deeds in the bank when she returned there on August 14, 1920; that it was upon that occasion that she discovered that her instructions not to record the instruments had been violated; and that it was then that Neilson made the suggestion, acceded to by appellant, that a power of attorney be given the mother to enable the latter to handle the properties as her own and to restore to her the right of complete ownership. But it was shown conclusively that the deeds, after having been recorded, were returned to the bank some days subsequent to the 14th of August. It also was conclusively shown that it was upon the last-mentioned date that the power of attorney was actually executed and acknowledged by the daughter. Wherefore appellant argues that the reason assigned by respondent and Neilson for the execution of the power of attorney could not have been the true reason, and that, therefore, respondent's testimony to the effect that the power of attorney was given to enable her to treat the properties as though full and complete ownership had been restored to her is inherently improbable.

We are of the opinion that the evidence which shows that the recorded deeds could not possibly have been seen by respondent until some few days after the execution of the power of attorney, while tending to contradict the testimony given by respondent and her witness Neilson, did not so corroborate appellant's testimony respecting her reason for giving the power of attorney as to conclusively contradict that of respondent and Neilson, or impair the latter's testimony to such an extent as to compel the conclusion that a finding based thereon is not supported by credible testimony. There is printed in respondent's brief what purports to be an excerpt from a written opinion filed in the court below, wherein the learned trial judge gave it as his opinion that the testimony of respondent and Neilson to the effect that the deeds had been recorded and returned to the bank as early as August 14th, while evidently a mistake on their part, is not inconsistent with the inference that knowledge that the deeds were being recorded, or had been filed for record, was brought home to the parties on August 14th, and that such knowledge was the inducing cause for the execution of the power of attorney. We think this a fair inference which the trial court was warranted in deducing, and that it affords a complete answer to appellant's claim of inherent improbability in the testimony of respondent and Neilson respecting the reason for the execution of the power of attorney.

[6, 7] Appellant contends that the undisputed evidence in the case supports her plea of estoppel. It is claimed that, by signing appellant's name to the renewal notes and mortgages given at the time when the old mortgages matured, respondent not only recognized the existence of a mortgageable title in her daughter, but imposed upon the latter personal obligations as a joint maker of the notes. Wherefore it is claimed that respondent is estopped to assert the truth respecting the title to the properties. The claim clearly is untenable. The facts necessary to be shown in order to call into exercise the principles of equitable estoppel are stated by Chief Justice Field, in Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 367, as follows:

"* * * First, that the party, making the admission by his declarations or conduct, was apprised of the true state of his own title; second, that he made the admission with the express intention to deceive, or with such careless and culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud; third, that the other party was not only destitute of all knowledge of the true state of the title, but of the means of acquiring such knowledge; and, fourth, that he relied directly upon such admission, and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved."

The present case lacks several of these essential elements of estoppel. For instance, the evidence fails to show the existence of the second of the above-enumerated essentials. There must be some degree of turpitude in the conduct of a party before a court of equity will estop him from the assertion of his title; the effect of the estoppel being to forfeit his property and to transfer his enjoyment thereof to another. Here respondent, when exercising the power conferred upon her by her daughter to execute mortgages in the names of both of them, did only that which must have been within the contemplation of the parties when the general power of attorney was given, and therefore the acts of respondent in executing the mortgages, so far as those acts affect the matter of title, can present no question of fraud or concealment, or negligence amounting to constructive fraud; and the fact that, by the execution of the notes in the names of both of them as joint obligors, respondent imposed personal obligations upon appellant, could not have induced the latter to believe that the title was vested in herself and respondent as joint tenants. The imposition of such personal obligations was a thing quite apart from any question of title to the properties. It was not, of itself, an act which could have led appellant to believe that the title was other than the facts showed it to be, viz.: A title vested entirely in the mother as the sole owner of the properties. In the next place, the third essential of estoppel mentioned by Chief Justice Field is absent from the case. Appellant, who accompanied her mother on the visits to the bank, and who had every opportunity to see and to hear all that was done and said upon those occasions, had every possible means for knowing the real state of the title. She knew all the facts, from which it follows, as a necessary legal conclusion, that no title passed out of the mother into appellant's grantor, Meng. Appellant, then, was not destitute of convenient and ready means of knowledge of the true state of the title, and she, therefore, could not have been deceived by any act of respondent. "The estoppel is removed by proof that the party claiming its existence, even though mistaken in regard to his rights at law, had notice of the actual state of the facts at the time he acted upon the representation, and this though the representation was made under oath." Bigelow on Estoppel, p. 560. "The estoppel does not apply where everything is equally well known to both parties." Her- man on Estoppel, § 957. "Where the condition of the title is known to both parties, or both have the same means of ascertaining the truth, there can be no estoppel." Crary v. Ivey, 208 U. S. 521, 28 S. Ct. 360, 52 L. Ed. 595. The same principle is announced in Eltinge v. Santos, 171 Cal. 278, 284, 152 P. 915, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1143; Leedom v. Ham, 5 Cal. Unrep. 633, 48 P. 222; Holcomb v. Boynton, 151 Ill. 294, 37 N. E. 1031; Estis v. Jackson, 111 N. C. 145, 16 S. E. 7, 32 Am. St. Rep. 74; Sheffield Car Co. v. Constantine, etc., 171 Mich. 423, 137 N. W. 305, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 984; and Gjerstadengen v. Van Duzen, 7 N. D. 612, 76 N. W. 233, 66 Am. St. Rep. 619.

[8] It next is contended that respondent's conduct amounted to a ratification of her deed to appellant's grantor. There is a well-defined distinction between ratification of a deed and facts constituting an estoppel of the grantor to deny its validity. Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 226, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252. And where, as in California, the mode of ratification is governed by statute, the distinction between the two doctrines often becomes an important consideration. By express statutory provision in this state, ratification of an agent's act can be made:

"Only in the manner that would have been necessary to confer an original authority for the act ratified, or where an oral authorization would suffice, by accepting or retaining the benefit of the act, with notice thereof." Civ. Code, § 2310.

As we have seen, it has been definitely decided in this state that under our statute of frauds the authority of an agent to insert in a deed any of the essentials of a valid conveyance, such, for example, as the name of the grantee, is required to be in writing. Harris v. Barlow, supra. It follows, therefore, that a ratification of Neilson's act in causing to be inserted descriptions of the properties and the names of respondent as the grantor and of Meng as the grantee could be made only in writing subscribed by appellant. There never was such a writing, and therefore there never was a ratification.

We have now considered all of the points raised by appellant with respect to parcels 2, 3, 4, and 5, and our conclusion is that as to those parcels the judgment should be affirmed.

Parcel No. 1.

[9] The facts respecting lot D in block 87 of the city of Santa Monica (referred to in appellant's brief as parcel No. 1) appear to be substantially these: The title to this lot was acquired some time after respondent had signed the blank deeds which she left at the bank with Neilson. Respondent caused the deed to this parcel of land to be made to herself and daughter, as the grantees. It seems that prior to the acquisition of this lot respondent and her daughter were the owners, as joint tenants, of a parcel of land referred to by the witnesses as the "Highland property." There seems to be no question as to the daughter's rightful claim to title in this Highland property as a joint owner thereof with her mother. Respondent sold the Highland property. The deed thereto she executed in the names of herself and daughter, as the grantors, signing the daughter's name as the latter's attorney in fact under the power of attorney already mentioned. With the proceeds from the sale of this property respondent bought the Santa Monica property (parcel No. 1), causing the title thereto to be conveyed to herself and daughter as joint tenants. This Santa Monica property is referred to by the witnesses as the "Fourteenth street property," or the "Fourteenth street house." Respondent testified: "The Highland property we held as joint tenants is the Fourteenth street house." By this testimony respondent evidently meant that the "Highland property" had, in effect, been converted by her into the "Santa Monica property." It is manifest that upon these facts appellant is the owner of at least some interest in or title to parcel No. 1, and that the judgment is erroneous, in so far as it declares respondent to be the sole owner thereof, and in so far as it purports to quiet the latter's title thereto as sole owner.

In view of the fact that the judgment should be affirmed as to four, and reversed as to one, of the parcels of land, the costs of appeal should be apportioned between the parties in as equitable a manner as seems practicable.

Those parts of the judgment which quiet respondent's title to, declare her to be the owner in fee simple of, and appellant to have no right, title, or interest in, the lots and parcels of land other than lot D in block 87 of the city of Santa Monica, and all parts of the judgment which relate to or affect the properties other than said lot D, are affirmed. That part of the judgment which quiets respondent's title to, declares her to be the owner in fee simple of, and appellant to have no right, title, or interest in, said lot D in block 87 of the city of Santa Monica, is reversed. The trial court is directed to retry the issues which involve the title to said lot D, and to adjudicate the respective rights of the parties in and to that lot. Appellant shall recover one-fifth of all amounts actually paid out by her in connection with the appeal and the preparation of the record for the appeal, including one-fifth of the cost of printing her briefs, if the cost of printing her briefs did not exceed $100; and, if it did exceed that sum, then she shall recover $20 for printing her briefs.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Richard T. Pomeroy, executor of the will of Matthew Kelleher, deceased, against George D. Collins, Sr., individually and as trustee, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant George D. Collins, Sr., and intervener, Helen H. Walsh, appeal. Affirmed.

Daniel J. Kiley, of Boston, Mass., and George K. Ford, of San Francisco, for appellant Walsh.

McNair & Stoker and George E. Stoker, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This is an action in equity, brought by the executor of the estate of Matthew Kelleher, deceased, to set aside and compel the cancellation and annulment of four certain trust instruments executed by said Matthew Kelleher, on the ground that said Matthew Kelleher was, at the time he executed the same, mentally incompetent and of unsound mind. It is claimed and alleged that the execution of said trust instruments was induced and procured by fraud and deceit practiced upon said Matthew Kelleher by appellant George D. Collins, Sr., whereby said Kelleher conveyed and transferred to said George D. Collins, Sr., as trustee, certificates representing 910 preferred shares of the capital stock of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, a corporation, and certain described real property fronting on Folsom street, city and county of San Francisco, of the aggregate value of not less than $85,000; all of said property being at the time of his death the property of said Matthew Kelleher and constituting property belonging to his estate. The complainant also prayed for an order directing the said George D. Collins, Sr., to reconvey and retransfer said real property and stocks to the executor of the said estate. The trial court annulled said trust instruments and granted relief in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The appeal taken by George D. Collins, Sr., is from the decree as thus rendered, and is joined in by intervener, Helen H. Walsh. The other defendants, not being beneficially interested in the result of the action, did not join in the appeal.

The trust instruments will be identified in the order and by the same letter stamps that were placed upon them by the trial court.

Exhibit A purports to be a "declaration of trust and assignment of stock," and bears date May 25, 1921. By its terms Matthew Kelleher assigned, transferred, and conveyed to "George D. Collins, Sr., as trustee, and upon the uses and trusts hereinafter specified, 910 preferred shares of the capital stock of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, a corporation." A description of the stock is therein set out. The instrument bears the indorsement of and recites the delivery of said stock by said Kelleher to said George D. Collins, Sr., as trustee. The next paragraph is as follows:

"The said trustee to have and to hold said 910 shares of stock upon the express trust to pay the dividends thereon to said trustor until such stock is sold and to sell, assign, transfer and convey said stock or any part thereof to the purchaser or purchasers and to dispose of the proceeds of such sale or sales as follows to wit: To Helen H. Walsh, of West Summerville, Massachusetts; Mrs. Margaret O'Neil, of Boston, Massachusetts; Julia H. Pomeroy, Parish of Drischane, County Cork, Ireland; Patrick O'Reardon, Parish of Drischane, County Cork, Ireland—$1,000 each.

"V.

"All reversionary interests in the proceeds of said sale of said shares of stock, resulting from the death of a beneficiary or other cause and the amount not hereinbefore disposed of, shall vest in said trustee pro se, and not in trust. (Italics supplied.)

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand the day and year first above written.

"Matthew Kelleher.

"Witness: Geo. D. Collins, Sr.

"I hereby accept the foregoing conveyances and trust for the purposes therein specified.

"Dated this 27th day of May, 1921.

"Geo. D. Collins, Sr."

Exhibit B is a deed and declaration of trust executed May 26, 1921, whereby the Fulton street real property is granted and conveyed to said George D. Collins, Sr., as trustee, "to have and hold in fee absolute upon the express trust nevertheless to sell and convey said property and to dispose of the proceeds" as follows: To pay all debts and the expenses of his last illness and funeral expenses; to pay to the Reverend Father McDonald, chaplain of the Holy Cross Cemetery, the sum of $250 for masses for the repose of his soul; to spend $500 for a monument to be erected at his grave and whatever sum may be necessary for perpetual care of the grave." The names of the same beneficiaries set out in Exhibit A are restated, and each is given an additional $1,000. The reversionary interest clause and the "pro se and not in trust" clause are repeated. The execution is the same in form as the first instrument. It is dated May 26, 1921.

Exhibit C is a declaration of trust and an assignment of stock and precisely the same in substance and form as Exhibit A, except the "pro se and not in trust" clause is omitted, and in lieu thereof (after providing for the payment to the same beneficiaries named in the trust instrument bearing date May 25 and May 26, respectively) the following clause appears:

"To dispose of the remaining amount of the proceeds of said sale in accordance with the instructions heretofore given said trustee by said trustor." (Italics supplied.)

It contains a clause providing for the payment of debts and expenses which is not found in Exhibit A. The execution is the same as in the other trust instruments. It bears date May 27, 1921.

Exhibit D is a deed and declaration of trust, and repeats the names of the beneficiaries and the amount of the benevolences set out in the trust instrument marked Exhibit B, by giving to the Reverend Father McDonald an additional $250 for the saying of masses for the repose of his soul, and by setting aside an additional $500 for the erection of a monument at the grave, and giving to Helen Walsh, Mrs. Margaret O'Neil, Mrs. Julia H. Pomeroy, and Patrick O'Reardon an additional $1,000 for the third time, making a total of $4,000 to each. It is precisely like the trust instrument marked Exhibit B, except the "pro se and not in trust" clause is omitted, and like its companion instrument it directs the expenditure of the remaining amount "in accordance with the instructions heretofore given said trustee by said trustor." The execution is the same as the others, and the day of execution is given as May 27, 1921.

The oral instructions which Mr. Collins claims were given to him by Kelleher on May 23, 1921, and which were afterwards reduced to writing by Collins, were to be a guide for him in the distribution of the estate. According to Collins' testimony, the oral instructions given by Kelleher contained directions which were not to be disclosed to Kelleher's friends or made public. These instructions purport to have been acknowledged by Collins before a notary public on May 26, 1921. Omitting the formal parts, the instructions as prepared read:

"And whereas on said 25th day of May, 1921, the said Matthew Kelleher transferred said shares of stock with the exception of the fourteen shares evidenced by certificate No. 32310 to the undersigned as trustee by endorsement on the certificates and delivery of said certificates so endorsed, and subsequently said fourteen shares were issued to the undersigned as such trustee by said corporation together with eight hundred and ninety-six shares, making a total of nine hundred and ten shares (first preferred) of the capital stock of said corporation, issued to the undersigned as trustee for said Matthew Kelleher;

"And whereas in the said declarations of trust certain property is transferred to the undersigned pro se, to wit, proceeds of sale therein mentioned, the declared purpose of said Kelleher in that respect being to avert litigation by persons claiming without right to be his heirs or relatives and in that behalf to secure to and confer upon the undersigned the absolute and uncontrolled and independent judgment and discretion free from interference or control by any court in determining from evidence adduced who if any person or persons are the surviving heirs and relatives of said Matthew Kelleher and in selecting from such heirs and relatives the person or persons deemed by the undersigned worthy of having and receiving said property and proceeds, the said Matthew Kelleher stating that to the best of his knowledge and belief, all of his relatives are dead but that if nevertheless any of his relatives survive him, they were to receive said property in equal shares according to said selection by the undersigned, the said Matthew Kelleher further stating that he was never married;

"And whereas said Matthew Kelleher on said 25th day of May, 1921, instructed the undersigned to dispose of and distribute said property to wit, said proceeds to the following persons and to the hereinafter named charitable organization in the proportions and upon the contingencies hereinafter stated, now therefore I do hereby formally acknowledge and declare that the said property and proceeds conveyed to me pro se, by said Matthew Kelleher in each of said declarations of trust, were so conveyed to me upon the following instructions given to me by said Matthew Kelleher on said 25th day of May, 1921, to wit:

"I.

"To make final and conclusive determination from evidence adduced as to who if any are the heirs and surviving relatives of said Matthew Kelleher and thereupon to select from such heirs and relatives those worthy of having and receiving said property and proceeds, and distribute the same to them in equal shares. That should there be but one person so selected as herein stated, to distribute to such person all said property and proceeds.

"II.

"If there be no surviving relatives or heirs of said Matthew Kelleher, or none deemed by the undersigned worthy of having and receiving said property and proceeds, then to distribute said property and proceeds as follows, viz.: One-third thereof to Helen H. Walsh, Julia H. Pomeroy, and Patrick O'Reardon in equal shares, and the remaining two-thirds to be given equally to the Associated Charities of San Francisco for the charitable purposes of the organization, and to the relief of those of the Irish belligerents made destitute in County Cork, Ireland, in consequence of supporting the Sinn Fein warfare now prevailing there.

"III.

"Any residue of the said property and proceeds arising from the death of either said Helen H. Walsh, Julia H. Pomeroy or Patrick O'Reardon prior to distribution to them as hereinbefore stated, shall be paid and transferred by the undersigned to the survivor or survivors, and if none, then said residue shall be paid one-half to said Associated Charities of Sa Francisco for the charitable purposes of the organization and the remaining one-half shall be paid to those of the Irish belligerents made destitute in County Cork, Ireland, in consequence of supporting the Sinn Fein warfare now prevailing there.

"IV.

"I do hereby accordingly undertake and agree to comply strictly with the foregoing instructions given me by said Matthew Kelleher on said 25th day of May, 1921.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this the 26th day of May, 1921.

"[Signed] Geo. D. Collins, Sr."

Matthew Kelleher died June 18, 1921, a little more than three weeks after the execution of the foregoing trust instruments.

The second amended and supplemental complaint contains three counts or causes of action, the gravamen of each count being the practice and imposition of fraud and deceit in several forms by the defendant Collins upon said Matthew Kelleher, thereby inducing and influencing him to execute said instruments.

The first count alleges unsoundness of mind on the part of said Matthew Kelleher, and consequently the execution of said instruments by him was not his voluntary act; also that he lacked the mental capacity to understand the nature, purposes, and effect of said acts; that it was not the intention of said Matthew Kelleher to transfer the whole or any part of his estate to said George D. Collins, Sr., as trustee or otherwise.

The second count alleges the age of Matthew Kelleher at the time of the execution of said instruments to have been about 79 years, and that he was and for a long time prior thereto he had been suffering from disease, loss of memory, and weakness of body and mind to the extent that he was unable to properly care for his property or affairs, and he was at the time of the execution of the said instruments, and for a long time prior thereto had been, in a weakened and impaired condition of mind and body, and was easily influenced by his acquaintances and by those in whom he reposed confidence; that said Collins was an attorney at law and maintained offices in the city and county of San Francisco; that Kelleher reposed absolute faith and confidence in said Collins, and counselled with him with the intention and desire of making a testamentary disposition of his estate by will, but that said Collins advised, counselled, and cautioned said Kelleher, who was in a weakened and enfeebled mental condition, against making a will, and persuaded him that he, Collins, better than the courts of law and better than he, Kelleher, was able to determine who were his surviving heirs and relatives, and the extent, if any, to which said heirs or relatives were deserving of his bounty, and promised said Kelleher that if he signed said instruments and transferred to him the said estate, that upon the death of said Kelleher he would make such a determination and would distribute his estate according to the merits of the respective claimants as set out in said instructions; that by the adoption of such a plan all litigation commenced by persons claiming, without right, to be his heirs or relatives would be averted.

It is also alleged by said count 2 that Kelleher did not know that he was absolutely divesting himself of his estate by the execution of said instruments A and B, and did not know that he was empowering said Collins to sell and convey the same before as well as after his death and to receive the purchase price thereof without any obligation resting upon said Collins for the support and maintenance of said Kelleher during the remainder of his life or to account to any person for any portion of said estate over and above the sum of about $10,000, as provided in said trust instruments A and B. It is directly alleged that the fact that Kelleher was absolutely divesting himself of all interest in and to his property was concealed from him and that he was without sufficient understanding to protect himself against the machinations of Collins, whose purpose and intention it was to appropriate all of said estate to himself above the said sum of $10,000, which amount was, according to the terms of said instruments, made payable to said beneficiaries. It was the theory of plaintiff, as pleaded in said count 2, that if successful in maintaining said trust instruments A and B, it was the purpose and intention of said Collins to suppress trust instruments C and D, but if the first plan should by any chance miscarry, he would, in such event, dispose of the remainder of Kelleher's estate as provided by the instructions referred to in paragraph VI of C and paragraph III of D, which authorized him to dispose of said property "in accordance with the instructions heretofore given said trustee by said trustor," which were orally given and resided in the breast of Collins alone. Further, that the reduction of said instructions to writing was an afterthought, and was compelled by the exigencies of a desperate situation, and was done only to give a fairer aspect to an inequitable transaction. The allegation that it was the intention of Collins to hold under cover the second set of instruments, C and D, until and unless required by some untoward circumstance to produce them, is based upon the fact that he hastened to file at once said trust instruments A and B for record in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco, but did not make known the existence of said instruments C and D and said instructions until some days thereafter. Other allegations of fraudulent acts are alleged, but it is not necessary to repeat them. Count 3 alleges mental incapacity on the part of Kelleher, and alleges that George D. Collins, Sr., was practicing law and maintained offices in the city and county of San Francisco, and that Kelleher in his mentally incapacitated condition took advice from him as an attorney, and was deceived into the execution of said trust instruments. It is further realleged that Kelleher consulted Collins with the intention of making his last will, and informed said Collins that he desired to make a will in favor of a number of his relatives and intimate friends, and requested Collins to prepare such a will for execution, and when he affixed his name to said instruments he believed it was in execution of a will prepared in accordance with his request and desire, and that the instruments which were actually signed by him were represented to be in accordance with the will, wish, and desire of the said Kelleher, but that he was acting under a misrepresentation of facts when he executed said instruments; that he had confidence in said Collins and relied upon him implicitly to carry out his wishes, and that he had no independent advice in the matter whatsoever, but acted solely and alone under the advice and influence of the said George D. Collins, Sr.

The answer specifically denies each allegation of fraud, and alleges that said Matthew Kelleher at and during all the times related therein was of sound and disposing mind and was free from any incapacity of any kind whatsoever, and that said instruments and transfers were prepared by the defendant in strict accordance and compliance with the express wishes, desires, and instructions of said Kelleher, and not otherwise; that at all times he was of sound and disposing mind and acted freely and voluntarily in the exercise of his own will and judgment. It is denied that it was the purpose or the intention of said Kelleher or desire of said Kelleher to make a will, but that it was his effort to avoid probate proceedings and that the trust instruments were the product solely of the mind of said Kelleher and not of the said Collins. Defendant Collins disclaims any and all and every right, title, and interest, other than as trustee, in and to the real and personal property, or any part thereof. His prayer is joined in by Helen H. Walsh, an intervener, that said trust instruments be upheld.

The court found that each of the said instruments was executed by the said Matthew Kelleher without receiving any consideration therefor, and that in the month of May, 1921, he was of the age of about 79 years, and for a long time prior to the execution of said trust instruments was physically infirm, and his mental capacity was greatly impaired; that he was at all times of unsound mind; that because of such unsoundness of mind he was unable to understand and did not understand the nature, purpose, and effect of the said acts, or either thereof, in indorsing and delivering to said defendant the aforesaid certificates of stock, and in executing and delivering to said defendant the aforesaid instruments in writing; that at none of said times did the said Matthew Kelleher possess sufficient mental capacity to perform or understand his acts or either thereof; that from the time of the execution of said instruments until his death, to wit, June 18, 1921, the impairment of the physical and mental capacities of the said Matthew Kelleher continuously increased; that the said George D. Collins, Sr., was aware of the mental condition of said Matthew Kelleher, and knew at the time said Kelleher executed said instruments that he did not understand or comprehend the effects of said acts or either of them. It is further found that the said Matthew Kelleher did not, on the 25th or 26th or 27th days of May, 1921, or any other time, intend to transfer, assign, or convey his estate, or any part thereof, to said George D. Collins, Sr., either individually or as a trustee for himself nor for any other person or at all; that the said George D. Collins, Sr., well knew on the said 25th, 26th, and 27th days of May, 1921, that said Matthew Kelleher did not intend to transfer the whole or any part of his estate to said defendant, either individually or as a trustee. It was specifically found by the court that all of the allegations of the first count of the second amended and supplemental complaint were true and sustained by the evidence. No finding was made as to the other two counts, as the finding on the first count made it unnecessary to find on the other two. Both are more or less interwoven with allegations of mental incompetency and the results that may flow therefrom. No point is made because of a failure to find on the other two counts.

It may be said at the outset that a consideration of the contents of the four trust instruments and said instructions, and the manner in which they were prepared and produced, without recourse to any evidence whatever as to the mental competency of the person who executed them, would be a sufficient reason for a court of equity to scrutinize the transactions with great care and concern.

The early story of the life of Matthew Kelleher is told by Bartholomew Danehy, his lifelong associate and intimate friend, to whom he bequeathed $5,000 in his will dated February 9, 1914. Both were born in County Cork, Ireland, were about the same age, lived but three blocks apart, and were boys together in youth and companions throughout their long spans of life. Kelleher preceded Danehy by four years in arriving at Boston. In 1872 Danehy also left Ireland and came to Boston. For a time he and the companion of his youth lived in the same house, conducted by Mrs. O'Neil, who is mentioned as one of the beneficiaries in the trust instruments. Danehy and Kelleher came to California together in 1875, and both located in the city and county of San Francisco. Kelleher engaged in the housemoving business, was a man of strong physical powers, and possessed good intellect. He took care of his savings and invested them in sound securities. His habits of life were methodical and fixed, but very simple. He was cautious and very suspicious. He enjoyed his friends, however, and the associations of his boyhood and early life in Ireland seemed to have lingered in his memory up to a short time prior to his death. He never married, and spent at least the later years of his life at a hotel. He associated with friends of his nationality, whose companionship he delighted in. By observing strict rules of frugality he slowly accumulated the property involved in this proceeding. George D. Collins, Sr., described Matthew Kelleher as a "miserly" person, possessing a very suspicious mind, "very illiterate, very uncouth, but very intelligent." As he formerly knew him, he described him as a vigorous, healthy man, apparently very strong. He said he was always "very opinionated" and intelligent in his judgment—"a man of very strong mind at that time. * * * There seemed to be in his mental makeup a rather sinister turn." Later, when he saw him, he described him as "having acquired a very much more positive frame of mind than formerly, and he seemed to be in a quarrel constantly with conditions and people. He had a prejudice against lawyers, and would not pay them if he could avoid it." His suspicious mind did not change with the passing years. It is the testimony of all who knew Kelleher in his better days that he was a strong willed man, independent, self-reliant, and conscious of his ability to make his way in the world. George D. Collins, Sr., testified that he met Kelleher for the first time about 25 years ago. He saw him but occasionally up to about 1909, and from 1909 to 1918 he was out of touch with him entirely. Kelleher visited Ireland in 1910 and returned to San Francisco in 1914. He made a will before leaving this country for Ireland, in 1910, and made another before leaving Ireland for this country in 1914. Collins had no intimate relations with him, nor did he know that Kelleher had spent four years of his life in Ireland since he last saw him or that he had ever executed a will. The only law business that Collins seemed to have transacted for him was in his later years, beginning with an incident when Kelleher became embroiled with a neighbor whom he claimed had dumped some rubbish containing nails and glass upon his vacant lot. Kelleher took the matter up with the person who was alleged to have dumped the rubbish on his lot, and it resulted in Collins swearing to a complaint charging the alleged wrongdoer with an offense under the city ordinance. This difficulty was of a trifling nature but it wrought upon Kelleher very much. He grew to believe that people were pasturing animals upon his lot at unusual hours, and said animals were eating the wild grasses growing thereon. He was seen by the neighbors at unseemly hours secreting himself in places of vantage that he might discover the trespassers. He became involved in a turmoil concerning these inconsequential matters. These matters were regarded by the neighborhood as trifling and foolish, and they were not inclined to discuss the subject with him. It was within this period that Kelleher's conduct, conversation, and general manner began to attract the attention of the neighbors and of his intimate friends and plainly marked the beginning of his mental decay. Kelleher's most intimate friends did not know that Collins represented him or was his attorney; in fact, they were not acquainted with Collins until the beginning of the transactions in question, when they chanced to see him in Kelleher's room a day or two before the execution of said instruments going through his trunk for the purpose of obtaining certain data. The trunk contained letters and papers of personal importance to Kelleher, and it furnished the basis of much, if not all, of the history related by Collins concerning a knowledge of Kelleher's private life. It appears that Kelleher had, on previous occasions, conferred with attorneys other than appellant on matters of business.

As to the findings of the court that Kelleher was of unsound mind and was not able to understand the effect of the instruments which he executed, there is an abundance of evidence in the record. As early as February 10, 1917, four years prior to his detention for the second time at the Lane Hospital, we find the following entry upon the clinical record: "Eyes: pupils small, reacts sluggishly. * * * Marked arcus senilis." Also the following statement made by him upon his entry to the hospital on that occasion:

"I am crazy. I cannot sleep. From my throat up is all bad. Is a tube running down from my skull which carries the pain around?"

He then complained of "buzzing" in the ears. He was dizzy, and believed that "one of his lungs had gone out of him entirely." It was difficult to get his history because of his mental condition and deafness. He remained there only a short time and departed. Since that time he exhibited upon numerous occasions definite symptoms of both physical and mental decay or what is ordinarily known as senile dementia. Every one who knew him well noted his mental and physical decline. Several persons who regarded and respected him testified that they would avoid trying to converse with him because of his constant mumbling and incoherent speech. He was very garrulous. His conversation with Mr. Collins but a day or two before he executed the instruments in question was alone enough to put him on notice as to Kelleher's mental condition. Mr. Collins' statement is that in discussing the disposition of Kelleher's estate with him he told him that he wanted a part of it invested in munitions of war to be sent to Ireland to aid the Sinn Fein cause. He also wanted to do something to Lloyd George that would mean his extermination. In a letter written by him late in 1920 he said that if "they could get Lloyd George it would accomplish more than all the night raids they can make." But this is not all. By a great preponderance of the evidence it would not seem possible that Kelleher could have appeared to any one who undertook to carry on a conversation of any length with him to have been a rational person on May 25th, 26th, and 27th, or at any period thereafter.

In February, 1921, Kelleher re-entered the Leland Stanford or Lane Hospital. Doctor George H. Becker, a student interne at the Lane Hospital when Kelleher was admitted in February, 1921, and who was specializing in nervous disorders, had Kelleher under observation. Kelleher had intentionally taken boracic acid internally which had been given him to be used for a chronic ear trouble, believing that if it was efficacious externally it should be helpful if taken internally, and said it had burned a hole through his stomach, and complained that the medicine which the nurse had given him was poison. Physically he presented the findings of an agitated man with the usual deterioration found in such a case. He had muscular weakness, senile tremor, and incoordination of his muscular movements as the result of senility. There was present a marked arteriosclerosis (hardening and thickening of the arteries) and enlargement of the heart. Also diabetes, chronic bronchitis, and emphysematous, a swelling produced by gas or air diffused in the cellular tissue. The witness defined senile dementia to be a breaking down or falling of the intellect as evidenced by lack of ability to judge facts, loss of memory, particularly for recent dates, tendency to unreasonable conclusions. Arteriosclerosis dementia is manifested by loss of memory, a tendency to forgetfulness, repetition, irritability, periods of amnesia. The witness was of the opinion that Matthew Kelleher in February, 1921, was suffering from senile psychosis or dementia. The clinic record showed under date of February 15, 1921, that he was afflicted with diabetes. His case was diagnosed as "psychosis senile." Wandering of the mind, sleeplessness, restlessness, and incoherency are frequent annotations made in the neurological records or charts. Kelleher had hallucinations and illusions of a most pronounced character. He complained of pains in the head, which he attributed to an injury he had received some years prior to his entry into the hospital. He imagined that his "wishbone" was standing up at right angles and was standing out as much as an inch. He said that he applied some cold cream to the "wishbone," and it seemed to drink it in like a fish. At no time does the neurological record show that Kelleher's mind was entirely normal or free from delusions of some form. While the mental cloudiness may have subsided or cleared up at times and he became better oriented on some occasions than on others, there was no time when he was free from indulging in absurd notions. Another entry in the record states that upon an examination of Kelleher no definite symptoms of mental or nervous diseases were discovered, the conclusion being, however, that he was suffering from diabetes and possibly a senile psychosis.

The testimony of George D. Collins, Sr., was to the effect that Kelleher began to consult him as to making trust dispositions of his property some time in February, 1921, but nothing of a definite nature was done until about the 23d day of May, 1921. The active negotiations were then begun by Kelleher going to Collins' office, and by Collins visiting Kelleher at his home in the Mission Hotel. None of the papers in question were executed before the 26th day of May, 1921. Before this day, however, a number of witnesses detailed a long list of mental lapses on the part of Kelleher, beginning with several months prior to his death. He was prone to fall asleep in his chair, was given to incessant mumbling, was incoherent in his speech, forgetful and listless, and the continuity of thought was broken. He had not engaged in any business for a long time prior to the time in question, and had done by force of habit the simple things which he continued to do until the beginning of the illness which resulted in death. The one desire that was firmly fixed in his mind and which was the last to perish was the desire to accumulate money. His only business was to draw the premiums on his stock, which were paid quarterly, and he appeared very regularly to receive them.

Charles L. Barrett, assistant secretary of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, who had known Kelleher since 1914 and negotiated with him the purchase of his first stock in said company, gives a vivid picture of Kelleher as he appeared a short time before and at the time he began to dispose of his estate. He met him every time he called to draw his dividends and to reinvest the earnings in the purchase of other stock. He had talked with him a great deal about his personal and business affairs and was well acquainted with him. He visited the office of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company on May 20, 1921, as was his habit every three months, to reinvest his earnings in the purchase of more stock. He was very much emaciated and wandering in his talk. He was weak, and had all he could do to get into the office. His appearance shocked Mr. Barrett. He muttered, and his talk was more or less incoherent. It was with great difficulty that Mr. Barrett could understand that he wished a check which he had in his possession redrawn and divided into two checks, one to be used for the amount of stock he wished to purchase and the other for the balance, to wit, $252.47. The latter check was returned to him. He could not understand the transaction. He thought he should still have two checks after he delivered one for the purchase of the stock. Mr. Barrett could not explain the matter so that he understood it. He returned on May 23, and appeared to be very much troubled, and said he wanted the two checks. Barrett was unable to make him understand the situation. Kelleher was usually quick to understand business transactions when he was in health.

On the morning of May 26, when Mr. Barrett arrived at his office, he found Kelleher there sitting in a chair in the worst chill, as the witness described it, that he had ever seen a person have. He was actually shaking the chair. When he was able to speak he asked about the checks. He insisted that he saw the checks on one of the clerk's desks, which was not true. He searched through his clothing, but could not find the check he should have had, and he seemed to have the idea that some one was trying "to do him up." This check was given to him on May 20, and was for $252.47, and was indorsed by him in a very "shaky" hand, and he took it with him. Later it was cashed by George D. Collins, Sr. His appearance and mumbling to himself on May 20 indicated that he was not his former self. On May 26 Mr. Barrett could understand but a few of Mr. Kelleher's utterances. The "terrific chill," as it was described, lasted spasmodically throughout the entire time that Kelleher was at the office, and when it was at its height he was very weak. The severe shaking spoken of by the witness was doubtless a fit or seizure known as "senile tremor," which appears in the clinic report of his case made in February, 1921. Mr. Barrett put him on a street car and advised him to go home. He did not reach his home, but subsequently fell in a faint or fit and was taken to the emergency hospital. Mr. Barrett was of the opinion that Kelleher was of unsound mind. He noticed that Kelleher began to fail in November, 1920, after he had drunk boracic acid as above related.

Mr. Collins testified that the first trust instrument, Exhibit A, was prepared May 25, and that Kelleher was to call at his office to sign it, but failed to appear, and later telephoned to him to come to his room. He went to Kelleher's room that night and procured Kelleher's signature. No one but Collins was present to witness the signing. Its execution was afterwards acknowledged by Collins as a subscribing witness. Instrument B, conveying the real property, was not signed on that night, as Kelleher, according to Collins, discovered an error in the description which he wished corrected, and an appointment was made for Kelleher to be at Collins' office to sign the instrument as corrected on the morning of May 26. That was the morning that Kelleher appeared at the Pacific Gas & Electric Company's office. His manner and appearance have already been described by Mr. Barrett. Collins heard of the collapse of Kelleher and hastened to the emergency hospital, taking with him the trust instrument covering the real property and had it signed by Kelleher. Collins testified that Kelleher's mind was perfectly clear when he arrived at the hospital and at the time he executed said instrument, and purported to relate parts of conversations he claims to have carried on with him. He found Kelleher on a reclining chair.

John T. Kane, who was an applicant for letters of guardianship of the estate and person of Kelleher, a matter pending, upon being informed of Kelleher's illness, procured an ambulance and went to the place where Kelleher was stricken to convey him to the emergency hospital. He found him in a helpless condition and unable to walk. He testified:

"He acted kind of childish as if he didn't have any sense. He seemed kind of stunned. I spoke to him and asked how he felt; he shook his head, 'No.'"

From the time Kane first saw him until the time that Collins arrived at the hospital Kelleher did not utter a word. Collins said to him, "You were to be down to my office this morning." Kelleher said nothing, but "laughed like, kind of a funny grin." He was raised to a sitting posture, and Mr. Collins pulled two papers out of his pocket and handed Kelleher a pencil and said, "Sign here." Kelleher signed, Collins holding the tablet. The papers were not read to him. Collins said, "This is the paper you wished to sign at my office." Kelleher said nothing when he signed. The witness could not say whether Kelleher recognized the paper or not. When he signed his name extended beyond the edge of the instrument he was signing. Prior and subsequent acts indicating irrationality were also detailed. Reverend Thomas H. Flaherty was present also when Exhibit A was signed. His version is that Mr. Collins said, "Here are those papers." His recollection was that Kelleher made no reply. Kelleher started to sign on a piece of yellow paper at the top. Collins interrupted by saying, "Don't sign there, sign here," and indicated with his hand. Kelleher made no reply. After he signed the pencil dropped from his hand. Kelleher appeared listless, and "had something of a snarl on his face, sort of a contraction of his face, and every once in a while he would squint and look up with what seemed to be a perfectly clear eye." That the witness did not believe Kelleher to be in a normal mental condition is made clear by an examination of his testimony. Two other instruments were signed by Kelleher on May 27, no one else being present but himself and Collins. Father Flaherty had Kelleher taken to a private room, where they were together for 45 minutes. What was said by either was not divulged. At any rate, at the conclusion, Father Flaherty suggested to those in charge that Kelleher be taken to St. Mary's and a priest be procured for him there. Reverend Patrick G. Foote was the priest called upon to hear Kelleher's confession at St. Mary's. By Kelleher's words and actions he said he appeared to him to be rational. He heard his confession and gave him absolution. Asked as to what Kelleher said, the father replied:

"That is pretty hard to say. I will have to explain myself. I wish to say the man was a perfect stranger to me. He came into my life for that once, and it would be pretty hard for me to give you my memory of it. If it had been a case I had been visiting for several weeks, I would have been able to tell you more or less what I said on those occasions.
* * *

When asked how long he was in Kelleher's room, he said:

"I came in and heard his confession, and left his room and never met him again."

He was not able to recall any conversation he had with Kelleher prior to the confession. Upon being asked pointedly whether he regarded Kelleher as then being of sound mind, he replied:

"I judged him fit to make his confession. Q. But whether or not he was of sound mind or unsound mind? A. That would be supposed. Q. That he was of sound mind? A. Of sound mind."

The other exhibits, C and D, were executed at St. Mary's Hospital on the 27th day of May, no one being present but Collins and Kelleher. Kelleher was removed from the emergency hospital to St. Mary's on the 26th day of May, and remained at St. Mary's until the time of his death. For the first two days of his detention at St. Mary's Hospital female nurses were assigned to his case, but he grew so noisy and violent that they were replaced by male nurses. The first nurse went on duty at 7 p. m., May 26, 1921. At 11 o'clock that night he became very irrational and continued irrational all the time she was with him. He did not know where he was, and thought his room was on fire, and imagined that people were trying to steal his money. His mind was wandering, and he had to be kept in bed by force. The day nurse went on duty at 7 o'clock the following morning, and she had great difficulty in keeping Kelleher in his room. He was in a delirium all day and talked irrationally. He grew so violent that she and her companion were displaced by male nurses. It became necessary to change his room to a basement room and to confine him in bed with straps. It was impossible to carry on a rational conversation with him at any time. He had hallucinations and delusions, and mumbled continually. At times he would make a great deal of noise by shouting, and he imagined that he saw serpents and tarantulas upon the ceiling. There is evidence in the record given by attending nurses that he tore his bedding apart and cut the sheet into strips. He was also fearful that he was going to be served by a constable with a subpoena or some sort of process. He believed that persons who came about his room were there for the purpose of robbing him and people were trying to enter his room through the transom. His temperature was usually normal. He was in a delirium much of the time, however, and it is the testimony of four or five nurses who attended him from the day he was brought to the hospital until his death that at no time was he a rational man. It was during this period of delirium and irrationality, as described by a number of witnesses, that Kelleher signed three of the instruments in question, and during which period a power of attorney authorizing the transfer of 14 shares of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company's stock to Collins was also brought to the hospital by Collins to be signed by Kelleher. Walter R. Gerard, who nursed Kelleher at St. Mary's, beginning with May 29 to the time of his death, testified that there was not a day within that period that Kelleher did not have hallucinations and delusions. He also recited an attempt he made, at the request of Collins, to have Kelleher copy in his own hand a request prepared and furnished by Collins requesting that the latter act for him as his attorney in the guardianship matter then pending. He further testified that he was requested by Collins to make an affidavit that Kelleher seemed mentally right and to permit no one to see Kelleher, as an attempt might be made to induce him to make a will.

Upon the death of Mr. Kelleher, Dr. G. Y. Rusk, a pathologist of the University of California Hospital, and an assistant professor in the medical school, made an autopsical examination of the abdominal cavity, and found the heart, kidneys, pancreas and lungs in a very advanced stage of deterioration and disease. There was evidence of marked thickening and hardening of the arteries, fibrosis and sclerosis. The heart was generally enlarged, and the surface in some instances had adhered to the sac in which it lies. Extensive fibrous myocarditis of the left ventricle was evident. The general condition of these organs was chronic and of long standing, and affected in a very large degree the flow of the blood to the brain.

The deceased suffered from a "heart block," which was a serious and chronic disturbance of the heart action, in that it showed that the auricle and ventricle did not beat in normal rhythm. This was sufficient to cause loss of memory, forgetfulness, irritability, syncope, and a general mental disturbance. No autopsical examination was made of the brain. It was the opinion of the expert that an examination of the brain would have shown the same condition as to arterial thickening and hardening as was disclosed by the examination of the organs of the body.

[1,2] In addition to what has been above said, there is testimony in the record of marked general deterioration of mind and body in Kelleher beginning several years prior to his death. We think there is no doubt but that there is sufficient evidence in the record to fully sustain the findings of the court that he was of unsound mind at the time and for some time prior to the executions of the instruments in question, to the extent that he did not understand the nature, purpose, or extent of his acts. There is also testimony in the record coming from his most intimate friends that during the time covered by the Collins' negotiations he believed that he was engaged in making a will, and he remarked to one or two of his close friends that he had remembered them in his will. The finding of the court that he did not understand or appreciate the nature, quality, purpose, effect, and extent of his act in executing the papers in question is amply supported by the evidence in the case. It is the contention of appellant that, had decedent made a will, the evidence as adduced in this action would be insufficient to overturn it under the many standard authorities of this state settling the rule as to the degree of mental incompetency necessary to be adduced to justify a court or jury in holding a testator incompetent to make a will, and the same evidence, if applied to such a case, would compel us to hold it insufficient to establish mental incapacity. With this suggestion we must disagree. We feel satisfied that a finding of a court or a jury as to the incapacity of a testator upon evidence such as is presented to us in the instant case would compel an affirmance of the finding. No hard and fast rule may be announced as to whether a different degree of capacity is required to make a deed or contract than is necessary to the execution of a valid will. A contract may be so complex and intricate as to require a keener discernment of intellect and understanding than would be required to execute an ordinary, simple will; and vice versa. As a general proposition of law, it is impossible to say that either requires a greater degree of capacity than the other. Each must be construed with reference to its own particular or peculiar facts. But this case is not to be ruled solely by the decisions of this state which establish the quantum of capacity required to transmit property by will. Section 39 of the Civil Code provides:

"A conveyance or other contract of a person of unsound mind, but not entirely without understanding, made before his incapacity has been judicially determined, is subject to rescission, as provided in the chapter on rescission of this Code."

Consequently, to avail one's self of this statutory remedy, it has been said by the courts of this state and other jurisdictions that:

"It is not necessary for a person to be incompetent to make any kind of a contract or to transact any business however simple, but the test is: Was the party mentally competent to deal with the subject before him with a full understanding of his rights?" Carr v. Sacramento Clay Products Co., 170 P. 446, 35 Cal. App. 439; Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. Harris, 15 S. Ct. 843, 158 U. S. 326, 39 L. Ed. 1003. "Did he understand the nature, purpose, and effect of the contract?"

[3,4] After citing a number of authorities, the decision states the rule that, if there is found in the evidence any rational ground for holding that the person executing a contract was mentally deficient, his contract will be avoided. In determining this question an appellate court must regard the evidence in the light most favorable to such a conclusion. A person may understand that he is executing a mortgage and note or a trust deed, or trust instrument, and still lack sufficient capacity to realize the effect it might have on him or his estate and to judge of the wisdom or un wisdom of the transaction and its effect on his property. Sutcliffe v. Heatley, 122 N. E. 317, 232 Mass. 231.

[5-8] Section 2224, Civil Code, provides:

"One who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it."

Whether or not Collins intended and planned to gain an advantage over Kelleher was a question for the trial court. If he did, then the burden was upon him to show that the transaction was fair. While the name of the appellant does not appear upon the roll of attorneys of this state, this court will take judicial knowledge of the fact that he was for many years an active, practicing attorney in all of the courts of this state. That he assumed to be a practicing attorney so far as relations with Kelleher were concerned there can be no reasonable doubt. Therefore he will be held to the duties and burdens which the law imposes upon an attorney in dealing with his client and to the same degree of accountability as though he were a legally admitted attorney. He brings himself within the rule announced in Clark v. Millsap (Cal. Sup.) 242 P. 918.

[9] Surely a transaction such as has been outlined should command the close scrutiny of a chancellor. Whether the transactions contain within themselves the seeds of an iniquitous purpose is a question solely for his conscience, and his decree will not be disturbed if there be any substantial evidence to support his conclusion, even though an opposing conclusion may find some support in conflicting or contradictory evidence. We have examined the entire record, and have given careful consideration to the arguments of counsel, and are convinced that the judgment is supported by the evidence.

[10] Appellant insists that the action is one primarily for the reconveyance of specific real and personal property in the possession of the appellant, and that the action is therefore of a legal cognizance, and that the appellant was entitled to the intervention of a jury under the authority of section 592, Code of Civil Procedure. Donahue v. Meister, 25 P. 1096, 88 Cal. 121, 22 Am. St. Rep. 283; Hughes v. Dunlap, 27 P. 642, 91 Cal. 385. But where the issue joined by the pleadings is clearly of equitable jurisdiction, the right to a jury trial does not exist as a matter of right. In such cases it is not error to deny the application for a jury trial.

[11] Under the common law the right to a trial by jury was not granted in actions for cancellations of instruments, and the rule is well established in this state that it is not error to deny a jury in any cases where such right was not granted at common law. Holland v. Kelly, 169 P. 1000, 177 Cal. 43; Cassidy v. Sullivan, 28 P. 234, 64 Cal. 266; Woods v. Varnum, 24 P. 843, 85 Cal. 639; Ballou v. Avery, 166 P. 1003, 175 Cal. 641; 15 Cal. Jur. 331. It has been held that in actions which are nominally instituted to quiet title under section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, but which are actions of a legal nature, such as the right to the possession of real property, the litigants are entitled to a trial by jury, but in the instant case the gravamen of the complaint is of an equitable nature, and the trial court did not err in denying the application for a trial by jury. We recently held in the case of Union Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Broderick (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 1034, that, in an action of interpleader between two rival claimants to the proceeds of an insurance policy, neither was entitled to a jury trial, notwithstanding the circumstance that the real controversy was one of law. We hold, therefore, that no error was committed by denying a jury trial in the instant case.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 231—Before proceedings may be had in magistrate's court against accused, he must be fully informed of his right to be represented by counsel, and is entitled to compel attendance of witnesses.

Before proceedings may be had in magistrate's court against accused, he must be fully informed of his right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceeding, and is entitled to compel attendance of witnesses, and he is also privileged to appear as a witness in his own behalf; all proceedings being required to be had in his presence.

4. Indictment and information $\S$ 161(3)—Permitting state's attorney during trial to amend information charging robbery by substituting name of actual person injured for name of person in whose immediate presence money was alleged to have been taken held not error (Pen. Code, $\S$ 809, 1008).

Permitting state's attorney during trial to amend information charging robbery by substituting name of actual person injured for name of person in whose immediate presence money was alleged to have been taken held not error, in view of Pen. Code, $\S$ 1008; it appearing accused was not surprised, in view of evidence adduced at the preliminary hearing in magistrate's court, despite section 809.

5. Indictment and Information $\S$ 122(2)—Whole system of procedure by information is subject to control and regulation by Legislature (Pen. Code, $\S$ 809).

Whole system of procedure by information is subject to control and regulation by Legislature, including the subject-matter embraced in Pen. Code, $\S$ 809, confining district attorney in framing the information to the same crime as the one designated by the magistrate in the commitment.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 306—Presumption not indulged that accused, on day named in information, committed another robbery.

The presumption will not be indulged that accused, on the day named in an information charging him with robbery, committed another robbery, and took from another person robbed exactly the same sum of money that he took from the person named in the indictment as the person whom he robbed.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 170—Permitting state, during trial, to amend information charging robbery by substituting name of actual person injured for name of person, in whose immediate presence money was alleged to have been taken, held not error as placing accused in double jeopardy for same offense (Pen. Code, $\S$ 956).

Permitting the state, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 956, during trial, to amend information charging robbery by substituting name of actual person injured for name of person, in whose immediate presence money was alleged to have been taken, held not error as placing accused in double jeopardy for same offense, in view of accused's right, in the event of conviction, to prove the identity of the person he robbed both by parol and record evidence in the case.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 141(2).

Error cannot be presumed.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 144(16)—Not presumed that jury would permit evidence, addressed to count, that failed to influence it in consideration of another and separate count (Pen. Code, $\S$ 954).

In prosecution for robbery, based on more than one count, as permitted by Pen. Code, $\S$ 954, it will not be presumed that the jury would permit the evidence, addressed to a count, that failed to influence it in the consideration of another and separate count.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 878(3)—Jury's acquittal of accused of offense charged in one count is not ground for vitiating verdict of guilty found under another count.

Jury's acquittal of accused of offense charged in one count is not ground for vitiating verdict of guilty found under another count, if the verdict under the later count is sufficiently supported by evidence.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 572—Jury, in considering defense of alibi, is not limited to alibi defense alone.

Jury, in considering defense of alibi, is not limited to alibi defense alone, but must consider that question in connection with all the other evidence in the case.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 824(4), 829(7)—Failure to instruct that accused is not required to establish alibi by preponderance of evidence held not prejudicial, in view of instructions, and failure to request proper instruction.

In a robbery prosecution, where defense was alibi, the failure of the trial court to instruct that the burden was not on accused to establish the defense by a preponderance of the evidence, but that jury must acquit, if the evidence was sufficient, on the consideration of the whole case, to produce a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, held not prejudicial, in view of instructions given, and failure of accused to request proper instruction embracing the matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Oscar Foster was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Judd, of Los Angeles, and J. A. Balthaser, of Glendale, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SEAWELL, J. The defendant was charged by an information filed against him on the 12th day of September, 1924, by the district attorney of the county of Los Angeles, with the commission of two separate and distinct crimes of robbery, separately stated in the information. Both robberies were committed in See's candy store, located at 135 Northwestern avenue, in the city of Los Angeles, on July 19, 1924, and July 24, 1924, respectively. The first robbery was committed at about the hour of 10 o'clock p. m. and the second at about 9:35 o'clock p. m. Upon both occasions the defendant entered the candy store, of which Mr. See was the owner and proprietor, alone and undisguised in any manner, and with drawn revolver compelled the lady employees thereof to stand by while he took and compelled the delivery to him upon his first entry the sum of $46, and upon the second entry he took the sum of $23 from the cash register in said candy store.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged in the information upon both counts. The court pronounced judgment as prescribed by law upon the verdict of guilty as found by the jury under the first count of the information, but declined to pronounce judgment against the defendant under the second count, giving as a reason therefor that it was of the opinion that the ends of justice would be fully subserved by the imposition of one sentence, and thereupon made an order dismissing the second count. Appellant upon appeal makes the point that the trial court erred in two major particulars, first, by permitting the district attorney to amend the second count of the information; and, secondly, by refusing to give a portion of an instruction offered by him in support of his defense of alibi, which contained both objectionable and unobjectionable statements of the law, which will hereafter be considered.

That portion of the first count of the indictment which is descriptive of the offense, reads:

"That the said Oscar Foster, alias Robert Smith, alias Jack Todd, on the 19th day of July, 1924, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, and forcibly take from the person, possession, and immediate presence of one Mrs. Agnes Funke, forty-six ($46.00) dollars * * * the personal property of the said Mrs. Agnes Funke. * * *"

The allegations necessary to the statement of an offense of this character, as to the money having been taken without the consent and against the will of said Mrs. Agnes Funke and accomplished by means of force and fear, are fully set out in said first count.

The second count in formal respects is identical with the first. That portion which is descriptive of the offense is as follows:

"That the said Oscar Foster, on or about the 24th day of July, 1924, * * * did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and forcibly take from the person, possession, and immediate presence of one Mr. Fisher, twenty-three ($23.00) dollars in money. * * * the personal property of said Mr. Fisher, which taking was then and there without the consent of the said Mr. Fisher," etc.

[1] The defendant was positively identified by Mrs. Funke, who was forced by him to open the cash register drawer and take the money therefrom and hand it to him as he stood close by her side, himself occasionally assisting in emptying the money till, as the person who committed the robbery on the night of July 19th. That another lady employee, who admitted that she was very badly frightened and extremely nervous while the defendant was in the candy store, was unable to identify him as the person who entered the store and committed the crime, would by no means justify this court in reversing the case. We have reviewed the record with care and it is not at all surprising that the jury should have accepted the testimony of Mrs. Funke, as against said other employee, and the testimony of the alibi witnesses. The testimony of the former, as it appears in the record, is clear, positive, and convincing, and there appears to be no reason why it should not have been given full credit by the jury. On the other hand, said employee's testimony was badly shaken, if not positively impeached, by a number of witnesses to whom she had made statements inconsistent with her testimony as to whether she was able to say that the defendant was not the person who entered the store as described by Mrs. Funke. Her ability to distinguish human features was greatly weakened when she declared from the witness chair that she had not before seen the face of the deputy district attorney with whom she had talked the day before she appeared as a witness. The testimony of Mrs. Funke, and the witness above referred to, was considered by the jury and nothing appears in the record that would cause us to discount the convincing effect that the former testimony must have had upon the minds of the triers of the facts. The mother of the defendant, three brothers, and two sisters were called to support the alibi defense of the accused. We have also scrutinized the testimony of those witnesses. It is quite apparent that the testimony of said witnesses was not sufficient to create a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury that the defendant was at another place than See's candy store at the time the robbery was committed.

The next point has to do with the court permitting the district attorney to amend the information. Miss Freda Knuebel, an employee in charge of Mr. See's store on the night of July 24, 1924, was the second witness called for the people. She had been under examination but a short time whereupon she testified that the defendant came into the store, walked up to her, and pointed a "gun," which he held in his hand, toward her, and said, "Turn over your money." The witness pointed to the cash register and said: "Over there it is." The defendant, who was then within a foot or so of her, walked over to the till, opened it, and took therefrom the amount alleged in the information. At this juncture counsel for the defendant objected to the testimony of the witness on the ground that it did not "tend to establish the allegations of the information" as set out in count 2. As the facts were further developed, it became clear that it was after the money had been taken from the presence of Miss Knuebel and just as the defendant was about to depart from the candy store that Mr. Fisher, an employee of Mr. See, and from whose possession and immediate presence the money was alleged to have been taken, stepped into the store and was confronted by the defendant in the doorway. The defendant had a "gun" in his hand and said, "Get inside and stay there." Mr. Fisher entered the store, and the defendant disappeared into the street. It was these rapidly occurring incidents that caused the confusion in the pleader's mind. The defendant was positively identified by Mr. Fisher, who chanced to be in that particular locality, and was drawn into the store by the strangeness of the situation inside. The testimony directed to the second count, and which tended to show that the money was taken from the person, possession, and immediate presence of Miss Freda Knuebel, was objected to, as the second count of the information did not allege the robbery to have been committed in the immediate presence of Miss Knuebel, and she was the only person in the store at the time the defendant entered and was engaged in the act of reducing the property to his possession, and no third person other than Fisher entered during the time the defendant was, by force of arms, making good his escape from the immediate place where he had committed the crime and from the immediate presence of the person he had robbed. At the conclusion of the examination of this witness the amendment was allowed against the objection of the defendant in conformity with the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, and the name "Freda Knuebel," the person from whose immediate presence the money was taken, was substituted in place of the name "Mr. Fisher." The testimony of the witness Freda Knuebel came as no surprise to the defendant, as she had testified in the presence of the defendant and his attorney at the preliminary examination substantially as she testified at the trial, and Fisher's testimony at said examination also showed, as defendant was fully aware, that Fisher entered the store immediately after the defendant had gained possession of the money as above described. This was substantially admitted by counsel during the discussion between court and counsel immediately prior to the order of the court substituting the name of Miss Knuebel for Fisher. Upon arraignment, defendant demurred to the information on both general and special grounds, but made no motion to set aside the second count or made no objection thereto in any way.

[2-4] Section 954, Penal Code, authorizes the charging in one information of two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses under separate counts. Section 956, Penal Code, with reference to the particular person injured in this class of crimes, provides:

"When an offense involves the commission of, or an attempt to commit, a private injury, and is described with sufficient certainty in other respects to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured, or intended to be injured, is not material."

Direct authority for the amendment of the information is found in the following section of the Penal Code:

"An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. An indictment cannot be amended so as to change the offense charged, nor an information so as to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination. * * * " Section 1008, Pen. Code. (Italics supplied.)

That portion of said section 1008 permitting the amendments of indictments and informations was added by amendment in 1911. St. 1911, p. 436. Prior thereto no such authority existed.

Inasmuch as the evidence taken at the preliminary examination showed that the money was taken from the immediate presence and possession of Miss Knuebel, the amendment comes within both the letter and spirit of section 1008, Penal Code, and violates no constitutional inhibition. Said section impliedly recognizes a natural distinction between an indictment, which is found by an official body known as a grand jury and presented in open court—preserving to this day at least some remnants of the ancient forms that obtained under the common-law procedure—and an information, which is an accusatory paper filed by a district attorney after preliminary examination had before a magistrate. There exist substantial reasons for placing a different limitation upon the power to amend an indictment than should be placed upon the power to amend an information.

A grand jury is a distinctive, inquisitorial body which exists for a limited time and no one may act for it after it has completed its service. Its sessions are secretly conducted and the person whose acts are under investigation by it may have no official knowledge that he is the subject of investigation, nor does he know who his accusers were or what they have testified to until after the indictment has been returned against him; in short, the accused has not had his day in court, so far as the preliminary proceedings are concerned. The right of the accused to be informed of the evidence taken before the grand jury, even after indictment found, is a modern statutory innovation of the ancient rule. In no case is the accused privileged to be confronted by his accusers. Indeed, he may not appear before the grand jury or produce witnesses in his own behalf as a matter of right. The procedure by information is quite different. The accused, before any proceedings are had against him in the magistrate's court, must be fully informed of his right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceeding, and he is entitled to compel the attendance of witnesses and he is also privileged to appear as a witness in his own behalf. All proceedings must be had in his presence. The evidence, which must be sufficient to support the information, is adduced in the presence and hearing of the accused and furnishes the authority for the commitment and the filing of the information. The procedure by indictment and information are so vastly different as to justify the distinction observed by section 1008, Penal Code, which prohibits the amendment of an indictment in such form as to change the offense charged therein and permits the amendment of an information so long as the crime stated by the amendment is supported by the evidence which was taken at the preliminary examination. By pursuing this course, the due process clauses of the federal and state Constitutions are not violated by such an amendment, for the reason that the defendant was present and was given an opportunity to defend himself throughout the entire proceedings. Hurtado v. California, 4 S. Ct. 111, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. Ed. 232.

Under our system of criminal procedure the committing magistrate is not limited in making his order of commitment to the allegations of the complaint or the crime named therein. It is his duty to commit the accused for trial for the offense disclosed by the evidence, even though it be a different offense than the one laid in the complaint. Section 872, Pen. Code; People v. Lee Look, 76 P. 1028, 143 Cal. 216; 14 Cal. Jur. 28, 29. In this case the accused was held to answer to the charge of robbery committed in the county of Los Angeles on a stated day. The kind of property taken is described as money and the amount thereof was $23. The crime charged in the complaint and found by the magistrate to have been committed by the defendant was robbery, with the time, place, and amount of money taken specifically stated. Treating the crime as completed, and not as continuing at the time of the arrival of Mr. Fisher, the court was of the opinion that the amendment should be made. If no constitutional right of personal liberty is violated by amended section 1008, Penal Code—and we are not aware of such violation, nor have we been cited to any authority in this state which challenges the authority of the Legislature to so regulate criminal procedure—all of the objections made by appellant as to the identity of the crime are swept aside by the amendment.

[5] Conceding that the district attorney by virtue of section 809, Penal Code, is confined to the same crime in framing the information as the one designated by the magistrate in the commitment, such an exaction would not strip the Legislature of the power to authorize the correction of an error by an amendment of the information so as to correctly identify the person who was actually injured by the robbery, if the evidence taken at the preliminary examination justifies the amendment. The whole system of procedure by information is subject to control and regulation by the Legislature.

[6] But let us consider the crime as referable solely to section 956, Penal Code. The person injured is not material if the crime is described in the information with sufficient certainty as to identify the act. The act or crime of robbery as described by the information was committed by the defendant on the 24th day of July, 1924, in the county of Los Angeles, and the amount of money taken by means of force and fear by the defendant was alleged to be the sum of $23, the exact amount which was proved at the trial to have been taken by the defendant by means of force and fear. The only way by which any uncertainty could arise as to the identity of the crime charged would be to indulge the probability that the defendant, on the day named in the information, committed another robbery and took from said other person robbed exactly the same sum of money that he took from Miss Knuebel. But this presumption may not be indulged. Criminal acts are never to be presumed or indulged against a person, but must be proved, and the proof of the robbery alleged would not give rise to a presumption that another robbery had been committed by the defendant.

[7] There seems to be no room for doubt as to the object sought to be effected by the adoption of section 956. Said section declares in plain terms that "an erroneous allegation as to the person injured is not material," if the "offense * * * is described with sufficient certainty in other respects to identify the act." This language does not mean that the error which will be held to be immaterial is referable only to a mistake as to the name or a misdescription of the person injured, and therefore not referable to mistake as to the person injured, as expressly provided by the statute, and no case in this state so holds. If that is what the Legislature intended, it would have provided that an erroneous allegation as to the name of the person injured is not material. To so interpret the statute would be to arbitrarily change its language and meaning and render the law impotent to prevent a miscarriage of justice in cases where the commission of the crime is established and the accused identified as the person who committed it, merely because the information alleged the ownership of the property stolen to be in one person and the proofs showed it to be legally in another. In the instant case the examination of the defendant before the magistrate, as well as the testimony at the trial, identified the offense as being the same offense in each proceeding, to wit, robbery committed by the defendant.

We think the amendment as made to section 1008, Penal Code, in 1911, is quite persuasive, if not entirely convincing, as to the intention of the Legislature to permit, in the discretion of the trial court, the amendment of informations where it can be done without substantial prejudice to the rights of the defendant, so as to correctly state the offense shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination. Surely, a substitution of the person actually injured in the place of the one who was not injured, so far as the loss of property is concerned, but who was actually present and held in fear during a portion of the time when the injured person was held under duress by the defendant, could not be said to be prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant. If, as contended, amendments only may be made to the indictment or information to correct an error or misdescription as to name, the amendment of section 1008, Penal Code, was absolutely purposeless as this has always been allowable. Prior to the statute authorizing amendments to be made to informations, it was the settled law of this state, as shown by a long line of decisions, that a mistake or misdescription of the name of the person or corporation or firm injured was not a material matter (section 956, Pen. Code), and objections made thereto upon the grounds of variance were uniformly overruled. People v. Smith, 44 P. 663, 112 Cal. 333; People v. Nunley, 75 P. 676, 142 Cal. 105; People v. Watson, 14 P. 97, 72 Cal. 402; People v. Anderson, 22 P. 139, 80 Cal. 205; People v. Olsen, 220 P. 444, 64 Cal. App. 126; People v. White, 190 P. 821, 47 Cal. App. 400; People v. Hinshaw, 227 P. 156, 194 Cal. 1; People v. Grable, 227 P. 227, 67 Cal. App. 183; 14 Cal. Jur. 91, 92, 93.

In a number of the foregoing cases, and in many others that might be cited, the name of the person or the description of the corporation alleged in the indictment or information to have been injured was so radically different from the person or corporation shown by the evidence to have been injured as to have furnished no definite information to the accused that the person charged to have been injured and the one actually injured was the same person, corporation, or firm. Under the settled state of the law, there was no occasion for further legislation on a question which had been definitely settled both by statute and by decisions of the courts of this state. Decisions in other jurisdictions have been called to our attention as authority for appellant's contention, but, upon an examination of the decisions cited, it will be found that they are based upon the nonexistence of statutory authority or statutes dissimilar to our own or upon the consideration of questions wholly different from the question presented to us for consideration under our statute. In practically all of the cases relied upon by appellant the amendment was made to an indictment as to a substantial matter, or, if to an information, the statutory right to amend, if it existed at all, was less comprehensive than our own. In Webb v. State (Okla. Cr. App.) 224 P. 991, the defendant was charged with maintaining a nuisance at a place designated as No. 918, North Broadway, Oklahoma City, by keeping a place where intoxicating liquors were bartered, sold, and given away, and where persons were permitted to congregate for the purpose of buying and drinking liquor. The proof at the trial showed that the defendant was in charge of a hidden whisky plant in the second story rooms at No. 718½, North Broadway, and the county attorney was permitted to amend the information with respect to the place where the nuisance was maintained under a statute which provided that an information might be amended in matters of substance or in form at any time before the defendant pleads, and may be amended after plea on order of the court, where the same can be done without material prejudice to the rights of the defendant; and, while the court there held that an information could not be amended as to a matter of substance, it nevertheless held that the amendment concerning the place where the nuisance was committed was as to a matter of form and not a matter of substance and upheld the conviction. It will be observed, however, that there was no provision in the Oklahoma statute, as in ours, authorizing the filing of an information based upon the evidence taken before the magistrate at the preliminary examination.

While there is no prior decision of this court involving the precise facts as those presented by the instant case, the cases of People v. Anderson, 22 P. 139, 80 Cal. 205; People v. Grable, supra, and other decisions cited tend to establish the only interpretation which we think can be placed upon sections 956 and 1008, Penal Code, and which we have here discussed. There is certainly no authority in this state holding or pointing to a contrary conclusion. If what we have said as to the right of the district attorney to amend the information in the discretion of the court be sound, then the further question as to the identity of the defendant with the crime is rendered immaterial, as the amended information sufficiently described the offense as having been committed in the presence of the person from whose custody and possession the money was actually taken. Nevertheless, as the defendant has made the contention that the identity of the crime places him in a position where he could not defend himself against a second charge based upon the same offense, we will consider his objections as made under section 956 alone and without reference to 1008. The information in the case of People v. Faust, 45 P. 261, 113 Cal. 172, decided many years before the amendment of section 1008, was much more vulnerable to attack on the ground that the information did not sufficiently identify the offense than the information first filed in the present case. The defendant in that case was charged under the provisions of section 397, Penal Code, which made it a felony to furnish or supply intoxicating liquors to any Indian. Faust was charged by the information filed against him with the crime of selling liquors to two Indians, neither of whom was described by name or in any other way than "two Indians." The same objection was made in that case as is made here as to the sufficiency of the identity. This court there held that, if the defendant should again be prosecuted for the offense of which he stood convicted, he might plead the conviction and establish the identity of the offense by parole evidence. So here, if any question should hereafter arise as to the identity of the person robbed, the defendant could show beyond the peradventure of a doubt, both by parole evidence and by the record in the case, including the information, the evidence, and the minutes of the court, that the person whom the defendant was charged and convicted of robbing on the said 24th day of July, 1924, of the sum of $23, was Miss Knuebel and not Fisher, and all danger of being placed twice in jeopardy would be averted. Other authorities to the same effect touching the question of the plea and defense of jeopardy are commonplace in our reports.

[8, 9] Appellant, assuming the invalidity of the second count of the information for the reasons assigned, argues that a reversal of the judgment of conviction should be had under the first count, for the reason that the evidence offered in support of said assumed void count must have had a prejudicial effect upon the minds of the jurors and influenced them to the defendant's injury in their consideration of said valid count. But error cannot be presumed and it cannot be said that a jury would permit the evidence addressed to a count that failed, to influence it in the consideration of another and separate count. If appellant's reasoning be sound, section 954, Penal Code, which is the authority for the procedure adopted in the instant case, would be rendered fatal to the people in every case. The same argument as to the prejudicial effect of the offer of testimony to establish any one of the counts upon the minds of the jurors with respect to the other separate counts could be made with equal force whether the defendant be convicted on all the counts, or whether he be convicted on one or more and found not guilty on one or more. The people cannot be properly charged with bad faith by charging the defendant with two different offenses, as the evidence amply justifies its action.

[10] With bad faith removed as an element or consideration, the fact that a jury should acquit a defendant of an offense charged in one count could not be urged as a reason for vitiating a verdict of guilty found under another count, if it be sufficiently supported by legal evidence. We think there is no substantial merit in the contention of appellant as to legal prejudice suffered by reason of the proof offered to sustain the second count. This form of pleading is authorized by statute. In re Kinney (Cal. App.) 235 P. 460.

[11, 12] But one other question remains for decision which arises out of the court's refusal to give the whole of the alibi instruction offered by the defendant. The first paragraph of the following instruction was given, but the portion inclosed within parenthesis was refused as not being a correct statement of the law:

"The defendant in this case has introduced evidence to prove the fact that he was not at the place where the crimes were alleged to have been committed, at the time charged, and if, in your deliberations, you determine that defendant was not at the place where the offenses are said to have been committed, at the time alleged, but was at another place, then under this state of facts you must find the defendant not guilty, for it is impossible for the same person to be in two different places at the same time. (The defendant is not required to prove this fact beyond all reasonable doubt, or even by a preponderance of the evidence, to entitle him to an acquittal, but it is sufficient if, after hearing all the evidence introduced upon this subject by the defendant, you have a reasonable doubt of his presence at the time and place where the commission of the crime is charged, and if it does, you must give the defendant the benefit of this doubt, and find him not guilty.)" (Italics supplied.)

The portion refused was properly rejected. The law is well settled that, while an alibi is not a separate or affirmative defense, the jury is not restricted or limited in its consideration of the case to the alibi defense alone, but is to consider that question in connection with all the other evidence in the case. It is true that the alibi evidence may be so persuasive as to raise a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant as against all the other evidence produced against him, but it is the duty of the jury, nevertheless, to consider all the evidence offered in the case, and it should be so instructed. McClain v. State, 62 So. 241, 182 Ala. 67; 29 A. L. R. 1141; Flanagan v. People, 73 N. E. 347, 214 Ill. 170. The court having properly refused to give the erroneous portion of said alibi instruction, the question arises whether it committed prejudicial error by failing of its own motion to instruct the jury that the burden was not upon the defendant to establish an alibi by a preponderance of the evidence, but that it was sufficient to entitle the defendant to an acquittal if the evidence of alibi, considered in connection with all the evidence in the case, raised in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt. The court did, by giving the sound portion of the instruction, specifically call the attention of the jury to the defense of alibi, and told them that it was impossible for the defendant to be "in two different places at the same time." It also instructed the jury fully as to its duty if any member thereof should entertain a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant upon the whole case presented, and, further, that every material fact in the case must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt; that, considering the evidence as a whole, if it was susceptible of two reasonable interpretations, "one looking towards guilt, and the other towards the innocence of the defendant, it was their duty to give such facts and evidence the interpretation which makes for the innocence of the defendant"; further, that if the facts and circumstances of the case could be reasonably construed as establishing the innocence of the defendant, or as raising a reasonable doubt of his guilt, it was the jury's duty to so construe the evidence. In the light of the instructions given it seems almost incredible that the defendant could have been prejudiced by a failure of the court to instruct upon a subject, which doubtless it would have instructed upon, had it been furnished with a correct statement of the law with respect thereto. While it should be the practice of courts to instruct the jury that the burden is not upon the defendant to establish the defense of alibi by a preponderance of the evidence, and that it must acquit, if the alibi evidence is sufficient, upon a consideration of the whole case to produce a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, we cannot say that prejudicial error was suffered by the defendant in the light of the proceedings in the instant case.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re REED'S ESTATE.

REED et al. v. REED.

(L. A. 8750.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 10, 1926.)

1. Insane persons $\S$ 2—Evidence held sufficient to support finding that person was incompetent to manage property.

In proceedings to declare person incompetent to care for property, evidence held to support finding that he was incompetent.

2. Insane persons $\S$ 27.

Conclusion of trial court as to incompetency of person to manage estate, based on conflicting testimony, is binding on appeal.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Edward L. Reed, an incompetent person. Proceedings by Emily L. Reed and another to have Edward L. Reed declared incompetent to manage his estate. From an order appointing the Security Trust & Savings Bank guardian of his estate, Edward L. Reed appeals. Affirmed.

Hughes & Miller and Harold Aubry Miller, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bertin A. Weyl and T. C. Gould, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. After proceedings for that purpose duly had, Edward L. Reed was declared to be incompetent, and incapable and unable unassisted, to manage and take care of his property. From the order appointing the Security Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, guardian of his estate, Reed has appealed. His sole contention is that the evidence does not warrant the court in finding him to be an incompetent person.

[1] It appears from the record that, before the hearing on the petition for the appointment of a guardian, Reed was adjudged by the superior court of Los Angeles county to be mentally sick and was placed in charge of the psychopathic parole officer of the county. At the time of the proceedings in the court below he was confined in a private sanitarium. A number of witnesses, including three medical practitioners, testified in support of the petition. In addition to appellant, two lay witnesses and two medical witnesses were called in his behalf. In brief, the evidence is to the effect that, for about two years before the hearing in the court below, the appellant, a man now nearly 70 years of age, acted very strangely. At times he became violent, and appeared to be getting worse. His married life of some 20 years was pleasant, and he was devoted to his wife and to their son; but his attitude toward them changed. At times he became angry, chased his wife "all around the table, showing his teeth, and his eyes bulging, like he was just going to claw (her) with his teeth, and he cursed (her) unmercifully." On these occasions "his face was flushed, very red, and the veins protruded. * * * During the last two years he had had those spells very often." When the family was away he went to live at another place, and refused to return home. Finally he began lavishing his money on women who were not members of his family, and who had no call on his benevolence.

In a case involving a question of the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a finding of incompetency by the trial court, this court said:

"It is unnecessary to enlarge upon the rule, so long settled and so well known as to be axiomatic, that the findings of a trial court upon disputed issues of fact are not to be overturned on appeal, unless they totally lack the support of substantial evidence. That rule is as applicable to a case of this character as to any other. It requires us to uphold the assailed finding if there is in the record evidence, which, with the aid of all inferences reasonably to be drawn from it, tends logically to establish the conclusion embodied in the finding." Matter of Coburn, 131 P. 352, 357, 165 Cal. 202, 212.

Aside from the testimony of the witnesses, which we have so briefly stated, there was the evidence of the medical witnesses who testified that the appellant showed mental deterioration, had hardening of the arteries in the brain, and was suffering from senile dementia. In their opinion the appellant was insane and incompetent, and liable to be imposed upon by artful and designing persons. The testimony of these witnesses was based upon their personal observation and examination, had in connection with the lunacy commission before which the appellant was examined, and the history of appellant's case. The testimony of the witnesses for the appellant, at variance with that of the witnesses who testified in support of the petition for the appointment of the guardian, merely raised a conflict in the evidence. The effect of the testimony of the medical witnesses who examined and who testified in behalf of the appellant was so destroyed upon cross-examination as to practically amount to an admission that under some circumstances the appellant might be imposed upon by artful and designing persons in relation to his property matters.

[2] We are not unmindful, of course, of the rule invoked by appellant, that an adult person has the right to control his own person and affairs, and that that right should not be taken from him except upon a clear showing of the statutory grounds warranting a restriction of his liberty of action for his own protection. But, as was said in the case cited by the appellant, where there is any substantial conflict of testimony, the solution of that conflict must in this class of cases, as in any other, rest with the trial court. The conclusion reached by that court, after weighing opposing testimony and considering the different inferences which may be drawn from all the testimony, is not open to review on appeal. Estate of Schulmeyer, 153 P. 233, 171 Cal. 340, 342.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re CHAPMAN'S ESTATE. (L. A. 8455.)
(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 10, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐766—Where appellant made no motion for affirmance, but printed substantially entire record, and appellant was by order relieved from requirement of statute as to matter to be included in briefs, merits of appeal would be considered (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Though appellant, not including in brief matter she desires to call to attention of court, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, incurs risk of affirmance upon motion, where respondent made no motion, but printed as supplement to his brief substantially entire record of testimony, and appellant was by order of Supreme Court relieved from requirement of such statute, held, that merits of appeal would be considered.

2. Insane persons ⇐1—One whose mental faculties were impaired so as to render her incapable of taking care of her property was "incompetent person" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1767).

One whose mental faculties were impaired so as to render her incapable of taking care of her property was "incompetent person," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1767.

3. Insane persons ⇐29.

Court on appeal would not disturb finding that mental faculties of one adjudged incompetent were still impaired, where evidence was conflicting.

4. Appeal and error ⇐204(1).

Objection to testimony would not be considered on appeal, where testimony was admitted at trial without opposition.

5. Insane persons ⇐29—On petition to be restored to competency, statement of judge at prior hearing held immaterial.

On petition by one adjudged incompetent to be restored to competency, statements of judge at hearing, which resulted in appointment of guardian, held properly excluded as immaterial.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Kate C. Chapman, incompetent. Petition by Kate C. Chapman to be restored to competency. From an order refusing the relief prayed for, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

E. D. Martindale, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chapman & Chapman, L. M. Chapman, and Ward Chapman, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. On February 25, 1921, Kate C. Chapman was adjudged by the superior court of the county of Los Angeles to be an incompetent person, and a guardian of her estate was duly appointed. She has now petitioned the same court to be restored to capacity, upon the theory that, since the appointment of her guardian, her mental condition has changed for the better to such an extent that she has become capable of properly managing and preserving her estate. After hearing the evidence, the lower court was of the opinion, and found, that Kate C. Chapman is still incompetent and unable, unassisted, to properly manage her property. The petition was accordingly denied. It is from that order that this appeal is taken. The only point raised by the appellant is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding of the lower court.

[1] A preliminary objection to the consideration of the appeal is urged by the respondent, who contends that the order below should be affirmed because of the failure of the appellant to comply with the mandatory provision of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure that in filing briefs in an appeal the parties must print in their brief, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portion of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court. As we pointed out in Estate of Berry (Cal. Sup.) 233 P. 330, since the 1923 amendment to the section, an appellant who fails to comply therewith incurs the risk that the order or judgment appealed from may be affirmed upon motion. In the present case, respondent made no such motion. On the contrary, he printed, as a supplement to his own brief, substantially the entire record of the testimony. For this reason, and the further reason that appellant appears to have been relieved by an order of this court from the requirement of the section, we have given due consideration to the merits of her appeal. See Jeffords et al. v. Young (Cal. Sup.) 239 P. 1054.

[2, 3] The trial court found that appellant is afflicted with a paranoiac state of mind; that such condition is incurable; that the petitioner is unable, unassisted, to properly manage and take care of herself or her property; and that by reason thereof she would be likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful or designing persons. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings. Even if it be assumed that findings were required, there is testimony in the record to give them ample support. A number of witnesses testified for the petitioner, and others testified in opposition to her prayer for restoration to competency. The testimony of these witnesses raises a direct conflict as to the competency of the appellant. It is the contention of the respondent that the testimony of the incompetent herself, when taken and read as a whole, is sufficient to support the findings made by the trial court, and that, even though there were no other evidence in the record, the order of the lower court should be affirmed. It would serve no useful purpose to set out in detail the testimony of the petitioner or the other witnesses. The lower court had the advantage not only of seeing and hearing all of the witnesses, but of observing the appellant herself, and was in far better position than we could be in determining her mental condition. With the witnesses before it testifying to the facts disclosed by the record, the court could very properly conclude that appellant's mental faculties were still impaired to such an extent as to render her incapable of taking care of her property, and that she was still likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful or designing persons. When it was satisfied that such were the facts, it was its duty to hold that the appellant was still within the definition of an incompetent person found in section 1767 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Its finding on the conflicting evidence will not be disturbed. Estate of Schulmeyer, 153 P. 233, 171 Cal. 340.

[4] Complaint is made by the appellant that the lower court permitted Dr. Steddom, who was appointed by the court to examine appellant and report, to testify that the appellant was not competent to manage her property; no reason being assigned for the conclusion. The witness testified at length as to the condition of appellant, and all his testimony was admitted without opposition. It cannot be objected to at this time.

[5] Another contention of the appellant is that the lower court erred in sustaining an objection to a question propounded by appellant to a witness as to what statements the judge of the superior court made in announcing his judgment from the bench, at the conclusion of the hearing in 1921 which resulted in the appointment of the guardian. The objection that the remarks made at the former hearing were immaterial was properly sustained.

We find no error in the record, and the order of the trial court is affirmed.

DANLEY v. MERCED IRR. DIST. et al.
(Civ. 2931.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Dec. 29, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 25, 1926.)

1. Costs $\S$ 32(1)—Landowner, who sued irrigation district to prevent unauthorized contract, and who prevailed on appeal, held entitled to costs of appeal (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1027).

Landowner, who sued irrigation district to prevent unauthorized contract, and who was caused heavy expenses on appeal, by defendants' resistance, held entitled to recover costs of appeal under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1027, on decision in his favor; district being benefited by result of suit.

2. Costs $\S$ 3.

The right to recover costs is statutory, and warrant for their recovery must be found in some statute.

3. Costs $\S$ 169—Where costs actually paid, prevailing party is entitled to recover, whether paid personally or by advancement by other party under agreement to repay them, and such agreement not determinable in motion to tax.

Where costs were actually paid, prevailing party was entitled to recover therefor, whether he paid costs personally, or procured payment to be made by another party under an agreement for repayment and question whether prevailing party had obligated himself to repay sums advanced cannot be litigated on a motion to tax costs.

4. Costs $\hookrightarrow$ 169—Agreement whereby interested party paid costs under agreement for repayment, if plaintiff recovered same, did not preclude plaintiff from recovering costs of appeal.

Where interested party advanced costs on plaintiff's appeal, under agreement that plaintiff should repay costs if recovered, plaintiff on prevailing, was not precluded from recovering costs of appeal merely because his obligation to repay under such agreement was conditional upon his recovery of the costs.

5. Contracts $\hookrightarrow$ 154.

It is not presumed parties deliberately entered into agreement calling for impossible condition or event as test of performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by L. E. Danley against the Merced Irrigation District and others. From an order striking out items of costs claimed, plaintiff appeals. Reversed with directions.

See, also, 222 P. 362, 64 Cal. App. 594.

James F. Peck and Robert L. McWilliams, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, A. L. Cowell, of Stockton, and F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff, as a landowner in the defendant district, brought the above-entitled action to restrain the district and its board of directors from entering into an unlawful contract obligating the district to pay certain persons a total sum of more than $1,000,000. The trial court sustained defendants' demurrer to the complaint, without leave to amend, and entered judgment in favor of defendants. The plaintiff appealed, and the judgment was reversed, with direction to overrule the demurrer, and the appellant was given judgment for his costs of appeal. Danley v. Merced Irr. Dist., 66 Cal. App. 97, 226 P. 847, 854. Within due time after the filing of the remittitur in the trial court, the plaintiff filed therein his memorandum of costs and disbursements on appeal. The defendants duly served and filed their notice of motion to reduce certain items claimed by plaintiff as costs, on the ground that the amounts thereof were excessive, and to strike out all of the items of the cost bill "on the ground that none of the same were paid or incurred by the said plaintiff and appellant, but that, on the contrary the same were entirely incurred and paid by parties other than the plaintiff and appellant." The motion was heard and determined upon affidavits and the court made an order "striking out all items." The plaintiff has appealed from the order. The only evidence bearing upon the question in issue is contained in the affidavit of James F. Peck, attorney for plaintiff, and is as follows:

"That it is true that said L. E. Danley did not pay directly in the first instance any of the costs in the above-entitled action, nor in the companion case of Kelsey v. Merced Irrigation District, but the said Danley arranged for the payment by the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company of said costs, and said costs were paid by the Crocker-Huffman Land and Water Company, and in this behalf affiant alleges that said Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, being a landowner in said Merced irrigation district (and said Danley being likewise an owner of land in said Merced irrigation district, as alleged in the bill of intervention herein), agreed with the said L. E. Danley that the said L. E. Danley should institute said action and prosecute said intervention in the name of the said Danley, and that the said Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company would advance to said Danley, and for his use, all the costs that said Danley should expend in said action, and that, if the said Danley should recover the said costs, the said Danley should pay to the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company such sums as it had expended or incurred therein, and said Danley, who is likewise a property owner in said district, and interested in prosecuting the said action, in the same manner, but to a lesser amount than the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, did commence and maintain the said suit and said appeals, under said arrangement, as to payment of costs of suit and appeals.

"Affiant further alleges that, prior to the printing of the transcripts in the above-entitled action, and in the companion case of Kelsey v. Merced Irrigation District, affiant endeavored, through R. L. McWilliams, an attorney associated with him in said case, to secure from counsel, E. F. Treadwell, for the respondents therein, a stipulation for the printing of one transcript on appeal to be used in the two appeals, in order to reduce the expense thereof, but that said attorney for said respondents refused to agree thereto, or to join in said stipulation, and said attorney for respondents insisted that two transcripts be printed and filed, one thereof in each appeal."

[1, 2] The plaintiff sued to protect the district from the unauthorized act contemplated by its board of directors, and the district, through the board, resisted his efforts, and thereby caused him to incur the heavy expense of an appeal, and, further, by refusing to make the stipulation mentioned in the affidavit, put him to the unnecessary expense of printing two transcripts, where apparently one would have answered every purpose of both appeals. The questions presented by both appeals were identical. Kelsey v. Merced Irr. Dist., 66 Cal. App. 113, 226 P. 853, 854. The defendant district, as well as the plaintiff, is largely benefited by the result of the suit. On every principle of natural justice, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to recover his costs of appeal. The right to recover costs, however, is statutory, and "warrant for their recovery must be found in some statute." Turner v. East Side Canal & Irr. Co., 177 Cal. 570, 573, 171 P. 299, 300. Section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The prevailing party on appeal shall be entitled to his costs excepting when judgment is modified, and in that event the matter of costs is within the discretion of the appellate court. The party entitled to costs, or to whom costs are awarded, may recover all amounts actually paid out by him in connection with said appeal, and the preparation of the record for the appeal, including the costs of printing briefs."

[3] In this case the costs were actually paid, and it appears to be immaterial whether the plaintiff paid the same personally or procured the payment thereof to be made by another person under an agreement that he would repay such other person the amount thereof. Respondents contend that the plaintiff—

"did not either actually pay out any amount or incur any expense in connection with his appeal. It will be impossible for him to incur any expense unless he recover costs in this action, for he cannot incur expense by paying amounts which he is under no obligation to pay, but he has not even done that. Costs cannot be recovered for the purpose of incurring the expense for which the costs are allowed. He cannot, under the facts in this case, incur expense until he recovers costs, and he cannot, under the law, recover costs until he incurs expense."

[4] Plaintiff incurred such expenses when he procured the services for which the costs are claimed. The question here presented is not whether he incurred such expenses or paid the same, but whether he obligated himself to repay the sums which the Crocker-Huffman Company advanced and paid for him. That seems to be a question between him and that company, and any controversy between them cannot appropriately be litigated on a motion to tax costs in an action to which the company is not a party. But, if it be conceded that respondents are in a position to raise the question, no sound reason appears for holding that the plaintiff is precluded by the agreement from recovering costs.

[5] The substance of respondents' contention is that the agreement between the plaintiff and the Crocker-Huffman Company is wholly ineffectual, and by its very terms defeats the evident intention of the parties. The Crocker-Huffman Company was not an officious intermeddler in the suit. Both parties to the agreement were landowners in the defendant district, and, in common with all other landowners therein, they were both interested in preventing the execution of the unlawful contract alleged in the complaint.

A suit by one landowner would as effectively accomplish that purpose as a suit by all. It is not uncommon or improper for many persons who have a common interest in the subject-matter of a controversy to advance the costs of a suit by one of them to protect the rights of all. This is especially true in actions by taxpayers to enjoin the unlawful use of public funds. No case has been cited holding that the plaintiff in such an action cannot recover his costs of suit on the mere ground that his obligation to repay those contributing to the expense of the action is conditional upon his recovering costs. When the plaintiff and the Crocker-Huffman Company entered into the agreement stated in the affidavit, they had the right to assume that, if the plaintiff prevailed in the contemplated action, he would be given judgment for his costs, and that payment of the amount thereof by the district could be enforced. It must be presumed that they acted upon that assumption in making the agreement.

"It is not to be presumed that parties deliberately enter into an agreement which calls for an impossible condition or event as a test of performance." Saunders v. Clark, 29 Cal. 300, 306.

The agreement is neither unusual nor improper. Courts are authorized, in proper cases, to allow persons acting in trust capacities, such as guardians, administrators, and trustees of express trusts, the necessary expenses of administering their trusts, including reasonable attorney fees. Attorneys frequently agree with such trustees to accept as compensation for professional services whatever the court may allow the trustee for that purpose. In such a case it would hardly be contended, merely because the trustee may be under no legal obligation to pay anything to his attorney unless and until the court makes an allowance therefor, that the court could not allow the trustee any sum whatever with which to pay the attorney for his services. The trustee and his attorney would have the right to contract upon the assumption that the court would allow a reasonable sum for attorney fees, just as the parties to the agreement in question here had the right to assume that the plaintiff would be allowed his reasonable costs of suit. There seems to be no distinction in principle between the assumed case and the one here under consideration. Respondent relies upon the case of Mudd v. Mudd, 98 Cal. 320, 33 P. 114, an action by a husband against his wife for divorce, in which it was held error to require the plaintiff to pay his wife counsel fees in the action, upon the ground that her attorneys had agreed to give their services gratuitously. The two cases are not parallel. If the attorneys for the defendant in the Mudd Case had agreed with her, as is usual in such cases, to accept as compensation for their services such amount as the court might allow her for attorney fees, she would undoubtedly have been entitled to a reasonable allowance therefor.

The order is reversed, and the trial court is directed to hear and determine the motion to tax costs in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Appeal by plaintiff from an order of the Superior court of Merced county, J. J. Trabucco, judge, striking out items of costs in an action to restrain the defendant Irrigation District and its Board of Directors from entering into a certain contract. Reversed.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the intervener from an order striking out all the items of his memorandum of costs. The facts are in all respects the same in principle as those in Danley v. Merced Irrigation District et al., 243 P. 676, this day decided by this court.

CALIFORNIA CANNING PEACH GROWERS v. DOWNEY et al. (Civ. 2913.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 26, 1925.)

1. Agriculture ⚡6—Evidence held to show co-operative member's crop had not been sold to packing company, whose permission to sell elsewhere was asserted, but merely assigned on co-operative basis.

In action by co-operative association against member for breach of contract, evidence held to show no sale had been made by association to packing company from which member claimed to have obtained permission to sell elsewhere, but that association had merely assigned peaches grown by defendant to packing company upon a co-operative basis.

2. Agriculture ⚡6—Member's claim of repurchase of crop from packing company to which co-operative association had sold it held unsupported by evidence.

In an action by co-operative association against member for breach of contract, defendant's claim that it had repurchased crop from packing house to whom association had sold it, held unsupported by evidence.

3. Agriculture ⚡6—Packing house to whom co-operative association had assigned crop held to have no authority to release member from delivery.

Packing house, to which co-operative fruit-growing association allotted member's crop held, under terms of agreement between association and members, to have no authority to release member from obligation to deliver.

4. Agriculture ⚡6—Though grower released by packer to whom crop had been assigned by co-operative association member held required to account for fruit sold to other than association.

Even though packing company, to whom co-operative association had assigned member's crop, had authority to release member from obligation to deliver, held that, under terms of membership contract, member would be required to account to association for fruit sold others, and would be only entitled to receive average price received by other member growers.

5. Agriculture ⚡6—Officers of co-operative association held not authorized to release fruit grown by member so as to exonerate member from accounting for proceeds.

Officers of a co-operative fruit-growing association held not authorized to release fruit grown by member so as to exonerate him from accounting to association for proceeds of sales, in view of terms of agreement with other members of association.

6. Agriculture ⚡6—Members of co-operative association must be held to have knowledge of all elements entering into marketing agreements.

Every member of a co-operative fruit-growing association must be held to have knowledge of all the elements which enter into co-operative marketing agreements, and must be charged with knowledge that no member can be advantaged to the detriment of any other member by being released from his obligation as to delivery of fruit.

7. Agriculture ⚡6—Co-operative association held not estopped to recover damages against member by reason of letter informing member it had sold crop to packing company releasing crop.

Co-operative association held not estopped to claim damages from member's breach by reason of its letter informing him of sale of his crop to packing company, from which he thereafter procured a release, since he was charged with knowledge that under contract packing company could not release his crop.

8. Novation ☞ 1.

Act of one party alone cannot accomplish a novation.

9. Novation ☞ 1—Alleged contract for release of crop of member of co-operative association held not a novation (Civ. Code, § 1531, 1532).

Where co-operative association notified member that it had sold member's crop to a certain packing house, and member thereupon secured an alleged release from the packing house of his crop, such release did not constitute a novation of defendant's contract with the association under Civ. Code, §§ 1531, 1532.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the California Canning Peach Growers, a corporation, against Sheridan Downey and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Downey, Downey & Seymour, of Sacramento, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to recover liquidated damages from the defendant Sheridan Downey, on account of alleged violation of the terms and conditions of a certain fruit-marketing agreement, entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant Downey on or about the 17th day of April, 1923. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals. Leaving all the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint uncontroverted, the defendant sets up in his amended answer:

"That the plaintiff notified the defendant that his peaches for the year 1923 had been sold to Smith-Frank Packing Company, a corporation, and that thereafter and on or about the 25th day of July, 1923, the defendant secured from said Smith-Frank Packing Company permission to ship his peaches to and sell said peaches in the eastern market."

The testimony set forth in the transcript, alleged to be insufficient to support the findings in favor of the defendant, is as follows:

On or about the 16th day of July, 1923, the plaintiff, by its secretary, forwarded to the defendant Downey a letter in the words and and figures as follows:

"July 16, 1923.

"Sheridan Downey, Sacramento, California—Dear Sir: We beg to advise you that we have sold to Smith-Frank Packing Company your crop of canning peaches based on your estimated tonnage as follows: 26 tons of new variety midsummers; 82 tons of Phillips. Peaches to be delivered at Manlove.

"Yours very truly,

"California Canning Peach Growers,

"F. S. Schmitt, Asst. Secty."

About a week subsequent to the receipt of this letter, the defendant had a conversation with a Mr. Humphrey, representing the Earl Fruit Company, and learned that there was a possibility of obtaining a little better price for the fruit by shipping his crop through the Earl Fruit Company on a commission basis to eastern markets. Thereafter, and on or about the 25th day of July, 1923, the defendant Downey called up Smith-Frank Packing Company and had the following conversation:

"On the morning I called up the Smith-Frank Packing Company, and I asked for D. L. Smith, with whom I had dealt previously in matters; he was not there. Then I asked for Mr. Temple Smith, who was the executive officer of the Smith-Frank Packing Company. I asked Mr. Temple Smith if it would injure him in any way for me to ship my peaches to the eastern market, and, if it would not, I would appreciate it very much, their releasing my peaches. Mr. Smith was very courteous to me, and said: 'Mr. Downey, we have absolutely no objection to releasing you, if you can make more money—if you can do it by shipping your fruit, but,' he said, 'I do not believe I have any authority to release you from your contract with the Canning Peach Growers.' I said, 'Well, Mr. Smith, the Peach Growers have sold my peaches to you.' He said, 'If that is so, I have no information to that effect;' and I said, 'Well, Mr. Smith, I know it must be so because I have their letter on my desk; I am looking at it now.' Mr. Smith says, 'Well, that is rather mysterious, it had not been brought to my attention, but my brother has been handling these matters of the fruit; I do not know much about it;' and I said, 'Well, under those circumstances, then, have you any objection to my selling my fruit in the East?' Mr. Temple Smith said, 'No; as far as I am concerned I am glad to release you,' and said, 'I do not know—I do not think that the association would in any way object,' and I said, 'You, of course, realize they pay more for peaches than canned goods in the eastern markets.' He said, 'Yes; I think that is true; while we have all we can handle, we will be glad to accommodate you.'"

Mr. Downey, on cross-examination, testified in part as follows:

"Now, in this conversation with Mr. Temple Smith, was anything said as to what would be done by the Smith-Frank Packing Company to get a release from their obligation to buy the peaches which were bought, under your assumption, from the California Canning Peach Growers? A. Nothing that I can recollect now. Q. In other words, so far as the conversation over the telephone was concerned, about their getting a release from their obligation to the association? A. Nothing was said by Mr. Temple Smith, but I said then to Mr. Temple Smith that, as long as they were refusing orders from the organization, I am entirely willing to pay the association the commission that they charged for handling those peaches. Q. Of course, that is not a question of commission; all I want to know is the further conversation. A. That was all that was said. Q. Was anything said between you that you would get their release from any obligation to the association? A. No, sir. Q. Was there anything further said in case the association insisted on them buying the peaches—A. No. Q. Nothing of that kind? A. No sir.”

Temple Smith's version of this conversation, as shown by the transcript, is as follows:

“A. Mr. Downey called up on the phone; he asked me if we would object to him shipping Tuscan peaches to the eastern market. I said, ‘Mr. Downey, we have no jurisdiction over those peaches.’ He said, ‘Why you know I expressed a preference to deliver to you, don't you?’ I says, ‘Yes;’ and I said, ‘We have never, * * * your expressed preferences has not been confirmed by a sale of those peaches.’ Then I said, ‘Inasmuch as we have not confirmed them, that is tentative.’ ‘Well,’ he said, ‘I have been notified by the association my peaches have been assigned to you.’ I said, ‘That is news to me; we have not received any such notification.’ He says, ‘Have you any objection to my shipping peaches?’ I said, ‘Mr. Downey, how can I object; we never purchased the peaches; we have not purchased one peach at all.’ * * * I forget now whether that was all the conversation or not, but I said, ‘In the nature of.’ I told him that he had better see the association about it, that we could not possibly object because we had nothing to do with them. Then he said finally, ‘Well, you have no objection to my shipping the peaches.’ I said, ‘No; I have no right to, because I cannot.’ That was all the conversation.”

On the same day, the defendant forwarded to the Smith-Frank Packing Company a letter as follows:

“Sacramento, July 25, 1923.

“Smith-Frank Packing Company, Sacramento, California—Gentlemen: Confirming my oral conversation over the telephone with your Mr. Temple Smith, Tuesday, in the event the California Canning Association sells to you my peaches from the Manlove ranch, I am to have the right to ship what portion of the crop I desire for other purposes than canning, upon the understanding that I shall notify you promptly as to what portion of the crop shall be reserved for your cannery. I wish to thank you for your courtesy in this matter, and express my appreciation of your liberal attitude.

“Yours very truly, Sheridan Downey.”

After dictating and forwarding this letter, the defendant again called up Mr. Humphrey and entered into an agreement with him for the shipment of defendant's peaches by the Earl Fruit Company to the eastern markets.

On the 26th day of July, 1923, the Smith-Frank Packing Company wrote and forwarded the following letter to the defendant:

“July 26, 1923.

“Mr. Sheridan Downey, Capital National Bank Building, Sacramento, Calif.—Dear Sir: Replying to your letter of the 25th, beg to advise that the writer does not know just what understanding our Mr. Temple Smith had with you, but we hasten now to advise you that you must not take any statement from us in regard to shipping your peaches, as final, because we are not the ones to get the authority from.

Cal. Rep. 240-243 P.—53

The peaches, as you know, have been pooled through the California Canning Peach Growers' Association, and they are the ones that have the final disposition of your peaches; therefore we beg to advise that these are the people whom you should address in the matter. The writer believes that it was only the intention of our Mr. Temple Smith to tell you that if you got the permission of the association, we would not object to your shipping the peaches. The writer is unable to take this up with our Mr. Temple Smith at the present time, because he is out of town.

“Very truly yours,

“Smith-Frank Packing Company,
“D. L. Smith.”

On the 27th day of July, 1923, the canning company forwarded to its members, including the defendant, the following circular letter relative to the handling of peaches for the year 1923:

[Letterhead of the California Canning Peach Growers.]

“244 California Street, San Francisco, California. July 27, 1923.

“To All Members: In order to place the entire tonnage of cling peaches being handled through the association, it became necessary that we place a quantity with canners on a co-operative basis. The tonnage being canned co-operatively will approximate 12,000 tons. So that members will know the way in which we are handling the matter, we have placed all the cling peaches that are being handled through the association of the No. 1 grade in one pool, all No. 2 cling peaches in one pool, Lovells in one pool, and other Freestones in one pool.

“The members delivering to canners who are packing for the association on a co-operative basis will participate proportionately in any moneys received from canners to whom we sold for cash, and the growers whose crops have been sold to canners on a cash basis will participate proportionately in any returns we may receive from the tonnage placed on a co-operative basis. In other words, all the net proceeds we receive from cash sales sources, and the co-operative sources are pooled together. As an illustration, if our deliveries for the week, including cash sales and tonnage delivered to co-operative canners, will total 1,000 tons of No. 1 Tuscan cling peaches, for which we will receive in total $10,000, then every member who delivered that week would receive $10 a ton.

“As regards payments, it has been deemed advisable that payments to members be made on the basis of $15 per ton on No. 1 cling peaches, $7.50 per ton on No. 2 cling peaches, $12.50 per ton on No. 1 Lovells, and $10 per ton on No. 1 grade of other Freestones; further payments to go forward at such time as the money becomes available, and our directors may deem advisable.

“Complete settlement to the members cannot be made until such time as all peaches placed with canners on a co-operative basis have been sold, and final settlement has been made by them to the association.

“Yours very truly,

“California Canning Peach Growers,

“A. D. Poggetto, Manager.”

On the 30th day of July, 1923, the defendant Downey wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

"Sacramento, July 30, 1923.

"California Canning Peach Growers, 244 California Street, San Francisco, California—Gentlemen: This will advise you that I have made arrangements to ship the peaches upon the Manlove ranch to the eastern market. Under your letter of July 16th, I was informed by you that the Manlove peaches had been sold to the Smith-Frank Packing Company. Thereafter I secured the consent of the Smith-Frank Packing Company to the release of my peaches from their contract, and, relying upon your letter and their release, my commitment has been made to an eastern shipment. I presume in any event I would have a right to make such shipment, and that you would not object to it, but certainly under the facts before enumerated I have the right to make the sale to which I have now committed myself.

"Very truly yours, Sheridan Downey."

To this letter the canning company replied by letter of the same date, to wit:

"244 California Street, San Francisco, California, July 31, 1923.

"Mr. Sheridan Downey, 314 Capital National Bank Bldg., Sacramento, California—Dear Mr. Downey. Your letter of July 30th to us is at hand this day. We are not willing to release your peaches from your contract to us. Smith-Frank Packing Company is operating for us on a co-operative basis, and, in order to make our operations through that company successful, it is necessary that they shall have all the peaches which we have assigned to them. We regret, of course, that without consulting us you have made some sort of a committal for eastern shipment, but we cannot allow that fact to jeopardize our interests in having the Smith-Frank Packing Company make a successful run this season. If growers desire to obtain a release for green fruit shipments, they should make application to the association before the association has completed its arrangements for the disposition of the fruit. Regretting our inability to comply with your request, we are,

"Yours very truly,

"California Canning Peach Growers,

"C. D. Poggetto, Manager."

[1, 2] It may be further stated that the defendant Downey testified that he acted under the belief that his peaches had been sold to the Smith-Frank Packing Company. The testimony which we have set forth shows, however, that no sale had been made, and that an assignment only had been made to the Smith-Frank Packing Company to cover the peaches grown by the defendant upon a co-operative basis. The theory upon which the respondent rests his case appears to be: (1) That the conversation had with Mr. Temple Smith of the Smith-Frank Packing Company amounted to a release of the respondent's peaches, and released him from the terms of his contract in so far as the handling of the peaches was concerned by the plaintiff corporation; and (2) that the letter dated July 16, 1923, constitutes an estoppel against the plaintiff to set up the fact that the peaches had only been allotted and not sold to the Smith-Frank Packing Company. Upon the part of the appellant it is insisted that the letter does not amount to an estoppel, that the conversation had with the Smith-Frank Packing Company, taking the defendant's version alone, does not amount to a release, or, if it did, the Smith-Frank Packing Company had no authority to make any release and could not give to the defendant any release which would absolve the defendant from his contractual relations with the plaintiff. While in some portions of the briefs the argument is presented on the theory that the defendant's peaches were resold to him by Smith-Frank Packing Company, the answer sets up only the claim of a release, and the testimony which, when analyzed, shows that there was no element of sale entering into the negotiations between Smith-Frank Packing Company and the defendant Downey, irrespective of whether the defendant's version is accepted or that given by the witness Temple Smith.

Preceding the execution of the marketing agreement, the transcript shows that the defendant Downey had made application for admission to membership in the plaintiff California Canning Peach Growers, a corporation, and had been received as a member therein. The marketing agreement necessary to be considered in this case contains, among others, the following paragraphs:

"(5) The buyer shall pool the peaches of the grower with peaches of like kind, grade, and classification purchased by the buyer under contracts similar to this, and the price to be paid to grower therefor shall be based on the average price per pound at which all peaches of like kind, grade, and classification shall have been sold by the buyer. If, however, the grower request the buyer to sell the peaches purchased of the grower to any given purchaser, the buyer, if such sale can be made, will comply, if the prices and terms of sale are at least equal to the minimum fixed by the buyer at such time, and if such sale will not in any way injuriously affect the business of the buyer. Such sale shall not, however, affect or change the basis or manner of accounting to grower."

"(8) Each year the buyer will sell the peaches purchased by it in that year at the best obtainable market price, and pay the proceeds to the growers named in this and similar contracts, first deducting any advances made the grower, and each grower's pro rata share of the cost of receiving, handling, storing, advertising, and marketing, and other association expenses, including depreciation and an association charge not to exceed 5 per cent. of the gross sales. From this 5 per cent. organization and other general association expenses shall be deducted, and with the balance a commercial reserve shall be created. The annual surplus from such association charge must be prorated among the growers in that year on the basis of the crop purchased from each."

"(12) Grower, upon written consent of the buyer, may retain and sell all or part of his peaches green or dry, for use green or dry, but only to or through persons, firms, or corporations which then have written contracts with the buyer, providing that the said purchasers shall handle said peaches for green use or dry use only. Grower agrees to give buyer immediate written notice of such sale, and will render an accounting to buyer for the peaches so sold by him; provided that no such sales shall be made after June 1st of any year, or such later date as the buyer may designate."

"(19) Buyer may make regulations from time to time for release of peaches for sale by grower for strictly home canning or home use."

Paragraph 13 of the marketing agreement, after setting forth that it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to fix actual damages, sets forth that 50 per cent. of the marketing price of peaches at the time of any member's breach of the agreement entered into by him shall be considered, and is by that paragraph fixed as liquidated damages and also such sum as the trial court may allow for attorney's fees in any action brought against a member for violation of his contract.

The several provisions of the marketing agreement, as hereinbefore set forth, show clearly that the whole intent and purpose of the co-operative plan are that all of its members shall stand upon an equal basis, bearing an equal proportion of the expenses of maintaining the corporation, marketing the crops, and then share upon the same basis in the proceeds available for distribution, based upon the several grades of fruit raised by the different growers. All the peaches of like kind are to be pooled, and all growers having peaches of a like kind receive exactly the same price for their product, irrespective of the fact that different quantities of the same grade of fruit may be sold for different prices. In other words, the essential foundation of the co-operative association is equality of burden and equality of profits, irrespective of whether one particular grower's crop may or may not be sold upon the most favorable market. Thus we find in paragraph 5 that the grower is to receive for his peaches the average price per pound at which all peaches of a like kind, grade, or classification may have been sold. To accomplish these purposes it is necessary that the buyer named in the agreement, which is the plaintiff in this case, have practically absolute control of the disposition and marketing of the fruit raised by different members. Were this not true, the different members would be placed in direct competition with each other. Subdivision 8 sets forth the expenses and such items as shall be charged against the crop of each member grower.

Paragraph 12 of the agreement, which is discussed at considerable length in the briefs of counsel, specifies the only procedure or method by which a grower may be permitted to retain and sell his own crop. Even in such case sales can only be made through persons, firms, or corporations which have written contracts with the buyer (i. e., with the plaintiff in this case), and it is further agreed that such sales shall be only for green use or drying purposes (i. e., such peaches shall not be sold so as to come in competition with the peaches raised by other member growers suitable for canning purposes). Paragraph 19 of the agreement allows the canning company, the plaintiff in this case, to release peaches for sale for strictly home canning or home use. There is no claim in this case that the California Canning Peach Growers, the plaintiff and buyer named in the agreement, has executed any release or authorized the respondent to make any disposition of his fruit other than to deliver his crop of peaches to the Smith-Frank Packing Company at Manlove. The place of delivery is an important factor in the handling of fruit to the intent that excessive quantities of fruit may not be directed to be delivered at any place and an insufficient quantity at other points.

[3] The most favorable construction that can be given to the conversation had with the Smith-Frank Packing Company by the respondent is, at best, only conditional; that is, if the Smith-Frank Packing Company had bought the peaches and had the authority to make a release which would bind the plaintiff in this case, they were willing to release. It is evident, however, from a reading of the terms of the contract and from what we have said, that no authority to execute any such release was vested in the Smith-Frank Packing Company. The respondent, as a member of the peach-canning company, and as a party executing the agreement to which we have referred, certainly had knowledge of the provisions of the agreement, and that the Smith-Frank Packing Company had no power or authority to change any of its provisions. The very paragraph, to wit, No. 12, which refers to the sale of certain kinds of peaches by the grower, by its language, limits sales by the grower to such as are made prior to the 1st day of June of any year. The evident purpose of this again is to prevent competition by a grower in selling his peaches in the same market where the canning company is endeavoring to make sale of its fruit. For the more effectual purpose of carrying out the objects of the co-operative company, the title to all the fruit is vested in the canning company, and consent to any other method of distribution than that set forth must be had from the canning company. Even in such cases the paragraph of the agreement to which we have referred requires a full accounting of the proceeds of sales made by growers of released crops or released portion of their fruit, so that the members of the association may be placed upon an equal footing and not disadvantaged by reason of such released sales. In other words, if the canning company should make sale of fruit at $30 per ton, and a released member grower should, by advantageous circumstances, secure $40 per ton, such grower would have to account to the canning company for the sale of his peaches at the advanced price, and would be entitled to receive as his proportion, after the accounting, the average price received by the other members of the association for the sale of a like quality and quantity of their fruit. This appears to be the very thing which the respondent avoided or sought to avoid in the disposition of his peaches through the Earl Fruit Company.

[4] The respondent's offer to pay 5 per cent. does not meet the requirements of his contract. Under the agreement, had an official release been executed by the plaintiff, or even through the medium of the Smith-Frank Packing Company, an accounting would have been had from the respondent to the plaintiff, and the respondent then only entitled to the average price for his peaches, as received by other member growers for a like quality of fruit. If the agreement could be construed otherwise, it would nullify the whole scheme of co-operation, because competitors, wishing to break down co-operative enterprises, would adopt the very tactics in obtaining fruit which the agreement prohibits, and so break up co-operative associations and leave the field thereafter free for their own exploitation. As said by the court in Anaheim C. F. Ass'n v. Yeoman, 51 Cal. App. 759, 197 P. 959:

"The existence and life of the association itself depended upon its being furnished fruit to dispose of in the public market. A reduction in the amount of fruit so handled would not only tend to increase the overhead cost to the non-transgressing members, but, we may assume, to some extent affect the prestige and standing of the association as a marketing concern."

The Anaheim Case considers fully the legality of such co-operative associations' purposes, etc., and, as a hearing of that case in the Supreme Court was denied, it may be taken as settling the different phases of the law there considered relative to co-operative organizations.

[5, 6] There is no claim that the Earl Fruit Company was a firm, corporation, or otherwise, having an agreement with the plaintiff for the handling of fruit, or any person or corporation through or by which any member grower was authorized to contract for the handling of his crops. From what we have said, and the paragraphs of the agreement which we have set forth, it is also apparent that the officers of the canning company could not release the peaches grown by the respondent so as to exonerate the respondent from accounting to the canning company for the proceeds of his peaches without violating the terms of the agreement with other grower members of the association. All the other members of the association have an interest in the proceeds received from the sale of the respondent's peaches; they are entitled to share therein and to have the prices for their own peaches enhanced to the extent of any sum which the respondent may have secured by reason of a sale made outside of the dealings of the association. This pecuniary interest the officers of the association cannot waive or release, as that is one of the fundamental rights belonging to every member of the association. Every member of the association must, of course, be held to have knowledge of all of these elements which enter into co-operative marketing agreements. They are not simply agreements entered into with an agent, although a few people may be selected to act in the capacity of officers to manage the business of the association. The agreements are essentially to and with all the other members of the co-operative association, and the interests of every member rest upon the same foundation, and no member can be advantaged to the detriment of any other member. Of all this each member must also be held to have full knowledge, as the contract sets forth all of these facts in equalizing burdens and advantages.

[7] The respondent's theory is that the plaintiff is estopped by reason of its letter dated July 16, 1923, written by the secretary of the association. The respondent also relies upon the alleged release of his peaches by the Smith-Frank Packing Company, but it is apparent from what we have said that the respondent had no right to rely upon anything that the Smith-Frank Packing Company said as to its willingness to release the respondent, because it had no authority whatever to execute a release of the agreement and rights held by the California Canning Peach Growers, and of this fact the respondent, as a member of the marketing agreement, must have had full knowledge. If the respondent acted upon that conversation as constituting a release, he must have done so with the full knowledge that his contract provided otherwise, and that a release could only be obtained from the canning company, as conditioned in the agreement requiring full accounting. There was no lack of knowledge of these matters on the part of the respondent, and the conversation had with Smith-Frank Packing Company indicated clearly that the Smith-Frank Packing Company did not consider itself in a position to grant any release, but simply a willingness to do so, and that it would, in effect, make no difference to them.

Again, the letter of July 16th, written by the secretary of the corporation, does not evidence anything indicating an expectancy or promise that the respondent deliver his peaches, other than as therein indicated, and does not authorize any other conduct on the part of the respondent. In Murphy v. Clayton, 113 Cal. 153, 45 P. 267, the court, in considering some of the requirements necessary to constitute estoppel, says:

"In Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 266 [10 P. 674, 676], the court said: 'To constitute the estoppel, the party claiming the benefit of it must be destitute of knowledge of his own legal rights, and of the means of acquiring such knowledge. Biddle Boggs v. Merced, etc., Co., 14 Cal. 279; Stockman v. Riverside, etc., Co., 64 Cal. 57 [28 P. 116]; Morrill v. St. Anthony Falls, 26 Minn. 222 [2 N. W. 842, 37 Am. Rep. 399]. To constitute such an estoppel it must also be shown that the person sought to be estopped has made an admission or done an act, with the intention of influencing the conduct of another, or that he had reason to believe would influence his conduct, inconsistent with the evidence he proposes to give, or the title he proposes to set up; that the other party has acted upon or been influenced by such act or declaration; that the party so influenced will be prejudiced by allowing the truth of the admission to be disproved. Brown v. Bowen, 30 N. Y. 519, 86 Am. Dec. 406; Plumb v. Cattaraugus County Mut. Ins. Co., 18 N. Y. 392, 72 Am. Dec. 526.'"

Also, upon this phase of estoppel, the principles applicable are set forth in 21 C. J. 1126:

"It is an essential element of equitable estoppel that the person invoking it has been influenced by and has relied on the representation or conduct of the person sought to be estopped; and this rule applies with equal force and effect, as well where the conduct of the party sought to be estopped consists of silence, as where it consists of positive acts. There can be no equitable estoppel where the complainant's act appears to be rather the result of his own will or judgment than the product of what defendant did or represented. The act must be the immediate or proximate result of the conduct or representation, which must be such as the party claiming the estoppel had a right to rely on. The representation or conduct must of itself have been sufficient to warrant the action of the party claiming the estoppel. If, notwithstanding such representation or conduct, he was still obliged to inquire for the existence of other facts and to rely upon them also to sustain the course of action adopted, he cannot claim that the conduct of the other party was the cause of his action and no estoppel will arise. As a corollary to the proposition that the party setting up an estoppel must have acted in reliance upon the conduct or representations of the party sought to be estopped, it is as a general rule essential that the former should not only have been destitute of knowledge of the real facts as to the matter in controversy, but should have also been without convenient or ready means of acquiring such knowledge. One relying on an estoppel must have exercised such reasonable diligence as the circumstances of the case require."

[8, 9] As a further defense, the respondent alleges a novation. Here, again, we find no tenable ground as a defense. Sections 1531 and 1532, Civil Code, provide the rules for determining the question of novation in this state. The first section referred to lays down three methods:

"1. By the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties, with intent to extinguish the old obligation; 2, by the substitution of a new debtor in place of the old one, with intent to release the latter; or, 3, by the substitution of a new creditor in place of the old one, with intent to transfer the rights of the latter to the former."

Here, again, essential elements are wanting. None of the rights of the plaintiff is purported to be transferred and the Smith-Frank Packing Company expressly stated that it doubted its authority to exercise any such rights. Section 1532, supra, says:

"Novation is made by contract, and is subject to all the rules concerning contracts in general."

This is amplified in the case of Young v. Benton, 21 Cal. App. 382, 131 P. 1051, where the court said:

"Novation, strictly speaking, implies four essential requisites: 1. A previous valid obligation; 2. The agreement of all the parties to the new contract; 3. The extinguishment of the old contract; and 4. The validity of the new one."

There is nothing here which shows the agreement of all the parties to the new contract; nothing by which the parties to the old contract have contracted for its extinguishment. The act of one party alone cannot accomplish the result. As we have shown, the conversation between the respondent and Temple Smith of the Smith-Frank Packing Company did not establish any new contract; it was no sale of peaches from the packing company to the respondent, and was only the expression of a willingness on the part of the packing company to release the peaches to the respondent, provided they had any authority so to do. There is only one of the four requirements which we find in this case; i. e., a previous valid obligation, which provided for the handling of the crop in the manner set forth in the marketing agreement. To the same effect, though not set forth so fully, is the opinion of the court in Cal. Packing Corp. v. Emirzian, 45 Cal. App. 236, 187 P. 77.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

PRODUCERS' FRUIT CO. OF CALIFORNIA
v. GODDARD. (Civ. 2971.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 23, 1925. Rehearing Denied Jan. 22, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 18, 1926.)

1. Corporations $\S$ 432(12)—Facts and circumstances held to warrant finding of power of plaintiff's general superintendent or manager to make contracts for handling fruit grown in county (Civ. Code, $\S$ 2317).

Facts and circumstances held sufficient to establish in mind of defendant, and to warrant jury's finding, that fruit company's general superintendent, or manager, in handling and purchasing fruit had power as such, in view of Civ. Code, $\S$ 2317, to make contracts for handling fruit grown in defendant's county.

2. Principal and agent $\S$ 173(3) — Evidence held to show implied ratification of oral agreement to purchase peaches at market prices by accepting fruit under terms thereof.

Evidence held to show plaintiff's implied ratification of oral agreement of its agent to handle defendant's peaches at market prices instead of under former contract at specified prices by accepting and disposing of fruit under the oral contract.

3. Novation $\S$ 4—Oral agreement to handle peaches at market price held "novation" of former agreement to handle them at specified prices (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1531).

Where, under oral agreement, defendant was obligated to deliver to plaintiff both canning and shipping peaches at market prices at time of sales, jury were justified in finding that it was made with intention that it be substituted for and extinguish previously written contract to handle peaches at specified prices, and evidenced intention that it should constitute a "novation" within Civ. Code, $\S$ 1531.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Novation.]

4. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 125(3) — Unwritten agreement, if otherwise legally unobjectionable, is as effective as is agreement committed to writing until enforcement voided on ground it was not in writing (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 1).

An agreement not in writing, but which Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 1, requires shall be in writing to be enforceable, is, if otherwise legally unobjectionable, as effective as to all purposes for which it was made as is a written agreement, until its enforcement is voided because it was not in writing.

5. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 125(3) — Contract within statute, if otherwise valid, is not, because it was not written, invalid in sense that it is void (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 1).

An agreement or contract, within Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 1, if otherwise valid, is not, merely because it is not in writing, invalid in sense that it is void.

6. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 144—Defense based on statute of frauds may be waived.

Because the statute of frauds relates to the remedy only, defense based thereon may be waived.

7. Novation $\S$ 10—Where parties intended a novation, and were governed by the new agreement, the old agreement is extinguished (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1531).

As question whether novation, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1531, is always one of intention, where new agreement was intended to take place of an existing one, and where parties proceeded to be and were for two years governed by the substituted agreement, then it follows that the old agreement has been entirely abrogated or extinguished.

8. Contracts $\S$ 238(2) — Where oral agreement substituted for written agreement, statute providing that written contract may be altered only by contract in writing held inapplicable (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1698).

Since the abandonment or extinguishment of a written contract may be shown by parol, in cases where an oral agreement is substituted for an existing written agreement, Civ. Code, $\S$ 1698, providing that a contract in writing may only be altered by a contract in writing or an executed oral agreement, is not applicable.

9. Pleading $\S$ 8(7)—Courts not bound by construction pleader may give to a written instrument.

Courts are not bound by the construction the pleader may give to a written instrument, or an oral contract declared on or set up as a defense, nor pleader's conception of legal nature or effect thereof.

10. Appeal and error $\S$ 1070(1)—Failure of jury to follow instructions on plaintiff's theory of care not miscarriage of justice, where verdict accords with proper theory.

Where plaintiff's instructions were framed on theory that oral agreement effected a mere alteration of original agreement, but where verdict accords with proper theory that oral agreement was substitution of original agreement, no miscarriage of justice resulted in failure or refusal of jury to follow instructions.

11. Appeal and error $\S$ 762 — Plaintiff not placed at disadvantage because of theory on which case was decided on appeal.

Plaintiff cannot complain that in supporting appeal it was placed at disadvantage because of theory on which case was decided, since defendant presented question whether oral agreement amounted to novation, and plaintiff in reply brief noticed that fact, but refused to discuss it.

On Petition for Rehearing.

12. Sales $\S$ 89—Evidence held sufficient to justify finding that nothing was said, at time substituted oral contract was made, about committing its terms to writing.

Evidence held sufficient to justify finding of jury that, at time terms of oral contract to deliver peaches at market price, which was substituted for written contract to deliver canning peaches at specified prices, were agreed on, nothing was said about committing terms thereof to writing.

13. Appeal and error 994(2)—Inconsistencies in witnesses' testimony concerning credibility or weight of testimony was for jury.

Apparent inconsistencies in testimony of defendant and his wife as witnesses which concerned particularly the question of their credibility or weight of their testimony was for jury to settle.

14. Sales 89—Fact that parties acted on oral agreement held competent proof of intention to abandon and cancel previously written agreement.

Even though it were true that oral agreement to deliver peaches at market price was that it should be committed to writing before it became binding, since parties themselves acted on terms of oral agreement, it was competent proof of abandonment and cancellation of written agreement.

15. Sales 78—Prices received by plaintiff for peaches, minus commissions and loading charges, constituted reasonable value thereof.

Where defendant was entitled to maintain action on quantum meruit for reasonable value of peaches delivered to plaintiff under oral agreement that plaintiff handle it at market prices, prices received by plaintiff, minus commissions and loading charges, constituted such reasonable value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by the Producers' Fruit Company of California against M. C. Goddard. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion that judgment be entered in its favor notwithstanding the verdict, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Devlin & Devlin and A. I. Diepenbrock, all of Sacramento, and Lowell, Lowell & Lowell, of Auburn, for appellant.

Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff is a corporation, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California. The defendant is a resident of Placer county, this state, and is, and has been for many years, a fruitgrower in said county.

On or about the 1st day of March, 1917, the defendant entered into an agreement in writing with the Producers' Fruit Company, a corporation, whereby the former agreed to sell, and the latter agreed to buy, the crop of Levi and Phillips cling peaches grown by the defendant on his fruit ranch in said county during the years 1917 to 1926, inclusive, covering a period of 10 years, the same "to be delivered by the seller," as the complaint alleges, "at his own expense to the shipping house of the buyer, at Loomis, California, at the following prices: No. 1 Phillips cling, $27.50 per ton net; No. 1 Levi cling, $25.00 per ton net; No. 2 Phillips cling, $13.75 per ton net; No. 2 Levi cling, $12.50 per ton net."

The above contract, with all the rights of the said Producers' Fruit Company thereunder, was, prior to the year 1922, assigned and transferred to the plaintiff herein.

The complaint alleges that the defendant failed and refused to deliver to the plaintiff, as said contract required, the crop of peaches of the varieties named therein for the year 1922, although, it is further alleged, there were produced in said year upon defendant's fruit ranch 22½ tons of No. 1 Phillips cling peaches, 2½ tons of No. 2 Phillips cling peaches, 112½ tons of No. 1 Levi cling peaches, and 12½ tons of No. 2 Levi cling peaches; that the market value of said 1922 crop of Phillips and Levi cling peaches was $60 per ton for No. 1's and $30 per ton for No. 2's. The complaint alleges that, because of the failure and refusal of defendant to deliver the above specified crops of peaches for the year 1922, the plaintiff was and is damaged in the sum of $4,928.13, for which amount judgment is prayed.

Answering the complaint, the defendant admits the making of the contract therein referred to and expressly made a part thereof, but denies all other material allegations of said pleading, and then sets up a special defense, as follows:

"That prior to the commencement of the above-entitled action, and on or about the 17th day of October, 1919, the said agreement was altered as hereinafter stated by the mutual consent and agreement of this defendant and the plaintiff herein; that on or about the 17th day of October, 1919, it was mutually understood and agreed by and between plaintiff and defendant that the said defendant did then and there sell and agreed to deliver to plaintiff during the then coming seasons of the years 1920 to 1926, inclusive, all of the fruit grown on said ranch, and that said plaintiff did then and there purchase from and agree to pay to the said defendant therefor the prevailing market price for said fruit at the times of such deliveries, less loading charges for canning fruit of $2.50 per ton, and less a commission of 7 per cent. on all other fruit; and this defendant made and entered into said last-mentioned agreement with said plaintiff because of the desire of said plaintiff to purchase from this defendant all of his shipping fruit, in addition to the canning fruit covered by said contract of March 1, 1917; that this defendant, during the years 1920 and 1921, did perform all of the terms and conditions of said contract as so altered and on his part to be performed, and delivered to said plaintiff all of the fruit grown on said ranch during the seasons of 1920 and 1921, but the said plaintiff has failed, neglected, and refused, and still fails, neglects, and refuses, to pay to this defendant, in accordance with said contract as so altered, the said agreed market prices for said fruit prevailing during the seasons of 1920 and 1921, and this defendant is excused from further performance of said contract as so altered by the said breach on the part of said plaintiff of said contract as so altered.

"Said defendant denies that plaintiff was entitled to purchase the 1922 crop of peaches raised on said ranch or receive delivery of the same or any part thereof under and pursuant to or under or pursuant to said agreement of March 1, 1917, or any other agreement between defendant and Producers' Fruit Company, a corporation, or any agreement between plaintiff and defendant, or otherwise or at all, and this defendant denies that he was so informed during any part of the year 1922, but in this regard defendant alleges that said plaintiff failed, neglected and refused to pay the agreed prices for the fruit delivered from said ranch to plaintiff during the seasons of 1920 and 1921 in accordance with the agreement as altered on or about the 17th day of October, 1919, as aforesaid."

Further answering the complaint, and "by way of counterclaim," the answer alleges:

"That within the four years last past, and under and by virtue of that certain written agreement, a copy of which is annexed to plaintiff's complaint herein and marked Exhibit A, as such written agreement was altered by the agreement between plaintiff and defendant, made on or about the 17th day of October, 1919, which has been executed by defendant and breached by plaintiff as hereinbefore alleged, the said plaintiff became and was indebted to this defendant in the sum of $12,681.50, for goods, wares, and merchandise, to wit, fruit sold and delivered by this defendant to said plaintiff at the special instance and request of said plaintiff, and for which said plaintiff agreed to pay to defendant the prevailing market prices for said fruit during the seasons of 1920 and 1921 as hereinbefore alleged."

The answer admits that the sum of $8,898.87 has been paid on account of said sum of $12,681.50, but alleges that there is still due, owing, and unpaid to defendant, on said sum, the sum of $3,782.63, for which sum the defendant prays that he be awarded judgment.

The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned that "plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything as against the defendant; and that defendant is entitled to recover of and from plaintiff, upon the defendant's counterclaim, the sum of $2,358.93."

Plaintiff made a motion for a judgment in its favor, notwithstanding the verdict. The motion was denied, and judgment was entered in favor of defendant in accord with the verdict.

The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and also from the order denying the plaintiff's motion that judgment be entered in its favor, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury. It is conceived to be the more orderly to set out the facts before stating the legal points upon which plaintiff relies for a reversal of the judgment. The terms of the written contract entered into between the plaintiff's assignor and the defendant are sufficiently set forth hereinabove.

It appears that, during the years 1919, 1920, and 1921, one J. H. Randolph was the plaintiff's superintendent of its Placer county shipping agencies; that, as such, he had charge of the Auburn, Newcastle, Penryn, and Loomis districts for the plaintiff, and the local agents at the places named worked for plaintiff under his supervision; that his duties were "to solicit fruit and ship fruit"—that is, he was engaged in "handling fruit and buying fruit" for plaintiff. "We sometimes bought fruit and sometimes handled it on commission," Randolph testified. Prior to the time he became connected with the plaintiff, Randolph, for several years, acted in a similar capacity for plaintiff's assignor, Producers' Fruit Company, and continued so to act until the latter went out of business and transferred all its interests to plaintiff. Just when this transfer took place the record is not clear, but it does appear that the contract of March 1, 1917, was made between defendant and the predecessor of the plaintiff.

The undisputed evidence shows that defendant grew upon his fruit ranch table, or, as it is referred to in the testimony and briefs, "shipping fruit," as well as canning fruit—that is, fruit that is to be shipped in a condition suitable for canning or packing. The written contract of March 1, 1917, covered canning fruit only; hence the defendant was, so far as said written contract was concerned, perfectly free to sell his table or shipping fruit to or through whomsoever he pleased. In other words, the written contract referred to did not include or cover the table or shipping fruit produced by the defendant during any of the years embraced within the 10-year period during which said contract was to run or subsist.

It appears that, while under no contractual obligation to do so, the defendant delivered the shipping as well as the canning peaches produced or grown on his ranch in the years 1917 and 1918 to the plaintiff's assignor and the plaintiff. In the year 1919, and after plaintiff succeeded to the interests of the Producers' Fruit Company, the defendant, in obedience to the terms of the contract of March 1, 1917, delivered his crop of canning peaches to the plaintiff's assignor, but delivered his shipping peaches to the Earl Fruit Company.

In the month of August, 1919 (near the end of the fruit season), Mr. Randolph (above referred to), as representative of plaintiff, called upon the defendant at the latter's home, and, in effect, proposed to the defendant that the contract of March 1, 1917, be canceled or abandoned, and that in lieu thereof an agreement be made between him and plaintiff whereby defendant would agree to sell and deliver to the plaintiff, during every year of the balance of the unexpired term of 10 years provided in said written contract—that is, from and including the year 1920 to and including the year 1926—all his shipping as well as all his canning fruit, the defendant to receive for all said fruit the prevailing market prices at the times of the sale of the fruit, less a commission of 7 per cent. on the table fruit and a loading charge of $2.50 per ton on the canning fruit. This proposition was accepted by defendant; the agreement being that the contract thus made should be substituted for the written contract of March 1, 1917, and that the latter contract should then and there be considered as canceled. Goddard said that on the occasion of the making of the oral agreement nothing was said by either him or Randolph about committing the said agreement to writing. The defendant, however, testified that some time in the year 1920, although he was then delivering all his fruit to plaintiff in pursuance of the oral agreement, he spoke to Randolph about a written memorandum of the terms of said oral agreement, and that Randolph said that he would have a written memorandum ready and presented for execution "as quick as he could," but defendant "to keep right on" and "continue shipping his clings, shipping fruit and all," or, in other words, to continue delivering all his fruit to plaintiff under the terms of the oral agreement. The defendant did continue to deliver all the fruit grown on his ranch—that is, all the canning and table fruit—and so delivered all such fruit for the years 1920 and 1921 under and in pursuance of the terms of the oral agreement. The plaintiff received or accepted the fruit so delivered, sold or marketed the same, and rendered to defendant a statement of the result of the sale of the fruit delivered by the latter to it in the year 1920 and a like statement for the fruit so delivered in the year 1921. The 1920 statement showed that plaintiff received the following prices per ton for the fruit delivered to it by defendant in the year just named: For No. 1 Phillips, $110; for No. 2 Phillips, $55; for No. 1 Levi, $100; and for No. 2 Levi, $50. The total amount for which said fruit was sold was $9,128.68. Deducted from that sum were the loading charges, and the sum of $7,210.06 paid to defendant by plaintiff on account of said sales. Said statement also contained a charge against defendant of $2,358.93, noted as follows: "Your proportion of expense in re United Cannery action." This would leave the defendant, at the time of the rendition of said statement, indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $560.99, for which sum, in a letter to defendant accompanying said statement, the plaintiff requested the former to execute and return to it his promissory note. The 1921 statement showed that the sales aggregated the sum of $1,832.15, and a net sum in favor of defendant, after deducting commission and certain charges, of $1,688.21. The record is not clear as to the nature or purpose of the action referred to in the statement of 1920 sales as "the United Cannery action." There is, though, no point made here with regard to that action, or whether the charge made against the defendant on account of that suit was or was not a legitimate charge. The defendant, however, repudiated that item in said statement, claiming that he was in no way connected with or responsible for, or, either directly or indirectly, a party to or in interest in said action, and insisted upon plaintiff paying to him the full amount shown by said statement to be due him, regardless of the charge based upon said action. The plaintiff refused to make a settlement of the statement on the basis suggested and insisted upon by defendant, and the latter, claiming that thus the plaintiff had breached their oral agreement, conceived that he was under no further obligation to deliver any fruit to the plaintiff.

The above statement, as may be supposed, is extracted principally from the testimony of defendant and his wife, the latter having testified that she was present in October, 1919, when, as her husband testified, the oral agreement was made; that the terms of the said agreement were such as they are given above from defendant's testimony; and that she heard Randolph tell the defendant, when the latter asked the former when he would have a written memorandum of the oral agreement ready for the signatures of himself and plaintiff, to proceed with the delivery of all his fruit to plaintiff and that the written memorandum would be prepared and presented as soon as he could have it done.

Randolph gave a different version, in certain particulars, of what took place between him and the defendant and his wife at the time the oral agreement was made. He also claimed, and so testified, that, while it was true that he was a general agent or manager of the plaintiff in Placer county during the years preceding and at the time the alleged oral agreement was made, it was not within the scope of his authority as such general agent or manager to make any agreement with any fruitgrower with whom plaintiff had a contract for the sale of his fruit to change or modify or rescind such contract, or to make any contract for plaintiff with any other grower; that he could change, modify, rescind, or abandon a subsisting contract for plaintiff only when specially vested with such authority by plaintiff in writing; and that he had no such written authority at the time of the making of the alleged oral agreement with defendant to negotiate either a new contract with defendant or to make an agreement modifying the written contract of March 1, 1917. All the authority he possessed as agent or manager in Placer county of plaintiff, he said, had been reduced to writing. His written authority, however, had been destroyed by fire, he stated, and, therefore, could not be produced at the trial, but a form of the written contract whereby he was employed as agent or manager was the same in all respects as the form of a like contract whereby another agent or manager for plaintiff was appointed, and that form was introduced in evidence, and the limit of his authority as such agent was, with the aid of his testimony, thereby shown. By said document Randolph "promised and agreed," among other things, "not to make or enter into any contract or agreement of any kind or nature whatsoever for the purpose of binding or obliging the said Producers' Fruit Company of California, without first receiving written authority therefor in manner as above specified." The "manner as above specified" is in the preceding paragraph of the document, and is to the effect, paraphrased, that, having no such authority, he will not attempt to make any agreement for and on behalf of plaintiff, "except said authority be specified, given, and granted by the terms hereof or by instrument in writing, signed by" certain named individuals.

Randolph admitted that, in the year 1919, after the shipping season for that year was over, he called on the defendant and his wife at their home for the purpose of securing a contract for the plaintiff for the handling of all the fruit grown by the latter on their ranch. "A man in the fruit business," testified Randolph in that connection, "wants to get all the business he can. Mr. and Mrs. Goddard had been shipping with the Producers' Fruit Company, and when they quit doing business with that company for one year (meaning the year 1919, when they delivered or sold their table or shipping fruit to the Earl Fruit Company, I naturally wanted to get it back." Randolph also admitted that he proposed to defendant that the 1917 written contract would be canceled if the latter would make an agreement to deliver all his fruit to plaintiff on the terms stated by defendant and his wife, as above set forth. He testified, though, that he said to defendant, and defendant agreed thereto, that there must be a written marketing contract covering their oral understanding or agreement, and that he would attend to having one prepared and presented to defendant for his signature. In the month of June, 1920, Randolph testified, he called on the defendant, and informed him that the plaintiff was willing to agree to a substitution of a marketing contract, covering all the fruit grown by defendant containing the terms agreed on in the oral agreement, for the 1917 written contract, and that later he would bring or send to him (defendant) a written agreement containing the terms of the oral agreement—that is, that defendant was to receive for all his fruit the prevailing market prices, minus 7 per cent. commission on the shipping fruit, and $2.50 per ton loading charge on canning fruit; that defendant replied, "All right"; that in August, 1920, he (Randolph) called on defendant, and informed him that "the company" (plaintiff) would make the marketing contract, "but they felt they should have the new contract take the place of the cling contract (referring to the contract of March 1, 1917), for a period of 10 years and the charge $5 a ton as the loading charge." Defendant, Randolph said, refused to sign any contract which would bind him to a contract with plaintiff for all his fruit for a period of 10 years from the date of the execution of the proposed new contract, and further declared that he would not agree to a loading charge of $5 per ton. He also told Randolph that his (defendant's) wife, who was not present at that conversation, would not sign an agreement containing the terms mentioned. Randolph said that when the conversation was being held he had the written agreement in his pocket, but that, defendant having declared that he would not sign it, because of the 10-year term and the increased loading charge therein provided for, he did not take the writing from his pocket or show it to defendant. The defendant, so Randolph admitted, made it clear to him (Randolph) on the occasion referred to that he would execute a written agreement in accord with the oral agreement, viz.: for a term of 6 years, covering the unexpired period or term of 10 years for which the written contract of March, 1917, provided, and providing that plaintiff should receive and sell all his fruit every year for the 6 years, on a commission of 7 per cent. on the packing fruit and $2.50 per ton loading charge. Further testifying, Randolph said: That, subsequent to the conversation just related, he received word from the Sacramento office of the plaintiff advising him not to execute the proposed new agreement until after the "cannery action" was settled, as the lawyers of the plaintiff were apprehensive that the making of such new contract or one to be substituted for the contract of March, 1917, might in some manner affect the suit; that the "canning suit" was settled in April, 1921; and that at the close of the fruit season of that year, and subsequent to the date of the same, he attempted to induce defendant to sign a marketing contract covering all his fruit for a period of 6 years, but insisted on keeping in the contract a provision for a $5 per ton loading charge. Said proposed written agreement was dated the 10th day of August, 1921, and signed by plaintiff. Both defendant and his wife refused to sign the agreement as so proposed. The defendant had then delivered all his fruit for the years 1920 and 1921 to the plaintiff under and in pursuance of the terms of the oral agreement of 1919, as above indicated.

Randolph repeatedly stated that the new agreement was intended to be a substitute for the written contract of March 1, 1917. Indeed, such was the trend of all the conversations between him and defendant relative to the oral agreement. Randolph was asked by the attorney for defendant whether the latter, on the conclusion of the conversation relative to the oral agreement, in June, 1920, said that "he would commence shipping his fruit to the Producers Company," to which he (Randolph) replied: "Yes, the visit before he said that—he did commence delivering it."

In rebuttal, defendant denied that Randolph at the former's ranch, in the month of August, 1920, or at any time or any place, told him (defendant) that the plaintiff wanted a 10-year marketing contract on his fruit and an agreement that "I would pay a loading charge of $5 per ton." Defendant further contradicted Randolph's testimony that he (defendant) told him (Randolph) at any time or place that Mrs. Goddard, wife of defendant, "would not sign any such contract," referring to the proposed written memorandum of the oral agreement, containing, however, contrary to said agreement, as the Goddards claimed, a provision that said agreement should cover or embrace a term or period of 10 years from the date of the execution thereof, and that defendant would pay plaintiff $5 per ton as a loading charge.

The above comprehends a statement in substance of the salient facts of the controversy.

The plaintiff contends: (1) That Randolph, the general agent of plaintiff, was without authority to negotiate the alleged oral agreement; (2) that, even if, at the time said agreement was made, he possessed such authority, the agreement was, nevertheless, invalid, under the terms of subdivision 1 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, which provides, inter alia, that an agreement that by its terms is not to be performed within a year from the making thereof is invalid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged; that furthermore, the said agreement being oral and executory and its purpose to alter a contract in writing, it was invalid under section 1698 of said Code, which provides: "A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise;" (3) "that the evidence without conflict shows that the oral agreement was expressly understood and contemplated to be placed in writing and signed by each of the parties," and that until the same was put in writing no contract existed, "and neither party was bound by the same, irrespective of whether one or both of the parties had performed the same pursuant to the terms thereof, and in reliance that it would be placed in writing and signed by each of them"; (4) that the jury disregarded the instructions of the court.

It is to be assumed that the verdict implies the finding by the jury of the following facts: (1) That Randolph at least possessed ostensible authority to negotiate the oral agreement above referred to and described; (2) that the defendant and Randolph, in October, 1919, entered into the said oral agreement, and that defendant, in pursuance of the terms of said agreement, delivered to plaintiff all the canning and shipping fruit grown on his ranch in the years 1920 and 1921; (3) that plaintiff received, accepted, and disposed of all said fruit upon the terms agreed upon in said oral agreement; (4) that nothing was ever said about committing the terms of the oral negotiations to writing until after defendant had proceeded with the delivery of all his fruit to plaintiff and the acceptance of the same by plaintiff; (5) that no written memorandum of the oral agreement was ever submitted by Randolph or any other person acting for plaintiff to be signed by the latter; (6) that defendant, at some time subsequent to the making of the oral agreement, and before he had delivered all of the fruit grown on his ranch in the two years named—1920 and 1921—to plaintiff, asked Randolph if he had a written memorandum prepared, to which Randolph replied in the negative, but told the defendant to proceed with the delivery of his fruit as stipulated in said agreement, and that everything would be all right, or words to that effect, and that, as above stated, defendant did so.

The facts above set forth were, as stated, comprehended within the implied findings of the jury. In the evidence as to some of those facts there is no conflict. As to some there is a conflict. Upon the question whether, at the time of the oral negotiations, it was understood between Randolph and defendant that, before those negotiations should take the form of an agreement, the terms thereof should be reduced to writing, there is a conflict. The defendant testified, as we have seen, that the terms of the new contract were agreed to by both him and Randolph at the time the new agreement was first proposed; that nothing was then said about committing them to writing; and that he proceeded, at the seasonal time for fruit shipping, to carry out the agreement; that, conceiving it to be the better plan to have the terms put in writing, he spoke to Randolph about a written memorandum after he had delivered, and plaintiff had accepted, his shipping and canning fruit under the oral agreement. Randolph, as seen, testified that the understanding was, when the oral negotiations for a different contract from that then existing were had, that the terms to which they then agreed should be committed to writing. Hence it is clear that the evidence is such that it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the jury were not warranted in finding the vital facts—those above enumerated—favorably to defendant.

[1] 1. It is clear that the evidence discloses circumstances from which the defendant had the right to infer, and the jury to find, that Randolph was vested with authority by plaintiff to negotiate and consummate the oral agreement. Randolph, for some time prior to the transfer of the interests and business of the plaintiff's assignor to plaintiff, represented the former in Placer county in precisely the same capacity in which he was acting for the plaintiff at the time of the making of the oral agreement, namely, general superintendent or manager of the plaintiff's business in handling and purchasing fruit, and the evidence shows that he entered into the employment of the plaintiff in the capacity mentioned, operating as such in Placer county, immediately upon the plaintiff succeeding to the fruit business of its assignor, the Fruit Producers' Corporation. Randolph admitted that, acting for plaintiff's assignor, he personally conducted the negotiations leading to the making of the written agreement of March 1, 1917. In his capacity of superintendent or manager for plaintiff and its predecessor he had exercised control or supervision of all the local fruit agencies of those corporations for several years prior to the time at which the oral agreement was made, and in that capacity, as well may be inferred from the evidence, made contracts with other fruitgrowers in the vicinity of the defendant's home. In addition to the foregoing considerations it was not shown that the defendant ever knew that Randolph was in any way limited in his authority by the plaintiff or its predecessor in the matter of making fruit contracts with fruit growers in Placer county. We think that these facts and circumstances were sufficient to establish in the mind of the defendant and in warranting the jury in so finding that the plaintiff held Randolph out as its agent in Placer county, with plenary power as such, to make for it contracts for the handling of fruit grown in said county. In other words, we think it is clear that the evidence warrants the conclusion that Randolph possessed ostensible authority to act for the plaintiff in said county in the particulars referred to, and, even if we were required to say that the circumstances were not such as to show that the plaintiff intentionally caused third persons in said county to believe him to be possessed of such power as such agent, that such third persons were allowed to so believe by the want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff. Section 2317, Civ. Code. The case here comes squarely within the rule stated in Robinson v. American Fish, etc., Co., 17 Cal. App. 212, 219, 119 P. 388, 390, as follows:

"The law will not, of course, permit a principal to escape the liability which it attaches to him by reason of such circumstances as are present here, upon the plea that the agent has violated or transcended some limitation that he has secretly or without the knowledge of those with whom his agent, as such, is to deal placed upon the latter's authority as such agent.

* * * As is said by all the law-writers and all the cases, the rule is that 'quiescence is tantamount to acquiescence,' and forbids the principal denying an authority which his own conduct has invited those with whom he was dealing to assume. See Clark on Contracts, p. 717, and cases cited in the footnote. So, it may be true—indeed, assumed—that appellant did limit the authority of Junta in the respects specified by the latter, and yet the former, under the circumstances as disclosed here, and according to the implied findings of the jury, is still bound by his acts and estopped by its own conduct from denying his authority to go as far as he did. 'Where the special character of the agency is not known, and the principal has clothed the agent with apparent powers, strangers, in dealing with the agent, may assume that such apparent powers are possessed. The principal cannot, by private communications with his agent, limit the authority which he allows the agent to assume.' Clark on Contracts, p. 734, and cases cited."

See Leavens v. Pinkham & McKevitt, 164 Cal. 242, 244 et seq., 128 P. 399, in which the facts are strikingly similar to those herein, and also Jan Wai v. Smith-Riddle Co., 55 Cal. App. 59, 202 P. 952; 1 Cal. Juris. § 44, p. 745.

[2] But the question of the authority of Randolph to make and bind the plaintiff by the oral agreement is without material significance, since the evidence unquestionably shows that there was at least an implied ratification of the oral agreement by the plaintiff, in that it accepted and disposed of all the fruit grown on defendant's ranch and delivered by the latter to the former in the years 1920 and 1921, in accord with the terms of said agreement. Indeed, to the extent of that portion of the period during which the agreement was to exist covered by the years 1920 and 1921, the agreement was fully performed and executed. The written statements rendered by plaintiff to defendant showing the sales according to the prevailing market prices of the years 1920 and 1921, the verity of which was in no way challenged or impeached, together with the fact that plaintiff accepted and handled all the fruit produced by defendant on his ranch for those years, stand as conclusive evidence of the fact that plaintiff, in accepting and handling said fruit, was acting, and did act, in pursuance of the terms of said contract, and thus ratified it.

[3] That the oral agreement constituted an entirely new contract and the jury were justified in finding that it was made with the intention that it should be substituted for and so extinguish the contract of March 1, 1917, are propositions which seem to afford no ground for legitimate discussion. The agreement is itself evidence evincive of an intention by both parties that it should constitute a novation, or, as our law defines such a transaction, the substitution of a new obligation for an existing one. Civ. Code, § 1531. It is widely divergent or different in terms from the contract of March 1, 1917. By the latter, as has been pointed out, and as is obvious, the defendant was bound to the delivery of his canning fruit only at definitely specified prices. As before stated, he was under no obligation under said contract to deliver or sell any of his shipping or table fruit to the plaintiff or its assignor. These he could dispose of as he saw fit or as pleased him. Under the new agreement he committed himself to deliver to plaintiff both his canning and shipping fruit, not at specified prices, but at the prevailing market prices at the times the sales of the fruit were made.

[4-7] 2. We are wholly out of accord with the contention that the new agreement could not have the effect of extinguishing the contract of March 1, 1917, for the reason that, not being in writing, it is invalid under the statute of frauds. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 1, supra. It is thoroughly settled that an agreement or contract within the provisions of the statute of frauds, if otherwise valid, is not, merely because it is not in writing, invalid in the sense that it is void. In re Balfour v. Garrette, 14 Cal. App. 261, 111 P. 615; Durbin v. Hillman, 50 Cal. App. 377, 195 P. 274; Kinney v. Jos. Herspring & Co., 53 Cal. App. 628, 636, 200 P. 737; Warder v. Hutchison (Cal. App.) 231 P. 563; O'Brien v. O'Brien (Cal. Sup.) 241 P. 861. It follows that an agreement not in writing, but which the statute requires shall be in writing to be enforceable, if legally unobjectionable in all other respects, is as effective as to all the purposes for which it has been made as is such an agreement whose terms have been committed to writing until its enforcement is voided upon the ground that it is not in writing. This proposition is sustained by the consideration that, because the statute of frauds relates to the remedy only, a defense based thereon may be waived. 1 Cal. Jur. § 110, p. 941, and cases therein named. Hence, upon the making of the oral agreement, the written contract of March 1, 1917, ipso facto et eo instanti, passed out of existence, and became functus officio. And this proposition would still remain unimpeachable even where the statute of frauds had been successfully interposed against the enforcement of the terms of the new agreement itself. The question whether a novation has taken place is always one of intention (Civ. Code, § 1531; Parkside Realty Co. v. McDonald, 166 Cal. 426, 430, 137 P. 21; 29 Cyc. 1134), and where it satisfactorily appears that a new agreement was intended by the parties to take the place of an existing one, as clearly it was so made to appear here, since the parties proceeded to be and were for two years governed by the substituted agreement, then, as stated, it necessarily follows that the old agreement has been entirely abrogated or extinguished. And, as is said in Beckwith v. Sheldon, 165 Cal. 319, 323-324, 131 P. 1049, 1050:

"This extinguishment does not mean that the earlier contract was held in abeyance or in suspense. It does not mean that it could be revived upon a mere failure to perform the new obligation. It means that it was canceled and obliterated as completely as though it had never had existence. It means that, saving in the exceptional cases which are indicated by section 1533 of the Code, and of which this is not one, all rights are to be measured and determined under the new substituted obligation as completely as though it had never been preceded by an earlier contract. It matters not, as has been said, that the new agreement is itself executory. Indeed, generally speaking, all the cases arise when the substituted agreement is executory, for, if executed, there could seldom or never be cause of complaint or ground of action. The courts have felt themselves compelled to look no further than to determine whether a novation has taken place, or, in other words, whether the new contract was entered into without fraud and with an agreement of minds that it was to be substituted for the existing obligation. When that point has been reached they have found no difficulty in declaring that the rights of parties to the agreement are to be governed by the new contract alone, and that a failure to perform does not, under any theory of rescission or revivor, operate to breathe new life into the dead and extinguished obligation. Spier v. Hyde, 78 App. Div. 151 (79 N. Y. S. 702); Morehouse v. Second Nat. Bank, 98 N. Y. 503; Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 576 (81 Am. Rep. 491); Dean v. Skiff, 128 Mass. 174; Huggins v. Safford, 67 Mo. App. 469; Howard v. Scott, 98 Mo. App. 509 (72 S. W. 709); Oakley v. Ballard, 1 Hempst. 475, 18 Fed. Cas. 515."

[8] The theory upon which we feel justified by the record in deciding this case makes inapplicable, regardless of the consideration that the oral agreement was in part executed, those cases in which it is held, in accord with section 1698 of the Civil Code, that a contract in writing may only be altered by a contract in writing or an executed oral agreement. As has already been shown, the oral agreement here goes further than merely to modify or alter the existing agreement—its effect was to work a novation and the consequent rescission or abrogation of the written contract of March 1, 1917. Manifestly, no one will take the position that the abandonment or extinguishment of a written contract by the mutual agreement of the parties may not be shown by parol. The rule that such extinguishment may be so shown proceeds from the very nature of such a transaction itself, and has often been applied by the courts. See Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 95 P. 154, 159; Credit Clearance Bureau v. Hochbann Cont. Co., 25 Cal. App. 546, 144 P. 315; Proud v. Strain, 11 Cal. App. 74, 103 P. 949. In those cases it is held that, where an oral agreement is substituted for an existing written agreement, section 1698 of the Civil Code has no application.

3. To the contention that the oral agreement was without binding force for the reason that it was agreed, in the making thereof, that it should not bind the parties until its terms were reduced to writing, a sufficient answer is that, upon the question whether such an understanding was had when said agreement was made, the evidence is in sharp conflict, from which situation it follows, in view of the direct and explicit instructions given by the trial court to the jury upon that question, that the verdict must be interpreted to imply a finding that it was not understood or agreed by and between Randolph and defendant, at the time said agreement was made, or at any other time, that the terms thereof should be committed to writing and signed or subscribed by the parties before it should become operative or binding upon them. The fact that both parties, after the oral agreement was made, acted upon or in conformity with the terms of the oral agreement for two consecutive years immediately succeeding the date of the making of said agreement is itself singularly persuasive as in substantiation of defendant's testimony and that of his wife that no such an agreement was made or understanding had. It is a consideration worthy of note that, if it were true that the agreement was to be put in writing, the written statement delivered to defendant by plaintiff and signed by the latter of the sales of the fruit in 1920 in accord with the terms of said agreement, in effect, constituted at least an acknowledgment in writing of the making of said agreement.

[9] But it is vigorously asserted by counsel for plaintiff that the case went to issue entirely upon the theory that the oral agreement involved an attempted modification of the written agreement of March 1, 1917, and that the trial was had and submitted to the jury solely upon that theory; that, accordingly, the case should here be decided on that theory. Practically, the case was tried upon both theories; that is to say, upon both the theory that the oral agreement involved a modification of the existing agreement and upon the theory that it wrought a novation. The defendant in his answer pleaded or set forth the terms of the oral agreement, and it is in the case to speak for itself. It is true that defendant, in pleading said agreement, characterized it as a modification of the written contract so often referred to herein; but the courts are not bound by the construction the pleader may give to a written instrument or an oral contract declared upon or set up as a defense, or the pleader's conception of the legal nature or effect thereof. As pleaded, the oral agreement upon its face is clearly a new agreement between the same parties relative to the same subject. And there was evidence that, as pleaded, it was made and intended to take the place of the one then in existence. Randolph and the defendant and the latter's wife repeatedly declared, when giving their testimony, that it was expressly agreed and clearly understood that the oral agreement was to operate as a substitute for the old agreement, or, as Randolph himself several times expressed it, "as in exchange for the written agreement." While these statements by those witnesses do not constitute the criterion determinative of the legal nature of the oral agreement (a function of the court), still they show and emphasize what the parties themselves understood and, in fact, intended was to be the purpose of said agreement when they were negotiating the consummation thereof. But a further and quite a significant consideration in the present connection is that, while it is true that the trial court submitted to the jury a number of instructions fitting the theory that the oral agreement involved a modification of the written contract of March, 1917, it also gave to the jury the following: "If, from the preponderance of the evidence in this case, you find that plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement as a substitute for the written contract sued upon, which agreement was to be placed in writing and signed, but which has not been either reduced to writing or signed by plaintiff and defendant," then the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, etc. While, perhaps, it may not be strictly correct to say that the question whether the oral agreement was intended as a substitute for the original agreement was thus directly submitted, yet the phraseology of the instruction is such that, when considered with the evidence in the case as to the circumstances characterizing the making of said agreement, it may justly be concluded that the theory that said agreement was intended to operate as a novation or to be substituted for the contract of March 1, 1917, was fairly within the case, as it was tried and submitted to the jury. Indeed, the facts of the transaction culminating in the making of the oral agreement would necessarily be the same whatever might be the legal nature of said agreement. As Mr. Justice Waste said in McClure v. Alberti et al., 190 Cal. 348, 351, 212 P. 204, 205, which involved an action upon a contract similar in its general aspects to the one here, and in which it was objected that the trial court committed prejudicial error by allowing the respondent to amend her pleadings, after the evidence was all in, so as to make them conform to the proof that the contract declared upon wrought a novation rather than the alteration of an existing agreement, as was the theory of plaintiff's case as originally framed and filed, so in principle, it is true here:

"Assuming that an additional issue was tendered by the amendment, we cannot see how the testimony in the case could have been different from that already introduced. All the facts were before the court, and its findings [verdict here] conclusively establish the liability of the appellants, irrespective of whether the issue was one of an alteration of the written contract or its entire abandonment, and the substitution of the oral agreement."

[10] 4. The given instructions which appellant contends the jury disregarded in considering the evidence and arriving at a verdict were framed upon the theory that the oral agreement constituted and effected a mere alteration of the original contract. They were given to the jury at the request of the plaintiff, but, as the verdict accords with what we conceive to be the correct theory of the nature of the oral agreement, and is evidentially well supported upon that theory, it cannot, of course, consistently be said that a miscarriage of justice has resulted from the failure or refusal by the jury to follow said instructions.

[11] Lastly, it is to be observed that the appellant cannot justly complain that in supporting this appeal it has been placed at a disadvantage because of the theory upon which the case is here decided, since the respondent in his brief, while not elaborating the proposition, nevertheless presented the question whether the oral agreement amounted to a novation, and counsel for the appellant, in their reply brief, noticed that fact, but refused to discuss the question, claiming that that proposition was not an issue in the case. Certainly, the plaintiff cannot justly claim that the question was not opened up by respondent for discussion on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [12] Counsel for plaintiff, in their petition for a rehearing, state the former opinion was incorrect in the statement therein that there was a conflict in the evidence upon the question whether it was agreed and understood that the terms of the "new agreement," as it may the more conveniently be designated, were to be reduced to writing before it should become binding upon the parties. On page 32 of the transcript is the defendant's testimony that in October, 1919, Randolph, at defendant's house, made a proposition to defendant that plaintiff would cancel the old agreement if defendant would agree to deliver all his peaches for the remainder of the term specified in the old agreement to plaintiff upon the terms stated in the former opinion herein, and that defendant then and there agreed thereto. On page 36 of the transcript it will be seen that defendant testified that on the occasion above referred to nothing whatever was said by either Randolph or himself about committing the new agreement to writing. On cross-examination, defendant repeatedly stated that, while the new agreement was understood to be a "marketing contract," he also said page 69 that in the conversation in October, 1919, leading to the making of the new agreement, nothing was said about a "written contract." On the same page it will be seen that he also said "there was nothing spoken of a marketing contract"; that all that was said by Randolph was that "he would give us a market price for it" (the fruit). The deposition of defendant as to the transactions involved here was taken prior to the trial. Counsel for defendant based a part of their cross-examination of defendant on said deposition, thereby showing that defendant therein stated that the understanding was that the new agreement was to be put in writing as a marketing contract. In brief, the defendant's testimony upon that subject seems to be inconsistent. A careful analysis of it would well warrant the conclusion that he was unable to make himself clear regarding that matter. His testimony in places would indicate that what he understood to be a "marketing contract" was an agreement whereby he was to receive the market prices for his fruit, and that it was in that sense that he stated in his testimony that he was to have a marketing contract for his fruit. Again, he would seem to undersand the technical characteristics of a marketing contract, and stated that no such contract was mentioned when the new agreement was first suggested by Randolph. And repeatedly he said that nothing was ever said about a writing until 1920, about or after the time he delivered all his fruit to plaintiff according to the terms of the "new agreement"; and again he stated that he supposed that the terms would be put in writing, and for that reason asked Randolph when he would have the writing embodying the terms of the new agreement prepared. Goddard did say, on cross-examination, that his statement in his deposition that there was an understanding at the time the new agreement was made that said agreement was to be put in writing was correct. In fact, he "backed and filled," so to speak, throughout his testimony, brought out both on his direct and cross examination, upon the question whether anything was said at the time the agreement was made about reducing said agreement to writing. The testimony of defendant's wife, who was present at the time the new agreement was made, was something of the same general character as that of her husband regarding this matter. She first stated that nothing was said about a written memorandum of the terms of the new agreement when the same was made. She stated that Randolph and her husband agreed on the terms of the new agreement, as they are explained in the former opinion, and that, in pursuance thereof, her husband in 1920 and 1921 delivered all his fruit to plaintiff under said agreement. On cross-examination she contradicted her testimony to the effect that nothing was said about putting the new agreement in writing at the time said agreement was made. But, with all these inconsistencies considered, we still adhere to the view that the repeated statement of defendant during the course of his examination that there was no understanding, at the time it was made, that the new agreement should be reduced to writing, and that of his wife to the same effect, taken together with the undisputed fact that defendant delivered to and the plaintiff received and disposed of all of the former's fruit in the years 1920 and 1921 in accord with the terms of the oral agreement, and also Randolph's positive testimony that the oral agreement was to be put in writing, and that such was the understanding at the time it was made, created a conflict in the evidence upon that question.

[13, 14] The jury could, in our opinion, have well concluded, upon a consideration of the testimony of both Goddard and his wife as to the matter in hand, that, having freely admitted that there was some talk subsequent to the making of the oral agreement about putting the same in writing, became confused as to dates, and that what they at all times intended to say was that no writing was spoken of until some time after the oral agreement was made and the parties had proceeded to carry out the terms of said agreement. At all events, the apparent inconsistencies in their testimony concerned particularly the question of their credibility or the weight of their testimony, which it was for the jury to settle, as, upon the whole case, it was for the jury to determine whether there was or was not any understanding had between Randolph and Goddard that, before the terms of the oral agreement were to become binding upon the parties, the same should be put in the form of a writing. But, be all that as it may, we are in no doubt that, even if the oral agreement was void for the reason that it was not put in writing as agreed, if such was the agreement, the fact that both Randolph and Goddard agreed, at the time the oral agreement was first discussed, that it should be substituted for the old written contract, and the further fact that in the years 1920 and 1921 the defendant delivered all his fruit to the plaintiff, and the latter received, handled, and disposed of the same precisely according to the terms of the oral agreement, as shown by its statements rendered to defendant for those years, constitute conclusive evidence of an intention on the part of both parties to abandon and so cancel the written agreement of March 1, 1917 (Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 137 P. 21, 166 Cal. 426, 430; 29 Cyc. 1134; Civ. Code, § 1531), and that such was the effect thereof. There is no inconsistency between the conclusion thus announced and the fact, if it is a fact, that the so-called new agreement was or is void or nonenforceable because not committed to writing. The fact that a written contract has been abandoned or canceled may be shown by parol, and, while it is true that the terms of the oral agreement, in so far as they are executory, may not be enforced, if it be true that the agreement was that they should be committed to writing before they were to become binding, still the fact that the parties themselves acted upon and in accord with the terms of the oral agreement, it having been expressly understood that said agreement was to supersede or be substituted for the old or existing agreement, is competent proof of the intention to abandon and cancel and consequently of the fact of the abandonment and cancelation of the latter agreement.

The cases cited by counsel in their petition as upholding their position that the old agreement, upon which this action is grounded, still exists or was never abandoned or canceled have no application to the situation here. They are: Spinney v. Downing, 41 P. 797, 108 Cal. 666; Aftergut v. Mulvihill, 145 P. 728, 25 Cal. App. 784; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 168 P. 1037, 176 Cal. 461; Durst v. Jolly, 169 P. 449, 35 Cal. App. 184; Dillingham v. Dahlgren, 198 P. 832, 52 Cal. App. 322. In each of the cases named the action was on the invalid contract, or, in other words, involved an attempt to enforce a contract which was void because it offended the statute of frauds or was not committed to writing, as the parties agreed that it should be before its terms should be binding upon them.

[15] It will not be disputed (assuming that the oral agreement was invalid) that the defendant was entitled to maintain an action upon a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the fruit which he delivered to plaintiff under the oral agreement, and that the prices received by plaintiff for said fruit in 1920 and 1921, minus the commissions and loading charges, as disclosed by the statements of the sales rendered to defendant by plaintiff, constituted the reasonable value of said fruit.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

NIELSEN v. RICHARDS, County Auditor.
(Civ. 3000.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 21, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 18, 1926.)

Schools and school districts § 135(3)—Contract by county superintendent of schools, employing wife as supervising teacher, is unenforceable; "traveling expenses" (Pol. Code, § 920; Pen. Code, § 71; Civ. Code, §§ 155-159, 171, 176, 1607, 1608, 1667).

Contract by county superintendent of schools, employing his wife as supervising teacher of schools, including provision for "traveling expenses," which include room rent and meals as well as transportation, held unenforceable, under Pol. Code, § 920, and Pen. Code, § 71, prohibiting officers from having any interest in contracts executed in their official capacity, in view of duty of support of wife by husband under Civ. Code, §§ 155, 156, 171, and in view of sections 1607, 1608, 1667, making entire contract, part of which is against public policy, void, and notwithstanding sections 157, 158, 159, 176.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Application by Josie E. M. Nielsen for a writ of mandate against Lucy V. Richards, as Auditor of the County of Butte, to require payment of salary as supervising teacher of rural schools. Judgment denying writ, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 232 P. 480.

Ware & Ware, of Chico, for appellant.

Wm. E. Rothe, Dist. Atty., of Chico, and C. W. Johnson, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Oroville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by petitioner to secure a writ of mandate directing the respondent, as the auditor of the county of Butte, to audit, approve, and allow a certain warrant issued and delivered to petitioner by C. H. Nielsen, the county superintendent of the county of Butte, for and on account of a certain contract purporting to employ the petitioner as a supervising teacher of rural schools in the county of Butte. Respondent had judgment, and the petitioner appeals.

The record shows that during all the times referred to in this proceeding C. H. Nielsen was the superintendent of schools of the county of Butte; that the petitioner was a qualified teacher of the county of Butte, holding a valid certificate authorizing her to teach in said county; that during all the times referred to the petitioner Josie E. M. Nielsen, and C. H. Nielsen, the county superintendent of said county, were husband and wife. On or about the 1st day of September, 1923, the said C. H. Nielsen and the petitioner herein entered into a contract purporting to employ the petitioner as a supervising teacher of rural schools in said county, which contract was in the words and figures following, to wit:

"I, C. H. Nielsen, superintendent of schools, Butte county, state of California, hereby appoint Mrs. Josie E. M. Nielsen as supervising teacher in the schools of Butte county for the term ending June 1, 1924, at an annual salary of three thousand three hundred ($3,300) dollars ($2,700 of which is designated as salary and $600 as traveling expenses), one-ninth of which salary shall be payable on the first of each calendar month following the first of September until nine payments shall have been made. The above payments shall be made in requisitions drawn upon the county auditor by me upon the supervision fund of Butte county.

"[Signed] C. H. Nielsen,
"Superintendent of Schools.

"Dated Sept. 1, 1923.

"I hereby accept the conditions stated above, and agree to serve as supervising teacher in the Butte county schools for the term specified above.

"[Signed] Josie E. M. Nielsen."

At the conclusion of the trial of the action the court made certain findings as to the official character of the said C. H. Nielsen, of the relationship existing between the petitioner and the said C. H. Nielsen, the fact that there was money in the county treasury of the county of Butte available for paying the claims of a supervising teacher, the issuance of a warrant by the superintendent of schools, and the refusal of the respondent to audit the claim of the petitioner, and, also, the execution of the writing which we have hereinabove set forth. The trial court then made the following finding, to wit:

"That prior to and before the execution and acceptance of said purported employment of said petitioner, the said petitioner and the said C. H. Nielsen, had conversations wherein, and as a result of which, the said C. H. Nielsen agreed that all money which his wife should earn teaching school under said purported employment should become her own money, and that he would have and claim no interest whatever in any money earned by his said wife under said purported employment as supervising teacher in the county of Butte."

Based upon the findings to which we have referred, the court drew its conclusions of law that the purported employment was illegal and void, and entered judgment for the respondent.

Based upon section 157, Civil Code, which reads, "Neither husband nor wife has any interest in the property of the other, * * *" and section 158, Civil Code, which reads, "Either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried, * * *" and also upon section 159, Civil Code, which reads, "A husband and wife cannot, by any contract with each other, alter their legal relations, except as to property, * * * it is argued by the appellant that under the findings of the trial court set forth, the agreement of the parties that whatever salary the petitioner might earn as a supervising teacher of the county of Butte was to be her separate property, the contract is free and clear of any legal inhibitions whatever.

The respondent rests her case upon section 920 of the Political Code, which specifies that members of the Legislature, state, county, and township officers must not be interested in any contract made by them in their official capacity, or by any body or board of which they are members, * * * and section 71 of the Penal Code, making executing contracts in which an officer is interested a penal offense. One phase of this controversy was before this court in the case of Nielsen v. Richards, 232 P. 480. No question was presented in that case as to the relationship of the parties, or the interest of the school superintendent in the contract entered into by him with petitioner, employing her as a supervising teacher of rural schools in the county of Butte. The questions decided related to whether the provisions of the law providing for supervising teachers were valid and applied to the county of Butte, and, also, as to the power of the county school superintendent to employ such teachers and fix their compensation. These questions were resolved in favor of the petitioner. The validity of the petitioner's appointment was not itself passed upon, as there was nothing in the record showing the relationship of husband and wife existing between the petitioner and the superintendent of schools of the county of Butte at the time of the employment and the execution of the contract set forth in the opinion of the court in the case just referred to.

Examination of the contract of employment brings to our attention serious questions affecting its validity. We will first consider the provision for "traveling expenses" and what is written into the contract by those words. The contract expressly states that in the fixing of the salary at the sum of $3,300, an item of $600 is inserted therein to cover traveling expenses, or, as said in the opinion deciding the first phase of this case presented to us, "The evident intention of the parties to the contract, inartificially expressed in the parenthetical clause, is that the petitioner shall be paid an annual salary of $3,300, she to pay her own traveling expenses, estimated to be $600 a year." The words "traveling expenses" have a definite legal meaning in reference to officers and employees traveling from place to place in the state of California, and include not merely means of locomotion or transportation but room rent and meals. This question was definitely settled by the Supreme Court in the case of Corbett v. State Board of Control, 188 Cal. 289, 204 P. 823. In deciding that case the Supreme Court said:

"If the meaning of the phrase 'traveling expenses' prevents its application to anything except expenses paid for some kind of locomotion or conveyance, doubtless this interpretation might be sustained. But it is a familiar rule of statutory interpretation that words and phrases are construed according to the approved usage of the language, and that words of common use are to be taken in their ordinary and general sense. Gross v. Fowler, 21 Cal. 396; Pol. Code, § 16. Ever since the year 1878 [Amendments to the Codes, 1877-78, p. 22] the law has provided that the members of the Supreme Court shall be allowed their 'actual traveling expenses' in going to and from their respective places of residence to attend the sessions of the court. It has been the universal practice for that period to allow the members and officers of that court, not only their railroad fare, but also their hotel bills during the time of their attendance on the sessions. The phrase quoted has always been understood to include these expenses. Section 3702 of the Political Code was enacted in its present form in 1887, and the same practice has prevailed ever since that time with relation to the traveling expenses of the members of the board of equalization. The Legislature has undoubtedly acquiesced in this interpretation, since the law has remained unchanged. It would seem that it is too late to claim the technical and literal construction now contended for. Furthermore, it is not in accordance with the common use of the phrase 'traveling expenses.' It is common knowledge that in commercial affairs agents are traveling * * * constantly under an arrangement with their principals that their traveling expenses are to be paid. Often they are required to remain in one place for considerable periods of time in the transaction of the business, but it is commonly understood that their hotel bills are a part of the traveling expenses, unless some provision of the contract shows a different meaning."

Section 155, Civil Code, reads: "Husband and wife contract towards each other obligations of mutual respect, fidelity and support." Section 156, Civil Code, declares:

"The husband is the head of the family. He may choose any reasonable place or mode of living, and the wife must conform thereto."

Irrespective of the Code provisions, the common law casts the duty of support, which includes meals and a place for the wife to sleep, or a room to occupy, upon the husband, or as said in 13 Cal. Jur. 804:

"While the husband and wife undertake toward each other obligations of mutual support, primarily the husband is the breadwinner and assumes the responsibility for the support of the family. Independently of the statute, he is bound to support her according to his means and station, even though she is insane or has ample means of her own."

This principle of law is set forth in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Shebley v. Peters, 53 Cal. App. 288, 200 P.

364. In speaking of the claims of the wife and children upon the husband, the Supreme Court there said:

"They were entitled to demand of him a support in accordance with his station in life. Such support it is the right of every wife and minor child to receive from the husband and father, even if they are not dependent upon him at all, but have ample means of their own."

This primary liability fixed by the common law and its application to particular cases must be read in connection with sections 155 and 171 of the Civil Code. Section 155, as hereinbefore set forth, makes the obligations resting upon the husband and wife mutual in relation to respect, fidelity, and support. Read by itself, this section would leave no primary liability upon the husband, but would place them upon an equal footing. The next section, however, of the Civil Code names the husband as the head of the family, and section 171, supra, particularly points out and fixes the liability of the wife. It is there said:

"The separate property of the wife is liable for her own debts contracted before or after her marriage, but it is not liable for her husband's debts; provided, that the separate property of the wife is liable for the payment of debts contracted by the husband or wife for the necessities of life furnished to them or either of them while they are living together; provided, that the provisions of the foregoing proviso shall not apply to the separate property of the wife held by her at the time of her marriage or acquired by her by devise, succession, or gift, other than by gift from the husband, after marriage."

This section, as applied to the case at bar, would render all of the salary earned under the contract liable for the necessities of life furnished the petitioner and her husband, C. H. Nielsen. The latter portion of the section makes it impossible for the husband by any agreement to make a gift thereof to her of any property in which he would otherwise have an interest so as to escape such liability. This section has a present and immediate application. It does not relate to any expectancies or contingencies, as is provided for in section 176, Civil Code, or the statute relating to succession when husband or wife dies intestate. As said in Leake v. Lucas, 65 Neb. 359, 91 N. W. 374, 62 L. R. A. 190:

"There can be no doubt but that the defendant would be liable as surety for her husband for the necessary food furnished the family, himself included."

In the case at bar, the contract of employment between the husband and the wife would, if carried into effect, increase the pecuniary responsibility of the person thus made a surety for family supplies, and constitutes a property interest safe-guarding the county school superintendent to the extent of the sum paid under the contract. In 13 A. L. R. 1396, is an extended note setting forth what has been held necessities by a number of courts having statutes similar to our own, making the separate property of the wife acquired after marriage liable for household necessities. These cases include instances where medical attendance, food, clothing, and furniture have been held as coming within the term "necessaries," even including wearing apparel purchased and worn by the husband alone. Gilman v. Matthews, 20 Colo. App. 170, 77 P. 366. Also, medical services rendered to the husband personally are a family expense within the meaning of the statute, making the expenses of the family chargeable upon the property of the wife. This latter item of necessities coming within the statutory provision is set out at length in Evans v. Noonan, 20 Cal. App. 288, 128 P. 794. A number of cases are there cited as to the holding of what constitutes necessities of life and so chargeable against a wife's separate earnings. Section 171, Civil Code, is also interpreted as well as applied. The court there said:

"It will be observed that the section as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 206), excludes from liability her separate property held by her at the time of her marriage and that acquired by her by devise or succession after marriage, and, therefore, the application of the provisions of the section is necessarily limited to such of her separate property only as she may have acquired after her marriage by any other means than by devise or succession, such property, for instance, as her earnings or that which she might acquire by gift after her marriage. * * * But whatever might have been the legislative motive prompting the enactment of the amendment, it is plainly manifest that the intention was thus to make the wife jointly liable with her husband for the payment of debts contracted by either or both for necessities furnished to either or both while they are living together, restricting, however, the wife's liability by limiting the right to take her separate property in execution of a judgment for a debt so contracted to such of her separate property only as she may have acquired after marriage otherwise than by devise or succession."

The foregoing authorities lead us unavoidably to the conclusion that C. H. Nielsen, as the husband of the petitioner, had a direct and indirect pecuniary interest in the contract which he was purporting to execute as superintendent of schools of the county of Butte. The contract directly adds a sum of money for the support of the wife, and, indirectly, for his own support. We also think it is apparent that section 158, Civil Code, empowering husbands and wives to contract with each other and enter into business engagements respecting property, etc., which either might, if unmarried, relates to cases where the husband is acting for himself and in his own right and individual capacity, and not as the agent or trustee of some other person or of the general public. In such cases the contract on the part of the husband which he is authorized to make must be such in which he has neither a direct nor an indirect pecuniary interest, even though the confidential relation between husband and wife might not prohibit the making of the contract.

The county superintendent of schools is a public officer and every public officer is an agent of the county, municipality, or state responsible for his election or appointment, and as such officer charged with the public trust of performing the duties of the office for the public interests. 21 Cal. Jur. 823. And, as said in section 67 of the same chapter, page 886 of the same volume:

"The rule has long been recognized that any contract by an officer which interferes with the unbiased discharge of his duty to the public in the exercise of his office, is against public policy and void. Acting upon the principle that no person can, at one and the same time, faithfully serve two masters representing diverse or inconsistent interests with respect to the service to be performed the legislature has prohibited the making of such contracts."

In Hay v. Long, 78 Wash. 616, 139 P. 761, the Supreme Court of Washington, in holding invalid a lease executed to a wife by her husband, while acting as agent for another, used language which we think pertinent to this case:

"The lease made by Athow was a lease to the community, and was therefore a lease to himself. But if it were not so, it has been held that a contract made by an agent with his wife is voidable at the instance of a cestui que trust or a principal, 'not on the ground of coverture, but of her relationship to the trustee. It would be evidence of unfairness quite as much as if the sale were made to the trustee himself, and falls within the spirit of the rule which forbids his own purchase.' Dundas' Appeal, 64 Pa. 325. 'The doctrine is familiar, and has been often recognized by this court, that an agent cannot, either directly or indirectly, have an interest in the sale of the property of his principal, which is within the scope of his agency, without the consent of his principal, freely given, after full knowledge of every matter known to an agent which might affect the principal. Coat v. Coat, 63 Ill. 74; Ebelmesser v. Ebelmesser, 99 Ill. 548; Zeigler v. Hughes, 55 Ill. 288; Hughes v. Washington, 72 Ill. 85. It is of no consequence in such case that no fraud was actually intended, or that no advantage was in fact derived from the transaction by the agent. Kerr on Fraud and Mistake (Bump's Ed.) 173, 174; Perry on Trusts, § 206; Story's Eq. Jur. § 315; Bispham's Eq. (2d Ed.) § 238, p. 299. The rule is not merely remedial of wrong actually committed. It is intended to be preventive of wrong. Public policy requires, as was tersely and forcibly said by the Chief Justice in Staats v. Bergen, 17 N. J. Eq. 554, that 'a trustee may not put himself in a position in which to be honest must be a strain on him.'"

In Tyler v. Sanborn, 128 Ill. 136, 21 N. E. 193, 4 L. R. A. 218, 15 Am. St. Rep. 97, the Supreme Court of Illinois held invalid a sale of land made to a wife by a husband, while acting as agent for another, even though the purchase was made from the separate funds belonging to the wife. After holding that the law which forbids such action on the part of the agent is not only remedial but preventive, when intended to promote honest and fair dealing in the faithful discharge of the trust imposed upon an agent, and, further, in order to shield the agent from the temptation of serving his own interest, while under legal obligations to serve the interests of another, the court in that case says:

"The husband is still the head of the family; and the expenses of the family and of the education of the children are, by section 15 of the statute in relation to husband and wife, charged upon the property of both husband and wife or of either of them, in favor of creditors. Rev. Stats. 1874, p. 577. Upon the death of the wife, intestate, without children surviving, the husband inherits one-half of her real estate (Rev. Stats. 1874, c. 39, par. 1); and in any event, upon her death, he is entitled to dower in her real estate; hence, the husband still has a pecuniary interest, greater or less, as circumstances may vary, in all the real estate of which his wife may be owner, during coverture. There is, moreover, apart from this pecuniary interest, an intimacy of relation and affection between husband and wife, and of mutual influence of the one upon the other for their common welfare and happiness, that is absolutely inconsistent with the idea that the husband can occupy a disinterested position as between his wife and a stranger in a business transaction. He may, by reason of his great integrity, be just in such a transaction; but unless his marital relations be perverted, he cannot feel disinterested—and it is precisely because of this feeling of interest that the law forbids that he shall act for himself in a transaction with his principal."

To the same effect is the ruling laid down in Cal. Jur. 978, relating to officers of a municipal corporation, that they must not use their official position for their own benefit or for the benefit of another or for the benefit of any one except the corporation itself, and may not represent a corporation in any contract or contracts in which they are personally interested, in obtaining an advantage at the expense of the municipality, for in such cases the city would not have the benefit of their unbiased judgment. In the case at bar the county of Butte was entitled to the unbiased judgment of the county school superintendent. Here we have contained not merely the personal and confidential relation existing between husband and wife, but also the pecuniary advantage which was being gained by the husband by reason of the contract which we have heretofore specified. In Nuckols v. Lyle, 8 Idaho, 589, 70 P. 401, the Supreme Court of Idaho held void a contract of employment of a school teacher by her husband who was a member of the school board making the employment. In that case there was no question concerning the agreement as to the separate property character of the salary to be earned, but, in so far as the question of support, etc., is involved in the contract under consideration, the case of Nuckols v. Lyle is applicable.

This court, in the case of Stockton Plumbing & Supply Co. v. Wheeler, 68 Cal. App. 592, 229 P. 1020, in an opinion written by Justice Hart touching the question of contracts in which officers are interested, has said:

"The personal interest of an officer in a contract made by him in his official capacity may be indirect only, still such interest would be sufficient to taint the contract with illegality. If this interest in the contract is such as would tend in any degree to influence him in making the contract, then the instrument is void because contrary to public policy, the policy of the law being that a public officer in the discharge of his duties as such should be absolutely free from any influence other than that which may directly grow out of the obligations that he owes to the public at large."

The rules of law which we have hereinbefore set forth are also fully stated in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 2 (5th Ed.) § 773. By reference to the contract which we are considering it will be seen that the consideration moving the parties to enter into the same is not severable, the salary and the traveling expenses are both intermingled and constitute an inherent and essential part thereof, hence, if either one of said items comes within the rules which we have set forth, the whole contract is vitiated. Section 1608 of the Civil Code says:

"If any part of a single consideration for one or more objects, or of several considerations for a single object, is unlawful, the entire contract is void."

Section 1607, Civil Code, requires that the consideration of a contract must be lawful within the meaning of section 1667, Civil Code. That section requires that, in order for a contract to be lawful, it must be one not contrary to an express provision of law; (2) or contrary to the policy of express law, although not expressly prohibited, or otherwise not contrary to good morals. These provisions, as we have set forth, are violated by both of the items of consideration entering into the contract. These sections of the Code are dealt with in the case of Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 119, 57 P. 777, 45 L. R. A. 420, 73 Am. St. Rep. 31, which case had to do with a contract attempted to be entered into by a member of a city council. This case follows the rule applicable in the case at bar, and cites a large number of authorities having to do with such attempted violations of duty by city and county officers.

For the reasons which we have heretofore given, it must be held that the purported contract entered into, between the petitioner on the one part and her husband, as county school superintendent on the other part, is prohibited by law and contrary to public policy.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

BUTLER v. CORNELL. (Civ. 3011.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 21, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡1036(2)—Defendant could have suffered no prejudice, because of improper joinder, where one cause of action was later abandoned.

Defendant could not have suffered prejudice from improper joining of cause of action for work, labor, and services, and money advanced with cause of action for damages for forcible entry and unlawful detainer, where plaintiff had abandoned alleged cause of action for damages.

2. Pleading ⚡399—Failure of evidence to establish fraud immaterial, where fraud was not necessary element of cause of action, even though pleaded.

Fraud is not a necessary element to cause of action for work, labor, and services performed, and moneys advanced, notwithstanding that complaint alleged promises were fraudulently made without intention to perform them, and fact that evidence failed to establish fraud would be immaterial.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1002—Implied finding of jury from conflicting evidence conclusive on appeal.

Where there was sufficient evidence to support finding for jury either way on question whether parties were copartners, implied finding of jury from such conflicting evidence was conclusive on appeal, as Court of Appeals has nothing to do with weight of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Fred Butler against Dave Cornell. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hersch & McNulty, of Crescent City, for appellant.

John L. Childs and George W. Howe, both of Crescent City, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was conducting a cigar business in the city of Eureka and was desirous of leaving that city and establishing a similar business near the town of Requa. The complaint alleges that it was agreed between the parties that the plaintiff would pay certain expenses and render certain services in connection with the establishment of said business at Requa and that "defendant would either thereafter immediately enter into and form a partnership with plaintiff or would pay plaintiff for such services and would repay plaintiff all money paid for such expenses"; that the plaintiff performed such services and paid said expenses in the total value and sum of $435.29; and that defendant refused to enter into the alleged partnership or to pay the plaintiff for such services and expenditures. The complaint also alleges that the parties secured a lease of certain land and that the defendant excluded the plaintiff therefrom to the latter's damage, but this claim was abandoned by plaintiff during the trial, and the question was not submitted to the jury and need not be considered further.

The answer, in addition to denials of certain allegations of the complaint, alleges that, prior to the time the alleged services were performed or expenditures made, the parties had entered into an agreement of copartnership for the purpose of conducting the alleged business at Requa, and that such services were performed and expenditures made "under and in pursuance of such agreement of copartnership, and as a part of the contribution of said plaintiff to said partnership business."

The plaintiff testified that the original agreement was:

"If I would help him get his goods out of that building (in Eureka), where his lease was up, and help him get built up there, and help him get started, if I wanted to be a partner, he would enter a partnership agreement if I felt I wanted to go up there; if not, * * * if I was not satisfied up there, he would pay me. * * * He said: 'If you are not satisfied, I will pay you for time and trouble and pay your money back.'"

The defendant testified that the parties entered into an agreement of copartnership as alleged in the answer. The court instructed the jury to the effect that, if the agreement between the parties was as alleged in the complaint, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of his services and the amount expended by him; but that, if the parties were copartners, and such services were performed and expenditures made in furtherance of the partnership business, then the defendant was entitled to a verdict. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the amount claimed by him for such services and expenditures, and judgment was entered accordingly in that amount. The defendant has appealed from the judgment. Appellant does not contend that the evidence fails to show that plaintiff rendered services of the value claimed and expended the amount alleged.

[1] It is contended that defendant's de-murrer to the complaint on the ground that a cause of action for "work, labor, and services performed, and moneys advanced" was improperly joined "with a cause of action for damages for forcible entry and unlawful detainer." It need not be determined whether there was such improper joinder of causes of action. The plaintiff abandoned his alleged cause of action for damages for his exclusion from the premises, and the case was submitted to the jury upon the other issues. The defendant, therefore, suffered no possible prejudice by reason of the improper joinder, if it was such.

[2] The complaint alleged that the defendant's promises to plaintiff were fraudulently made without any intention to perform them. Appellant contends that the evidence fails to establish fraud. Fraud, however, was not a necessary element of plaintiff's cause of action, and it was sufficient to prove defendant's agreement to pay for the alleged services and expenditures and his failure to do so.

[3] It is contended that "the verdict of the jury is against the weight of the evidence" upon the question of whether the parties were copartners. As stated, there is sufficient evidence to support a finding either way upon that question. The implied finding of the jury from such conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal, as this court has nothing to do with the weight of the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO., Inc., v. STATE
FISH AND GAME COMMISSION et al.
(Civ. 5223.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. December 23, 1925.)

1. Certiorari $\S$ 21—Certiorari will not lie to review order of fish and game commission (St. 1925, p. 595; Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1068).

Certiorari would not lie to review order of fish and game commission, made in response to petition under St. 1925, p. 595, to determine monthly capacity of petitioner's packing plant, because such commission could not lawfully exercise judicial functions, which is necessary in order for writ to lie under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1068.

2. Constitution law $\S$ 80(2)—Fish $\S$ 9—Fish and game commission cannot be invested with judicial functions (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 1).

Fish and game commission, having state-wide jurisdiction as distinguished from local boards, cannot be invested with judicial functions because, except for local purposes, Const. art. 6, $\S$ 1, confines judicial power to specified courts.

Application by Van Camp Sea Food Company, Inc., for certiorari to review an order of the Fish and Game Commission of the State of California and others. Writ discharged.

Fredericks & Hanna and William A. Alderson, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

B. D. Marx Greene, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. From the petition presented herein, it appears that the business of petitioner includes that of canning sardines and manufacturing fertilizer as a by-product of its fish-canning industry; that, in accordance with the provisions of the statute of this state, enacted at the session of the Legislature in 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 595), petitioner made application to the respondent fish and game commission for the purpose of having determined by said commission the monthly capacity of the packing plant of said petitioner, to the end that its right to manufacture therein the maximum quantity of fish fertilizer as provided by the terms of the statute might also be determined and certified by said commission; that, in accordance with the prayer of said application, a hearing was had before said commission, and thereupon it made certain findings of fact from which certain conclusions were deduced, and which resulted in an order being made by said commission authorizing petitioner, "while actually engaged in packing sardines, a monthly allowance of sardines to be used in its reduction plant of 4,500 tons for each calendar month, based upon its aforesaid canning capacity of 18,000 tons per month, and being 25 per cent. of the monthly capacity of the packing plant. This order is made subject to the regulations required by the fish and game commission's general order No. 1, which order is made a part of this order."

"General order No. 1" referred to in said order of the commission, among other things, contained the following provision:

"In order to determine whether a packer is actually engaged in packing sardines, this commission will require that for each ton of sardines received by a packer during a calendar month he shall produce fifteen (15) cases of one pound ovals (48 cans to the case), or the equivalent if other size cans are used."

[1] It is contended by petitioner that that part of the order of the commission contained in "general order No. 1" was in excess of the jurisdiction of the commission and consequently void.

To the petition for the writ of certiorari, the respondent commission has interposed a demurrer on the ground that said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or to authorize the issuance of the writ. In that connection the principal point relied upon by respondent is that the writ will lie only as against "an inferior tribunal, board or officer exercising judicial functions," as provided by section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that respondent commission was not, in said matter, exercising any judicial function.

Assuming, for the purposes of this case only (but without deciding the point), that, in the performance of the acts heretofore set forth, the respondent commission was attempting to exercise at least quasi judicial functions, the question to be determined is whether the respondent commission had the lawful power to exercise such functions.

The matter is primarily regulated by the provisions of section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution relating to judicial powers, which provides:

"The judicial power of the state shall be vested in the senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, in a supreme court, district courts of appeal, superior courts, such municipal courts as may be established in any city or city and county, and such inferior courts as the Legislature may establish in any incorporated city or town, township, county or city and county."

Consideration of the constitutional provision has been frequently before the appellate courts of this state, wherein orders made by different state commissions and local boards have been reviewed. As affecting solely the police power of the state, it has been held that the orders of a commission having a state-wide jurisdiction, exercising powers quasi judicial in their nature, and local boards, such as boards of supervisors, acting in a judicial capacity in hearing and determining questions such, for example, as involving the organization of irrigation districts, were not in violation of the constitutional provision. County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 670, 59 P. 202, 77 Am. St. Rep. 217; Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 77 P. 879, 1 Ann. Cas. 13; Imperial Water Co. v. Board of Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 120 P. 780; Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 250, 187 P. 965; Brecheen v. Riley, 187 Cal. 121, 200 P. 1042; Gregory v. Hecke (Cal. App.) 238 P. 787, 793.

[2] But, in contrast with the foregoing decisions, we find the cases of Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 P. 24, and Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390, where, in substance, it was held that it was only under a special and independent constitutional provision that the Industrial Accident Commission was empowered to exercise judicial functions. It is there pointed out that, in the absence of a special constitutional provision conferring such power, an act of the Legislature attempting to create judicial powers in a state board, such as the fish and game commission, would be invalid. In the former case (171 Cal. 319, 153 P. 24), in speaking of the constitutional provision heretofore quoted herein, the court said:

"Under this provision the Legislature would be without authority to give judicial power to any general state board or tribunal. Except for local purposes the section disposes of the whole judicial power of the state and vests all of it in the courts expressly named therein, leaving none at the disposal of the Legislature."

The latest expression on the subject by the Supreme Court, contained in the case of Department of Public Works, etc., v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 239 P. 1076, is to the effect that a commission, like the respondent herein (that is, one having state-wide jurisdiction, as distinguished from a local board), cannot be invested with judicial functions for the reason that, "except for local purposes," section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution confines all judicial power to certain specified courts. That case, which appears to be controlling in its effect, so far as the issue here involved is concerned, was a proceeding for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent superior court from proceeding with the hearing and determination of a petition for a writ of review. It appears that, acting under the authority contained in the Water Commission Act (Stats. 1913, p. 1012), the department of public works, division of water rights, which, like respondent herein, was a state commission, after pursuing certain procedure provided in the act, had issued its certificate to the applicant for the appropriation of water. Upon application made to the respondent therein, the superior court issued its writ of review concerning the right of said commission to issue said certificate, fixing a time and place for the return of the writ. In deciding whether a writ of prohibition would lie, restraining said superior court from proceeding with the hearing and determination of the petition for the writ of review, following a statement that the sole question for determination was whether the respondent superior court had jurisdiction to entertain and determine a petition for a writ of review under section 12 of the Water Commission Act, and after making a statement as to the general requirements necessarily precedent to the issuance of such a writ, the court said:

"It is apparent that at least one of those essentials is and was not present when the respondent court issued the writ of review, namely, the exercise by the petitioners of a judicial function. This is true, for the reason that it was not within the power of the Legislature to vest judicial power in the petitioners. Their authority under the Water Commission Act is state wide. Under section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution: 'The Legislature would be without authority to give judicial power to any general state board or tribunal. Except for local purposes the section disposes of the whole judicial power of the state and vests all of it in the courts expressly named therein, leaving none at the disposal of the Legislature.' Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 P. 24; Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390. See, also, concurring opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Shaw in Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Comm., 187 Cal. 533, 202 P. 874.

"And in no other section of the Constitution do we find authority in the Legislature to vest judicial power in the petitioners under the Water Commission Act. The cases of Imperial Water Co. v. Board of Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 120 P. 780, and other cases of like import and relied on by the respondents are not in point, because they involved the scope or validity of judicial powers exercised by local tribunals, boards, or officers whose jurisdiction was limited to incorporated cities, towns, townships, counties, or cities and counties, and did not involve the authority of any tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial powers and having state-wide jurisdiction."

A decision on certain incidental questions raised by the parties herein becomes unnecessary. It is ordered that the demurrer to the petition be and it is sustained, and that the writ heretofore issued shall be and it is discharged.

BENJAMIN v. DAVIS. (Civ. 5013.)

1. Patents ⇨240—Plaintiff's patent, embracing merely new and useful improvements in other apparatus, protected only against duplication of very devices invented.

Where plaintiff's patent on centrifugal impact ore pulverizer was not basic, but embraced merely certain new and useful improvements, he could only be protected against duplication of very devices invented by him.

2. Patents ⇨234—Patent on centrifugal impact ore pulverizer held not infringed within contract to protect licensee against infringement.

Patent on centrifugal impact ore pulverizer held not infringed within meaning of contract by which patentee agreed to protect licensee from infringement.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Edward H. Benjamin against Norris K. Davis, with counterclaim by defendant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Boswell F. King and Carlos P. Griffin, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles W. Slack and Edgar T. Zook, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff for the payment of certain sums of money, with interest, which sums represent the full amount of certain minimum royalties provided to be paid to plaintiff by defendant pursuant to the terms of a written contract entered into between them, whereby plaintiff granted to defendant the sole right to manufacture a certain centrifugal impact ore pulverizer upon which letters patent had been issued to plaintiff by the United States Patent Office. Said contract provided, among other things, that plaintiff should protect the defendant against any infringement of the patent by others during the term of the agreement. Defendant in his answer admitted the nonpayment of the royalties, but set up as a defense and a ground of counterclaim an alleged infringement of the patent by one Marks, against which defendant claims plaintiff failed to protect him. The sole question presented for determination is whether or not there has been any infringement of said patent by the said Marks. The trial court found adversely upon the defendant's contention as to that issue, and it will therefore be necessary to ascertain only whether or not there is substantial evidence in the record to sustain that finding.

In support of the finding, the record discloses the following facts, most of which were established by the testimony of plaintiff:

The device which was the subject of the contract was a machine used for reducing ores or minerals by the use of the centrifugal force of a rapidly rotating shaft to which shoes are fixed, throwing the ore to the outer walls of the chamber with such force as to convert said ore into powdered form. The shaft revolves rapidly, making some 3,500 revolutions a minute, and, when the ore or other heavy material is dropped into this rapidly revolving shaft, there is danger of the shaft getting out of alignment, and, when the shoes wear down, there is danger of them being loosened from their fastenings and thrown against the walls of the pulverizer, breaking it to pieces.

Plaintiff claimed no basic patent to said machine; his invention relating to an improved type of one already in use and known as the Partridge machine. The latter machine was defective in the two respects of having no adequate means of maintaining the equilibrium of the shaft, or of knowing when the shoes were wearing down to the point of breaking off. The inventions claimed by plaintiff consisted of two improvements: First, the use of eight tension rods running through the machine to a bearing sleeve on the shaft and maintaining an even pressure thereon, which was compensated by adjustable springs on the outside of the casing of the machine to take up any unusual pressure in that direction; and, secondly, the device of a hole bored in the shoe from the rear so that, when the face of the shoe is worn down to the bottom of the hole, a whistling sound is noted, caused by the air currents through the hole in the rapidly revolving shoe. Neither of those improvements was attached to or made a part of the machine which it is claimed Marks was manufacturing. In the Marks type of machine a rubber ring or grummet was used to maintain the lateral tension on the shaft. This was the principle found by respondent to be impractical in the Partridge machine and of no value because of the rapid disintegration of the rubber. As a result of plaintiff's patent, a substitution for these rubber rings was made by providing the rods with springs which effected a perfect balance, adjustable to various kinds of ore which might be run through the machine. This feature of adjustability of springs in plaintiff's machine was absolutely wanting in the Marks machine.

[1, 2] Defendant admits that the design of each particular part of Marks' machine and of plaintiff's are widely different, but it is asserted that a combination of all elements, as set forth in paragraph 7 of plaintiff's patent, brings forth the practical application of a certain principle which is alike in both machines. As before stated, plaintiff's patent is not a basic one; he did not invent or claim to have invented the centrifugal impact ore pulverizer. His patent embraces merely "certain new and useful improvements in Ore-Pulverizing Apparatus," the essential features of which are those already mentioned, and which are specifically set forth in plaintiff's patent. Under such circumstances he could only be protected against duplication of the very devices invented by him. 30 Cyc. 940, 941; Morley Sewing Machine Co. v. Lancaster, 23 F. 344; Adams Electric Ry. Co. v. Lindell Ry. Co., 77 F. 432, 23 C. C. A. 223; Sandusky Foundry & Machine Co. v. De Lavaud (D. C.) 258 F. 640; Pacific States Electric Co. v. Wright (C. C. A.) 277 F. 756; Railway Co. v. Sayles, 97 U. S. 554, 24 L. Ed. 1053. And it was only against infringement of those improved devices which are covered by his patent that he agreed to protect the defendant.

It is our opinion that there is ample evidence to support the contested finding, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

PENDELL v. WARREN. (Civ. 4115.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 28, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1012(1).

Action of trial court held final, where finding is assailed as not supported by the evidence, but point made relates to weight of evidence.

2. Sales ⇨38(1) — False representation by seller of truck that it was made in 1916 instead of 1914 held material.

Seller's representation that truck, having rental value of $100 a month, was made in 1916 instead of 1914 to one buying it for use in his business, and not for resale, held material.

3. Sales ⇨38(1).

False representation by seller of used truck that he would procure registration in name of buyer held material.

4. Sales ⇨126(1)—Buyer, giving seller notice of rescission of contract 22 days after learning of one of several false representations, held not guilty of laches.

Buyer, giving seller notice of rescission of contract 22 days after learning that truck bought was made in 1914, instead of 1916, as represented, held not guilty of laches, though such notice was given some time after seller's failure to make good representation that he would procure license.

5. Trial ⇨397(5)—Where sale of truck was rescinded, issue as to rental value, raised by inadequate pleading which was not objected to, held material one, requiring finding.

Where cross-complaint asked rescission of contract for sale of truck, reasonable rental value, while in buyer's possession, held material issue, on which finding should have been made, though answer to cross-complaint raising it, which was not objected to at trial, was not termed counterclaim, since objection to such inadequacy cannot be raised for first time on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by H. G. Pendell against Edwin M. Warren. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Plaintiff sold an automobile truck to defendant. This action was instituted for the purpose of enforcing a collection of the selling price. Defendant cross-complained for a rescission of the contract of sale, on the ground that the transfer was brought about by means of fraudulent misrepresentations made by plaintiff to him concerning the truck. In his answer to the cross-complaint plaintiff alleged the reasonable rental value of the truck for the period during which defendant had it in his possession; alleged that defendant used it in his business during the period; and demanded judgment for the reasonable rental value of the vehicle. A judgment of rescission was rendered under the allegations of the cross-complaint, but the trial court did not find upon the issues supporting plaintiff's demand for judgment for reasonable rental, and rendered judgment that plaintiff take nothing because of the action. Plaintiff appeals.

[1] It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that appellant made the misrepresentations with which he was charged in the cross-complaint. It is apparent from the manner in which appellant argues this question that the point is without merit. Dealing with one of the alleged misrepresentations, appellant says that the evidence concerning it was "weak on the part of defendant," and that the evidence of appellant on the subject "wholly preponderates that of the defendant." With questions such as this we have nothing to do. Where a finding is assailed on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, and the point really made is that the weight of the evidence is opposed to the finding, the action of the trial court in making it is final. An examination of evidence to which respondent calls our attention convinces us that appellant could have taken no stronger ground in support of his point than he does take.

[2] The alleged fraudulent representations were made toward the close of 1920. One of them was that the truck was built in 1916. It was in fact built in 1914. It is contended that the representation that the vehicle was a 1916 model was not a material one, and this upon the theory that the value of the truck was not apparently increased by the represented decrease of its age from six years to four. Such a contention flies in the face of all natural laws affecting senility and longevity—those arising from wear and tear, rust, decay, and from that lapse of time which affects all the others, and sends even automobile trucks to the wrecker. Appellant points to the evidence of one witness to the effect that in 1920 a 1914 truck was as valuable for purposes of "resale" as one of the vintage of 1916. But there is no showing in the evidence that respondent bought the truck for resale. On the contrary, it appears that he used it for many months in his business. It is because of that fact that appellant makes his claim to judgment for the reasonable rental value of the vehicle. It appears to us from the very essentials of common sense that respondent was entitled to believe from the representation made by appellant that he would enjoy a use of the truck for a period of two years beyond the time when its actual years of existence would have consigned it to one of those receptacles of automobile "bodies" and "parts" which exist in such numbers in and about every large city. It seems to us, beyond a doubt, without more direct evidence to the contrary, that a 1914 truck was, in 1920, worth materially less to respondent than a 1916 truck would have been. It is not at all beside the point to remark here that appellant pleaded the reasonable rental value of the truck, during the time respondent had it, as $100 per month, and he introduced evidence in support of the allegation. From these circumstances it can reasonably be deduced that the truck was of considerable value of itself; and the greater its value, the greater would have been the falling off in value, in successive periods of time, because of the fact that it was two years older than it was represented to be. The conclusion here reached derives some support from Morris v. Fiat Motor Sales Co., 32 Cal. App. 315, 162 P. 663.

[3] The trial court found that at the time of the negotiations between appellant and respondent for the sale of the truck the vehicle was registered with the state in the name of a certain corporation, that fact being known to appellant; that appellant knew that respondent could not use the truck upon the public highways without procuring the consent of the corporation to a transfer of the registration from it to respondent, and knew that respondent would not accept the truck, and would not execute the contract for its purchase, unless the corporation delivered its registration certificate to the truck to him; and that appellant, for the purpose of inducing respondent to conclude his purchase, promised respondent, without intent to keep his promise, that he (appellant) would immediately procure the registration of the truck with the state in the name of respondent, and would procure a transfer of the certificate of registration thereto from the corporation; and that appellant failed to perform these inducing promises. Appellant contends that these "representations" were immaterial, for the reason that it was the duty of respondent himself to procure a license to operate the truck, or suffer the pains and penalties of the law, if forsooth, he ventured upon the highway with it, but without a license there to operate it. This is one of those contentions which it is not difficult to state, but which it is most difficult to comprehend. There seems hardly to be a visible handle by which it may be ardently and forcibly grasped. The following appears to be the only means of approach to the subject, although it is a stealthy means, and savors much of wily subterfuge: Appellant apparently is convinced that it was the duty of respondent to fare boldly forth upon the road, mounted upon this licenseless truck, like Don Quixote astride the illy equipped Rosinante, and suffer arrest, merely to demonstrate that he could not lawfully emerge from the byway into the highway without a license so to do. We refuse to be impaled upon this horn of the dilemma. Matador-like, we deftly step aside and avoid it. Why need respondent suffer the ignominy of arrest? Why might he not remain in his own yard and await the procuring of the license by appellant, holding him to the dire consequences of a failure to procure it? We think he could. We hope he did. We think the inducing promises were material.

[4] Appellant contends that there was an undue delay upon respondent's part, after appellant's failure to procure the license to operate the truck, in giving notice of rescission of the contract of sale. There was some delay, taking the failure to procure a license as the basis of the notice, but we think it was not sufficient to amount to laches. We forbear to discuss the point at length, however, because of this circumstance: Respondent gave his notice of rescission twenty-two days after he learned that the truck was a 1914 model. We think this relieves him of the charge of laches altogether.

[5] Appellant's final contention is that the trial court erred in failing to find upon the issue as to the reasonable rental value of the truck while respondent was in the possession of it and while he used it in his business. Respondent answers that the issue was an immaterial one, and that a finding upon it was therefore unnecessary. The issue as to reasonable rental value was tendered by a paragraph of the answer to the cross-complaint which read:

"Alleges that the reasonable rental value of the truck which plaintiff delivered to defendant and which truck plaintiff alleges the defendant used in his business was and is the sum of at least $100 per month, and that by reason thereof defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $100 per month during the entire period he has had possession of said truck in the event defendant is entitled to a judgment of rescission."

This paragraph was added to the answer to the cross-complaint by means of an amendment which was filed by leave of court during the trial. To the amendment appellant appended a prayer "for the same relief sought in his complaint and answer to defendant's cross-complaint, and in addition thereto the relief justified by this amendment, and for general relief." Respondent's contention that the issue as to rental value was not material is for the reason that the matter covered by the amendment to the answer to cross-complaint was not given a name—specifically, that it was not by the pleader termed a counterclaim. We think this view is untenable. Just preceding the granting of leave to file the amendment to the answer to cross-complaint, the following occurred at the trial:

"Mr. Lady: * * * We brought suit to recover on the sale of a truck, and he got possession of the truck in December, 1920, and they come in and rescind in September, 1921. There's about nine months he has had the use of our truck; and, if he is entitled to a rescission, we are entitled to a certain amount for the use of our truck. If he is entitled to rescind, I think we have a right to show how he paid the amount of money he did pay, and we have a right to show what the reasonable value of what that property now is. On the way out here I prepared a couple paragraphs in answer to the cross-complaint, as follows."

Then was read the paragraph of the amendment above set forth, and another paragraph somewhat related to it, but which it is unnecessary to quote. Mr. Lady then proceeded to remark further:

"I think these things should be alleged so the court can determine the matter. The only reason I suggest these two paragraphs is so we may have an issue on the question, or your honor can determine what is proper after hearing all the evidence. I don't know what will develop, and what the parties will be able to prove. We think we can defeat the defendant's case on his cross-complaint, but in case we cannot, I think we have a right to cut his claim down and have a proper adjudication of that. I submit that to your honor for your honor's consideration."

The amendment, including the prayer, was then permitted to be filed; no objection being made. The trial then proceeded, and evidence was admitted, also without objection, upon the question of the reasonable rental value of the truck.

We need not pause to decide whether the issue now in question should be held to have been properly tendered, if objection to the amendment had been interposed when it was offered, or if objection had been made to the admissibility of evidence under it on the ground that it was insufficient. Upon the showing made by the record, a mass of authority supports the view that respondent cannot now for the first time suggest the inadequacy of the pleading. A few only of these cases will be cited.

"Counsel will not be allowed to try the case upon the theory that the issue was properly before the court below, and thus entice his adversary into a trap to be sprung in this court at the last moment. This court does not countenance technical objections to pleadings when the case was tried in the court below upon the theory that the issues were properly made." Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 664, 58 P. 266.

"The record shows that the plaintiff tried the case upon the theory that defendant's failure to perform was in issue. Under these circumstances, this court will not entertain the suggestion, made for the first time on appeal, that the attempted denial was ineffectual for any purpose." Bayly v. Lee, 174 Cal. 137, 162 P. 96.

"When a complaint is not totally devoid of allegation upon a particular point and the objection that it is insufficient in that regard is first made on appeal, the trial having been conducted by the objecting party upon the theory that it was sufficient, all of which is the case here, it will be upheld." Fowler v. Enriquez, 56 Cal. App. 107, 204 P. 854.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the trial court to retry only the issues as to the reasonable rental value of the truck, and as to whether defendant used it while it was in his possession; to determine and adjudge what, if any, amount plaintiff shall recover under those issues; and, if it shall be determined that plaintiff should recover thereunder, to reframe its entire judgment accordingly.

BALDWIN et al. v. AMERICAN TRADING CO. (PACIFIC COAST) et al.
(Civ. 5212.)

1. Mortgages ⇨294—Mortgagor's agreement, releasing equity of redemption, held valid as being a separate transaction from mortgage.

Corporate mortgagor's agreement, releasing equity of redemption of mortgage on corporate property, made in consideration of extension of time on mortgage, held valid, as being a transaction separate and distinct from the original mortgage.

2. Mortgages ⇨294—Rescission of mortgagor's agreement, releasing equity of redemption, should be prompt, with offer to restore status quo.

If corporate mortgagor's agreement, releasing its equity of redemption, was voidable for fraud and undue influence, objecting stockholders should have given prompt notice of rescission and offered to restore mortgagee to the status quo.

3. Corporations ⇨442—Corporate mortgagor's release of equity of redemption of mortgage on corporate property held not invalid as unauthorized transfer of all corporate property (Civ. Code, § 361a).

Contention that corporate mortgagor's agreement to release its equity of redemption of mortgage on corporate property was invalid under Civ. Code, § 361a, as providing for transfer of all the corporate assets and property without being authorized by two-thirds of stockholders, was untenable, especially where it appeared that the mortgagor's property was virtually disposed of, before the execution of the agreement, by the creation of liens against it.

4. Mortgages ⇨294—Failure to make detailed accounting between mortgagee and mortgagor held not ground for enjoining execution of agreement releasing equity of redemption.

Where corporate mortgagor's agreement releasing equity of redemption of mortgage on corporate property on failure to pay mortgage within certain time did not contemplate final accounting in event of failure to pay, and accounting was had up to within six months of stockholders' action to restrain consummation of agreement by transfers, fact that detailed accounting was not had during such six months is not ground for enjoining such consummation of agreement.

KNIGHT, J. This is plaintiffs' appeal from an order dissolving a temporary restraining order and refusing to grant an injunction pendente lite. On December 20, 1921, defendant La Zacualpa-Hidalgo Rubber Company, a corporation, entered into a written agreement with defendant American Trading Company, a corporation, whereby said rubber company agreed, in part, that, if within a period of 18 months thereafter an indebtedness owing to said trading company, amounting to a sum not less than $167,823.46 or more than $205,671.34, was not liquidated, said rubber company would cause to be transferred to said trading company certain real and personal property situate in the republic of Mexico, as full settlement of said indebtedness. On June 19, 1923, the day before said period of 18 months expired, and without having paid or offered to pay said indebtedness, plaintiffs, as stockholders in said rubber company, commenced this suit in equity to restrain said rubber company from executing said transfers as called for in said written agreement, upon the ground that said agreement is invalid; also to require an accounting by said trading company, and thereupon, in the event that said rubber company failed to discharge its obligations, that plaintiffs and other stockholders be authorized so to do. Upon filing the complaint in said action, plaintiffs procured a temporary restraining order enjoining the consummation of said transfers, which was followed by the presentation of a motion for an injunction pendente lite for the purpose of continuing in force said injunctive relief until said action was heard and determined. Upon the hearing of that motion said restraining order was dissolved, and the court refused to grant a temporary injunction. Plaintiffs have appealed, and, pending the appeal, the court granted a stay of proceedings.

The record upon which the trial court based its rulings consists of the verified complaint in the action and numerous affidavits submitted on behalf of certain defendants. Said affidavits disclose the following facts: For some time prior to 1914 three corporations, operating under the laws of the republic of Mexico, were engaged in certain enterprises in that country for the production of rubber and coffee. These corporations issued and sold a large number of so-called "acre certificates" which entitled the holder thereof to a portion of the revenue derived from one acre of land. During the operation of these enterprises said corporations incurred a large amount of debts. They borrowed from a bank in Mexico an amount of money equivalent to about the sum of $575,000, United States gold, and, to secure the payment thereof, gave a mortgage covering certain rubber plantations belonging to them. They also became indebted in a large sum of money to a number of other concerns, among them being said trading company. In 1914, at the instance of these latter creditors, and pursuant to the laws of Mexico, said corporations executed a so-called "escritura" whereby said corporations admitted their debts and confessed judgment therefor. Later, in 1915, on account of the urgent demands of the mortgagee and the escritura creditors for payment of the obligations due them, said corporations perfected a scheme for the refinancing of their affairs, as a result of which the "acre certificate" holders formed a new corporation under the laws of the state of Nevada, known as the La Zacualpa-Hidalgo Rubber Company (defendant herein) and transferred to it their so-called "acre certificates" in exchange for capital stock and the assumption by said newly formed corporation of the entire outstanding indebtedness of said three corporations. Said trading company was one of the principal creditors of said rubber company, and, for the purpose of receiving further financial aid and as a part of the refinancing scheme, the defendant Louis A. Ward, who was the executive vice president on the Pacific Coast for said American Trading Company, was persuaded to become a director in said rubber company, and through his efforts, and in order to prevent a foreclosure of said mortgage, said trading company was induced to purchase said mortgage, with the understanding that said trading company should thereafter hold the same as security for the payment of the total amount of indebtedness owing to said trading company, and also as security for any future advances which it might make for the benefit of said rubber company. Thereafter said rubber company, aided financially by said trading company, endeavored for several years to operate said enterprises, but the business was not successful. One of the escritura creditors, George A. Moore & Co., commenced a suit in California against one of the original corporations to recover an amount due under said escritura, and obtained a judgment which included the escritura indebtedness of said trading company, amounting to $72,993.94; and said George A. Moore & Co. was about to enforce said judgment against the coffee interests of said corporation, falling in which the rubber plantations were to be resorted to for the purpose of satisfying said judgment.

Finally, in December, 1921, the financial affairs of said rubber company seemed to have reached the point of exhaustion. The escritura creditors were making urgent demands for the payment of their claims, and said trading company was threatening immediate foreclosure of said mortgage. Thereupon, in order to obtain further extension of time for the payment of its debts, and thus prevent financial disaster, and for the further purpose of obtaining additional financial assistance from said trading company in the operation of its properties, particularly in the matter of making a survey for the discovery of oil, this agreement of December 20, 1921, was made. Said agreement first recites the various indebtednesses owing to said trading company, also the fact of the purchase of said mortgage by said trading company, the shipment of a consignment of rubber to said trading company for the purposes of sale, and the matter of the George A. Moore & Co. litigation. The agreement then provides as follows:

"Whereas, it is desired to settle the accounts between the parties hereto and their mutual rights and obligations in the premises: It is therefore mutually agreed as follows:

"(1) The first party (the rubber company) is indebted to the second party (the trading company) on every account in the sum of not less than $167,823.46, and not more than $205,671.34 (moneys advanced on open account, $86,119.11; moneys advanced to purchase Hipotecario mortgage, $46,548.29; moneys owing, the payments of which are secured by escritura, $72,993.94), with accruing interest from December 20, 1921, and legal expenses heretofore referred to, subject to any alteration or correction in amount that the facts, when ascertained, may require.

"(2) First party hereto agrees to deliver forthwith to second party possession of the said rubber plantations and the personal property situate thereon, and agreed that any interest it may have in said plantations and the said Hipotecario mortgage and the obligation secured thereby, and said rubber in New York and San Francisco, may be held by second party as security for the payment of said indebtedness of amount named in paragraph number one and legal expenses heretofore referred to, and interest from December 20, 1921, at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. * * *

Continuing, said agreement provides, in substance, that said trading company shall operate said properties, sell said consignment of rubber, and render an accounting of such operations to said rubber company on March 31, 1922, and quarterly thereafter; that said rubber company shall have the right to sell all of its real and personal property at any time within one year for a sum not less than the full amount of the indebtedness due said trading company, and upon the payment thereof be entitled to the return of all of said property; but, in the event that said rubber company failed to pay the full amount of said indebtedness within one year, said trading company should have the right at any time within the succeeding 6 months to sell said properties, including said mortgage, and, after satisfying its demands, pay any excess to said rubber company. Further provision was made for the advancement by said trading company of money for the purpose of making a geological survey for the discovery of oil, also that during the life of said contract, but not exceeding 18 months from and after the date thereof, said trading company should advance to said rubber company $4,500 a year for the purpose of defraying its necessary expenses, and that the amount thus paid should be added to its indebtedness, and be secured by said mortgage, and the real and personal property, and should ultimately be repaid with interest at 8 per cent. Said agreement further provided as follows:

"(7) In case the indebtedness of the first party to the second party in said sum named in paragraph No. 1, plus any indebtedness that may accrue thereunder, and interest, is not paid in full to the second party on or before 18 months from the date hereof, either from the operation of said properties or the sale thereof, as herein contemplated, or in some other manner, then and in that case, the said rubber plantation and the personal property situate thereon and said Banco Hipotecario mortgage shall thereafter belong to and be the property of the second party, free and clear of any claim of the first party thereto; and in which event the party of the first part will execute and deliver to the party of the second part or its nominee or nominees, any instrument or document of any character which may be deemed by the second party as necessary, requisite, or convenient to vest in said second party all the right, title, and interest of the first party in and to said plantations and the personal property thereon, and such transfer of the real and personal property shall be considered as full settlement of all indebtedness."

In addition to the foregoing facts, the affidavit of the defendant Ward shows that—

"Quarterly during the entire period up to December 31, 1922 (said trading company) made financial reports to said La Zacualpa-Hidalgo Rubber Company, and reports from December 31, 1922, up to June 20, 1923, will be made as soon as data therefor is received from the plantations."

Said affidavit further avers that, pursuant to said agreement, the amount due and owing said trading company from said rubber company on June 20, 1923, was $200,272.99, and that, on account of plantation and other expenses, said trading company had expended approximately $40,872.26, against which it has received from said rubber company $20,000, and that therefore said rubber company owed said American Trading Company on June 20, 1923, approximately $221,145.25; that there was then in the hands of said trading company 325 bales of rubber unsold; that the proceeds of sales of rubber had been applied toward the reduction of the advances mentioned in said agreement; and that those advances had been reduced approximately $20,000. Other averments contained in said affidavits tend strongly to refute the estimated value of the properties of said rubber company as fixed by appellants in the complaint, and show further that, owing to the fact that rubber can be produced much cheaper in the Malay States, the enterprises of said rubber company in Mexico cannot be expected to produce a profit.

Appellants contend that said contract is in effect a mortgage given as security for the future payment of money, and that the provision therein authorizing a transfer of the title to the property in the event of a failure to make said payments is in the nature of a forfeiture and a waiver of the right of redemption, and therefore is illegal and cannot be given effect. Supporting this contention, appellants cite a number of authorities which declare the well-established rule that parties to a contract of mortgage cannot legally stipulate, at the time of the execution of said mortgage, that the mortgagor debtor shall not enjoy the right of redemption. Civ. Code, § 2889; Bradbury v. Davenport, 114 Cal. 598, 46 P. 1062, 55 Am. St. Rep. 92; Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 206 P. 674. But appellants concede it to be the law also that a mortgagor debtor, at any time after the execution of the mortgage, may, by a separate and distinct transaction, sell or release his equity of redemption to the mortgagee. Watson v. Edwards, 105 Cal. 75, 38 P. 527; 3 Pomeroy, Equity, § 1193; Phelan v. De Martin, 85 Cal. 365, 24 P. 725; McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 279, 19 P. 499.

[1] We are of the opinion that the transaction upon which this contract is grounded falls within the latter class. It is evident, we think, from the facts already narrated, that a lien existed against the properties of said rubber company several years before the date of the execution of said agreement of 1921. It first came into being when the mortgage was originally given to the Mexican bank, and that lien has never since been extinguished. In 1915 said trading company acquired all rights under said lien by the purchase of the said mortgage; the understanding at that time being, according to defendants' affidavits, that said mortgage should constitute a lien also for the payment of all other indebtedness due said trading company. In 1921, when said trading company was about to foreclose said mortgage, the agreement in question was made. Whatever equity of redemption may have previously existed was thereby released. It therefore becomes apparent that the execution of said agreement involved a separate and distinct transaction from the one under which the lien was created, and was entered into by said rubber company for the purpose of obtaining further extension of time, so that it might extinguish said lien and save itself from financial destruction. During the extension of time granted, however, said rubber company and its stockholders failed to perform the conditions of said agreement, and therefore are not entitled to restrain the operation of the terms thereof.

[2] Appellants next contend that said agreement should be declared void upon the ground that it was entered into under conditions not making for fairness and freedom from undue influence, and, moreover, "should be set aside at the option of a stockholder without any reason other than that it is his wish that it be set aside."

Those contentions are based mainly upon allegations in the complaint to the effect that the defendant Ward was a common director of the rubber company and the American Trading Company, and that, as a director of said rubber company, he exercised a dominating influence over two of the officers and directors of that company, thereby inducing them to enter into said agreement. There is no allegation in the complaint, however, that said contract is unfair in any respect, and the record shows that its execution was authorized by the board of directors of said rubber company at a meeting at which a majority was present, not including Ward; and, moreover, the agreement itself, when read in the light of the circumstances preceding its execution, shows, we think, that the result of the execution thereof operated to the benefit of said rubber company by granting to the stockholders thereof further time and additional opportunity to pay off its indebtedness and thereby save its property. The record further shows that the stockholders failed to take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded, and, although several stockholders' meetings were held thereafter, and a number of urgent communications were sent to them plainly describing the serious situation confronting them and urging that action be taken to pay off the indebtedness and redeem the property, apparently no such efforts were made; nor was the fairness or the validity of the agreement during that time ever challenged. On the other hand, during the period of said 18 months, said trading company, acting upon the faith of said agreement, advanced more money for the operation and maintenance of the rubber company's properties. It would therefore seem that, if said agreement be voidable upon the grounds urged by appellants, prompt notice of rescission should have been given and an offer made to restore said trading company to the status quo. It is our opinion that the facts of this case clearly distinguish it from those authorities cited and relied upon by appellants.

[3] Appellants further contend that said agreement provides "for the transfer of all of the assets and property of the corporation," and that said alleged transfer, not being authorized by two-thirds of the stockholders, is void under section 361a of the Civil Code. We believe this contention is disposed of by the case of Shaw v. Hollister Land & Improvement Co., 166 Cal. 257, 135 P. 965, wherein it was held that a sale of all the tangible property of a corporation without the consent of the stockholders is not in violation of said Code section. Furthermore, it would appear that the property of said rubber company was virtually disposed of before the execution of the agreement of December 20, 1921, by the creation of said liens against it, and that said agreement was made in furtherance of the operation of said liens.

[4] Lastly, it is contended that appellants are entitled to an accounting before said transfers of property may be consummated. Under a reasonable construction of said agreement, the implication seems clear, we think, that a final accounting was not contemplated in the event said rubber company failed to exercise its right within said period of 18 months to pay said indebtedness and redeem said property. As already stated, the affidavit of the defendant Ward shows that on June 20, 1923, the day following the commencement of this action, over $220,000 was due said trading company, and nowhere in the record does it appear that there has been an offer made to pay said indebtedness. Moreover, according to Ward's uncontradicted affidavit, an accounting was had up to within 6 months of the commencement of this action and the approximate total of receipts and disbursements since then is set forth. We think that the fact that a detailed accounting was not had for the period covering the 6 months immediately preceding the commencement of suit would not under any circumstances serve as legal grounds for enjoining the consummation of the transfers of said property in accordance with the plain terms of said agreement.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude that the trial court did not err in refusing to grant said temporary injunction.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

BLACKMER v. PIERCE. (Civ. 5270.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 24, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 925(2)—Where record showed no evidence in response to allegation, it will be assumed none was offered.

In action for balance due on sale of trees, where record did not show any evidence in response to allegation of answer to cross-complaint as to consent to sale to another, appellate court will assume no evidence was offered.

2. Trial $\S$ 397(3)—Absence of finding as to notice that seller could not make full delivery was not error, where such issue was not raised.

In action for balance due on sale of trees, absence of finding as to notice to buyer that seller could not make full delivery held not error, where pleadings did not raise such issue.

3. Trial ☞397(3)—Finding unnecessary on question whether buyer demanded delivery, where he failed to allege that seller could comply.

Where buyer of trees did not allege that seller had, at time of delivery, any trees measuring to calls of contract, court was not bound to make finding on allegation that buyer demanded delivery as per contract; it being immaterial.

4. Trial ☞397(3) — Finding unnecessary on question of performance of contract to sell trees when it was not in issue.

Where pleading of seller of trees was common count for goods sold and delivered, and contained no allegation of performance, and record did not show that answer to cross-complaint, which alleged performance, was on trial, or that any evidence was introduced as to such allegation, finding on such subject was unnecessary.

5. Appeal and error ☞694(1)—Sufficiency of evidence not decided, when evidence not before court.

Appellate court could not determine whether findings were supported by evidence, where evidence was not before it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Ezra A. Blackmer against R. E. Pierce. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bowker & Sheridan, of Ventura, for appellant.

Chas. F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover $3,316.20, alleged to be the balance due and owing to him for a lot of walnut trees sold and delivered. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings of fact and ordered judgment entered in behalf of the plaintiff as prayed. From that judgment the defendant has appealed, and has brought up the judgment roll.

From the pleadings it can be ascertained that the plaintiff is a nurseryman and engaged in rooting and grafting walnut trees. On the 18th of November, 1919, the defendant and plaintiff entered into a written contract for the purchase and sale of 5,000—

"Placencia Perfection walnut trees grafted on Royal Hybred black walnut root, the same now being situate on lot No. 118, Tapo ranch, for delivery spring 1921, for the price of $1.50 per tree; trees to be 8 feet and up, consecutively; trees to be free from insect pest or disease, and to pass county horticultural inspection. Twenty-five per cent. of the purchase price, or $1,875, at the time this contract is made and entered into, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged by seller, the balance when the trees are delivered. If from any cause beyond the control of the seller, such as damage by the elements, he is unable to make delivery of trees herein sold, upon return of the first payment hereinbefore mentioned to buyer the parties hereto shall mutually be released from the provisions of this agreement. * * *

[1, 2] On the 16th day of April, 1920, the parties entered into another contract to buy and sell other trees located on lot 118. The plaintiff's complaint, the defendant's answer, the defendant's cross-complaint and the plaintiff's answer to the cross-complaint each and all treat the dealings between the parties as one cause of action. In the defendant's cross-complaint it is alleged that the plaintiff delivered to the defendant 1007 walnut trees. It is not alleged that any objection was made by the defendant to any one of said trees, or that the defendant objected to accepting the said 1,007 trees. The appellant complains that—

"There is no finding by the court upon the issue that the sale by plaintiff of 400 of the 5,000 trees to be delivered under the contract dated November 18, 1919, to a person other than the defendant, was with defendant's consent."

There was no allegation on the subject in any other pleading than the answer to the cross-complaint. But the record before us does not show that any evidence was introduced in response to that allegation. In support of the judgment we must assume that no evidence was offered on the subject when as here the record is silent. The appellant then claims that—

"There is no finding of the court upon the issue that plaintiff at any time notified defendant that he could not make delivery in full under the contracts, or that he at any time returned or offered to return to defendant the money which defendant had advanced upon the contracts."

An examination of the pleadings discloses that the pleadings made no issue on that subject. There was neither allegation nor denial on the subject. Moreover it has not been made clear to us that the proper construction of the contract was to the effect that, if the seller could not make a full and complete delivery, then and in that event he was not called upon to make a delivery in part if he was able to do so.

[3] The appellant makes another point that—

"There is no finding upon the issue that defendant demanded of plaintiff the balance of 3,993 trees due under said contract dated November 18, 1919."

Turning to the contract, it is perfectly clear that the contracting parties were dealing regarding trees that were growing and which were not to be delivered until 16 or 17 months thereafter, and that it was only certain specified trees which would come within the calls of the contract. In the appellant's pleadings there is nowhere an allegation that the seller had at the time of delivery grown any trees which measured up to the calls of the contract. If he had not done so, it was an idle act on the part of the buyer to make a demand therefor. It cannot be assumed under these circumstances that the trial court omitted to make a finding on a material allegation; but, on the other hand, the allegation regarding a demand was under the facts as shown by the record an immaterial matter, and the court was not bound to make a finding thereon.

[4] Again, the appellant complains that—

"There is no finding of the court to the effect that plaintiff performed all of the terms and conditions by him to be performed under the contracts."

The plaintiff's pleading was a common count as for goods sold and delivered. It contained no allegation on the subject of performance, and therefore no finding was necessary. In the plaintiff's answer to the cross-complaint, the plaintiff alleged that he had done and performed, but the record does not show that the cross-complaint or the answer thereto were on trial, or that any evidence was introduced on the allegation referred to.

[5] The appellant then cites, under points 4, 5, 6, and 8, certain findings of the trial court, and claims that they are "erroneous." In his argument he seems to contend that those findings are not supported by the evidence. They may not be. We have no means of ascertaining the fact. The evidence is not before us.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Louis E. Ruppe against Lawson F. Utter. From a judgment for less than the amount sued for, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. Schreider, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lewis Cruickshank, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action brought by plaintiff against defendant for an accounting after dissolution of a copartnership.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff and defendant entered into and formed a partnership on the 24th day of May, 1915, for the transaction of a general undertaking, embalming, and funeral directing business. The partnership was known and designated as "Moneta Avenue Undertaking Company," and was situated at 4254 Moneta avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. The copartners were to share equally in the property and profits of said business. The partnership was terminated and dissolved on or about April 5, 1922. At the time of its dissolution there were accounts receivable, which it is alleged amounted to the sum of $36,000. These accounts were amicably divided between plaintiff and defendant, and do not enter into the controversy. There was also belonging to the partnership certain furniture, furnishings, fixtures, embalming tools, and implements, and stock in trade consisting of caskets, draperies, and supplies which plaintiff alleged to be of the value of $17,500, but which defendant in his answer claimed did not exceed in value the sum of $8,000.

This property was sold under the judgment or decree made by the court, and the funds derived therefrom, amounting to the sum of $11,146.26, were divided equally between the parties. This item is therefore also eliminated, so that the tangible property of the partnership is in no manner here involved. The remaining items in the complaint consist of the demand for an accounting of one-half of the proceeds or profits made by defendant in continuing the business with the use of the fixtures, stock in trade, and permit of the former copartnership after dissolution, together with the value of the leasehold and the good will thereof.

Trial was had and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff for the rental value of the use of the personal property which was fixed in the sum of $58.33 per month from the 6th day of April, 1922, to the 21st day of August, 1923, the date of the entry of the judgment, a period of some 16 months, making in all a total sum of $933.28. Appellant claims that, as the evidence shows that defendant retained the property of the partnership after dissolution, and continued to carry on the business with the use thereof at a profit, he should have been held to account for such profits.

It appears from the evidence that, after the parties had entered into the copartnership, they continued to transact business under their agreement up to April, 1922. The enterprise was a successful one, for in the year preceding the dissolution, according to plaintiff's testimony, the net profits thereof amounted to some $39,500.

The articles of copartnership provided, among other things, that, in the event either of the copartners desired to sell his interest in the business, he should give to the other copartner a 10-day option to purchase the same at the price and on the same terms as the interest might be offered to any third party. About March 25, 1922, the partners became dissatisfied with their association, and plaintiff, in conformity with the partnership agreement, addressed a written communication to defendant Utter advising him that he had been offered $30,000, excluding the book accounts, for his interest in the business, and that he would sell to Utter at that figure. In response to this offer Utter asked if plaintiff would purchase his interest for the sum of $25,000. Plaintiff agreed to do so, and procured a certified check for this amount to carry out this arrangement. Utter then refused to sell, whereupon plaintiff, on April 6, 1922, sold his interest to others for the sum of $30,000. On the same day he notified Utter of the sale.

It further appears from the evidence that Utter at first was willing to accept the purchasers as his partners, but later refused to have anything to do with them. Ruppe thereupon returned to them the purchase price, and received a reconveyance of their interest.

At the time of the dissolution of the partnership the firm owned a certain lease in the premises in which their business was being conducted, extending to and including the 31st day of March, 1923, at a monthly rental of $200. Utter remained in possession of these premises after the dissolution and there continued the undertaking business, and he used in the conduct of said business the personal property, including the furniture, furnishings, and stock in trade, and the like, of the former copartnership. Up to June 10, 1922, about 2 months after the dissolution, he kept the original sign over the doors in front of the establishment, and thereafter replaced it with another of practically the same import. At the time of the attempted transfer the landlord of the premises notified plaintiff Ruppe that any conveyance by him of his interest would be in violation of the terms of the lease justifying its cancellation. The lease contained a clause which precluded an assignment without the consent of the landlord in writing. The place where the property was located was zoned for the character of business conducted by the parties, and it was so conducted by them under a permit issued by the city council of the city of Los Angeles. About the 15th day of May, 1922, Utter, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, surrendered the permit and made application for, and was granted, a new one in his own name.

Under all these facts defendant characterizes himself as the sole owner of the business, for which reason he claims he was under no obligation to account to plaintiff for any of the profits derived from such business after the dissolution, but was only bound to account for the reasonable value of the use of the furniture and fixtures. The trial court took this view, and entered findings accordingly.

[1-3] The evidence does not warrant this conclusion. In the first place, the partnership lease was never terminated nor canceled. The notice given by the landlord was one merely to the effect that a transfer by Ruppe of his interest would work a forfeiture. None, however, was ever attempted to be declared. A covenant against subletting or assigning when violated by the lessee does not ipso facto terminate or render void the lease. The lessor has the option of declaring the same void or ignoring the breach and treating the lease as subsisting. Then, too, the notification merely stated that the landlord "shall expect to take" proceedings to cancel the lease. No such proceedings, however, were ever taken. Aside from this, it is well established that, where a lease runs to two lessees jointly, and there is a covenant not to assign without the consent of the lessor, the covenant is a joint one, and is not broken by the action of one of the covenanters in attempting to assign or sublet. Spangler v. Spangler, 11 Cal. App. 321, 104 P. 995; Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 590, 42 P. 976.

[4] The lease not having been terminated, any month to month arrangement effected by Utter with the landlord for the use of the premises inured to the benefit of Ruppe as well as defendant. Donleavey v. Johnston, 24 Cal. App. 319, 141 P. 229.

[5] With reference to the permit to conduct the business the evidence shows, as above narrated, that it was used by Utter up to May 16, 1922, at which time he surrendered it, and caused to be issued to himself a new one in his own name. It further appears that the new permit was obtained by representations that he was the sole owner of the business. He had no legal authority to make this change, and it amounted to no more than an attempt on his part to acquire a privilege, which, under the facts of the case, he was not entitled to.

[6-9] The evidence shows without conflict that Utter used the premises and personal property of the partnership, together with the permit to do business, as his own without right or warrant, and he should be made to account for all profits arising from such use. The leasehold interest, the permit to do business, and the good will of the partnership were as much assets as the fixtures which each partner was entitled to have converted into cash. 30 Cyc. 687, 697; Donleavey v. Johnston, supra. Good will is property recognized and protected by the law as such, and capable of sale and transfer from one owner to another. It is an asset which may be sold in connection with a business. How far its value might be affected by the competition of the retiring partner is an element, of course, to be taken into consideration in fixing of such value. 28 Corp. Jur. p. 735.

[10-12] There is no question that the good will of this concern had been a valuable one. For the year 1920 the business had yielded a net profit of $32,000, each of the partners receiving $16,000 as his share. The following year, and just prior to the dissolution, the business had yielded a net profit of $39,500, according to testimony of plaintiff. Nor is plaintiff's right to his share in this asset in any manner affected as claimed, or impaired by the fact that after the dissolution he formed other connections and advised his friends of this fact and solicited their business. This, as above indicated, he had a right to do. 28 Corp. Jur. 735. Defendant, of course, had the same right. In the exercise of this right, however, he was not authorized to prolong his possession of the assets of the firm for the purpose of continuing the business and deriving profits therefrom. Having done so, he must be held to account to his retiring partner for any profits so made. His right to the possession of the assets was merely for the purpose of winding up the partnership affairs. The trial court in confining the relief granted to the mere value of the use of the property, misconceived the effect of the evidence, and its finding under the facts narrated that defendant conducted the business for his exclusive benefit finds no support therein. Defendant occupied the position of a mere trustee. Having used the assets in question in conducting the business, he must be made to account for the profits derived therefrom.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Application by Claudeus Large for the probate of the will of Constance Berger, formerly Constance Diercken, deceased. From a decree admitting the will to probate, Ferdinand Louis Diercken and others, contestants, appeal. Reversed.

P. A. Bergerot and A. P. Dessouslavy, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Chas. J. Heggerty and Jno. W. Bourdette, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Cullinan & Hickey, of San Francisco, for Hynes.

WASTE, C. J. On November 6, 1911, Constance Berger, then Constance Diercken, executed a will leaving her entire estate to Claudeus Large, and appointing him sole executor. On May 6, 1913, she married Harry L. Boyle, from whom she was divorced on November 4, 1916. On March 8, 1918, she married Jean Baptiste Berger, who predeceased her on July 15, 1923. Mrs. Berger died January 4, 1924, leaving no issue. Upon her death Claudeus Large offered the will made November 6, 1911, for probate. The heirs at law of Mrs. Berger objected to its admission upon the ground that it was executed at a time when the decedent was an unmarried woman, and was revoked by her subsequent marriage to Boyle. The proponent and petitioner interposed a demurrer to the opposition, which was sustained without leave to amend. The court admitted the will to probate, and letters testamentary, without bond, were ordered issued to Claudeus Large. The heirs of Constance Berger have appealed.

[1-4] The sole question presented by the appeal is whether the will of Mrs. Berger was finally and completely revoked by her marriage to Boyle in 1911, at which time section 1300 of the Civil Code provided, "A will, executed by a woman, is revoked by her subsequent marriage, and is not revived by the death of her husband," or whether it was valid and governed by the section as amended in 1919 and in force at the time of Mrs. Berger's death in 1924. The amended section provides (Stats. 1919, p. 1239):

"If, after making a will, the testatrix marries, and the husband survives the testatrix, the will is revoked, unless provision has been made for him by marriage contract, or unless he is provided for in the will, or in such way mentioned therein as to show an intention not to make such provision; and no other evidence to rebut the presumption of revocation can be received."

The contention of the appellants is that the will was revoked eo instanti by the marriage to Boyle and could not thereafter be considered as having either a present or a potential existence. Respondent, in reply, takes the position that a will, being ambulatory in character during the life of the maker, is governed by the law in force at the maker's death, from which it follows, he argues, that under the provision of the statute in force when Mrs. Berger died, the will stood unrevoked and entitled to be admitted to probate. While the question thus presented is a novel one in this state, it has been many times considered in other jurisdictions.

Wills are ambulatory by their nature and create no rights which the court can recognize or enforce until they become operative by the death of the testator. "Acts which remain thus inchoate, * * * are in the nature of unexecuted intentions. The author of them may change his mind, or the state may determine that it is inexpedient to allow them to take effect." Moultrie v. Hunt, 23 N. Y. 394, 399; Goodsell's Appeal, 10 A. 557, 55 Conn. 171, 175. It is entirely competent for a statute to revoke by its provision a previously executed will. The right of any person to execute a will, as well as the form in which it must be executed, or the manner in which it may be revoked, are matters of statutory regulation. The power of the Legislature to limit the class of persons who shall be competent to make a will, or to declare that a change in the personal status of such persons after its execution shall operate as a revocation of the will, or be a sufficient reason for denying it probate, is unquestioned. In order to determine whether a will has been revoked, or whether after its execution there has been such a change in the status or personal relations of the maker as will in law effect its revocation, we have only to determine whether the changed condition is within the conditions named in the statute. In re Comassi, 40 P. 15, 107 Cal. 1, 4, 28 L. R. A. 414. When that is shown to be the fact, the law presumes that such a changed condition has been wrought in the life of the testator as to cause him to destroy or cancel a previous will. Sanders v. Simcich, 2 P. 741, 65 Cal. 50, 52. Section 1300 of the Civil Code, as enacted in 1872, read:

"A will, executed by an unmarried woman, is revoked by her subsequent marriage, and is not revived by the death of her husband."

It was amended in 1905 by substituting the words "executed by a woman" for the words "executed by an unmarried woman," the code commissioner saying:

"The purpose of the amendment is to apply the same rule to wills executed by married and unmarried women with respect to the revocation by subsequent marriage."

By the common law, a married woman had no power to make a will, and the marriage of a woman revoked any will that she had previously made. In re Comassi, supra. This rule has been very generally adopted as the common-law rule in the United States and has been re-enacted by statute in many states. Page on Wills, 1901, § 284. It does not rest alone upon mere presumption, but upon the material change which marriage works in the circumstances and condition of every woman and the new interests she sustains by the act of taking a husband. Schouler on Wills (6th Ed.) § 639. See, also, Kent's Commentaries, vol. 4, star page 521. The state of New York enacted a statute providing that the will of an unmarried woman was revoked by her subsequent marriage. 2 R. S. p. 64, § 44. In an early case involving the question we are now considering, the Court of Appeals of that state said:

"We concur in the conclusion reached by the surrogate that the will was revoked by the subsequent marriage of the testatrix. It was the rule of the common law that the marriage of a woman operated as an absolute revocation of her prior will. (Forse and Hembley's Case, 4 Co. 61.) The reason of the rule is stated by Lord Chancellor Thurlow in Hodsdon v. Lloyd (2 Bro. Ch., 534). He says: 'It is contrary to the nature of the instrument which must be ambulatory during the life of the testatrix; and as by the marriage she disables herself from making any other will, this instrument ceases to be of that sort, and must be void.' The rule that the marriage of a femme sole revoked her will was made a part of the statute law of this state by the Revised Statutes. (2 R. S. 64, § 44.) The language of the statute, that the will of an unmarried woman shall be deemed revoked by her subsequent marriage, is the declaration of an absolute rule. The statute does not make the marriage a presumptive revocation which may be rebutted by proof of a contrary intention, but makes it operate eo instanti as a revocation. (4 Kent, 528.) It is claimed by the contestants that the testamentary capacity conferred upon married women by the recent statutes in this state takes away the reason of the rule of the common law, and that upon the maxim cessante ratione legis, cessat lex ipse, the rule should be deemed to be abrogated. Upon the same ground it might have been urged at common law that the marriage of a femme sole should only be deemed a revocation or suspension of her prior will during the marriage, and that when the woman's testamentary capacity was restored by the death of her husband, leaving her surviving, the will should be revived; but the contrary was well settled. (Forse and Hembley's Case; 1 Jarman, 106; 4 Kent, 598.) But the courts cannot dispense with a statutory rule because it may appear that the policy upon which it was established has ceased. The married woman acts confers testamentary capacity upon married women, but they do not undertake to interfere with or abrogate the statute prescribing the effect of marriage as a revocation. It was quite consistent that the Legislature should have intended to leave the statute of 1830 in force although the new statutes took away the reason upon which it was based. The Legislature may have deemed it proper to continue it for the reason that the new relation created by the marriage would be likely to induce a change of testamentary intention, and that a disposition by a married woman of her property by will should depend upon a new testamentary act after the marriage." Brown v. Clark, 77 N. Y. 369.

McLarny, 47 N. E. 817, 153 N. Y. 416, 60 Am. St. Rep. 664.

The exact question was also considered by the Supreme Court of Illinois. The court said:

"If the statute of 1872 [declaring that a marriage shall be deemed a revocation of a prior will] is to have any effect at all, a marriage since its adoption, whether of a man or woman, must operate, per se, as a revocation of a prior will, and so we hold." McAnnulty v. McAnnulty, 11 N. E. 397, 120 Ill. 26, 60 Am. Rep. 552.

See, also, Hudnall v. Ham, 56 N. E. 172, 183 Ill. 486, 496, 48 L. R. A. 557, 75 Am. St. Rep. 124, and Ford v. Greenawalt, 126 N. E. 555, 292 Ill. 121, 125.

It was provided by section 3072, Hill's Ann. Laws, state of Oregon, that the will of an unmarried woman shall be deemed revoked by her subsequent marriage. In Booth's Will, 61 P. 1135, 66 P. 710, 40 Or. 154, the single question presented was whether the will of an unmarried woman was revoked by her subsequent marriage, and the court quoted approvingly from Brown v. Clark, supra, and affirmed the decree of the lower court refusing to admit the will to probate. In Pennsylvania, section 16 of the act of April 8, 1833 (P. L., 250), provided that "a will executed by a single woman shall be deemed revoked by her subsequent marriage." It was held that a will executed by a woman before marriage was absolutely inoperative as a will, her marriage having revoked it under the express language of the statute. Est. of Craft, 30 A. 493, 164 Pa. 520; Fidelity Trust Company's Appeal, 15 A. 484, 121 Pa. 1, 16. It would seem to follow from the foregoing authorities and others to the same effect which we could cite, that it is beyond dispute that both at common law, and under statutory enactments adopting the common-law rule that a will made by a woman shall be revoked by her marriage, the marriage of the woman produces absolute and complete revocation. Phaup v. Wooldridge, 14 Grat. (Va.) 332. If that is so, it would seem to also follow that the revocation is as complete as if made by the act of the testatrix, and the will cannot be given life and validity except by some testamentary writing executed and attested in the manner prescribed by law. See note to Graham v. Burch (49 N. W. 697, 47 Minn. 171) 28 Am. St. Rep. 339, 360.

[5] Notwithstanding the rule so clearly established by the authorities, respondent contends that revocation, like the will itself, is ambulatory in every case, and dependent for effectiveness upon the law in force at the time of the death of the testator. From this premise he argues that if, after the time an act is done which under the law in force at that time would have the effect of a revocation, the law is so repealed, or amended prior to the death of the testator as to deny the effect of revocation to the act, then the will is not revoked. Applied to the facts of the present case, respondent's contention is that because section 1300, supra, was amended after the marriage of Mrs. Berger (née Diercken) to Boyle in 1913 and before she died in 1924, in such manner as to make the survival of the husband, and failure to provide for him, the condition on which the will of testatrix is revoked, the will of Mrs. Berger was not in fact revoked at all. There are two answers to the contention. The first is that respondent is mistaken in his premise. Revocation being a "thing done and complete" is not in its nature ambulatory. The rules of law applicable to the reviving of wills revoked by the act of the makers are equally applicable to the reviving of wills revoked by act of the law, e. g., the effect of marriage; for in either case the will, being revoked, is of no effect until new life is given to it. Sawyer v. Sawyer, 52 N. C. 134. The principles laid down in the cases can be well expressed in the statement of a general rule that—

"Where a will is revoked in toto by act of the testator, or by operation of law, it is dead for all purposes, and no difficulty in determining the operation and effect of the revocation can arise." 40 Cyc. 1210.

When it is determined that the changed condition of the testator, as in this case the marriage, is within the condition named in the statute, the law will effect the revocation. In re Comassi, supra. When the contingency provided for by the Legislature becomes operative, the will is rendered dead as completely as if the testator had destroyed it by any of the means known to the law. Estate of Meyer. 186 P. 393, 44 Cal. App. 289, 295.

[6] The second answer to respondent's contention lies in the fact that it depends for its support upon a retroactive application of section 1300, as amended in 1919, some six years after the marriage of Constance Diercken to Boyle. That cannot be done. Section 1300, as amended in 1919, is not retroactive in terms. No indication can be gathered from it that the Legislature intended that it should be retroactive. Consequently we must regard the intention to have been that it should have only a prospective, and not a retrospective, operation. Estate of Frees, 201 P. 112, 187 Cal. 150, 155; 23 Cal. Jur. 629; Swan v. Sayles, 42 N. E. 570, 165 Mass. 177, 178.

Respondent has cited a number of authorities which hold that the law of the domicile of a testator at the time of his death prevails over that of the place of the execution of a will; but the question of the retroactive effect of an amended statute on a will previously revoked by operation of law is not involved in the cases. Daniels on the New York Law of Wills, § 403, is cited as holding that a determination as to whether a propounded instrument was revoked by marriage is controlled by the law in force at the time of the decedent's death, and not by the law as it existed at the time when the instrument was executed. He says:

"If a change is made in the statute, the will of a person who died after the change went into effect is governed by the new law, unless there is some provision therein which limits its application."

No one will dispute the accuracy of the rule, if there is a valid will, unrevoked, and existing at the time of the death of the testator. The author rests his assertion on decisions of the New York Supreme Court dealing with the statute providing that a man's will should be deemed revoked if the wife or issue of the marriage should be living at the death of the testator. Among them are: Matter of Dexter, 189 N. Y. S. 366, 116 Misc. Rep. 17; Matter of Cutler, 186 N. Y. S. 271, 114 Misc. Rep. 203; Matter of Coburn, 30 N. Y. S. 383, 9 Misc. Rep. 437; Matter of Gaffken, 187 N. Y. S. 255, 114 Misc. Rep. 693. They expressly hold that the statute they construe was not retroactive. Mr. Daniels could not have intended his declaration to have application to the provision of the New York law that "a will executed by an unmarried woman shall be deemed revoked by her subsequent marriage," for in the section dealing with that subject he says (section 398): "The will of the unmarried woman becomes a nullity immediately upon her subsequent marriage." We deem it unnecessary to take the time to distinguish the authorities relied on by respondent. We have been cited to no decision from New York, or other jurisdictions, holding that a will finally revoked is revived by a subsequently enacted statute changing the manner of revocation. As holding a contrary view, see Smith v. Clemson, 6 Houst. (Del.) 171, 180.

Other contentions made by respondent, affording opportunity for argument by analogy, are not sufficient to overcome the conclusion we have reached that the will made by Mrs. Berger (née Diercken) on November 6, 1911, was revoked eo instanti by her marriage to Henry L. Boyle on May 6, 1913. Consequently it was not entitled to be admitted to probate.

The order appealed from is reversed.

WRIGHT v. RODGERS et al. (S. F. 11179.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1926.)

1. Damages §78(6)—Agreement for stipulated damages for breach of real estate contract not void, unless it is penalty or fixing of actual damage is practicable.

Agreement to pay stipulated sum in damages for breach of contract for sale or exchange of realty is void only when in nature of penalty, or within inhibition of Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671, because fixing of actual damages is neither impracticable nor extremely difficult.

2. Damages §78(6)—Matters considered in determining whether agreement for stipulated damages is for penalty, stated.

In determining whether agreement to pay stipulated sum in damages for breach of contract for sale or exchange of realty is agreement for penalty, parties' intention, and whether agreement is in nature of things a penalty, though language declares it to be liquidated damages, must be considered.

3. Damages §77—Intention clearly declared in agreement that sum fixed shall be liquidated damages controls.

Intention, declared in agreement for exchange of realty, that sum fixed shall be liquidated damages for breach, controls, in absence of ambiguity or uncertainty.

4. Damages §78(2).

If provision in contract fixing damages for breach is penalty, no expression to contrary would change it into liquidated damages.

5. Damages §79(5)—Provision fixing damages for breach of contract to exchange realty valid because of presumed impracticability of fixing actual damages (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671, 3387, 3389).

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 3387, 3389, provision in contract to exchange realty fixing damages for breach is valid as within exception to section 1670 in section 1671; impracticability of adequately measuring actual damages being presumed.

6. Damages §163(3)—Nonsuit in action for liquidated damages for breach of realty exchange contract held erroneous (Civ. Code, §§ 1671, 3306, 3307, 3387).

Plaintiff having proved express contract sued on for payment of liquidated damages for breach of agreement to exchange realty, his readiness and ability to perform, and defendant's breach, was entitled to benefit of presumption, under Civ. Code, § 3387, that breach could not be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation to make out prima facie case under section 1671, and court erred in granting motion for nonsuit, though presumption is disputable; defendant having offered no evidence of damages under sections 3306, 3307.

7. Damages §79(5)—Statute as to determination of damages by breach of contract to convey realty does not affect validity of provisions for liquidated damages, where actual damages cannot be adequately measured (Civ. Code, §§ 1671, 3306, 3307, 3387).

Civ. Code, §§ 3306, 3307, as to ascertainment of detriment by breach of agreement to convey realty, did not eliminate section 3387, as to presumption of impracticability of adequately measuring damages, nor affect validity of agreements, in such cases for liquidated damages under section 1671.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benjamin K. Knight, Judge.

Action by W. E. Wright against Joseph Rodgers and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. F. Stafford, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sans & Hudson, of Watsonville, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendants after an order granting their motion for a nonsuit. The action was one commenced by the plaintiff to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract entered into between plaintiff and defendants for an exchange of their respective pieces of real estate, and incidentally for the transfer by defendants to the plaintiff of certain specified items of personal property upon or used in connection with the real estate which said defendants had agreed to convey. This contract was in writing and bore date as of December 27, 1922. On or about January 23, 1923, none of said properties having in the meantime been transferred, the defendants notified said plaintiff of their refusal to make said exchange of properties or to be bound by or to perform the terms and conditions of said agreement. The contract between the parties as finally executed contained the following provision:

"Ninth. The parties hereto do hereby further bind themselves, their heirs and assigns, unto each other, in the sum of $2,200.00 to be paid by the party failing to keep and perform the covenants and agreements herein contained and specified, unto the other party hereto, said amount hereby being agreed upon as settled and liquidated damages for such nonperformance."

Upon the refusal of the defendants to carry out or perform or be bound by the terms of said written agreement, the plaintiff brought this action for the recovery of the sum of $2,200 as liquidated damages pursuant to the foregoing clause in said agreement, and in his complaint alleged that he sought such recovery for the reason that it would be and was and is impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damages sustained by the parties to said contract, and that he was therefore entitled to sue for and recover said sum as liquidated damages and not as a penalty. The defendants answered said complaint, denying the execution of said agreement as to that portion thereof relating to liquidated damages, and also denying the averments of the plaintiff as to his ability to perform said agreement in a number of specified particulars. They also denied the plaintiff's averments to the effect that it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damages for the breach of said agreement, and in that behalf averred that the value of the respective properties of the parties was readily and easily determinable, and that any damage suffered by either party through a breach of said contract could be easily determined. They further denied that the plaintiff had suffered any damage by reason of their refusal to keep or perform the terms of said agreement. The defendants also presented a cross-complaint seeking affirmative relief, but its averments on the issues raised thereby are not involved in the questions presented upon this appeal. Upon the trial the plaintiff offered said written agreement in evidence and also gave testimony as to his ability and offer to perform the same and of the defendants' refusal to be bound thereby. He, however, offered no evidence as to any actual damages suffered by him by reason of the defendants' failure and refusal to be bound by or to perform said agreement, nor did he tender any evidence other than that of the terms of the agreement itself as to the impracticability or difficulty in the way of fixing the actual damages arising from the breach of said agreement. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony he rested his case; whereupon the defendants moved for a nonsuit upon several enumerated grounds, the first of which was that the provision in said contract for the payment of liquidated damages was void. This was the only ground of said motion discussed upon the hearing thereon, and the action of the court in granting the same was evidently predicated upon the proposition that the plaintiff, having failed to make proof of any actual damages as a result of the defendants' breach of said agreement, had not made out a case. The only question raised or discussed upon this appeal is as to the correctness of the court's ruling upon said ground of nonsuit.

[1-5] An agreement between the parties to a contract for the sale or exchange of real estate for the payment of a stipulated sum in damages in the event of the breach of said contract on the part of either is not necessarily void. It is only so when (1) it can be determined that such agreement is in the nature of a penalty and not an agreement for liquidated damages, or (2) when it can be determined that the agreement for liquidated damages is one which comes within the inhibition of sections 1670, 1671, of the Civil Code; that is to say, it is an agreement for the fixation of the amount of damage to be paid in anticipation of the breach of a contract when from the nature of the case it would be neither impracticable nor extremely difficult to fix the actual damage. The first question which arises in this case is as to whether or not the particular agreement of the parties embraced in the clause of their contract for the exchange of properties above set forth is an agreement for a penalty. If it is, it is conceded to be void. In the determination of this question two things are to be considered: First, whether it was the intention of the parties to the agreement that the sum fixed upon as damages for the breach thereof by either should be a penalty; second, whether such agreement is, in the nature of things, a penalty, regardless of the language of the agreement declaring it to be "liquidated damages." In the clause in said agreement here under review, the parties have clearly manifested their intention that the sum fixed therein as damages should be liquidated damages, and in the absence of any ambiguity or uncertainty in its terms this declared intention should control in so far as the intent of the parties is concerned. 17 Corpus Juris, p. 966, and cases cited; Madler v. Silverstone, 104 P. 165, 55 Wash. 159, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1; Calbeck v. Ford, 103 N. W. 516, 140 Mich. 48. This brings us to the second contention, which is whether the said provision is, in the nature of things, a penalty. If it is, then no expression in the agreement that it should be otherwise regarded would be controlling, since the parties could not, by their agreement so to do, change that which is by nature a penalty into liquidated damages. We look, therefore, to the agreement between the parties as a whole for the purpose of determining whether that portion thereof which undertakes to fix in advance the damages to either party caused by its breach by the other is to be regarded as a penalty for such breach. The contract between the parties is one for the exchange of their respective real properties. Had this contract been one by which one of the parties thereto was to buy the real property of the other, the question as to whether the clause therein providing for liquidated damages in the event of a breach thereof would present little difficulty. There was confusion in the earlier decisions of this court touching this subject, due, apparently, to the fact that the parties to such agreements had stipulated that in the event of failure on the part of the purchaser to continue his installment payments on account of the purchase price the seller might cancel the contract and declare a forfeiture of the payment made thereon as liquidated damages. In the case of Drew v. Pedlar, 25 P. 749, 87 Cal. 443, 22 Am. St. Rep. 257, this court declared that a stipulation in such a contract that the purchase money paid should be taken as liquidated damages for the breach of the contract by the purchaser is void under sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code. This decision was followed for a time, but in the case of Glock v. Howard, 55 P. 713, 123 Cal. 1, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, the question was made the subject of an exhaustive review by the learned writer of the main opinion in that case, wherein the several sections of the Civil Code bearing upon the subject were examined and the case of Drew v. Pedlar, supra, reviewed and limited, and the conclusion was arrived at that contracts for the purchase and sale of real property came fairly within the exception to section 1670 of the Civil Code embraced in section 1671 thereof. The writer of the opinion was led to this conclusion by a consideration of sections 3387 and 3389 of the Civil Code, which read as follows:

"Sec. 3387. It is to be presumed that the breach of an agreement to transfer real property cannot be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation, and that the breach of an agreement to transfer personal property can be thus relieved."

"Sec. 3389. A contract otherwise proper to be specifically enforced, may be thus enforced, though a penalty is imposed, or the damages are liquidated for its breach, and the party in default is willing to pay the same."

These sections of the Civil Code apparently re-enact the common-law rule regarding contracts for the sale of real property, as well as the rule in equity permitting the specific performance of such contracts. 17 Corpus Juris, supra. It is true that the case of Glock v. Howard, supra, presents the singular situation of an evenly divided court as to the particular ground upon which the judgment should be reversed, but the case is so well reasoned that it has notwithstanding become a leading case and has been so often cited with approval that the statements both of the main and of the concurring opinion may be taken as stating the settled law of this state touching the validity of agreements of the character considered therein and of the rights of the respective parties to recovery thereunder. We are unable to perceive that there is any distinction to be drawn between contracts for the purchase and sale of real property and contracts for the exchange of real property. If there is any such distinction, it should be in favor of upholding the clause in the latter providing for liquidated damages in the event of a breach thereof, for the reason that as to both parties the property sought in exchange is real property, to which the principle of pretium affectionis applies, and to which, also, the presumption as to the impracticability of adequately admeasuring damages, referred to in section 3387 of the Civil Code, is to be given application.

[6, 7] Having thus determined that the clause in the contract of the parties hereto relating to stipulated damages was a valid and binding obligation, we come to the trial of the cause. The plaintiff offered in evidence the contract between the parties for the exchange of their respective real properties bearing date as of December 27, 1922; and also offered in evidence the letter written on behalf of the defendants dated January 20, 1923, declining to go further with the transaction. He also offered himself as a witness on his own behalf, and testified that he was the owner of the property which he had proposed in said agreement to exchange for the defendants' said real estate, and that he had always been ready and willing to perform the portion of the agreement of December 27, 1922, to be by him performed. No other testimony was offered. When the plaintiff rested his case, the defendants moved for a nonsuit upon several grounds, but upon the first and chief ground that the provision in said contract providing for liquidated damages for a violation thereof was void. The other grounds of said motion need not be considered, since they refer to matters of defense. The order of the trial court in granting said motion clearly indicates that the first ground urged was the ground upon which the trial court acted in granting the motion for nonsuit. We are of the opinion that the trial court was in error in granting said motion. The plaintiff having brought his action upon an express contract for the payment of money in the form of liquidated damages for the breach of an agreement for the transfer of real property, and having produced in evidence what we have herein determined to be a legal and binding obligation for the payment of the sum of money for which suit was brought, having shown the defendants' breach of the agreement of which such obligation formed a valid part, and having testified that he was ready, able, and willing to perform said agreement, was entitled to the benefit of the presumption provided for in section 3387 of the Civil Code to make out a prima facie case. It is true that such presumption is a disputable presumption and that the defendants might have offered evidence to overthrow it by a showing in conformity with the provisions of sections 3306 and 3307 of the Civil Code which point out the method for the ascertainment of the detriment caused by a breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property. These sections of the Civil Code were not, however, intended to eliminate section 3387 thereof, nor were they designed to provide that agreements for liquidated damages in the case of breaches of contracts to convey real property should not in proper cases be brought within the exception set forth in section 1671 of the Civil Code. They were obviously intended to point out the kind of proof to be presented in actions brought to recover the actual damages caused by a breach of such agreements and also probably to point the sort of proof to be presented in an attempt to overthrow the disputable presumption embraced in section 3387 of the Civil Code. The defendants herein did not, however, see fit to avail themselves of the form of proof provided for in said sections of the code. They rather chose to rest their case upon a motion for nonsuit, the effect of which would be to not only leave the presumption above referred to undisputed, but also to leave the plaintiff in a position to claim that the agreement for liquidated damages when aided by said presumption was a valid and enforceable agreement. In other words, the plaintiff had made out a prima facie case.

The motion for nonsuit was therefore improperly granted, and hence the judgment based thereon was erroneous. It is therefore reversed.

7. Partnership $\hookrightarrow$ 329—Evidence introduced at interrupted hearing on cross-complaint for partnership accounting held to require complete hearing.

In action for moneys expended for defendants, evidence introduced before interruption by court at hearing on cross-complaint, alleging partnership and asking accounting, held such as to require complete hearing had.

8. Account $\hookrightarrow$ 12—Action at law held probably unauthorized until complete accounting between parties.

In action for money expended for defendants, where notes evidencing first two counts were part of larger transaction giving rise to unliquidated larger part of account, to which third count was addressed, action at law was probably unauthorized until accounting of all of parties' affairs as prayed in cross-complaint.

9. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 671(4)—Without explanation of erasure from, or evidence of circumstances attending execution of, contract, Court of Appeals cannot determine parties' intention if not as evidenced by contract.

Where erasure from contract of name of port from which court found that vessel was to be towed was not explained by either party, and no evidence was offered as to circumstances when contract was written, Court of Appeals cannot ascertain parties' intentions if different from those evidenced by face of contract.

10. Money paid $\hookrightarrow$ 1—Payments for another held not improper, in absence of evidence of lack of good faith.

In action for moneys expended for defendants, payments of customs duties and salaries held not improper charges, in absence of evidence of lack of utmost good faith in making them.

Whether parties occupied relation of trustee and beneficiary partners, or joint adventurers, utmost good faith is required.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by N. R. Vail and another against the Pacific Fish Products Company and others, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, all parties appeal. Reversed.

Kemp & Clewett and H. S. Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for appellants and respondents.

Meserve & Meserve and Stephens & Stephens, all of Los Angeles, for respondents and appellants.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants and alleged their claims in three common counts, each being for moneys laid out and expended for the defendants. The defendants answered, and in their answer, first, they denied each of the allegations contained in each count in the plaintiffs' complaint; second, to each count they interposed a separate defense to the effect that the subject-matter of that particular count in plaintiffs' complaint was a part of a larger transaction, to wit, a copartnership enterprise between the plaintiffs and the defendants as copartners; third, the defendants pleaded a defense to the effect that the subject-matter of all the counts contained in the plaintiffs' complaint was a part of the subject-matter of a larger transaction, to wit, said copartnership, and pleaded the facts constituting the copartnership and the business transactions had thereunder down to the 24th day of December, 1918, at which time the copartnership was dissolved; that during the existence of said copartnership the plaintiffs received large sums of money for the account of the defendants, and have refused to apply them as provided in the partnership agreement, and that an accounting should be had; fourth, defendants then pleaded seven counts against the plaintiffs, each being for a different claim for moneys alleged to be due and owing to the defendants by reason of transactions had between the parties under the alleged copartnership agreement. The defendants closed their answer with a prayer that an accounting be had, etc. The plaintiffs answered the cross-complaint, and thereafter the cause came on for trial before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a general verdict and many special verdicts. The verdicts were incorporated in a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants in the sum of $16,086.30, from that judgment the defendants have appealed and have brought up a bill of exceptions. From the same judgment the plaintiffs have appealed and have joined in bringing up the same record to support their appeal.

When the cause was called for trial it was stipulated between counsel that the special defense, to the effect that the plaintiffs and the defendants were copartners and that no accounting had ever been had, and that therefore no action could be maintained by one copartner against the other until such an accounting had first been had, should be tried by the trial court sitting without a jury and before calling a jury to try the other issues. Thereupon the following documents, parts of which we have italicized, were offered and received in evidence:

"Defendants' Exhibit No. 1.

"This agreement, made this 17th day of March, 1917, by and between the Pacific Fish Products Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, party of the first part, and N. R. Vail and W. D. Coberly, parties of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas, the party of the first part is the owner of the floating cannery John G. North, owning the same free and clear of all incumbrances; and

"Whereas, the party of the first part agrees to furnish to the parties of the second part a good and sufficient surety bond in the sum of $10,000 for the faithful performance of this agreement; and

"Whereas, said ship has been fully equipped with all of the machinery and appliances necessary for canning the products to be obtained in the enterprise hereinafter provided for, which said equipment is owned by the party of the first part and is all fully paid for; and

"Whereas, the party of the first part is free of debt to any person or corporation; and

"Whereas, the parties of the second part control the power schooner Vaquero:

"Now, therefore, it is understood and agreed that:

"First. Said floating cannery shall be towed to a point in Mexican waters to be selected by the parties hereto by the schooner Vaquero and there placed in operation and continued in operation at said point or at such other points as the parties hereto may agree upon, for the period of ten years from the date hereof, unless the enterprise be abandoned as hereinafter provided.

"Second. The parties of the second part hereby agree to deliver to the party of the first part sums up to ten thousand dollars ($10,000), said sums to be hereinafter designated as the Vail fund. Said fund shall be paid to the party of the first part as needed for said enterprise such portions thereof as may be required for payroll and local expenses at the point of operation of the cannery, in cash, such portions thereof as may be required by furnishing transportation in and towage by said schooner Vaquero at the rates hereinafter provided, and also such portion thereof as may be required by the expenditure thereof, in the purchase of cans, labels, shook, supplies required in the operation of the cannery, and also a stock of merchandise and supplies to be used for trading purposes. All of said merchandise and supplies and those thereafter purchased for the party of the first part shall be billed to it at cost to the parties of the second part.

"Third. The parties of the second part agree during the term of this contract to transport upon said schooner Vaquero the cans, shook, supplies and merchandise required in the enterprise, and the canned product, and the party of the first part agrees to deliver the same to said schooner for transportation upon the following basis:

"(a) While the operations of the cannery are conducted at a point no further distant from Port Los Angeles than Magdalena Bay, the said Vaquero shall, if such service is required by the cannery, visit the cannery at least once every two weeks, and for the freight carried the party of the first part shall pay to the parties of the second part transportation charges as follows:

"I. For all north-bound freight, at the rate of $10 per ton weight or measure (i. e., on the basis of weight of 2,000 pounds to the ton or on the basis of measurement treating 40 cubic feet as equivalent to a ton), the weight or measure basis as applied to the various classes of freight in each cargo shall be applied at the option of the parties of the second part.

"II. For all south-bound freight, at the rate of $9 per ton weight or measure defined and applied as aforesaid, provided, however, that the measure basis shall not apply to empty cans or shook which are to be carried on a straight weight basis of $9 per ton.

"III. If operations are carried on at a point further distant from Port Los Angeles than Magdalena Bay, the calls shall be made less frequently and the transportation charges shall be raised, all raises to be based upon the charges hereinbefore provided for, upon a fair pro rata increase.

"IV. A charge of $1 per nautical mile shall be paid by the party of the first part to the parties of the second part for the towage of the cannery.

"(b) The title to all merchandise, supplies, canned product and freight delivered to said schooner Vaquero shall pass to parties of the second part as soon as it is so delivered, whether it be the canned product to be carried on the north-bound voyage, or whether it be the supplies, merchandise, etc., to be carried on the south-bound voyage, but is understood that the parties of the second part may from time to time waive the benefit of such arrangement for any definite period or periods, provided, however, it is understood and agreed that the parties of the second part are to be under no liabilities if loss or damage to any of said property results from fire, piracy, theft, riot, insurrection, the acts of God or the public enemy, or the perils of the sea.

"(c) It is understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the parties of the second part will cause all freights, both south-bound and north-bound, to be insured against marine loss and the premium on said insurance to be charged to operating costs of the enterprise.

"(d) The parties of the second part shall have the right to divert, from time to time, or permanently, from the enterprise the schooner Vaquero, if they provide during the period of diversion adequate means of transportation in lieu of the Vaquero.

"Fourth. The canned product which the party of the first part agrees in every case to deliver to the parties of the second part for transportation northward, as aforesaid, shall after its delivery into the United States, be sold by the parties of the second part, using all reasonable diligence to obtain the highest market price and best advantage, and selling directly to brokers, or at the option of the parties of the second part, it may be delivered to Frank Van Camp of Los Angeles, to be sold by him, and the money as received by the parties of the second part or the said Frank Van Camp, as the case may be, shall after the deduction of transportation charges due parties of the second part and subject to the provisions hereinafter made for certain cases, be paid over to the treasury of the party of the first part.

"It is further agreed that all bills, invoices and vouchers and records of all parties are to be subject to the inspection of other parties hereto.

"Fifth. After the delivery of the first pack to the parties of the second part and the transportation thereof to Port Los Angeles, the parties of the second part agree to loan and advance such further sums as may be required for the use of the enterprise up to the amount of $15,000, provided the value of the pack so delivered at Los Angeles is $15,000 or more; but if the value be less than $15,000 then the advances shall be only made up to the value thereof. All returns derived from the sale of said pack and of all future packs shall be collected by and retained by the parties of the second part until such additional advance has been repaid with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The arrangement provided for in this paragraph may be renewed from time to time if the proper financing of the enterprise requires renewals.

"Sixth. The net profits of the enterprise shall be divided between the parties hereto, the party of the first part receiving two-thirds thereof and the parties of the second part receiving one-third thereof. The net profits shall be arrived at by ascertaining the gross receipts which shall consist of all money collected from all products sold, including the proceeds of the sales of merchandise from the cannery store, and from such total shall be deducted the cost of operation, which shall be made up of a salary of $250 per month paid to J. E. Heston while he acts as the manager of the cannery in the place of operation, a salary of $150 per month to be paid to the said W. D. Coberly while he is working for the enterprise, all wages paid to laborers and mechanics in the cannery and to fishermen, the sums paid for sea products, for merchandise, supplies and transportation and the cost of ordinary repairs to the appliances of the cannery, to be paid to local officials or authorities or to holders of fishing concessions in Mexico and for dockage and premiums if any paid for insurance on the cannery, pack and supplies shipped, or any of them, and sums paid out in selling the pack, including payments to agents, jobbers or brokers as commissions, if required.

"Seventh. Before any net profits, however, are divided between the parties hereto, there shall be accumulated a fund of $10,000 hereinafter referred to as the 'working capital,' which said fund, together with said Vail fund, shall be kept in the enterprise undistributed until the final liquidation of the enterprise. It is understood and agreed between the parties hereto that the $10,000 working capital provided for in this paragraph shall be held in reserve for the purpose of purchasing additional equipment in the way of boats, barges, fishing equipment and gear that may be needed in the further development of this enterprise to increase its output, it being understood that the title to such equipment shall be taken by the parties hereto as tenants in common, the one-third in the parties of the second part and the two-thirds in the party of the first part.

"Eighth. If at any time prior to the full term of this contract said enterprise proves a failure or it is demonstrated that a continued operation of the enterprise will result in a loss, either party hereto may require a liquidation of the enterprise and a termination of this agreement; and upon such liquidation the ship cannery, together with the equipment with which it is now equipped, shall be withdrawn from the enterprise by the party of the first part, and all of the other assets of the enterprise, including the Vail fund, the working capital, the pack unsold, outstanding accounts, supplies, merchandise and extra equipment aside from the present equipment of the floating cannery, shall be divided between the parties hereto, the one-third thereof to the parties of the second part and the two-thirds to the party of the first part. In the event, however, that if when the time arrives for said division, the parties of the second part shall not have received by way of division of net profits a sum equal to the advancements made to said Vail fund, and have not received out of collections the further advances made against a pack, as provided for in paragraph 5 hereof, then in that event, before any division of assets is made, said additional advancements shall be fully repaid, and the difference between the amount of said Vail fund and the amount,

if any, received by the parties of the second part by way of net profits, shall be paid to the parties of the second part; and in any of such cases the parties of the second part shall have a lien upon all said assets and the right of possession thereof to convert said assets into money and apply the same to the satisfaction of such sums to which the parties of the second part are first entitled.

"Ninth. In the event that through the failure of the enterprise said Vail fund cannot be restored to the parties of the second part, either by way of net profits or as provided in the foregoing paragraph, there shall be no liability on the party of the first part to repay the same.

"Tenth. The party of the first part shall strictly comply with all pure food laws of the United States and with the various states of the Union in the canning and labeling of all sea food packed.

"Eleventh. It is understood and agreed that this arrangement shall not constitute the parties hereto partners in the said enterprise, or in any branch thereof.

"Twelfth. In the event that neither party hereto is prevented or delayed in the performance of any condition, covenant or agreement herein contained by reason of strikes, boycott, fire, piracy, theft, riot, insurrection, the acts of God or the public enemy, or the perils of the sea, then such delay or prevention shall be excused.

"Thirteenth. It is further understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the party of the first part shall enjoy all privileges, rights and freedom of operation necessary or convenient in said enterprise under any concessions, licenses, privileges or grants from the Mexican government or authorities, or from the Cia Industrial Mexicana S. A. (a Mexican corporation), granted to the parties of the second part, or their agents, paying to the parties of the second part, however, the cost to the parties of the second part of said rights and the royalty accruing by reason of its operations to the grantor thereof, if any. In the event that the parties of the second part operate or authorize others to operate other enterprises under such rights a fair pro rata charge based upon relative productions shall be made to the party of the first part. [Corporate Seal.] Pacific Fish Products Co., by John E. Heston, Pres., Stanley P. Allen, Secretary. N. R. Vail. W. B. Coberly.

"Defendants' Exhibit No. 2.

"This agreement, made this 17th day of March, 1917, by and between the Pacific Fish Products Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, party of the first part, and N. R. Vail and W. B. Coberly, parties of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas the parties hereto are this day entering into a contract with respect to Mexican fishing, etc., now therefore, as part of the same transaction, it is understood and agreed:

"First. Parties of the second part shall have the right to withhold the schooner Vaquero, or any other vessel which they put into service for the transportation and towage provided in said contract, when they deem the political conditions locally in Mexico or international to be such as to make the voyage to Mexican waters dangerous or hazardous to the vessel in use or to be such as to lead the parties of the second part to believe that the voyage might result in the destruction, detention or confiscation of the vessel.

"Second. That the agreement of the parties of the second part contained in said contract to furnish transportation and towage is subject to the right of the parties of the second part to be relieved therefrom in case of the commandeering of the vessel in service by the government.

"Third. That all towage shall be done at the risk of the party of the first part.

"Fourth. That the party of the first part is indebted to the Van Camp Sea Food Company in the sum of nine hundred thirty ($930.00) dollars.

"Fifth. That instead of selling directly to brokers as provided in paragraph 4 of said contract, the parties of the second part may sell directly to the trade or through brokers. The brokerage (including any selling charge made by Frank Van Camp or his corporation) shall be paid out of the proceeds of the sale. [Corporate Seal.] Pacific Fish Products Company, by John E. Heston, Pres., Stanley P. Allen, Sec'y. N. R. Vail. W. B. Coberly."

"Defendants' Exhibit No. 3.

"This agreement, made this 11th day of May, 1917, by and between the Pacific Fish Products Company, a corporation, party of the first part, and N. R. Vail and W. B. Coberly, parties of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas on the 17th day of March, 1917, the parties hereto entered into a contract with respect to fishing operations;

"And whereas the parties of the second part claim to have loaned and delivered to the party of the first part sums in the form of money delivered, drafts paid, and supplies and equipment purchased and furnished all in addition to the $10,000 fund provided for in said contract, and the $3,000 note given to the parties of the second part on March 21, 1917, which said excess is hereafter referred to as the 'disputed fund,' which said disputed fund the parties of the second part claim is an obligation due and owing them from the party of the first part, but whereas the party of the first part claims that there is no obligation on which to repay said disputed fund, and the parties hereto desire to compromise their differences with respect to said disputed fund;

"And whereas funds are required to further prosecute the fishing and canning operations and it is desired to obtain more funds for said purpose:

"Now therefore it is agreed that the parties of the second part shall and do hereby extend to the party of the first part a credit of seven thousand dollars ($7,000) to be disbursed as hereinbefore provided, and in consideration thereof the party of the first part delivers to parties of the second part its promissory note bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable at maturity, the principal of said note being payable at four months from this date; said credit shall be paid out by the parties of the second part, firstly in liquidation of outstanding accounts not yet paid but incurred by the parties of the second part in the purchase of supplies for the cannery, and next to the payment of the now outstanding drafts drawn for the expenses of the cannery and then upon written orders or O. K. of any officer or director of the party of the first part in purchasing the supplies or equipment, furnishing transportation, obtaining boats and fishermen, and in furnishing cash to J. E. Heston for the operation of the cannery and in purchasing equipment. All of said expenditures, payments and purchases, however, to be first subject to the approval of the parties of the second part or the approval of either of them.

"Said W. B. Coberly shall forthwith proceed to the cannery and remain there and assist in the attempt to fill the cans which are now there, and if when the said $7,000 credit has been exhausted the said Heston and Coberly shall reach the conclusion that the results at the cannery justify a further expenditure up to $3,000, the parties of the second part agree to extend a further credit and advancement to the party of the first part up to $3,000 to be expended and disbursed in the same manner as is herein provided for the expenditure and disbursement of said $7,000. Provided, however, that there shall be no obligation on the party of the first part to repay said further credit up to said $3,000 except that the parties of the second part are hereby given a first claim and lien upon all packs from said cannery until said $3,000 has been repaid out of the proceeds of packs, and the parties of the second part are hereby authorized to apply the proceeds from the sale of packs as collected in liquidation of said further credit, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from dates of expenditure to date of payment. Similarly the parties of the second part may apply the proceeds of said sale to the payment of said $7,000 note or any portion or portions thereof. The date of maturity of said $3,000 note given March 21, 1917, is hereby extended to date four months from the date of this agreement.

"In consideration of the premises said disputed account is hereby compromised upon the following basis:

"The parties of the second part waive all claims against the party of the first part for the repayment thereof except out of the proceeds of future packs, and the party of the first part gives to the parties of the second part a lien and charge upon future packs for the repayment of said disputed fund, together with the right to apply the proceeds of future packs to their satisfaction thereof. [Corporate Seal.] Pacific Fish Products Company. [Signed.] Pacific Fish Products Company, Frank Van Camp, V. P., Stanley P. Allen, Secy. N. R. Vail. W. B. Coberly.

"Defendants' Exhibit No. 4.

"Dated December 20, 1917.

"The Pacific Fish Products Company, party of the first part, and N. R. Vail and W. B. Coberly, parties of the second part, do hereby make the following amendments and additions to the contract between them dated March 17, 1917, with respect to a fishing enterprise in Mexico:

"(1) It is agreed that the open account, with interest at 6 per cent. (6%) per annum, of the party of the first part in favor of the parties of the second part, amounts to $4,631.76 over and above the $10,000 Vail fund referred to in the main contract.

"(2) It is further agreed that the equipment account for money expended in equipping the cannery in favor of the parties of the second part amounts to $4,500 over and above the $10,000 Vail fund referred to in main contract, and open account above referred to.

"(3) The party of the first part agrees to execute and deliver to the parties of the second part their promissory notes of $4,500 and $4,631.76, above referred to, dated December 20, 1917, and payable July 1, 1918, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, upon the surrender to them of two promissory notes for $3,000 and $7,000 respectively, executed by first party and dated March 17 and May 11, 1917. It being understood and agreed that the exchange of notes as herein stated shall take place as soon as it is ascertained that the floating cannery is to return to Mexico under this agreement.

"(4) The operations in the preparation of the cannery for the next season's pack are to be suspended until the parties have been notified that a Mexican concession for next season's operation has been obtained.

"(5) The party of the first part agrees to finish the equipment of the floating cannery as soon as the concession above referred to is obtained, and the parties of the second part agree to advance the funds for same which is to be charged to the $20,000 account hereinafter provided for, and the salaries of Coberly and Heston shall commence as soon as concession is granted.

"(6) The parties of the second part hereby arrange a credit with the Vail Company of $20,000 in favor of the party of the first part; said sum to be disbursed, however, in the manner provided and for the purposes provided in the main contract for the $10,000 Vail fund, except that no expenditures shall be made by the Vail Company except upon the written order or O. K. of the party of the first part or one of its officers; and provided, further, that in all disbursements due care is to be exercised to make all purchases at the best market price and the same to be billed to first party at cost to second party.

"(7) The party of the first part hereby gives to the parties of the second part its promissory note in the sum of $20,000 to represent, and in consideration of the obtaining of such credit with the Vail Company. But in the event that the party of the first part should not use all of said credit, then the amount remaining thereof is to be paid over by the Vail Company to the parties of the second part and credited upon the $20,000 note. The $20,000 note is to bear interest at 6 per cent. per annum, and is to be payable on or before July 1, 1918. But interest shall stop when partial payments are made thereon, and interest shall only run on the items of payment out by Vail Company on account of said credit from the respective dates of payment.

"(8) As long as the cannery remains in operation upon a profitable basis of operation, the parties of the second part agree from time to time to extend the payment of such notes during such period. But upon the termination of such operation and the liquidation of the enterprise whenever it should occur, the said notes shall, at the option of the parties of the second part, immediately mature, notwithstanding any previous extension thereof.

"(9) First, the $4,531.76 open account note, and, second, the $4,500 note for the equipment account above mentioned, shall be repaid to the parties of the second part out of the first profits of future packs, even though these profits are available before the date of maturity of the notes. But interest on the amount of the note so paid shall in each case cease to accrue. In the event that the enterprise is abandoned at a future date, as provided in the main contract, then all outstanding accounts, money, packs, and other assets of the party of the first part, other than the John G. North and its cannery equipment, shall be applied as follows:

"First. To the repayment of the $20,000 note or any part thereof then unpaid.

"Second. To the repayment of the open account note of $4,631.76, or any part thereof then unpaid.

"Third. To the repayment of the Vail fund of $10,000.

"Fourth. To the payment of the equipment note of $4,500 above mentioned, or the balance thereof remaining unpaid.

"(10) But if the Vail fund cannot be repaid as provided in the preceding paragraph, or if the same be so paid only in part, then the party of the first part shall not be liable for its return and it shall be considered lost to the parties of the second part; however, this does not relieve the party of the first part from any liability on their notes or other obligations excepting the Vail fund.

"(11) Frank Van Camp is hereby appointed by the parties of the second part as the exclusive selling broker for future packs, and he shall have the right to appoint subbrokers, and for his services, or for the services of the subbrokers, as the case may be, he is to receive a total of 6 per cent. of the selling price, which shall include all of his selling expenses of every character. And the party of the first part agrees on behalf of said Van Camp that he will faithfully, promptly, and efficiently dispose of each pack, using all due diligence to obtain the best market therefor.

"(12) The salary of W. B. Coberly, while he is engaged in assisting the enterprise, shall be the same as that of Heston, as provided in the main contract. And in this connection it is understood and agreed that while operating in Mexican waters the said Heston shall have exclusive and final authority on all questions which relate to the catching of fish, the canning of the same and the operation of the cannery, and that while there Coberly will render such assistance to him as he may direct as said Coberly can furnish with due regard to the other duties of Coberly. Coberly shall have the final and exclusive authority in dealing with the Mexican authorities and officials in all matters pertaining to imports and exports under the concessions from the government.

"(13) It is understood and agreed that this agreement is made for the express purpose of going ahead with the enterprise; and if the concessions above referred to are not obtainable then this agreement, except as hereinafter provided, shall be deemed not to have been entered into and shall be null and void, and the rights of the parties and their respective obligations, whatever they may be, shall be as they exist on the date of this agreement and shall in no way be impaired or altered by this agreement.

"(14) The freight rate for operations carried on at San Lucas Bay shall be the same as that provided in the main contract for operations at Magdalena Bay, while the Vaquero is in the service, but not otherwise.

"(Ink addition):

"(14½) It is further agreed to send a fishing boat to Cape San Lucas, as soon as permit is granted, for the purpose of finding out whether fishing conditions there warrant the return of the floating cannery to Mexican waters.

"(15) The parties of the second part agree to loan immediately to the owners of at least five good fishing boats under contract with the party of the first part for fishing in the Mexican operations for next season, and also for United States operations for the period of one year, or to the end of the 1918 fishing season, the loans to be in no case in excess of $2,500 on each boat with interest at 7 per cent. per annum unless the character of the boat and owner justifies, and the loans are to be secured by a mortgage as a first lien thereon. And the party of the first part is to procure for the parties of the second part insurance from the Tuna Packers' Association to the limit of the said association, and in case the coverage under the policy on any boat does not extend to the full amount of the loan, then any surplus above the insurance is hereby guaranteed by the stockholders of the party of the first part in proportion to their respective holdings of stock, all as set out following the names of each appended to this agreement. But if the loans on fishing boats or any of them herein provided for shall be made before the cancellation of this contract, as hereinbefore provided, nevertheless such cancellation shall not release the said guarantees; in such case the party of the first part agrees upon demand of the parties of the second part to transfer the fishing contract with such fishermen to the parties of the second part: All to the end that said loans shall be properly protected and the value thereof utilized.

"In witness whereof, the party of the first part has caused its corporate name seal to be hereunto affixed by its duly authorized officers, and the parties of the second part have hereunto set their hands the day and year first above written. The Pacific Fish Products Company, by John E. Heston, Pres. Attest: Stanley P. Allen, Secretary. N. R. Vail. W. B. Coberly.

"The undersigned stockholders of the Pacific Fish Products Company, each owning and holding the number of shares of stock in said corporation set opposite his or its respective name, do hereby execute this agreement: First, for the purpose of approving and ratifying the same as such stockholders; and, second, for the purpose of guaranteeing, in proportion to their respective holdings of stock, the surplus loans above the insurance on the boats, as provided in paragraph 15 of this contract. T. E. Heston, John E. Heston, owning 180 shares of stock. Douglas F. Allen, by Stanley P. Allen, Atty. in fact, owning 100 shares of stock. Stanley P. Allen, Frank Van Camp, for Van Camp Sea Food Co., owning 220 shares of stock.

"The undersigned, Stanley P. Allen, in consideration of the execution of the foregoing contract by the parties of the second part therein named, and for the purpose of introducing them so to do, does hereby guarantee that the said Douglas F. Allen, his son, will perform each and every obligation binding upon him by reason of the execution by the said corporation, of the foregoing contract and any of the instruments therein referred to, and by reason of the execution of the guaranty above mentioned with respect to fishing boats. Stanley P. Allen.

"Defendants' Exhibit No. 5.

"This agreement, made this 15th day of February, 1918, by and between Pacific Fish Products Company, party of the first part, and N. R. Vail and W. V. Coberly, parties of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas the party of the first part requires more money for the contemplated voyage to Mexico for further fishing operations than the funds already provided, the parties of the second part lend to the party of the first part five thousand dollars ($5,000), and the party of the first part gives to the parties of the second part its promissory note for such amount.

"And in the event that it shall be determined after operations in Mexico that the success of the packing operations justifies the parties of the second part in lending to the party of the first part a further sum, then in that event the parties of the second part agree to lend to the party of the first part a further sum up to 75 per cent. of the value of fish then actually in cans at the cannery or in transit, such sums to be used in the purchase of supplies, etc., and furnishing for transportation in the furtherance of the enterprise [ink addition] such advances to take the place of loans provided for in main contract of May 17, 1917.

"It is agreed that the John G. North shall be towed to San Lucas Bay by the Northfork, on the basis of two hundred dollars ($200) per day for each day in excess of the average running time between Port ~~Los Angeles~~ San Diego and Magdalena Bay, consumed in towing the John G. North to San Lucas Bay.

"The parties of the second part are directed to pay for such towage out of the consideration for the five thousand dollar ($5,000) note above mentioned.

"If there is any profit in the hauling of any return freight on the Northfork under an arrangement which may be made with the owner thereof for the return trip, the party of the first part shall have the benefit thereof.

"When the party of the first part has freight needed to be carried in the operation of the enterprise, it agrees to give to the parties of the second part at their Los Angeles office notification thereof and the quantity thereof, to the end that arrangements may be made or ships obtained to handle the same, within a reasonable time thereafter; but should the parties of the second part in response to a request made by the party of the first part, furnish the Vaquero or any other vessel to carry freight, and should it occur that, by reason of the small amount thereof, either through miscalculation of the party of the first part or otherwise, there should be a loss to the parties of the second part upon the trip upon which such freight is carried, which loss would not have occurred had the freight both ways been adequate to fill the ship, then the party of the first part will stand the loss, the same to be charged as a cost and expense of the enterprise. [Corporate Seal] Pacific Fish Products Co., by John E. Heston, President, Stanley P. Allen, Secretary. N. R. Vail. W. B. Coberly, by N. R. Vail."

[1] In addition to the foregoing, some correspondence was offered and received in evidence, and thereupon the trial court read Defendants' Exhibits 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and then remarked, "I think I will not go any farther but simply hold that these people are not partners." Thereupon the defendants objected to the introduction of any evidence by the plaintiffs in support of their case, because the agreement between the parties showed that they were copartners, and no copartner can maintain an action against another until an accounting has been had. The defendants, for the same reason, offered the same showing in support of a motion for judgment in favor of the defendants for costs. "The Court: The objection is overruled, and your motion is denied." Thereafter the jury was called in, and the court proceeded to hear the evidence on the issues presented by the plaintiffs' complaint and the answer of the defendants thereto. The first point assigned by the defendants is that the trial court erred in the rulings above set forth because the indentures quoted showed that the parties were partners. Chapman v. Hughes, 104 Cal. 302, 37 P. 1048, 38 P. 109. The plaintiffs have replied that under the facts the parties were not partners. Lyden v. Spohn-Patrick Co., 155 Cal. 177, 180, 100 P. 236.

[2-5] Although the respective contentions of counsel are interesting, we are not at liberty to pass on the question as to whether the parties were or were not partners. The cross-complainants were attempting to show that fact. They had introduced in that behalf only a part of their evidence. They were interrupted by the ruling of the trial court. Conceding that the evidence introduced at the time of the interruption did not show the parties to be partners, it cannot be known what relation would have been shown to exist when all of the evidence of the cross-complainants had been introduced. Moreover, assuming for the purposes of this decision that such evidence would not have disclosed the relation to be that of partners, it does not follow that the cross-complainants should have been denied the relief which they were asking. The evidence which had been introduced, weighed in the face of a motion for a nonsuit, must be taken most strongly in favor of the cross-complainants. Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 158 Cal. 596, 112 P. 53. As to whether it showed the relation to be that of partners we will concede at once is debatable. Nevertheless, it showed the relation to be of a fiduciary nature. Again, conceding that the relation shown was not that of partners, as that expression is used in our statute (Civ. Code § 2395 et seq.), there is yet another relation, that of joint adventure, which is sometimes designated a limited partnership. Keyes v. Nims, 43 Cal. App. 1, 184 P. 695; 33 C. J. 839. Many of the passages which we have italicized are the ordinary earmarks of a joint adventure contract. 33 C. J. 839, §§ 5, 6, 7, 12, 14, 16, 68, 79, 83, and 92. The fact that the cross-complainants asked relief on the theory that the parties were partners did not preclude the trial court from giving them relief on the theory that the parties were joint adventurers. Butler v. Union Trust Co., 178 Cal. 195, 172 P. 601.

[6, 7] For the same reason that we may not at this time determine whether the relation existing between the parties was that of partnership, we cannot determine whether it was that of joint adventurers, nor can we determine that one party was acting as trustee for the other. The proof introduced by the appellants before they were interrupted tended to show that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover all of their advances—that the recovery of a substantial amount of those advances was by the terms of the contracts contingent on the result of the success of the enterprise. That result could not be known till an accounting was had. If, on a full hearing, it transpired that an accounting should be had, then it follows that in the meantime no action at law should be maintained by the plaintiffs to recover those unascertained and unmeasured sums. As far as we are at liberty to go, in view of the condition of the record, is to state that the evidence which the cross-complainants had introduced was of such a nature that the hearing on the cross-complaint should not have been interrupted until a full and complete hearing had been had thereon. Butler v. Union Trust Co., supra.

[8] In what we have said we are not unmindful of the rule that when balances have been completely ascertained an action at law can be maintained in some instances by the trustee or the beneficiary. 2 Perry on Trusts, § 843; 33 C. J. p. 866, § 83; Gleason v. White, 34 Cal. 258. And in this connection we have not overlooked the fact that the first and second counts of the plaintiff's complaint are each alleged to be evidenced by certain promissory notes. However, it will also be noted in this connection that each of those notes was but a part of a larger transaction and part of which is evidence by Defendants' Exhibit No. 5, supra. Moreover, the cross-complaint sought an accounting of all of the affairs between the parties. Assuming that each $5,000 promissory note constituted a rest or a balance, nevertheless it is equally clear that the third count was addressed to the unliquidated, unascertained and unsettled larger portion of the account existing between the parties. As the record stands the subject-matter of the first count, of the second count, and of the third count was so interwoven with the main transaction that at this time it appears that an action at law was probably not authorized until an accounting between the parties had first been had.

Worms v. Lake, 120 Misc. Rep. 210, 198 N. Y. S. 861.

The most of the remaining points presented by the parties grow out of certain matters that arose by reason of instructing the jury. As we have held that the trial court should have heard the application of the cross-complainants for an accounting, it is not likely that the same questions will arise again. For that reason those points need not be determined at this time.

[9] The record discloses that the parties disagreed in construing the written contracts which they had executed. One instance of disagreement arose as to the meaning of Defendants' Exhibit 5 in so far as it purports to state the compensation to be paid for towing the John G. North to San Lucas Bay. The paragraph in question contains an erasure. The erasure was not accounted for by either party. No evidence was offered regarding the circumstances that existed at the time the contract was written, and the record does not show from where the John G. North was to be towed. The trial court construed the contract as providing for towage from Port Los Angeles to Magdalena Bay. One party asserts that the name Los Angeles was stricken out, and, consequently, the construction adopted by the trial court was error. The other party contends that the trial court inadvertently used the name "Los Angeles" when it should have used the name "San Diego." It is patent that this court cannot in this condition of the record ascertain the intentions of the parties if such intentions were different from those evidenced by the face of Defendants' Exhibit 5; nor can this court fully understand said passage in the absence of the information above referred to.

[10] Much of what we have said regarding the last item applies also to the items of expenditure which were made in payment of the alleged custom duties which the plaintiffs claim to have paid to a Mexican official, and to the several items charged by the plaintiffs as salary paid to another Mexican official purporting to be for compensation for inspection by said official but which services the defendants claim were never rendered. We do not understand the defendants to claim that the moneys were not paid out. We do understand them to claim that the moneys were paid under such circumstances that said payments were "purely gratuitous" and therefore not chargeable against the defendants. Molloy v. Rourke, 83 Conn. 196, 76 A. 517.

[11] Whether the parties occupied the relation one to the other of trustee and beneficiary, partners or joint adventurers, the utmost good faith is required of the trustee in whom confidence is reposed (Jones v. Kinney, 146 Wis. 130, 131 N. W. 339, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 200, 202, note); but the appellants did not introduce evidence showing any lack of the utmost good faith by Mr. Coberly in making the payments. As the record stands, we cannot say that any of the payments made to Mexican officials were not proper charges in behalf of the plaintiffs.

The judgment is reversed; and the defendants appealing to recover their costs.

EPSTEIN v. GRADOWITZ et ux.
(Civ. 5271.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 28, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨939—Request to clerk for transcript presumed filed in time where record did not disclose contrary (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 1963).

Though judgment was entered August 15th and request for clerk's and reporter's transcript was not made till December 1st, where record did not indicate date of notice of entry of judgment, appellate court will, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, presume section 953a, providing request must be made within 10 days, was complied with.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1).

Immaterial conflicts in findings will be disregarded, where judgment was supported by findings which were sustained by evidence.

3. Equity ⇨57—In view of equity maxim as to regarding that as done which should have been done, one partner cannot recover from another on note after having failed to surrender it as he had agreed (Civ. Code, § 1541, 3203).

Where one partner agreed to surrender note in consideration of another assuming certain partnership debts, but failed to surrender it, he cannot recover thereon, since equity will regard that as done which should have been done, despite Civ. Code, § 3203, requiring renunciation to be in writing, and section 1541, as to extinguishment of obligation by release.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Benjamin F. Warner, Judge.

Action by Louis Epstein against Meyer Gradowitz and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Hall and E. F. Gerecht, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Everett Brown, of Los Angeles (Edward Winterer, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action upon a promissory note.

[1] The respondent objects to consideration of the appeal, stating that the request to the clerk for clerk's and reporter's transcript was filed too late. This notice was dated and filed December 1, 1922. The record shows that the judgment was entered August 15, 1922. There is nothing in the record to indicate the date upon which plaintiff was served with notice of entry of judgment. Section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the notice to the clerk requesting transcript must be filed within 10 days after notice of entry of judgment. Because there is nothing in the record to disclose the contrary, we must presume that the proceeding before us is regular and that the request to the clerk was filed in time. Section 1963, Code Civ. Proc.

The plaintiff brought an action upon a promissory note for $2,450, executed and delivered by the defendants. The defendants answered, setting up that there was no consideration for the note; that there was a complete failure of consideration for the same; that plaintiff is not the legal owner and holder thereof; and that said note should have been returned to the defendants. Defendant Meyer Gradowitz set up a separate and affirmative defense and with relation to the facts therein alleged the court found: That the plaintiff and defendant Meyer Gradowitz were copartners in a wholesale produce business from January, 1921, to September, 1921, under the firm name of Gradowitz & Epstein; that said Gradowitz had invested $1,169.40 in said business and executed the note in dispute to equalize his interest in the business with that of his partner; that in September, 1921, the said business was indebted $4,300 and plaintiff sold his interest therein to one Cohn, who became a partner with Gradowitz under the firm name of Gradowitz & Cohn; that at the time of said sale, plaintiff canceled the note in dispute and agreed to deliver it to said Gradowitz and that said Gradowitz and Cohn agreed to pay and did pay the debts of the former partnership in the sum of $4,300; and that plaintiff failed and neglected to return to Gradowitz the note.

[2, 3] A large part of the argument made for reversal of the judgment grows out of the fact that the findings of the court were made by reference to paragraphs of the pleadings. This is always an unsatisfactory method of drawing findings, and inaccuracies and conflicts are frequent when such method is adopted. It was found that certain paragraphs of the complaint and of the answers of the different defendants and of the amended answer and of the separate defenses were true. As alternative defenses were set up in the answers, the findings present some conflicts and obscurities. However, appellant cannot avail himself of these matters. Where immaterial conflicts occur in the findings, and the judgment is supported by findings which are abundantly sustained by the evidence, the others will be disregarded. Butler v. Delafield, 1 Cal. App. 367, 372, 82 P. 260; Wheat v. Bank of California, 119 Cal. 4, 7, 50 P. 842, 51 P. 47. All of the findings in the instant case are in favor of the defendants. The court practically found that every defense set up against the note was true. Some of these defenses were alleged in the alternative and negative some of the others. However, appellant is not injured by this inconsistency, because if any of the defenses against the note are sustained by the evidence, the judgment is proper. This court may accept the finding that plaintiff is not the holder of the promissory note, but that said note is the property of defendants. That is in consonance with the detailed finding hereinbefore quoted that by agreement of the parties, said note was to be surrendered and delivered to defendants. The mere accident that plaintiff retained physical possession of the note cannot alter the rights of the parties. There are no innocent holders involved and equity will regard that as done which should have been done. If plaintiff neglected to deliver the note to defendants after agreeing to do so, he cannot take advantage of that fact.

Plaintiff meets this situation by invoking the aid of sections 3203 and 1541, Civil Code. We fail to see how either section changes the determination of this action. The former section relates to the discharge of a negotiable instrument and provides that a renunciation must be in writing, unless the instrument is delivered up to the person primarily liable thereon. The latter section provides that an obligation is extinguished by a release therefrom given to the debtor by the creditor, upon a new consideration, or in writing, with or without a new consideration.

With reference to section 3203, respondent urges first that the instrument involved here is not negotiable, because of its peculiar wording. We are not called upon to decide this point, however. The answer of defendant Meyer Gradowitz alleged, and his testimony was to the effect, that plaintiff agreed to surrender the note upon consideration of being released from payment of the partnership debts and that when asked to do so, he, apparently, made an attempt to find the note and stated that he could not find it and that it was lost. Under well-established principles, in such a situation, plaintiff will be held to do the thing which he agreed to do, and for which he accepted a valuable consideration. For the same reason section 1541 is inapplicable. Plaintiff agreed to release defendants from the obligation of the note, and this agreement carries with it an obligation to do everything necessary to accomplish the result, legally. It was an agreement made upon a new consideration, i. e., that plaintiff be released from the partnership debts. Because the plaintiff did not perform his agreement does not render the agreement void. Appellant loses sight of the controlling fact that defendants' affirmative defense in this action is, in effect, a proceeding to compel plaintiff to keep his agreement to surrender and cancel the note after having accepted and enjoyed the consideration for such agreement.

There are a number of alternative matters urged by appellant, but we think the foregoing disposes of the appeal and that further discussion of the record is unnecessary. There are conflicts in the evidence, of course; but we are concerned only with the portion of the record which supports the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Witnesses $\S$ 388 (10)—Question to accused's alibi witness, for impeachment, whether witness stated that he drove automobile at time of robbery, held defective as to element of place, but not prejudicial (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

3. Criminal law $\S$ 448(2), 1170½(2)—Question whether alibi witness had not related all details to another held to call for conclusion, but not prejudicial error on denial by witness.

In prosecution for robbery, question, for impeachment, to accused's alibi witness, whether he had not told another in a certain conversation all of the details of the holdup, was objectionable as calling for conclusion of witness; but not prejudicial error, in view of witness' positive and consistent denial of knowledge of holdup or the making of any statements concerning it.

5. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 824(8)—Admission of impeaching evidence not reversible where no limiting instruction asked.

Admission of testimony to impeach accused's alibi witness held not ground for reversal because of possible inference that jury may have misused such evidence, where accused requested no instruction to limit consideration of evidence to impeachment purposes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

James E. Hovermale was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Homer C. Mills, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. James Hovermale and Roy Smith were charged jointly with the crime of robbery by an indictment returned by the grand jury of Los Angeles county. The prosecution proceeded with the trial against Hovermale in the absence of Smith, who at that time had not been apprehended. From the judgment of the court upon a verdict of guilty, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant Hovermale prosecutes this appeal.

From the record it appears that on the evening of November 7, 1923, between the hours of 7:40 and 8, a Pasadena Short Line car of the Pacific Electrical Railway Company was boarded by three men at Valley Junction, a stopping point in a sparsely settled section of Los Angeles city. Immediately upon the car getting under way one of the trio passed rapidly through the car to the front platform, the other two remaining on the rear platform. A few minutes after the car had started, and while the conductor was occupied in collecting fares, a report was heard similar to that of an exploding track torpedo. The conductor immediately turned to go to the rear platform but was confronted by one of the two men, who had boarded the car at the last stop, with a revolver and a command "hands up." About the same time the man who had passed to the front of the car was seen pointing a revolver at the motorman. The third one of the trio proceeded immediately through the car relieving passengers of their money and jewelry. When the bandits began their operations, it was first noticed that all three of them had dark-colored handkerchiefs tied across their faces, covering the nose and lower portion of the face. The bandit who covered the conductor seemed to be the one who directed operations, as he gave commands to the conductor and passengers as well as directed the work of the one who was relieving the passengers. He was described as a young man weighing about 150 pounds, standing five feet six inches to five feet seven inches in height. As it was the theory of the prosecution that this one of the trio was in fact the defendant Hovermale, we will not give space to a detailed description of the other two bandits. After the passengers had been relieved of their valuables, the operation occupying 10 or 15 minutes, the motorman was ordered to slow down his car, and thereupon all three bandits left the car and disappeared in the darkness.

The defense offered by the defendant was that of an alibi. Appellant does not urge, as a ground of appeal, the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. His contentions for a reversal of the judgment are based upon: First, alleged errors committed by the court during the trial in the admission of certain testimony; second, errors committed by the court in giving certain instructions and in refusing instructions requested by the defendant; and, third, misconduct on the part of the district attorney during his argument to the jury.

[1] Considering the points in the order named, our attention is directed to certain questions propounded by the district attorney in the cross-examination of one C. R. Godfrey, a witness produced on behalf of the defendant, and whose testimony was given by deposition. The question objected to, as well as practically all of the questions propounded to the witness in cross-examination, were for the purpose of impeachment. The first one of the questions objected to, as well as the answer, is as follows:

"Q. Do you know one H. W. Fifield? A. I do.

"Q. Did you not state to H. W. Fifield early in January or February, 1924, that you drove the machine at the time of the Pacific Electric holdup on November 7, 1923? A. No."

[2] To the latter question the defendant objected on the ground that "it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial hearsay, and if intended for impeachment purposes no proper foundation has been laid, and it is intended to impeach on an immaterial matter." The court overruled this objection, and the defendant now assigns that ruling as error. The witness in his direct examination testified that the defendant Hovermale was his brother-in-law, and that on November 7, 1923, between the hours of 6 and 11 o'clock p. m., during which time the alleged robbery took place, the defendant with his family was visiting with the witness at the witness' home in Monrovia. The question objected to was for the purpose of impeachment and was both relevant and material. It is, however, urged that no proper foundation was laid for impeachment purposes. As to the elements of time and persons present we feel the objection is without merit. Plass v. Plass, 122 Cal. 4, 54 P. 372. As to the element of place the question was defective, and this leads to the inquiry as to whether or not the ruling of the court operated to the detriment of the defendant. The deposition of the witness Godfrey contained a number of questions propounded by the district attorney in cross-examination, relating to this alleged conversation between the witness and one H. W. Fifield. These questions were manifestly for the purpose of impeachment. Some of the questions asked and answers given were allowed to be read to the jury, and the objections to others were sustained by the court. All of the questions asked of the witness by the district attorney relating to an alleged conversation with Fifield were answered by the witness by a denial that he ever had any such conversation in which he either related any of the details or circumstances of the robbery or that he himself participated in it. We cannot conceive how the witness could have been misled in any way in answering the question under consideration by the fact that the particular place where the conversation was claimed to have taken place was omitted from the question. His answers were so unequivocally in the negative as to any such conversation, and the subject-matter was of such an unusual and serious character, that it is inconceivable that the witness either would have forgotten such a conversation if he had had it, or that, under the circumstances, he would have given any other answer than the one given even though a place was fixed in the question. The witness was defendant's brother-in-law. His testimony on direct examination was the strongest presented on the part of the defense in support of the defendant's alibi. The witness had positively and definitely stated that the defendant was visiting with him at his home at the time of the robbery. To have admitted, after giving such testimony, whatever the form of the question, that he had told Mr. Fifield anything that would have in fact positively rendered ineffective his direct testimony, seems quite beyond the bounds of reason. Considerable latitude has been recognized by the authorities in this state in the framing of questions of this character. People v. Bosquet, 116 Cal. 75, 47 P. 879; Plass v. Plass, 122 Cal. 5, 54 P. 372. Furthermore, section 4½ of article 6 has a direct bearing upon the point under consideration, and when so viewed, we have no hesitancy in concluding that the error complained of was not such as to justify a reversal.

[3, 4] The defendant next urges that the question:

"Did you not also tell H. W. Fifield in the same conversation, at the same time, all of the details of the Pacific Electric holdup? And also say to him that James Hovermale held a gun on a motorman?"

The defendant next urges that the question calls for the opinion and conclusion of the witness and the overruling of his objection to the question was prejudicial error. While the first question does call for a conclusion of the witness it was one of a series of questions that had been propounded on cross-examination and relating to the time, place, and incidents of the alleged holdup. As previously stated, these questions were all propounded, in cross-examination, for the purpose of laying the foundation for impeaching the witness. To each and all of the questions so propounded to the witness on cross-examination he gave negative answers. He consistently and positively denied any knowledge of the holdup, or of having made any statements concerning the same or any purported details of it to Fifield, or that the defendant Hovermale had been involved in it. Appellant cites, in support of his contention on this point, the case of People v. Nonella, 99 Cal. 333, 33 P. 1097. An examination of this case clearly shows that it is not in point. There the court held, and this is very apparent from reading the opinion, that the questions asked of the wife of the defendant, which served as a basis for the impeaching testimony offered later, differed very markedly from the questions that were asked of the impeaching witness and which constituted the error. Likewise, the case of People v. Morotti, 61 Cal. App. 689, 215 P. 719, cited by the appellant, is not in point. There the attempt to impeach the complaining witness was by the introduction of a written statement signed by the aunt of the complaining witness and a county probation officer, which statement purported to give the conclusion of the signers of what the complaining witness had told the signers some days previous to the trial. Without extending the review to other authorities which we have examined bearing upon this point, we are of the opinion that the ruling of the court, upon the objection that the question asked for the conclusion of the witness, was not a prejudicial error, and as to the other portion of the question the ruling was not in error.

[5] It is next urged by the defendant that the admission of the testimony of one H. W. Fifield which purported to give an entire conversation with C. R. Godfrey was highly prejudicial to the defendant. This testimony was offered by the district attorney for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the witness Godfrey, who had testified in direct examination on behalf of the defendant that the defendant, his brother-in-law, with his family, were visiting at Godfrey's home at the time of the robbery. The court, in overruling the defendant's objection and admitting the testimony, clearly stated that it was admitted solely for the purpose of impeachment. But appellant urges that the jury might, and in effect did, consider this testimony as bearing directly on the question of defendant's presence at, and participation in, the robbery. It may be admitted that jurors untrained in legal matters may not grasp the points of differentiation in the rules of evidence, and, further, jurors may intentionally or ignorantly permit evidence to influence them in the consideration of the defendant's guilt in a manner contrary to the instructions of the court. But this inference, for manifestly it is nothing more than an inference, does not destroy the right to have evidence introduced for a limited purpose. This, indeed, is quite common in both civil and criminal actions, and when the case is being tried before a jury, the possibility that the jurors may make improper use of the evidence is usually met, by the party likely to be affected, with a requested instruction from the court directing the jury to consider the admitted evidence only for the purpose for which it was admitted. We have carefully examined the record in this case and do not find any request made by the defendant, of the court, to instruct the jury that the testimony of Fifield could only be considered by them for the purposes of impeachment of the testimony of one Godfrey. Manifestly, where no such instruction was requested, the defendant cannot at this time complain of any injury that he may consider that he has suffered by reason of a possible inference that the jury may have misused the evidence introduced.

[6] The next group of errors have to do with instructions requested by the defendant and refused by the court. The first instruction referred to reads as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that the defendant has introduced evidence in this case in support of his defense of an alibi; an alibi means that the defendant was elsewhere than at the place where the crime charged was committed at the time of its commission, and that therefore he could not have committed it. The rule is that, if the testimony addressed to the alibi is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of the defendant James E. Hovermale's presence at the scene of the crime at the time it was committed, then a reasonable doubt of his guilt arises, and he is entitled to an acquittal."

This instruction was refused by the court on the ground that it was "substantially covered." The instruction given reads as follows:

"It is the contention of the prosecution that the defendant committed the crime charged in the city of Los Angeles. The defendant, on the other hand, has introduced evidence for the purpose of showing that he was in the city of Monrovia at the time when it is charged that the crime was committed.

"The defendant could not have been in these two places at the same time; and in this contradiction of witnesses the jury has to determine for themselves where lies the truth. In so judging, they will take into consideration the appearance and apparent candor and fairness of the respective witnesses; the probability or improbability of their statements; its coincidence or failure to coincide with other facts or features of the case which they may deem established; and generally those rules of ordinary experience and general observation by which intelligent men decide as to controverted propositions of fact."

The instruction given sufficiently covers all that was necessary on the mere question of alibi; but it does not advise the jury that if the evidence tending to establish the alibi was sufficient to create a reasonable doubt the jury should acquit. However, it does appear from the general instructions in several places that the court instructed the jury that if they were not convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant they should render a verdict of acquittal. Manifestly, if the jury believed that the defendant was in Monrovia at his brother-in-law's house on the evening of November 7, or if they had any reasonable doubt upon the question of his being there, they could not possibly have concluded beyond a reasonable doubt that he was one of the trio who perpetrated the robbery.

Appellant has cited the case of People v. Visconti, 31 Cal. App. 169, 160 P. 410, 411, as supporting his contention that the failure to give the requested instruction was prejudicial error. There a similar instruction was offered and refused, but it appears that no instruction whatever was given by the court on the subject of alibi. In the instant case there was an instruction given upon that subject, but not with the full detail as contained in the refused instruction. It is significant, however, that the Supreme Court, in denying a rehearing in the case of People v. Visconti, supra, makes this statement:

"In denying the application we deem it proper to say that we are not to be understood as intimating that the refusal to give such an instruction as was refused in this case would in all cases be deemed by us sufficient for reversal. Especially is this true in view of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. In denying the application for hearing in this court we assume that the district court of appeal concluded, in view of the circumstances of this particular case as shown by the record, that the refusal of the trial court to permit the requested instruction operated substantially to the prejudice of the defendant."

[7] Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that under the laws of this state, evidence of the oral admissions of a party to an action ought to be viewed by the jury with caution, and if you should believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, James E. Hovermale, has made any admissions to witnesses testifying in this case, you will so consider such testimony."

Appellant concedes that the refusal of such an instruction has been held not to be prejudicial error. It was so held in People v. Ruiz, 144 Cal. 251, 77 P. 907; People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 P. 744. It may be suggested further that subdivision 4 of section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, under which the instruction was drawn, has been declared unconstitutional. Hirshfeld v. Dana, 193 Cal. 156, 223 P. 451.

[8] Appellant urges that the court committed prejudicial error in refusing the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that the presumption of innocence with which the defendant, James E. Hovermale, is clothed throughout the trial of this case, goes with you in your retirement to consider your verdict, and you must examine the evidence in this case in the light of that presumption."

The case of People v. McNamara, 94 Cal. 509, 29 P. 953, is cited as supporting ap-pellant's contention. In that case the following instruction was held erroneous:

"This defendant, like all persons accused of crime, is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, and this presumption of innocence goes with him all through the case, until it is submitted to you."

The case was reversed because the court attached to the instruction the last six words which are in italics. In the instant case there was no limitation in the instruction given by the court on the subject of presumption of innocence, and this general instruction as given by the court has been held by our Supreme Court to be sufficient. People v. Jailles, 146 Cal. 301, 79 P. 965; People v. Patino, 9 Cal. App. 192, 98 P. 199.

[9] Criticism is made of the refusal of the court to give a specific instruction as to the weight to be given to the testimony offered on behalf of the defendant through depositions. The subject, we feel, is fully covered by the general instructions given by the court concerning the weighing of evidence.

The third point urged by appellant, as a ground for reversal, has to do with certain statements made by the district attorney in his argument to the jury and which statements are assigned as prejudicial error. We have carefully examined the criticized remarks, but find no merit in appellant's contention that they were prejudicial to his rights.

Judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Russell Smith was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Homer C. Mills, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Appellant Russell Smith was jointly charged with Mark Godfrey and Roy Smith, by an indictment returned by the grand jury of Los Angeles county, with the crime of robbery. Roy Smith not having been apprehended at the time of trial, the case proceeded against defendants Mark Godfrey and Russell Smith. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty as to defendant Mark Godfrey and a verdict of guilty against defendant Russell Smith. From the judgment of the court upon the verdict of guilty, and the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial, appellant Smith prosecutes this appeal.

This, in effect, is a companion case to that of People v. Hovermale (Criminal No. 1235) 243 P. 878, which was decided by this court on the 30th day of December, 1925. The robbery in question occurred on the evening of November 7, 1924, between the hours of 7 and 8 o'clock. A Pacific Electric Pasadena Short Line car en route to Pasadena stopped at Valley Junction, an outlying station in a sparsely settled portion of Los Angeles city, and was boarded by three men. One of these men went to the front end of the car, the other two remaining upon the rear platform. Shortly after the car got under way and while the conductor was in the process of collecting his fares, a report was heard which suggested to one or more of the witnesses that a track torpedo had exploded, and to others a pistol shot, which, in fact it proved to be. The conductor, immediately turning to go to the rear of the car, was confronted by one of the two men who had remained on the rear platform with a revolver pointed at him and a stern command to put up his hands. About the same time the man who had gone to the front end of the car was seen pointing a revolver at the motorman. The third one of the trio, shortly after the command of "hands up," proceeded to relieve the passengers of their money and valuables. The one who covered the conductor seemed to be in charge of the operations, for he was the one who gave commands to the conductor and passengers, as well as to the other two bandits. The theory of the prosecution was that there were actually four men involved in the perpetration of the robbery. In addition to the three who boarded the car, a fourth man remained in a Ford touring car; that this fourth man had driven the three who actually perpetrated the robbery to the point where they boarded the car and then drove the Ford touring car to the point where it was agreed that the three bandits would leave the car; that the fourth man actually did pick up the three bandits and drove them away from the scene of the robbery; that of the three men that boarded the car, James Hovermale, the defendant in the case hereinabove referred to, was the one who directed the conduct of the robbery; that Roy Smith, the codefendant not apprehended, was the one of the trio who went to the front of the car and covered the motorman with his revolver; that Mark Godfrey, the one of the defendants acquitted, was the one who gathered up the money and valuables from the conductor and passengers; and that the defendant Russell Smith was the fourth man who drove the Ford touring car which brought the three bandits to the car, and, after the robbery had been completed, drove them away.

Appellant does not urge as a ground for reversal the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, but does contend for a reversal of the judgment upon the following grounds: First, that the trial court erred in denying his motion for a separate trial; second, that prejudicial error was committed by the court in denying his motion for a continuance of the trial; third, that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during the course of the trial and which was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant; fourth, that the court committed serious error in refusing certain requested instructions.

[1] The first point urged is one that has had extended consideration by the appellate courts of this state in recent decisions, and for this reason we do not feel that it is necessary to cover the ground by extended discussion in this case. The affidavit which was filed in support of the motion for a separate trial was of no greater weight, to say the least, than the showing made in several of the cases herein referred to, where the appellate courts of this state have held adversely to the position taken by the appellant here. We are satisfied that the court, in denying appellant's motion for a separate trial, did not abuse its discretion. In fact, upon the showing made, if the motion had been granted, it might well have been urged that the purpose of the Legislature in amending section 1098 of the Penal Code would have gone for naught.

[2, 3] Appellant in his second point urges that the court's refusal to grant a continuance of the trial operated as prejudicial to his rights. It is, of course, unquestioned that this is a matter that lay in the discretion of the court, and this court would be justified in sustaining appellant's contention only when it appears there had been an abuse of discretion by the court which operated in some way to deprive the appellant of some substantial right. In support of the motion for a continuance there was offered the affidavit of the defendant which alleged, among other things, that C. R. Godfrey, who resided at Brigham, Utah, was a necessary and material witness for the defendant; that affiant on May 4, 1925, had forwarded to the said Godfrey at his home in Utah money with which to pay his expenses to come to Los Angeles; that on May 14, 1925, which was five days prior to the commencement of the trial, said Godfrey not having arrived in Los Angeles, a telegram was sent to the wife of the said Godfrey at Brigham, Utah, inquiring as to when the said Godfrey would arrive in Los Angeles; that in reply the said wife of Godfrey wired that he (Godfrey) had left Brigham, Utah, on May 6, 1925, for Los Angeles, and that she had heard nothing from him since. The affidavit, which bears date of May 18, 1925, the day prior to the commencement of the trial, further sets forth that at the time of the making of the affidavit Godfrey had not appeared, and further that the defendant expected that Godfrey, if present, would testify to certain matters set forth in the affidavit. There is absolutely nothing in the affidavit which shows that the desired witness Godfrey had ever informed affiant or any one on his behalf that he would come to Los Angeles and testify on behalf of the defendant. Nor is there any showing as to when the witness Godfrey would arrive, if ever, in Los Angeles, and indicate his willingness to appear as a witness on behalf of the defendant. The only information before the court as to the whereabouts or intention of Godfrey was the statement that a telegram had been received from Godfrey's wife saying he had left Brigham, Utah, on May 4th, for Los Angeles. Manifestly if Godfrey had left Brigham for the purpose of coming to Los Angeles, and we must assume that he knew the date for which the trial was set, he had abundant time to have reached Los Angeles before the date of the trial, and if perchance he had met with accident or delay it would not do violence to reason to assume that he would have wired or in some way communicated with the defendant explaining his delay. We are of the opinion that the showing was wholly insufficient to have justified, especially in these days of crowded calendars, an indefinite postponement of the case. Had the facts been such as to have indicated the delay of Godfrey was due to unavoidable accident, it would appear that the defendant had sufficient time to have made the necessary inquiry and to have made such a showing as would have convinced the court that Godfrey was in good faith on his way to Los Angeles for the purpose of appearing as a witness in this case and his failure to arrive was in no sense due to his own fault. It may be further suggested that, although the trial consumed some four days before its completion, there was no showing that during that four-day period the said Godfrey had not arrived or could not have been secured by reasonable effort on the part of the defendant. Although authorities on this point have been cited by both appellant and respondent, we do not deem it necessary to either cite authorities or discuss those cited.

[4] The third assignment of error may be best stated in appellant's own language as set forth in his brief:

"That the deputy district attorney was guilty of misconduct, which prevented the defendant Russell Smith from having a fair and impartial trial, in this, that he never intended to try the defendant Mark Godfrey upon the charge contained in the indictment, except to pretend to try him, in order to have introduced into the record testimony material against said Mark Godfrey but immaterial as to the defendant, Russell Smith, and highly prejudicial to said Russell Smith, when said deputy district attorney had reason to believe, and did believe, said Mark Godfrey had committed no crime as charged in the indictment, and in his argument to the jury, advised the jury to find the said Mark Godfrey not guilty, and further stated that if the jury did not agree with his desires in the matter, he would personally apply to the court to set aside the verdict, in the event it should be guilty."

The only basis for the foregoing assertion of the appellant as to the purpose of the district attorney must find its support, if any, in the argument made by the district attorney to the jury. For there is nothing else in the record that would indicate that the prosecutor was actuated by any other than the usual purpose in the prosecution of a case, unless some other inference may be drawn from the fact that the district attorney called as a witness, in the direct presentation of his case, appellant's codefendant, Mark Godfrey. The record, however, shows that when Mark Godfrey took the stand he was represented by counsel and definitely stated he had been duly advised as to his rights by counsel, and that he desired to take the stand and give testimony as to matters connected with the case.

It is true, as suggested by appellant, that an unusual situation is presented in the trial of criminal cases when the district attorney, as in the instant case, in his argument to the jury, stated that in his own opinion the explanation made by the codefendant, Mark Godfrey, of his part in the holdup could be believed, and that he himself believed it, and that believing that Mark Godfrey was forced into his part in the holdup by Hovermale, one of the bandits, he recommended to the jury that they acquit Mark Godfrey of the charge. With refreshing frankness, the district attorney explained to the jury his reason for placing Mark Godfrey on the stand and also his reason for concluding that Mark Godfrey should not be held legally responsible for his part in the holdup.

While it is true, under ordinary circumstances, the district attorney, either feeling that one charged with crime is not guilty or that he has not the evidence sufficient to warrant a prosecution, disposes of the case by recommending to the court a dismissal, we know of no rule of law or legal procedure that requires the district attorney to move the dismissal of any case simply because, in his opinion, the defendant is not guilty, or there is insufficient evidence to convict. At most, the motion for a dismissal is merely a recommendation to the court. If the court, for any reason, differs with the district attorney as to the result that might be obtained in the trial of the case, there can be no doubt that the court has a full right to refuse such dismissal. In fact, it might be urged with considerable force that in such a serious charge as this, where the grand jury has presented an indictment charging any person or persons with such an offense, it might well be a better practice for the district attorney to submit to a court and jury all of the evidence within his knowledge and let the court and jury, that is particularly charged with the duty of determining guilt or innocence of one charged with crime, assume the responsibility.

[5] It is urged at considerable length by appellant that the motive of the district attorney in putting Godfrey on trial was not to do Godfrey justice, but rather to do what the appellant contends was an injustice to him, in that the district attorney might thus be enabled to get before the jury testimony which would be ruled out if the appellant here went to trial alone. Two answers may be urged to this contention: First, that we know of no rule or reason that requires the district attorney to present the case of the people in a manner that will best serve the interests of any particular defendant. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the prosecution was enabled, by having Godfrey a defendant in the case, to present evidence that otherwise would not have been admissible, surely the district attorney had the right to present evidence in any manner that was allowable under the law and the practice, and that in doing so he may have gained an advantage that would not have been his under other circumstances, could not reasonably be held to have operated to the prejudicial injury of the appellant here. Furthermore, as a second answer, it may be pointed out that we do not note in the record any objection urged by appellant to any ruling made by the court on the testimony of Godfrey, or any other testimony that was allowed to be presented to the jury and which would not have been admissible if Godfrey had not been on trial. Had the case against Godfrey been dismissed, unquestionably he could have been, and would have been, used by the district attorney in the same way that he took the stand in the trial of the case. We feel there is no merit in appellant's contention on this point.

The remaining points urged by appellant for a reversal have to do with instructions requested by the appellant and which were either refused or given by the court in modified form. We have carefully reviewed all the instructions given by the court, as well as those refused, and without entering into a detailed discussion as to the merits of each point as urged by appellant, in relation to the several instructions refused, as they are both numerous and somewhat lengthy in form, we feel the situation is fairly met by saying that we find no prejudicial error in the court's ruling on these instructions. Some of the instructions which are the subject of discussion were identical with those offered and refused in the Hovermale Case, and in which opinion we held that there was no prejudicial error in the rulings of the court on the matter of instructions. Our review of the instructions given by the court convinces us that the court fairly and fully advised the jury upon all matters which were before the court and which were properly the subject of the court's instruction.

The judgment and order of the court denying the defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

DUARTE et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 5421.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 5, 1926.)

1. Master and servant ⇐417(7).

Questions of fact and weight of evidence are matters for determination of Industrial Accident Commission.

2. Master and servant ⇐405(4)—Evidence held ample to support finding death was not caused by injury in employment.

Evidence held ample to support finding of Industrial Accident Commission that death of employee was not proximately caused by injury occurring in course of, or arising out of, employment or that deceased sustained any injury at the time asserted in connection with such employment.

Proceeding for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Ynosencia Martinez Duarte, widow, and others, as claimants, for the death of Ysaac Duarte, known as Esau Duarte, opposed by the American Smelting & Refining Company, employer. The Industrial Accident Commission denied compensation, and claimants bring certiorari. Award affirmed.

H. L. Bradford, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent American Smelting & Refining Co.

TYLER, P. J. [1,2] Certiorari to review the findings and award of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation for the death of one Ysaac Duarte, husband and father, respectively, of the petitioners.

The deceased was an employee of respondent American Smelting & Refining Company. After rehearing, benefits were finally denied by the commission upon the ground that there was a want of sufficient evidence to establish that death was proximately caused by any injury occurring in the course of employment, or arising out of the same, or that the employee sustained any injury at all at the time asserted in connection with such employment.

In support of her claim for death benefits, the widow of Duarte testified, in substance, that on the 16th day of October, 1924, her husband left their place of residence to attend to his daily labor for the American Smelting & Refining Company, whose smelting works then and now are located at the town of Crockett. That in the evening of said day, and upon his return from work, he complained to her that he had been injured in the course of his employment. The injury had occurred while he and a fellow employee were attempting to lift a car loaded with metal that had been derailed for the purpose of replacing it upon the track. That they had used as a lever a pole in connection with their work which the other employee had let go of, and in consequence the same had struck her husband on the chest and injured him. She further testified that she called in a physician, who placed bandages on her husband's chest; that he was subsequently attended by other physicians, but his condition became worse, and he died on the 23d day of October following. Dr. Fernandez, the physician first called to attend the deceased, testified that Duarte had informed him that he had been injured while at work, and that he thought he might be suffering from a fractured rib, and bandaged him accordingly. That deceased returned to his work for two days, and then quit.

Petitioners also introduced certain hearsay testimony to the effect that the deceased and others had stated that Duarte had been injured while at work. In addition thereto two Mexicans, Cesario Ruiz and Joe Villa were produced as witnesses, and they testified to having witnessed the accident.

Ruiz, through an interpreter, stated in effect that on the day the alleged accident occurred he saw the deceased, together with an American, attempting to replace an ore car upon its track; that they were using a long pole as a lever, and the American had let go his hold upon the car, which resulted in throwing the weight upon the lever, causing it to fall back and strike deceased upon the chest. The testimony of Villa was to the same effect. This, in substance constitutes the evidence relied on by the petitioners to prove that an injury occurred in the course of employment. As against this evidence it appears that the company was never advised of any injury until after the death of Duarte.

One Anderson, employed by defendant company in connection with its personal and safety work, testified that deceased never complained to him of having received any injury, and he knew nothing concerning the same until the day that Duarte died. Charles Richards, a foreman, testified that the deceased had called for his pay and reported for duty on the 18th day of October after his alleged accident, but he was laid off for lack of work. He also testified that no complaint was made by Duarte of having been injured. Other testimony was to the effect that, while deceased did complain of being sick, he never claimed to have been injured. To disprove the testimony of Ruiz and Villa that they had witnessed the accident, the company introduced testimony to show that deceased had never worked with an American, except on rare occasions, and on the day when the alleged injury is claimed to have been suffered the deceased was working in company with a Mexican named Rodriguez.

Petitioners claimed that deceased was injured on the morning of Thursday, October 16, 1924. Rodriguez testified that he had worked with the deceased on Thursday and the following Friday and Saturday pushing cars and carrying ore, and that no accident had happened during that time, and that he did not know, nor had he ever heard of, Ruiz. He also testified that deceased had complained of having hurt his chest and of feeling sick on the last day he worked with him, but did not claim that he had suffered any injury during his employment. To disprove the testimony of Ruiz that he and his fellow Mexican colaborer were working together at the time of the accident and had witnessed the same, several of the foremen of defendant company were examined, and the time cards of both Ruiz and Villa were introduced in evidence. The time cards of Ruiz showed that his statement that he was working with Villa was untrue. Ruiz was proved by the testimony of a foreman and by the time cards to have been working on the night shift from October 12th to the 28th. Villa's testimony to the effect that he was working with Ruiz on the day of the accident was also disproved, as it was shown that he was working in an entirely different department and at different work than that to which he had testified.

On rehearing one Santiago Muro was produced as a witness on behalf of the petitioners. He testified that he was working for respondent company on the day of the accident, and, after its happening as alleged, Ruiz had told him that the deceased was injured. The time card of this witness was also produced, and it showed that on this day he was working on the night shift.

Under all these circumstances the commission was justified in disregarding these various witness and in concluding that petitioners had failed to prove the happening of an accident. Then too, the medical testimony does not clearly show that death was caused by an injury. An autopsy showed no fracture, but did show that deceased was suffering from a complication of diseases. His liver was enlarged, and his lungs were in a far advanced state of tuberculosis. His kidneys were badly diseased; one being filled with pus. The direct cause of death was a rupture of an aneurism of the aorta above its junction with the heart. Dr. Beard, the autopsy surgeon, gave as his opinion that the aneurism was of long standing, of at least two years duration, and was probably syphilitic, and, considering the nature of the rupture, in his opinion, it must have produced instantaneous death, as the entire pericardium was filled with blood.

The case as a whole presents questions of fact and weight of evidence. These were matters for the commission to determine. There is ample evidence in the record to support its findings.

The award is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by James J. Furlong against William J. Alexander and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed, as modified.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. L. Albert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. [1] This is an action to recover on two promissory notes. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. It is contended that the amount of the judgment should be reduced in the sum of $151.23, for the reason that the trial court erred in the computation of the interest due upon the notes and by that means rendered judgment for a sum which was in excess of the amount actually due to the extent stated. In arguing their contention, appellants say that the total amount of the judgment was $3,229.63, giving the items which together go to make up the total. They then assert that the aggregate sum should have been $3,078.40, and state the items which, according to their computation, go to form that total. The difference between $3,229.63 and $3,078.40 is $151.23, beyond a doubt, but there is a factor which appellants have omitted in their endeavor to convince us that the judgment was excessive in the sum last stated. The element of time in the computation of interest was wanting. The date from which interest was to be figured on each of the notes is stated in the brief, but the date to which it was to be computed is shown as to neither of them. To be more exact, appellants fail to show either to what date the court figured interest in arriving at the amount of the judgment, or to what date it should have been figured in order to render correct judgment; nor do they even show to what date, either correctly or incorrectly, they themselves have computed interest in their endeavor to convince us that the judgment is excessive. It is provided in section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, which concerns what is known as the alternative method of appeal—and the present appeal was taken after that method—that—

The parties must "print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court."

[2] In the respect above mentioned appellants have failed to comply with this rule. The provision, however, has been held to be merely directory (People v. Woods, 190 Cal. 513, 213 P. 951), and we have therefore been forced by the dereliction of counsel to examine the record ourselves for the purpose of supplying the missing information. After such examination we have computed the interest upon the two notes. We find that the interest upon one of them was correctly ascertained by the trial court, but that upon the other the interest allowed was excessive, not in the sum of $151.23, but in the sum of $47.93.

[3] Appellants insist that in rendering its judgment the trial court failed to allow them a credit of $100.60, to which they were entitled. To support this contention, appellants quote a portion of the record of the trial showing a stipulation to the effect that they should have the credit mentioned, and containing a statement of the court that it would be allowed them. The figures set forth in the brief do not convince us that it was not allowed. Moreover, respondent asserts in his brief that the credit was allowed and states the manner in which it was allowed, and appellants filed no reply brief. On the whole, appellants have failed to satisfy the rule that it is incumbent upon an appellant to show error in the rendition of a judgment which he would have reversed. The point made, therefore, cannot be sustained.

[4] The principal question presented by appellants is that the consideration for one of the notes sued on had failed and that respondent was therefore not entitled to judgment upon it. Evidence is then stated which, while it is not altogether clear, tends to prove that the paper was given merely as a guaranty, or as security, for the performance of a certain act, and that the act had been performed. On the other hand, however, respondent refers to testimony which tends to prove that the note was given in consideration of "money advanced for payroll" and for the cost of a building which respondent constructed for the use of appellants. Here, then, appears but a conflict of evidence, and the finding of the trial court upon the subject must stand.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the words and figures, "Three thousand two hundred twenty-nine and 63/100 dollars ($3,229.63)," and inserting in lieu thereof the words and figures, "Three thousand one hundred eighty-one and 70/100 dollars ($3,181.70)," and as so modified it is affirmed.

Ex parte CIRRO. (Cr. 1306.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District Division 1, California. Jan. 4, 1926.)

Habeas corpus $\Rightarrow$ 30(2)—Defendant held entitled to discharge on habeas corpus, when held under information erroneously charging embezzlement of grapes instead of proceeds of sale.

Defendant held entitled to discharge on habeas corpus, where held on information charging embezzlement, as agent, of grapes, where embezzlement, if any, was of proceeds of sale of such grapes.

Application for a writ of habeas corpus by Cirro against the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco. Writ granted.

Emilio Lastreto and Alexander Mooslin, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

R. M. J. Armstrong, Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and William W. Murphy, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Petitioner was accused by complaint filed in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco with having embezzled some 9 carloads of grapes. He was held to answer for this offense, and an information was subsequently filed charging petitioner with embezzlement as agent of the grapes. He here seeks his discharge upon habeas corpus, upon the ground that the testimony taken upon his preliminary examination shows conclusively that the complaining witness, Anthony Barone, and petitioner were partners, and that the property alleged to have been embezzled was partnership property, for which reason petitioner is not guilty of any criminal offense. It is further claimed that the grapes were disposed of in conformity with the lawful exercise of his trust and under the express agreement of the parties.

The district attorney concedes that petitioner is correct in this latter contention, and that the embezzlement, if any, was of the proceeds of the sale, an offense with which he is not here charged. A reading of the evidence shows this to be so.

It results that the petition must be granted and the prisoner discharged.

It is so ordered.

GITTELSON et al. v. McKNIGHT et al.
(Civ. 5277.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 22, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 18, 1925.)

1. Specific performance ¶14—On death of wife intestate after appeal from decree for specific performance, agreement of husband to sell community property held enforceable regardless of whether wife signed original offer or first escrow instructions.

Where, pending appeal from decree for specific performance of contract for sale of real property, wife died intestate, husband could not urge on appeal that property belonged to community and that wife had not signed original offer or first escrow instructions, especially in view of stipulation that husband was owner of property and testimony showing him to be record owner; wife's interest having vested in him.

2. Vendor and purchaser ¶39—Fact that seller instructed escrow holder to affix insufficient revenue stamps held not to invalidate contract.

Fact that seller instructed escrow holder to affix insufficient amount of revenue stamps to deed does not render contract invalid, in view of fact that deed had not been recorded or delivered, and that stamps had to be affixed on recordation.

3. Specific performance ¶131—Fact that pleadings and judgment included certain personal property held not to render judgment of specific performance erroneous.

In suit for specific performance of contract to convey real property, fact that pleadings and judgment included certain personal property which was not sufficiently described in contract did not render decree of specific performance erroneous, in view of fact that such property was inconsequential, and contract to convey real property and that to convey personalty might be separated.

4. Specific performance ¶131—Judgment granting specific performance held not erroneous for failing to provide for payment of consideration.

Judgment granting specific performance of contract to convey real property, which provided that agreement of parties should be specifically performed, was not erroneous as failing to provide for payment of consideration, although plaintiffs by stipulation were permitted to withdraw, pending trial, cash deposited in escrow, but such judgment will be modified to expressly protect vendors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Suit by George Gittelson and others against John H. McKnight, individually and as administrator of the estate of Agnes W. McKnight, deceased, substituted for her, and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the named defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Samuel A. Miller and John J. Wilson, both of Los Angeles (Gerald F. H. Delamer, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by some of the defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs decreeing specific performance of an agreement for the purchase and sale of real property in Los Angeles, Cal. The record bears out the statement of facts appearing in respondents' brief, from which we quote:

The initial negotiations were carried on between the defendant John H. McKnight for the sellers and Max Gittelson, father of the plaintiffs George, Harry, and Samuel Gittelson, in behalf of the purchasers, which negotiations finally resulted in an offer in writing by said John H. McKnight and an acceptance by said Max Gittelson. The consideration was $32,000 net to the sellers, $10,000 to be paid in cash, the balance of the purchase price to be by note secured by mortgage on the property, due in 5 or 7 years at 8 per cent. interest.

On July 9, 1921, Max Gittelson, the agent, brought the purchasers, his sons, and John H. McKnight, the seller, together. Samuel Gittelson, one of the purchasers, accompanied John H. McKnight, the seller, to the office of the title company, where they reaffirmed the terms of the contract and signed escrow instructions to the title company, which was to be the custodian of the purchase money, note, deed, and other documents. These instructions were dated July 9, 1921, and by their terms the Gittelsons were to deposit $10,000 with the title company as a cash payment, a note for $22,500, signed by the plaintiffs, secured by a trust deed on the property, due in 7 years from August 1, 1921, with interest at 8 per cent, per annum, payable quarterly. John H. McKnight was to deposit a deed executed by himself and Agnes W. McKnight, his wife, vesting title in the plaintiffs, purchasers in certain undivided interests. The title company was to deliver the $10,000 and the note and trust deed securing the same to John H. McKnight and the deed to the purchasers, "provided, within 15 days," the title company could issue its certificate as called for, and, "in the event the conditions of this escrow have not been complied with at the expiration of the time provided for herein," the title company was "to complete the same at the earliest date possible hereafter," unless purchasers shall have made written demand on the company for the return of the money and instruments deposited by them. To these conditions John H. McKnight subscribed in the words "the conditions as above are hereby approved," and he instructed the title company to deliver the deed to the purchasers upon payment to the title company for his account of $10,000 "within the time as above provided."

At the time of the signing of the escrow instructions, when Samuel Gittelson was about to deposit the $10,000 called for, the escrow officer of the title company stated that the company did not care to have the entire $10,000 deposited at that time, and suggested that Gittelson should then deposit $500 and the balance of the $10,000 and sufficient money to cover expenses when the title company had finished its preliminary examination and was ready to issue its certificate, and should so notify Gittelson. This arrangement was agreed to by all parties, and Gittelson deposited the said $500.

Subsequently John H. McKnight deposited with the title company, in pursuance of the contract and instructions, a deed to the property, executed and acknowledged by himself and Agnes W. McKnight, conveying the property to the purchasers in certain undivided interests, as called for in the instructions. Also the Gittelsons deposited in the escrow a note for $22,500, secured by a trust deed on the property, due in 7 years from August 1, 1921, with interest at 8 per cent, per annum, payable quarterly. Also Agnes W. McKnight, wife of John H. McKnight, deposited in the escrow a paper signed by her directing the title company to pay all money derived from the use of the deed she and her husband had deposited (particularly specifying that the deed conveyed the land to the Gittelsons, naming them, and stating the undivided interests vested in each, as called for in the instructions) to John H. McKnight, and further specifically instructing the title company in these words:

"In the event that the conditions of this escrow have not been complied with at the expiration of the time provided for herein, you are instructed to complete the same at your earliest possible date thereafter unless I shall have made written demand upon you for the return of all instruments deposited by me."

The title company was not ready to issue its certificate called for within the 15 days provided in the contract and instructions, that is, was not ready so to do on July 24, 1921, but was ready 7 days thereafter, to wit, on August 1, 1921. In the meantime, neither the Gittelsons nor the McKnights had in writing, or otherwise, demanded the return of anything in escrow. On August 1, 1921, the title company wrote Samuel Gittelson that if had completed its preliminary examination, and was ready to receive the balance to be deposited, and stated that the amount of the balance was $9,667; that is, $9,500 balance upon cash payment and $167 to cover expenses. This amount was promptly paid by the Gittelsons on August 2, 1921. The title company then had the whole $10,000 cash payment to be made under the contract, $167 for expenses, the note, and trust deed securing the same, and the deed from the McKnights. For some reason not explained by the record the title company, instead of delivering the $10,000 note and trust deed to John H. McKnight and the deed to the Gittelsons, on said August 2, 1921, held both money and deed for 15 days, during which time no demands had been made by either the Gittelsons or the McKnights for the return of anything deposited.

On August 17, 1921, John H. McKnight caused his attorney to write a letter to the title company, instructing it to cancel all instructions given by him and to deliver the deed to William J. O'Brien, on whose letterhead the letter was written. This letter gave as the only reason for canceling his instructions and the return of the deed that the $10,000 was not deposited with the company within the 15 days from July 9, 1921, and not until August 2d. The title company notified Samuel Gittelson that it had received said letter from said McKnight, copied the contents thereof in its letter to Gittelson, and refused to complete the transaction.

This action followed. The trial court decreed specific performance of the contract against John H. McKnight and Agnes McKnight, who have appealed. Pending the appeal Agnes McKnight died, and John H. McKnight, as the administrator of her estate, was substituted in her place and stood as a defendant and appellant in the action.

[1] The greatest ingenuity has been displayed by counsel in urging innumerable hypertechanical objections to the foregoing transaction. Many of the points made do not warrant serious discussion. The objections which have a semblance of merit are based upon the fact that the original transaction was between Gittelson or his agent and John H. McKnight, and that Agnes W. McKnight does not appear to have signed the original offer, nor the first escrow instructions. There are numerous replies to be made to these objections, among which we might mention, first, that there was a stipulation in court by the attorneys that John H. McKnight was the owner of the property, and his testimony showed him to be the record owner. He, however, later took the position that the property was community property, and, conceding that it was, Agnes W. McKnight signed the deed conveying it to the Gittelsons, which was deposited with the title company, and she also signed a letter of instructions to said title company, hereinbefore mentioned, directing the title company to proceed with the transaction and to pay the proceeds to John H. McKnight. The appellants meet these facts by urging that the escrow agreement does not constitute the contract and must be supported by a valid contract preceding it. We are saved the necessity of meeting this argument by the fact that upon the record before us Agnes W. McKnight has since died intestate. Her interest in this property, if it was community property, has vested in John H. McKnight, and with the merging of her inchoate interest in the estate of John H. McKnight disappears the last vestige of ground for this appeal.

Counsel seeks to avoid this result by urging upon this court, at great length through several briefs, his views in criticism of the case of Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 218 P. 22. He asks this court to take a view contrary to that case, and to hold that the wife's interest in community property is something larger than was decided therein. So far as this court is concerned, Roberts v. Wehmeyer, supra, must settle the law upon this question in this state. Under that case the interest of Agnes W. McKnight in the community property was a mere expectancy. That expectancy is destroyed by her death, intestate, during the lifetime of her husband, and his title is now full and complete.

Nor is there any merit in the claim that John H. McKnight holds one-half of this property in a superior equitable position with reference to this action and may urge any claims which Agnes W. McKnight might have had against the enforcement of this judgment. A reading of Roberts v. Wehmeyer, supra, is conclusive upon the fact that the wife had no separate and vested estate in any part of this property. The husband received no new estate upon her death intestate. He always was the owner of the community property, subject only to the wife's expectancy and her power or testamentary disposition. Both contingencies are now removed. The husband has the same estate he had before the wife's death, freed now from the possibility of being defeated in part. He has not a defense against this action for specific performance. The only reason he gave at the trial for not performing was that his wife did not want him to sell the property, and while she was ill, he wished to please her about the matter.

[2] It is idle to urge that the contract is invalid because the seller instructed the title company to affix only $10 in revenue stamps instead of $32.50 required. The purchaser has offered to furnish the balance of the stamps and the revenue law provides it may be done by either party. Furthermore, the deed in this case has never been recorded or even delivered to the grantee, and it is the recordation which is made unlawful without the stamps affixed.

[3] The point is also made that following the specific description of the real property in the pleadings and judgment appear the words "together with certain personal property contained therein as per inventory agreed upon by the parties herein." It is urged that there is no adequate description of the personal property at any place in the contract to enable a court to specifically perform the contract as to it. Respondents concede this, and assert that the personal property is inconsequential, and the provisions concerning the same may be treated as surplusage in the decree; that the contract to convey the real property and the contract to convey the personalty may be separated.

[4] The point is also made that the decree fails to provide for the payment over to the defendants of the consideration to be paid for the property. This is presented because it appears in the record that by stipulation between the parties the plaintiffs were permitted to withdraw, pending the trial, the $10,000 cash which they had theretofore deposited with the title company, without prejudice to their rights. It is fair to assume that since the trial the money has again been deposited with the title company in escrow, and will be paid over to defendants upon delivery of the deed to plaintiffs. Furthermore, the judgment appealed from provides that the agreement of the parties be specifically performed, which, assuredly, means performed by both parties. However, the judgment of this court will protect the appellants in this matter. Accordingly, it is ordered:

That the judgment appealed from be and it hereby is modified by striking from the description of the property the following words: "Together with certain personal property contained therein as per inventory agreed upon by the parties herein," and by adding to the end of the last paragraph of said decree: "And that the plaintiffs pay to the defendants $32,500 for said property in the manner and form agreed upon, to wit, $10,000 in cash and their promissory note for $22,500, payable seven years from August 1, 1921, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, secured by deed of trust upon said property."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed, the appellants to pay the costs upon appeal.

Haswell & Martin, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in allowing compensation for injuries to one W. R. Doolittle who, on the evening of February 18, 1925, was injured in an automobile accident.

Doolittle was employed by P. S. and S. J. Round, proprietors of a general store at Costa Mesa, Cal., of whom petitioner is the insurance carrier, to manage their meat department. His hours of labor were from 7 a. m. to 6 or 6:15 in the evening. Part of his duties consisted in the buying of meats, and in this connection he was vested with certain discretion. Ordinarily the meats were purchased from the Cudahy Company, but at times a small supply was procured from a market conducted by a Mr. Klamm at Santa Ana, a city close by. On the evening of February 18, 1925, Doolittle reported to his employer that the store was running short of pork and lamb. He was directed to take the firm's delivery truck home with him that night instead of going in his usual way, which was by stage, and purchase the necessary meat from Klamm, and bring it back next morning when he reported for duty. Doolittle had bought meat under similar circumstances on three former occasions.

Pursuant to these instructions, Doolittle left the shop for Santa Ana with the truck at about 5:45 o'clock in the evening; his declared intention being to notify Klamm before going to his own home, which was also situated in that city, to open his shop the next morning before the usual hour so that he could get back to Costa Mesa early the next morning with the meat. While proceeding along the highway in the most direct route to his destination, Doolittle attempted to pass a car driven by three boys. He blew his horn, but the boys refused to give him a right of way. He made an attempt to pass, but the car crowded him, and he was forced to drop back. On reaching a straight stretch of the road Doolittle, driving at about 25 miles an hour, again attempted to pass the car driven by the boys, but was crowded into a ditch. He was thrown through the windshield, and suffered multiple lacerations of both hands, which injuries were of a serious nature. Under these circumstances the Commission found that Doolittle sustained his injuries in the course of his employment; that such injuries caused temporary total disability entitling him to compensation for a period of 14 weeks in the weekly sum of $15.44, a total of $216.16.

[1-3] It is petitioner's claim that the injuries did not occur in the course of the employment, that Doolittle was guilty of willful misconduct, and that the evidence does not sustain the findings as to the extent of disability. The first contention is based upon the claim that the facts bring the case within the so-called "going and coming" doctrine. The evidence does not support this contention. That Doolittle intended to go home there can be no question, but it is equally clear that his primary purpose was a business errand. He had been instructed to make the journey, not in his usual manner by stage, but with his employer's truck, and he had left his place of business before his regular quitting time in order to see Klamm, the proprietor of the meat shop, so that he could procure the meat he wanted at an early hour. His return to his home was an incidental factor in his mission. He was at the time of the accident, which occurred about 6 o'clock in the evening, traveling on his employer's time, for a definite purpose connected with his employment and to further his employer's interest. He was therefore acting within the scope of his employment. Nor is there any evidence in the record to support the claim that Doolittle was guilty of willful misconduct in the operation of his car, even conceding that this fact, if true, would relieve petitioner from liability.

Equally without merit is the claim that the evidence does not sustain the finding as to the extent of the disability. The medical testimony shows the injuries to have been of a serious nature that might cause temporary disability for at least 6 months, with a probability of such temporary disability becoming permanent.

The award is affirmed.

Under Amendment 1918 to Const. art. 6, § 4 (see St. 1919, p. xxxiii), intended to enable District Court of Appeal to act as a court and transact business by concurrence of two of its justices, notwithstanding illness or absence or disqualification of third judge, a judgment on appeal, rendered by two district court justices, is valid, though third judge did not participate, deeming himself disqualified.

2. Courts ⇐102(1)—Constitutional authority to appoint judge in place of one disqualified or unable to act does not affect power of District Court of Appeal to transact business by action of two justices (Amendment 1918 to Const. art. 6, § 4 [see St. 1919 p. xxxiii]).

Constitutional provision, authorizing court to appoint a justice to act pro tempore in place of justice disqualified, or unable to act, does not affect power of court, under Amendment 1918 to Const. art. 6, § 4 (see St. 1919, p. xxxiii), to transact business through action of two of its judges.

CONREY, P. J. This case was before the court on appeal from the judgment, and was decided in April, 1924. Dolley v. Ragon, 228 P. 52, 66 Cal. App. 707. Signal Hill Oil & Gas Company, a corporation, was one of the appellants in the case. Now come E. D. Higginbotham and W. E. Pettit, claiming to be stockholders in said corporation, and severally present their motions to have the appeal set down for hearing. The theory of the moving parties appears to be that the former proceedings whereby the appeal was heard and determined in this court were void, and that the appeal is still pending. The motions are based upon the fact that Mr. Justice Curtis, deeming himself disqualified, did not act in the rendition of the opinion and judgment of the court. The minutes of the court show that, at the call of the calendar on March 24, 1924, the cause was submitted for decision. At that session of the court the three justices thereof were present. On April 24, 1924, the judgment was affirmed; the opinion being written by Mr. Justice Houser and concurred in by the presiding justice. A memorandum was attached thereto, stating that Mr. Justice Curtis, deeming himself disqualified, did not participate in the opinion.

On May 14, 1924, a petition for rehearing in this cause was filed by appellants, appearing by Wm. J. Clark and P. V. Davis as their attorneys. By order of May 20, 1924, this petition was denied. The record further shows that, by order of June 23, 1924, a petition for rehearing of the cause was denied by the Supreme Court.

[1] Assuming, without deciding, that these motions are presented by parties entitled to act on behalf of the corporation in presenting such motions, we are of the opinion that the judgment on appeal as rendered was the act of a sufficient number of judges, and was and is a valid judgment of the court. It is true that under the provisions of article 6, § 4, of the Constitution of California, as adopted in the year 1904 (see St. 1905, p. xxxvi), the concurrence of three justices of the court was necessary to the rendition of a judgment. The Constitution at that time declared as follows:

"The presence of three justices shall be necessary for the transaction of any business by such court, except such as may be done at chambers, and the concurrence of three justices shall be necessary to pronounce a judgment."

But by the amendment of that section as adopted in the year 1918 (see St. 1919, p. xxxiii), there was substituted the following provision:

"The presence of two justices shall be necessary for the transaction of any business by such court except such as may be done at chambers, and the concurrence of two justices shall be necessary to pronounce a judgment."

[2] It appears to be absolutely clear that the amendment above quoted was intended to enable a District Court of Appeal to act as a court and transact its business by the concurrent action of two of its judges, notwithstanding the illness or absence or disqualification of the third judge. The further provision in the Constitution (both as originally adopted and as amended), authorizing the court to appoint a justice or judge to act pro tempore in the place of a justice disqualified or unable to act, does not in any way affect the power of the court to transact business through the action of two of its judges as above stated.

It thus appearing that the appeal in question has long since passed to final judgment, the court is now without jurisdiction to act upon these motions.

For that reason the motions are dismissed.

Whether an interpreter shall be called to render testimony of witness not understanding English language rests in discretion of trial court.

5. Courts $\S$ 56.

Determination of witness' understanding of English language, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1884, is to be solved upon examination of witness' entire testimony.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 642.

Refusal to call interpreter for Japanese witness held not abuse of discretion, in view of witness' understanding of English language as disclosed by record.

7. Robbery $\S$ 24(1).

Evidence held to support verdict finding accused guilty of robbery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Voudria C. Holtzclaw and another were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

C. B. Conlin and E. R. Simon, both of Los Angeles, for appellant Davis.

George E. Stoddard, of Los Angeles, for appellant Holtzclaw.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendants were convicted of the crime of robbery. They appeal from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying their motion for a new trial.

The prosecuting witness, and the sole witness as to the actual facts surrounding the robbery, was one Frank Ito, a Japanese. Over the objection of appellants the trial court required the examination of Ito by means of the English language, and not through an interpreter. It is contended that in this ruling the court abused its discretion. In order to make disposition of the point it will be necessary to quote somewhat voluminously from the record. After the oath had been administered to the witness and after a single question had been propounded to him on direct examination, one of the counsel for appellants asked and obtained leave to examine him in order to ascertain "if he understands what has taken place in the administration of this oath." The record then shows:

"Q. Do you know what the clerk in this court just did to you? A. Yes.

"Q. What did he do? A. To-day?

"Q. Yes, to-day. A. We have court to-day.

"Q. You understand thoroughly, of course, what the clerk just administered to you? A. No, I don't know."

At this point appellants objected "to this witness testifying." Thereupon the district attorney examined him thus:

"Do you know what it means to take an oath? Do you understand what it means to take an oath that you just took, to hold up your hand and swear that you will tell the truth? A. Yes, the date, the 30th of March. * * *

"Q. Do you know what it means to take an oath, to hold up your hand and swear you will tell the truth? A. Yes, the whole truth.

"Mr. Conlin: It has already been answered, your honor. The 30th of March is his answer.

"The Court: This matter goes to the credibility of the witness; it should not go to exclude the testimony of the witness. * * *

"Mr. Murray (a deputy District Attorney): We might need an interpreter in this case.

"The Court: All right; proceed.

"Mr. Murray: Do you know, Mr. Ito, that you are to tell the truth? A. To tell the truth.

"Q. Do you know it is a crime of perjury not to tell the truth? A. Yes, I tell the truth.

"Q. Do you know it is a crime not to tell the truth when you swear to God you will tell the truth? A. Sure, I will tell the truth.

"Q. Do you know that they will put you in jail if you don't tell the truth? A. I told all the truth.

"Q. But do you know that if you don't tell the truth they will put you in jail? A. Yes.

"Q. You know when you put your right hand up and swore you would tell the truth— A. Yes, I swore I would tell the truth.

"Q. Do you know what it means to hold your right hand up and swear you will tell the truth; do you know that is an oath? A. Yes, truth; I know.

"Q. Do you understand what I say to you all the time? A. Sometimes I can't understand very good English.

"Q. Would you like to have an interpreter?

A. I have an interpreter next door to my place. He talks pretty good English.

"Q. I know, but would you like to have an interpreter here in court to-day to interpret your language into English, Japanese into English, and English into Japanese? A. Yes, I think interpreter is best.

"Q. Do you understand everything that counsel and myself have been saying here? A. No, I don't know. This is the first time I am in court. I don't know much.

"Mr. Murray: I think maybe, your honor, it would be better to have an interpreter, although the witness speaks fairly good English.

"Mr. Conlin: Do you believe in a supreme being? A. Supreme man?

"Q. Do you believe in a supreme being? A. Do you mean a high court?

"Q. Yes, that is right.

"Mr. Murray: I submit that the witness doesn't understand what he is talking about.

"The Court: All right. Call an interpreter.

"Mr. Conlin: I will submit he don't, too.

"The Court: The clerk advises me that it will take some time to get an interpreter, possibly until 2 o'clock. Now, regarding the objection to this witness testifying, section 1879 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that 'all persons, without exception, otherwise than as specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and, perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief.' The sections which contain the exceptions are those referring to persons of unsound mind and children under ten years of age, and so forth.

"Mr. Conlin: The first section the court read is the one I based my objection upon, those that apparently do not perceive and cannot make known their perception.

"The Court: The belief in a supreme being is not essential.

"Mr. Conlin: No, but the principal objection was that he did not perceive what was going on and could not make known his perception.

"The Court: However, those are matters which the jurors may take into consideration in weighing the evidence, and for that reason the court will let you proceed. Now, as to whether this man has organs of sense, it is apparent he has. Whether, perceiving, he can make known what his organs of sense disclose to him, the result of his perception, is a matter which we can determine after more careful investigation, after a little further proceeding. I am informed that this witness got ahead in the preliminary examination without an interpreter, and so I am willing to make an effort to proceed. If it appears later that it will be necessary to have an interpreter, why, we shall get one at 2 o'clock. You may proceed."

The examination of the witness upon the merits of the cause was then taken up and concluded.

[1, 2] It will be observed from the portion of the record which is above set forth that there was a strange intermixture of legal questions involved in the discussion between the trial judge and counsel for appellants. Three separate points were by them entangled together. These were: First, was Ito competent as a witness under the terms of section 1879 of the Code of Civil Procedure? Second, did he comprehend the nature of the oath which the clerk administered to him? Third, did he understand and speak the English language? This last question is important under the provisions of section 1884 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads, in part:

"When a witness does not understand and speak the English language, an interpreter must be sworn to interpret for him."

In every court there also rests the inherent power to call interpreters for witnesses under proper circumstances (People v. Walker [Cal. App.] 231 P. 572); and it is, of course, the duty of a court to call an interpreter whenever such circumstances arise.

[3] We advert to the state of the record concerning the three questions discussed by the court and counsel for appellants because there is some doubt whether appellants actually presented to the court the third question, the one upon which they now rely, although we have stated at the outset of this opinion that they did. We propose now to resolve that doubt. There is nothing in the record which lays a foundation for either of the two questions which we have first stated. There was not the slightest ground for the view that Ito was not competent as a witness under the provisions of section 1879 of the Code. There was nothing to indicate to the court that he was not in the full possession of his faculties. Likewise, there was nothing to show that he could not comprehend the nature of an oath, if it had been administered to him in his native tongue. His entire difficulty, plainly, was with the English language. Although three questions were intermingled in the discussion between the court and counsel for appellants, there is a fairly clear indication in the somewhat confused record that it finally appeared to all concerned that the only real point before the court was as to the necessity for an interpreter, the point embraced in the third question stated by us. The deputy district attorney evidently saw clearly that the calling of an interpreter would remove whatever difficulty was created by the peculiar answers to some of the questions put to Ito in English. It is true that the first objection of appellants' counsel was "to this witness testifying," but close upon the objection the deputy district attorney remarked: "We might need an interpreter in this case." Then, a little later, came this portion of the record:

"Q. Do you understand what I say to you all the time? A. Sometimes I can't understand very good English. Q. Would you like to have an interpreter? A. I have an interpreter next door to my place. He talks pretty good English. Q. I know, but would you like to have an interpreter here in court to-day? * * * A. Yes, I think interpreter is best. * * * "Mr. Murray: I think maybe * * * it would be better to have an interpreter. * * *"

Following this, and after the court's mention of section 1879, Mr. Conlin said:

"The first section the court read"—doubtless he meant the first sentence—"is the one I based my objection upon, those that apparently do not perceive and cannot make known their perception. * * * [T]he principal objection was that he did not perceive what was going on and could not make known his perception."

A few lines further on the court said:

"I am informed"—by what means does not appear—"that this witness got ahead in the preliminary examination without an interpreter, and so I am willing to make an effort to proceed."

Under all these circumstances we determine that appellants presented in sufficient form a demand for an interpreter and had an adverse ruling upon it.

[4] The question whether an interpreter shall be called for the purpose of rendering the testimony of a witness who does not understand the English language rests in the discretion of the trial court. People v. Morine, 138 Cal. 626, 72 P. 166. Was the discretion abused in the present instance? An answer to the question requires a further quotation from the record of Ito's testimony. We set forth his story of the commission of the crime with which appellants were charged, as it appears in his direct examination, omitting introductory matters and much testimony which bears but indirectly upon the main question. Ito was a restaurant keeper. He testified:

"Q. * * * [D]id you see either of these defendants on [the morning that the crime was committed]? A. Those two fellows I saw. One little short fellow has got a pistol.

"Q. Did you see the other defendant, too? * * * A. I know the short fellow.

"Q. Davis? A. He had the pistol.

"Q. How long have you known him? A. Oh, he came to my place last June or July, last year.

"Q. June or July last year? A. Yes; once in a while, not all the time.

"Q. How many times has he been in your place altogether since you have owned that place down there? A. Oh, about three or four times, I know.

"Q. You just knew him as a customer that came into your place three or four times? A. Three or four times; I can't say how many for sure, but I know three or four times.

"Q. The other defendant, Holtzclaw, did you ever see him before? A. I never saw him before.

"Q. The first time you ever saw him was on the morning of the 30th (the day the crime was committed)? A. Yes.

"Q. What time in the morning did you see them? A. A little after 4:30.

"Q. 4:30 a. m.? A. In the morning.

"Q. What time do you open up that restaurant down there? A. I open at 4:30.

"Q. How long had you been open when you saw these two defendants? A. I can't catch it quite.

"Q. How long had your restaurant been open when you saw these defendants? A. Just opened. * * *

"Q. Was it dark outside? A. Yes.

"Q. How many lights have you in your restaurant? A. Two in the front, two in the kitchen, and one in the room.

"Q. One where? A. Two on the lunch counter in the front, and two in the kitchen, but we haven't got no partition between the kitchen and the counter.

"Q. Are the kitchen and the counter all in one room? A. We have a serving table between the counter and kitchen. * * *

"Q. Just relate what occurred down there on the morning of the 30th when you saw these two defendants. A. The morning of the 30th—.

"Q. Talk slow and talk loud so the lady in the rear back here can understand you and hear you. A. March 30th, in the morning, 4:30, two fellows came in and ordered ham and eggs. At that time I was in the kitchen, and two fellows just came in, and I asked, 'What you going to have?'

"Q. Who did you ask that of? A. This fellow first.

"Q. Davis? A. Yes.

"Q. What did he say when you asked him what he was going to have? A. He said, 'Ham and eggs,' and the big fellow was on the second stool.

"Q. That is, Holtzclaw? A. On the other side (indicating). * * *

"Q. Was anybody else there present besides you and the two defendants? A. The two and me.

"Q. That is all? A. That is all in there. And the little fellow on this side.

"Q. Which fellow, Davis? A. Yes.

"Q. Call them by names. A. I don't know them by names.

"Q. The little fellow is named Davis, and the other fellow is named Holtzclaw. A. He asked me, 'I want a chance to wash hands,' and I go into the kitchen and he come behind me to wash his hands. We got water in the kitchen; we don't have any washstand in the front.

"Q. You have no place to wash hands in the front? A. No; in the kitchen.

"Q. Do you have a place in the kitchen where you can wash hands? A. Yes, and he came behind me, and the big fellow goes behind the counter. We got a register by the wall at the counter, and he pushed the register.

"Q. What did he do? A. He pushed the cash register.

"Q. Pushed in on the cash register? A. Yes.

"Q. Where were you at that time? A. I was by the stove in the kitchen.

"Q. Where was Davis? A. Davis was beside the stove.

"Q. How far from you? A. Two or three feet.

"Q. Then what happened? A. He pushed the register; I heard the bell ring, the noise.

"Q. You heard the bell ring? A. And I said, 'Here! Here! What you doing?' and Davis say, 'Keep quiet or I shoot you,' and put the pistol across me.

"Q. What did you see then? A. I said,

'What you doing?' He say, 'Keep quiet; keep quiet,' and he put the pistol on me and said, 'Lay down; lay down.'

"Q. Who said that? A. The little fellow, Davis, and 'Head down.'

"Q. 'Head down'? A. Yes.

"Q. What did you do? A. I cannot do much; I got no chance to do anything.

"Q. Did you lay down, or did you stand up? A. Yes, I just lay down like this.

"Q. Then what happened? A. They got out. We got no partition. I can see through to the register.

"Q. You can what? A. I could see clear through to the register at the front, and I saw him take out the money, and we have several cartons of Chesterfields and Camel cigarettes.

"Q. How much money did you have in the cash register, do you know? A. $6.15.

"Q. All right. A. And he cleaned up the cigarettes and the money and he came in the kitchen.

"Q. Who came in? A. That big fellow.

"Q. What did he do? A. He came in the kitchen.

"Q. All right. Whereabouts were you on the floor with reference to the stove; were you close to the stove? A. Yes; I never moved.

"Q. You never moved? A. Because he has got a pistol; I can't move.

"Q. Then what? A. And the little fellow says, 'Come on.'

"Q. Who said that? A. The little fellow.

"Q. What did he say? A. He took me to the back room.

"Q. Did he still have the pistol in his hand? A. Yes.

"Q. Which way did he have it pointed, the pistol? A. The pistol in his right hand.

"Q. Which direction was he pointing it at? A. Mr. Davis.

"Q. Which way did he have the pistol pointed? A. Right on my nose.

"Q. What did he say? A. He said, 'Come on, get up,' and I sat up, and he asked the big fellow, 'How much money have you got?' The big fellow said, 'About $5,' and the little fellow said, 'Oh, you got more than $5. All Japanese have more money.'

"Q. Who did he say that to, you? A. Yes, to me he said, 'You got more than $5,' and the little fellow said, 'You got more than $5; all Japanese keep more than $5 in their room. Where is your money?' And I say, 'I ain't got any,' and he looked in my pants, and I got a back pocket, a Mexican money half-dollar.

"Q. Half a dollar in Mexican money in your back pocket? A. Yes, sir; I had it for two months. And he said, 'Come on in the room.'

"Q. Which room was he referring to? A. In the back room. * * *

"Q. Where did you go? A. Go in the room and take up the mattress, take off the bedding and the mattress. I have got a little box under the bed that I put junk stuff in there.

"Q. Put what? A. Junk stuff.

"Q. Oh, junk stuff in the box. I see. A. And he turned the box over and the bedding.

"Q. What? A. Took off the bedding and say, 'Where is the money?'

"Q. Who said that? A. The little fellow.

"Q. Did he still have the gun in his hand? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Where was your wife? A. My wife, when I said, 'Hey! Hey!' she heard it. * * *

I hollered when he pushed the cash register; I hollered, 'Here! Here! What are you doing?' * * *

"Q. Did you hear anything out in the living room when you yelled, 'Here! Here'? A. Yes.

"Q. What did you hear? A. I know my wife went out.

"Q. How do you know that? A. We got a spring door.

"Q. Did you hear that spring door? A. The screen door I heard.

"Q. When you went out there with those two fellows, was your wife in the living room? A. No; she had gone out the back.

"Q. She had already gone? A. She had already gone when we came into the room. * * * The little fellow * * * said, 'Where is your wife?' I said, 'My wife no stay here.' I said, 'My wife no stay here.' He said: 'Yes, she stay here. Maybe she went down to get a cop.' I said, 'No.' I said, 'No, she no sleep here.'

"Q. You told him, 'She no sleep here'? A. And he said, 'Oh, yes; maybe she go get a cop,' and they started to go out.

"Q. Who said that? A. The little fellow said, 'I don't want ham and eggs to-day.'

"Q. Said he didn't want ham and eggs? A. He said he didn't want ham and eggs, and I should stand there three minutes and not move, and they went out like this through the door.

"Q. With the pistol pointed at you? A. Yes; and as soon as he got out of the door, they go around to the east."

[5, 6] We recite this testimony for the purpose of showing that the prosecuting witness had such a comprehension of the English language that the trial court was justified in denying the request that an interpreter be called to aid in the rendition of his testimony. We have no doubt that the question as to his understanding of the language is to be solved upon an examination of his entire testimony, and not merely that part of it which had been developed when the request was made. There were some matters in the cross-examination of the witness which aid in a slight degree the contention now made by appellants, but they are unconvincing when placed beside the rather graphic story of the crime as related on the direct examination. Moreover, the discrepancies and inaccuracies shown in the cross-examination are largely explainable upon grounds other than the lack of understanding of the English language on Ito's part. The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to call an interpreter.

[7] We have not scrupled to quote somewhat extensively from the direct examination of the prosecuting witness—apparently, indeed, a necessary course in meeting the point involved in the failure of the trial court to call an interpreter—for the added reason that it bears upon another point made by appellants. It is insisted "that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence," in that the testimony of the prosecuting witness, standing alone, as it did, upon the main features of the case, was so confused and uncertain as to amount to nothing. We understand the contention to mean that, for the reasons stated, the evidence failed to support the verdict. This point falls to the ground upon a mere perusal of the portion of the direct examination of Ito which is above set forth.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McKEAN. (Cr. 1284.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 31, 1925.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 1032(5)—Where information fails to charge and evidence to prove commission of any public offense, accused is entitled to reversal notwithstanding failure to file demurrer in court below.

Where information fails to charge and evidence to prove commission of any public offense, accused is entitled to reversal notwithstanding failure to file demurrer in court below.

2. Indictment and information $\S$ 154—Omission of essential element of offense in allegation or proof is not waived by failure to file demurrer, but may be raised at any time.

Absolute omission of essential element of offense in allegation or proof is defect of substance, and is not waived by failure to file demurrer, but may be raised at any time.

3. Abortion $\S$ 5—Information for offering services to assist accomplishment of miscarriage held defective in failing to charge services were offered by any notice, advertisement, or other like means; "or otherwise" (Pen. Code, $\S$ 317).

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 317, making it a felony to offer services to assist accomplishment of miscarriage by any notice, advertisement, or otherwise, information failing to charge means by which alleged offer was made held defective; the words "or otherwise" as used in the statute meaning or other like means under application of ejusdem generis rule.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Otherwise.]

Craig, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

Ralph L. McKean was convicted of offering services to the accomplishment of a miscarriage, and he appeals. Reversed.

C. W. Benshoof and Estudillo & Schwinn, all of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1, 2] Defendant was charged with offering his services to assist in the accomplishment of a miscarriage. It was the theory of the prosecution that the charge as laid stated all the essential elements of the offense denounced in the concluding clause of section 317 of the Penal Code. Whether the information does charge every essential ingredient of that offense is the principal question presented by this appeal. Defendant, who was found guilty as charged, appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Section 317 reads:

"Every person who willfully writes, composes or publishes any notice or advertisement of any medicine or means for producing or facilitating a miscarriage or abortion, or for the prevention of conception, or who offers his services by any notice, advertisement, or otherwise, to assist in the accomplishment of any such purpose, is guilty of a felony." (Italics ours.)

The charging part of the information is as follows:

"The said defendant on or about the 24th day of December, 1924, at the said county of Riverside, state of California, and before the filing of this information, did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously offer to Sanders Reynolds to produce and assist in the accomplishment of a miscarriage on Virginia Reynolds."

It will be noticed that the information is barren of any charge that appellant offered his services by any notice, advertisement, or other like means. The evidence also fails to show that defendant offered his services by any of those means. Giving to the evidence a construction most favorable to the prosecution, it discloses no more than a mere oral offer by defendant, made directly to Sanders Reynolds, the husband of Virginia Reynolds, whereby defendant proffered his services to produce a miscarriage of the wife.

Appellant contends, and, as we think, rightly contends, that the information does not state a public offense. The sufficiency of that pleading was not challenged in the court below by demurrer. Defendant, however, upon the conclusion of the people's evidence, moved the court to dismiss the case upon the ground that a public offense is not stated in the information. The motion was denied. If the information fails to charge, and if the evidence fails to prove, that defendant committed any public offense known to the laws of this state, then clearly appellant will be entitled to a reversal notwithstanding his failure to file a demurrer in the court below. Where there is an absolute omission of a fact which the statute makes an essential ingredient of the offense, the defect is one of substance and not merely one of form. In such case the defect is not merely the failure to allege a necessary fact with sufficient certainty; it is a failure to charge any public offense whatever. So radical a defect it not waived by neglecting to file a demurrer, but may be raised at any time. People v. Smith, 103 Cal. 563, 37 P. 516.

"* * * Neither the neglect to demur or move in arrest of judgment can be deemed a waiver of an objection based upon the ground that the indictment or information does not state a public offense. Such an objection might be raised at any point in the progress of a case, or upon appeal." 8 Cal. Jur. p. 500.

[3] Whether the information does omit the allegation of a fact necessary to constitute the offense defined in the concluding portion of section 317 depends upon the meaning to be ascribed to the words "or otherwise," in the provision that "every person who willfully * * * offers his services by any notice, advertisement, or otherwise, to assist in the accomplishment of any such purpose [i. e., in the production or facilitation of a miscarriage or abortion,] is guilty of a felony."

The section as a whole seems to be aimed against advertisements, i. e., advertisements of certain means for producing miscarriages, or abortions or for preventing conception. Thus the first part of the section declares that "Every person who willfully writes, composes, or publishes any notice or advertisement of any medicine or means for producing or facilitating a miscarriage or abortion, or for the prevention of conception, * * * is guilty of a felony." This part of the section speaks of "medicine" or "means" for producing or facilitating miscarriages or abortions or preventing conception. Just what is here meant by the word "means" is not clear. It is possible that it may include surgical instruments. This first part of the section is directed against the writing, composition, or publication of such notices or advertisements as are designed to bring home to the public a knowledge of certain "medicines" or "means," i. e., a knowledge of such agencies as may be used at any place and by any person—by the woman herself, for instance—to bring about an abortion or a miscarriage or to prevent conception. The concluding part of the section, that under which it was sought to charge appellant, deals, not with medicines, drugs, instruments, etc., but with "services," i. e., an agency which necessarily must be exercised upon the body of the woman by another viz., by the person offering his services. This part of the section makes it a crime for one to offer "his services" to assist in the accomplishment of any miscarriage or abortion. But a mere offer of services is not enough. More than that is required to bring the offerer within the terms of the offense denounced by the statute. He must offer his services by "notice, advertisement, or otherwise." Here, then, we have three classes of means for bringing to others a knowledge of the offer of services, one at least of which must be resorted to by the person offering his services in order to constitute the crime denounced by that part of section 317 under which it was sought to charge appellant. These are: (1) An advertisement; (2) a notice; (3) other means. We say "other means," for the word "otherwise" signifies "other means."

The word "advertisement" has been defined as "a notice published in handbills or a newspaper." 2 C. J. 294. The word also includes notice by posting or display on signboards. Id. In Carter v. State, 81 Ark. 37, 98 S. W. 704, the court says:

"The many uses of the term 'advertise,' in its various forms, may be found in the Century Dictionary, from which this definition, the one most nearly reaching to the facts here, is taken: 'The act or practice of bringing anything, as one's wants or one's business, into public notice, as by paid announcement in periodicals, or by handbills, placards, etc., as to secure customers by advertising.'"

The idea underlying the word "advertisement" has reference not so much to the vehicle or instrumentality used for getting the notice before the public, as to the diffusion, or bringing home to the public, of the information or matter contained in the notice. Cincinnati v. Fenner, 11 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 281, 287.

The word "notice," in its broadest significance, doubtless includes any means whereby intelligence of knowledge is communicated. But according to the rule of interpretation "nosctur a sociis," the word should be construed in connection with its associated word "advertisement," thus giving to each a kindred meaning. This conclusion is further strengthened by the consideration that the first part of the section refers to such "notice or advertisement" as may be written, composed, or published—i. e., the first part of the section refers to written, printed, or pictorial matter only. The word "notice," as used in both clauses of section 317, doubtless was intended to include such notices as are sent through the mail; also circulars left upon doorsteps, etc.

We think that the term "or otherwise," in the provision, "Every person who willfully * * * offers his services by any notice, advertisement, or otherwise, * * * is guilty of a felony," should be construed as signifying other like means, i. e., means which are of the same general nature or class as advertisements, or which are of the same general nature or class as those notices which are akin to advertisements. This construction is warranted by the rule "ejusdem generis," which is stated in Cyc. as follows:

"By the rule of construction known as 'ejusdem generis,' where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of persons or things, the general words will be construed as applicable only to persons or things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated. The particular words are presumed to describe certain species, and the general words to be used for the purpose of including other species of the same genus. The rule is based on the obvious reason that if the Legislature had intended the general words to be used in their unrestricted sense they would have made no mention of the particular classes. The words 'other' or 'any other,' following an enumeration of particular classes, are therefore to be read as 'other such like,' and to include only others of like kind or character." 36 Cyc. pp. 1119, 1120.

See, also, Pasadena University v. Los Angeles County, 190 Cal. 790, 214 P. 868. In Galveston County v. Gorham, 49 Tex. 290, the Supreme Court of Texas, construing a statute of that state, says:

"The word otherwise, in that part of the sentence, 'by sample card, or otherwise,' should be understood, as doubtless intended, to mean 'by other like means.'"

In Ex parte Williams, 7 Cal. Unrep. 301, 87 P. 565, the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District of this state had before it a habeas corpus proceeding, the petitioner wherein had been charged with carrying on a certain banking game, played by means of a slot machine, "for * * * representatives of value, to wit, cigars and tobacco," in alleged violation of section 330 of the Penal Code. That section makes it an offense to carry on any banking game, played with cards, dice, or any device, "for money, checks, credit, or other representative of value." In holding that cigars and tobacco are not "other representatives of value" within the meaning of the statute, Mr. Justice Buckles said:

"If the Legislature was intending to prohibit all gambling with banking devices or by banking games played with cards, dice, or any device, it seems to us there would have been no limitation as now to money, checks, or credits, but the statement would have been for anything of value or that represents value. * * * The rule seems to be well established in the interpretation of statutes and clauses like the one under consideration that where general words follow particular ones, the former are construed as applicable to persons or things of the same kind, class or nature."

In Rhone v. Loomis, 74 Minn. 200, 77 N. W. 31, the court had under consideration a statute which made it an offense to exclude any person, on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, from "restaurants, barber shops, eating houses, or other places of public * * * refreshment." In holding that saloons, or places where intoxicating liquors are sold as beverages, are not "places of public refreshment" within the meaning of the act, the Minnesota Supreme Court says:

"We concede that the word 'refreshment' may include intoxicating liquors, and that the words 'places of refreshment' may be used in such a connection as to include a place where such liquors are sold as a beverage. But here is a case where the Legislature has specifically enumerated, in a somewhat descending order according to rank or importance, every kind of place of refreshment which was presently in mind to which they intended the act to apply, but have omitted, apparently purposely, to enumerate places where intoxicating liquors are sold as a beverage. * * * We are of opinion that upon these facts is not permissible, under any proper application of the doctrine of ejusdem generis, or what is commonly called 'Lord Tenterden's rule,' to extend the meaning of the general words, 'or other public place of refreshment,' so as to include places where intoxicating drinks are sold. This rule, generally stated, is that where a statute or document specifically enumerates several classes of persons or things, and immediately following, and classed with such enumeration, the clause embraces 'other' persons or things, the word 'other' will generally be read as 'other such like,' so that persons or things therein comprised may be read as ejusdem generis 'with,' and not of a quality superior to, or different from, those specifically enumerated. (Citing authorities.) The reason of this rule is that 'if the Legislature had meant the general words to apply, without restriction, it would have used only one compendious word.'

In State v. Dennison, 60 Neb. 157, 82 N. W. 383, the statute provided: "If any person * * * shall open, or establish, as owner, or otherwise, any lottery, or scheme of chance, in this state," etc. In construing the term "or otherwise," following the word "owner," it was held that it should be restricted to the meaning of "owner," or some one in similar or like capacity.

The rule ejusdem generis is particularly applicable to penal statutes. In Matter of La Societe Francaise, 123 Cal. 531, 56 P. 460, our Supreme Court says that "there is little, if any, controversy as to the maxim in its application to penal statutes." The Supreme Court of Missouri, speaking of the application of the doctrine in criminal cases, says that "as applied to penal statutes especially, it is only a humane doctrine, and accentuates the wisdom of the fathers when they objected to being punished for offenses which had not been declared to be offenses by the law." Ex parte Neet, 157 Mo. 527, 57 S. W. 1025, 80 Am. St. Rep. 639. See, also, Ex parte Roquemore, 60 Tex. Cr. R. 282, 131 S. W. 1101, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1186, where the court quotes from Ex parte Muckenfuss, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 467, 107 S. W. 1131, as follows:

"It has been held also, that this rule [ejusdem generis] is especially applicable in the interpretation of statutes defining crimes and regulating their punishment."

In this state the rule is given express statutory recognition, it being declared in section 3534 of the Civil Code that, "Particular expressions qualify those which are general."

It is true that the maxim, "ejusdem generis" is only a rule of construction, to be applied as an aid "in ascertaining the legislative intent," and that it does not control where it clearly appears from the statute as a whole that no such limitation was intended. But we venture to assert that no authority can be found where the general words "or otherwise," when following particular and specific words, have been construed as having their unrestricted sense where such a construction would cause the preceding particular words as well as the general words to become meaningless surplusage. And yet that is precisely the result which must inevitably follow if the words, "or otherwise," as used in section 317, be given their full, unrestricted meaning. That is to say, if the words "or otherwise" be not construed as meaning "other such like means," then the whole phrase "by any notice, advertisement, or otherwise" becomes mere barren verbiage, sterile of effect. This is so for the reason that every offer of one's services necessarily implies the giving of notice of some sort to the person to whom the offer is made. To "'offer' to do a thing," says the court in Morrison v. Springer, 15 Iowa, 346, "is to bring to or before—to present for acceptance or rejection—to exhibit something that may be taken or received or not." See, also, People v. Ah Fook, 62 Cal. 494. Since the words "or otherwise," if used in their unrestricted sense, would embrace that notice of one's offer of his services which necessarily is included in the mere making of the offer, it seems clear that had it been the intention of the Legislature to employ those general words without restriction it would have said no more than that it shall be an offense for one to offer his services to produce a miscarriage or an abortion, omitting entirely the provision to the effect that such offer, to be criminal, must be made by "notice, advertisement, or otherwise." Unless, therefore, the general term "or otherwise" be construed as ejusdem generis with the preceding particular and specific words, then the whole phrase "by any notice, advertisement, or otherwise" may as well be stricken from the statute as an impotent inutility.

While we are satisfied that the term "or otherwise," as used in this code section, is equivalent to the term "or other such like means," we do not find it necessary to decide, and we expressly refrain from deciding, the precise content of the words "or otherwise," i. e., the precise kind of notice which would satisfy their requirement. Suffice it to say that, for the reasons above stated, these words must be held to mean that the offer of services must be made through or by means of notice of some kind other than such as necessarily is involved in the mere act of making the offer. But here the information makes no attempt to charge that the offer of appellant's services was made by means of any notice of any kind whatsoever, save only such as necessarily is implied in the mere act of offering one's services.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

I concur: WORKS, J.

CRAIG, J. I dissent. No rule is better established as an aid to statutory interpretation and construction than that known as ejusdem generis. On the other hand, its limitations and exceptions are equally well recognized. To my mind, the instant case as charged and proved is unquestionably within the inhibition of section 317 of the Penal Code. The defendant personally and verbally solicited the opportunity to produce a miscarriage, and this the statute makes a criminal offense by the use of the words "or otherwise," following the provision "who offers his services by any notice, advertisement."

A number of considerations, singly and each one supporting and corroborating the others, compel this conclusion. Because it is necessary for me to dissent from the opinion of my associates, I shall set forth these reasons at greater length than would otherwise be expedient. It will be observed that the sole reason for ruling that the defendant herein should not be held guilty is the asserted application of the ejusdem generis rule to the words "or otherwise," as used in this section of the Penal Code. Before accepting as final and as entitled to unquestioned obedience the authority of this rule, let us measure the scope of its application.

In the first place, it has no standing as against a positive provision of legislative enactment. Its only office is to aid the courts in determining the intent of the Legislature, as expressed in any law which may be the subject of examination. Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 437; Willis v. Mabon, 48 Minn. 140, 50 N. W. 1110, 16 L. R. A. 281, 31 Am. St. Rep. 626. If the meaning of the statute is clear, this rule has no right to receive the slightest consideration; but even when the statute is uncertain, other and more trustworthy aids are first applied, and will prevail when found to be in conflict with the rule ejusdem generis. State v. Woodman, 26 Mont. 348, 67 P. 1118.

I will now enumerate some considerations which constrain me to dissent, and then discuss each in some detail: (1) The language of the enactment, read in its ordinary sense, is so clear as to leave no room for construction. (2) When the purpose of the statute is considered its object would be only half achieved if a close and restricted construction be placed upon its language; but courts have no right to permit a blind devotion to the maxim ejusdem generis to interfere with the full accomplishment of the manifest purpose of the Legislature. (3) If the particular words exhaust the genus, there is nothing ejusdem generis left, and in such case we must give the general words a meaning outside of the class indicated by the particular words, or we must say that they are meaningless. In that case the rule would defeat its own purpose, and it will not be applied. (4) Courts will always refuse to limit or impede the operation and enforcement of statutes obviously intended to carry out public policy by the use of this rule, which is one of strict construction, but will recognize and remedy a known evil. (5) Where no reason exists for not giving effect to the general provision, and it is equally adapted to carry out the purpose of the law as is the special enumeration, the general term will not be discarded, but will be fully accepted and applied. (6) Not every enumeration of persons or things, followed by a more general term, constitutes a proper case for the application of this maxim. Where the preceding enumeration is not of individual things, the rule cannot be used. (7) Even if the rule ejusdem generis be applied, section 317 of the Penal Code would still penalize the defendant's offer to commit an abortion.

1. Of course, the entire object in interpreting any law is to discover the meaning intended to be conveyed and promulgated by the Legislature. No rule of statutory interpretation is controlling except in so far as it accomplishes this purpose. The intent of the statute is the law. Therefore, we should first analyze the section to determine whether or not its intent is clearly expressed. It may be that there is little or no occasion to take into consideration the rule ejusdem generis, or any other rule for the interpretation of ambiguous statutes. A mere reading of the provision is sufficient to satisfy me that its object is to prevent the destruction of gestation against nature, as well as to make illegal the prevention of conception. This purpose it attempts to accomplish in conjunction with section 274 of the same Code.

It is noteworthy that in the first part of section 317 the prohibition extends only as against notices and advertisements, whereas in the latter part, here under consideration, the words "or otherwise" are added, which comparison makes more emphatic the fact that the words "or otherwise" were deliberately placed there and intended to refer to offers of services distinct from and in addition to those conveyed by notices or advertisements.

There is no better recognized rule than that words are usually to be taken and interpreted in their ordinary meaning. Civ. Code, §§ 1324, 1644. The words "or otherwise" commonly mean "or in any other way." "Otherwise" is defined by the Standard Dictionary as meaning "in a different manner, in another way, differently, in other respects"; by Webster, "in a different manner, in other respects"; by the Century Dictionary, "In a different manner or way, differently, in other respects." These definitions are quoted with approval in Thompson v. City of Highland Park, 187 Ill. 265, 58 N. E. 328, and in other cases. If we accept these authorities, the statute is clear, and there is no ambiguity; it not only penalizes the act of any person who uses notices or advertisements in doing that which the statute inhibits, but makes it an offense to do the same thing "differently," "in any other way," and through the use of "any other means." In order to reject this construction we must resort to a rule of strict construction, and raise an issue where none before existed. Without reference to that rule, the statute is not even ambiguous. Under such circumstances, there is no warrant for giving it any consideration or weight. The mere fact that a general term is used after an enumeration of particulars does not necessarily even create an ambiguity so as to require construction.

In this case the Legislature has itself precluded the courts from applying the rule ejusdem generis, because it has eliminated the reason advanced for its application in proper cases, to wit, that it will not be presumed that the Legislature intended to make the special words previously employed meaningless by the use of a broader term comprehending such narrower words. It has eliminated this argument from consideration by employing the word "advertisement" after the word "notice," thus rendering "notice" unnecessary, because it is included in the word "advertisement." This it has done in the identical enumeration in which the words "or otherwise" are used. In the face of this demonstration of legislative intent the claim that the Legislature will not be presumed to have intended to render the special term meaningless by the use of a broader term is made entirely impossible. No presumption can stand against direct and positive evidence. Without doubt the purpose of the Legislature in enacting this statute was to prevent the production of miscarriages and abortion; to this end it penalized the making of offers to assist in the commission of such wrongful acts. It seems quite apparent that in drafting this provision the means ordinarily used by persons who make a business of such practices was first in the legislative mind, and so the employment of notices and advertisements as a means of making the objectionable offers was prohibited. The narrower of these terms is first employed. A notice is a form of advertising; it is defined to be information, by whatever means communicated. U. S. v. Foote, 25 Fed. Cas. 1140, No. 15,128. To advertise is "to notify," to "inform," to "give intelligence to" (Ency. Dict.); before writing was developed, advertising was exclusively by criers and signboards (Ency. Amer. vol. 1); advertising may be by oral proclamation (Cincinnati v. Fenner, 11 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 281, 8 Ohio N. P. 342); advertising has been called the medium or vehicle of persuasion. While advertising was originally by publication, the complete content of the word now involves exploitation, and thus while a notice involves nothing more than the giving of information, an advertisement conveys such information in a manner or by means to the end of persuading to do something, usually to buy.

Cal. Rep. 240-243 P.—58

Having broadened the scope of the inhibition from notices to advertisements, the draughtsman of the law, apparently to make certain that no means of making obnoxious offers might be devised by which a culprit might escape through technical judicial construction, sought a still broader term, and employed the words "or otherwise."

At this point attention is again called to the fact that the basis for the rule ejusdem generis is as above stated. It is said in Rhone v. Loomis, 74 Minn. 200, 77 N. W. 31, that the enumeration of the inhibited means, ascending progressively and widening in its scope, is proof conclusive of the legislative intent that the last term be allowed its broad and comprehensive meaning. In the statute there under consideration the converse was true. In that case the fact that "the Legislature has specifically enumerated, in a somewhat descending order according to rank or importance, every kind of place of refreshment which was presently in mind to which they intended the act to apply," was given great and perhaps deciding weight in producing the decision that in that instance the rule ejusdem generis should be applied.

Again, by the same process of reasoning as that adopted in Matter of La Societe Francaise, etc., 123 Cal. 525, 56 P. 458, 787, we may say that there appears no reason why the Legislature should prohibit the solicitation of employment to produce miscarriages or abortions when that solicitation is done through notices or advertisements, but would allow such solicitation by means of personal offers. The mere statement of the proposition is sufficient to convince that the vice of the latter form of offers to engage in such evil practices is both as vicious and as dangerous to the public welfare as the former.

2. In State v. Woodman, 26 Mont. 348, 67 P. 1118, the Supreme Court of Montana held, in construing a statute which prohibited games of chance, etc., "for money, checks, credits, or any representative of value, or for any property or thing whatever," that the rule ejusdem generis had no application; and that cigars were included under the term "or for any property or thing whatever." Referring to the rule, the court said:

"It is, however, but a rule of construction to be used as an aid in ascertaining the legislative intent, and not for the purpose of controlling the intention of a statute or of confining its operation to narrower limits than the Legislature intended. Id. sec. 279. It must be used in connection with other rules of equal importance, such as that the meaning of a statute is to be gathered from the language employed in it, and that every word of it must be taken in its ordinary signification, unless it was clearly the intention of the Legislature, as gathered from the context, to restrict its meaning."

Another case in which the rule was held inapplicable, because to hold otherwise would fail to carry out the purpose of the statute, is American Ice Co. v. Fitzhugh, 128 Md. 382, 97 A. 999, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 33, in which it was held that horse power was within the term "or other power," under a statute in which the enumeration was of "cars, trucks, wagons or other vehicles, and rollers and engines, propelled by steam, gas, gasoline, electric, mechanical, or other power."

In State v. Broderick, 7 Mo. App. 19, the words construed were, "If any carrier or other bailee shall embezzle," etc. It was held that the words "or other bailee" were not to be interpreted according to the ejusdem generis rule; that "it is by no means a rule of universal application, and its use is to carry out, not to defeat, the legislative intent."

An act for securing estates given to charitable uses specified that "all lands, tenements, hereditaments and other estates, * * * shall be free from the payment of rates." It was held that money at interest was included in the term "other estates," and that the rule here contended for had no application. Atwater v. Inhabitants of Woodbridge, 6 Conn. 223, 16 Am. Dec. 46.

Among other cases holding to the same general effect are: McReynolds v. People, 230 Ill. 623, 82 N. E. 945; Morton v. Skinner, 48 Ind. 123; Brown's Case, 112 Mass. 409, 17 Am. Rep. 114; Pein v. Miznerr, 41 Ind. App. 255, 83 N. E. 784. It will serve no good purpose to cite further authority on this point, although numerous decisions are to be found in the reports of nearly all the states upholding the proposition that the rule ejusdem generis will be disregarded where to give it effect would be to interfere with the carrying out of the object intended to be attained by the Legislature in enacting the statute in question.

3. If notices and advertisements be construed as belonging only to the class of publication consisting of fixed representations to the eye, they completely exhaust the genus. Offers by way of notices and advertisements cover substantially every kind and form of an offer that can be made by printing, writing, billboards, electric signs, etc.; hence, we must either give the general term "or otherwise" a meaning outside of this class, or discard it as surplusage. In such cases the maxim ejusdem generis must yield to the more important one, that every part of a statute, and every word in it, must be upheld and given an appropriate effect. Misch v. Russell, 136 Ill. 22, 26 N. E. 523, 12 L. R. A. 125; Nat. Bank of Commerce v. Ripley, 161 Mo. 126, 61 S. W. 587; Wills v. Mabon, 48 Minn. 140, 50 N. W. 1110, 16 L. R. A. 281, 31 Am. St. Rep. 626.

In American Ice Co. v. Fitzhugh, 128 Md. 382, 97 A. 999, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 33, heretofore mentioned, the Maryland court said:

"Following the doctrine of noscitur a sociis and the rule ejusdem generis, the appellant argues that the words of the statute 'or other power' in sub-section forty-one should be read as 'other such like,' and as including other power of the kind and character of the several kinds enumerated. The doctrine relied upon is, however, only applied as an aid in ascertaining the legislative intent and is not controlling where it appears that no such limitation was intended. It is said in 36 Cyc. 1121-22: 'Nor does the doctrine apply where the specific words of a statute signify subjects greatly different from one another, nor where the specific words embrace all objects of their class, so that the general words must bear a different meaning from the specific words or be meaningless.' In the case of National Bank of Commerce v. Ripley, 161 Mo. 126, 61 S. W. 587, the Supreme Court said: 'It is a rule of construction that a statute should be construed so as to give effect to all its words, if it can be done. * * * It is a corollary to the first proposition above stated, that the statute must be construed to give effect to all its words. The rule itself must not be so construed as to defeat that purpose. Whilst it is aimed to preserve a meaning for the particular words, it is not intended to render meaningless the general words. Therefore, where the particular words exhaust the class, the general words must be construed as embracing something outside of that class. If the particular words exhaust the genus there is nothing ejusdem generis left, and in such case we must give the general words a meaning outside of the class indicated by the particular words or we must say that they are meaningless, and thereby sacrifice the general to preserve the particular words. In that case the rule would defeat its own purpose.' Applying the well-recognized exception to the doctrine relied on to the provisions of the act in question the kinds of power specifically mentioned in subsection forty-one of section 32 of said act would seem to embrace all kinds of power other than animal power, and if we are to give the words 'or other power' any meaning at all there is no reason why they should not include horse power or mule power." (The opinion is reinforced by numerous citations of, and quotations from, other authorities.)

To the same effect is State v. Grosvenor, 149 Tenn. 158, 258 S. W. 140.

4. The following cases uphold the principle that statutes intended to carry out public policy and to remedy known evils are not to be nullified or limited by this rule: Riggs v. State, 7 Lea (75 Tenn.) 475; Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 66, 16 L. Ed. 717; Rawson v. State, 19 Conn. 292; Black on Stat. Inter. p. 215.

5. Where the general provision is equally adapted to carry out the purpose of the law with the special enumeration and no apparent reason exists for not giving effect to the general provision, it will be fully applied. Matter of La Societe Francaise, etc., 123 Cal. 525, 56 P. 458, 787. This was a proceeding to change the name of La Societe Francaise to "French Savings Bank," under a provision permitting such change of name by "any religious, benevolent, literary, scientific, or other corporation." The court held that the general expression "or other corporation" was not limited to include other corporations ejusdem generis with those specifically enumerated. The only reason for not applying the rule to this case is contained in the closing paragraph of the opinion, as follows:

"But in this case the necessity or desirability of a change of name is as likely to occur in the case of a private corporation organized for profit as any other, and there is no reason suggested why a change of name should not be permitted to such corporations as well as to those specifically named."

And so we have here a forcible illustration of the fact that in many of the cases where this maxim has been involved it is recognized that where the purpose of the statute is clear courts will be largely guided in construing a questioned provision by consideration of whether there is any reason why it should not be applied to the case before the court, as well as to instances specially enumerated in the statute. If no such reason exists, and the purpose of the statute is clear, cases coming within the general term of the law have usually been held to be within its provisions, although not ejusdem generis with the things or persons particularly named.

6. Where the preceding enumeration is not of individual things, the rule has no application. For the sake of argument only it has been assumed that the enumeration under discussion is one to which the rule might be applied, but notices and advertisements are generic and not special terms. The forms in which notices and advertisements may exist are almost limitless in number. Any kind of notification to another is notice; any means of exploitation through the conveyance of information is advertising. One case will be sufficient to illustrate the force and application of the proposition above stated, and to show that for this reason alone the rule ejusdem generis cannot be applied to the instant case. In Higler v. People, 44 Mich. 299, 6 N. W. 664, 38 Am. Rep. 267, it was held in construing a statute relating to cheating by means of "any false token or writing, or by any other false pretense," that the terms "false token" and "false writing" are generic, and not specific. Even more clearly, the words "notice" and "advertisement" are not special, but general.

7. One of the most common means of advertising is by broadcasting over the radio. Another is by lectures, running the entire range from those delivered by the erudite author and traveler who educates the wondering listeners in frigid climes concerning the beauties and the balmy climatic perfection of a certain land by the Sunset Sea, to the soapbox variety who upholds to a waiting world the hidden power of some magic lotion which he declares, if given the opportunity, will grow hair on even a marble dome. In this day, when the word "advertise" is perhaps as well known as any in the English language, and when the maxim, "It pays to advertise," is accepted everywhere and almost universally applied, and it is equally well known that the more complete the concealment of its identity as an advertisement, the more perfect the skill of the advertiser—who will say that the verbal announcement of one's ability, equipment or experience in any occupation or project is not to be classed with advertising? Does not a woman who goes from house to house explaining to housewives the advantage of some new device for cleaning the kitchen sink advertise? Does not one who stands in the doorway, or on a busy street corner, and exhibits his wares, telling all who listen just why each article is the most perfect of its kind ever offered to the public, advertise? What more effective means of advertising could be devised than that of going from one to another, proclaiming one's skill, and offering to demonstrate it forthwith? This is exactly what witnesses said this defendant did; and so, even if the rule ejusdem generis, or the broader maxim, noscitur a sociis, be held applicable, the result is the same as though the services of these maxims in assisting in the construction of this statute be rejected as entirely unnecessary. The means employed by the defendant in offering to perform an abortion is of the same class as a notice or an advertisement. This must be true, since the only claim that a distinction exists between the form of the offer made by the defendant and an advertisement is that the former was verbal in character, and it is contended that the latter consists of printing or similar representation to the eye. But, as we have seen, advertising may be done orally. So, although the solicitation of the defendant be not regarded or classed as advertising, it was undoubtedly ejusdem generis with advertising.

The foregoing are the principal reasons why the term "or otherwise" used in section 317 of the Penal Code should be construed to include all other means of offering to assist in the performance of miscarriages and abortions than by notices and advertisements.

It has been said that the rule ejusdem generis has no special application to penal statutes. This may have been true under the common law, and may still be a correct statement in those states where the principle of that law still prevails which requires all statutes to be strictly construed in the interests of the defendant. But wherever, as is the case in California, that provision of the law has been expressly canceled, the same rules of construction govern in penal as in civil cases, and we must accept as controlling in this matter section 4 of the Penal Code, which provides that all of the provisions of the Penal Code are to be construed according to the fair import of its terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice, and that the rule of the common law above referred to has no application.

Aside from this the cases are plentiful where courts have disregarded the maxim ejusdem generis in criminal cases, and have given the broader final term of an enumeration its full meaning. The following, in addition to others elsewhere herein cited, are a few such cases: State v. Grosvenor, 149 Tenn. 158, 258 S. W. 140; State v. Broderick, 7 Mo. App. 19; Higler v. People, 44 Mich. 299, 6 N. W. 664, 38 Am. Rep. 267; Wonner v. Carterville, 142 Mo. App. 120, 125 S. W. 861; McReynolds v. People, 230 Ill. 623, 82 N. E. 945; Queen v. Edmundson, 2 El. & El. 77, 121 Eng. Rep. (Repr.) 30; State v. Woodman, 26 Mont. 348, 67 P. 1118; State v. Williams, 2 Strob. (S. C.) 474; Rawson v. State, 19 Conn. 291.

It is said that no cases are to be found where the words "or otherwise" following an enumeration of special terms have not been so limited by the rule ejusdem generis as to prevent the preceding particular words from being rendered surplusage.

A few instances of this character will be mentioned. It is not often that such direct authority is to be found, as exists upon the construction of this term. In State v. West, 106 La. 274, 30 So. 848, the statute provided that:

"Whoever shall be found guilty of attempting to rob, from the person of another, money or other property by cutting or tearing the clothes, thrusting the hand into the pockets, or otherwise, though he do not succeed in such attempted robbery, shall, on conviction," be punished, etc.

It was held that the scope of the provision was enlarged by the use of the words "or otherwise," and that:

"The intent of the word 'otherwise' as used evidently was to include all similar acts to those denounced, resorted to in the attempt to 'rob.' The statute includes attempts other than those expressly mentioned by the use of the word, by expressly providing that attempts in a different manner and in another way than in that specifically denounced, shall be subject to punishment."

In Rawson v. State, 19 Conn. 292, the Supreme Court of Connecticut had before it a provision of a statute regulating the sale of wines and spirituous liquors, an excerpt from which reads:

"If any person or persons, except taverners, by agent or otherwise, shall keep any house," etc.

In the opinion it is said:

"No man can read this statute without learning from its entire perusal, that the controlling purpose of the Legislature was, to suppress tippling houses, under whatever pretense or name established; and thus to prevent the facilities to intemperate and ruinous dram drinking. To reject the word otherwise, from the law, and thus to legalize the evil which it was the object of the statute to prevent, if perpetrated in person, and not by agent, would be not only absurd, but it would involve a judicial repeal of an important part of the law itself. This word was not incautiously introduced into the statute; it was necessary to give full expression of the intent to the Legislature."

In Fontenot v. Fontenot, 157 La. 511, 102 So. 590, was involved an antenuptial contract which the court was required to construe in the settlement of community interests among the heirs of the contracting parties. It was provided in the contract, among other things:

"The parties to this act mutually agree that the property hereinbefore described and appraised shall be excluded from the community that shall exist between them as well as all property that shall be received by either of them hereafter, either by succession, donation or otherwise. Also the appearers declared that they nor their property shall not (sic) be in any way responsible for the debts due by either prior to their intended union. That the acquêts or gains shall be disposed of at the dissolution of their union as provided for in the Civil Code of Louisiana."

It was said of this provision:

"The meaning intended to be conveyed by the word 'otherwise,' in the foregoing quotation, was that property which should be acquired by either spouse with his or her separate funds, or in any other manner, under such circumstances, as would make the property acquired separate, under the law, should be deemed the separate property of the spouse acquiring it, as would property received by 'succession' or 'donation,' which words precede 'otherwise.'"

Attention need merely be called to the fact that by this construction the word "otherwise" was given a meaning of such scope as to render the words "succession" and "donation" unnecessary and surplusage.

Again, we have the case of Nagle v. Brown, 37 Ohio St. 7, which involved a statute providing that "the obstructing or incumbering by fences, buildings, structures or otherwise, any of the public highways, or streets, or alleys of any city or village shall be deemed nuisances," and any person injured thereby was afforded the right to collect damages. Nagle felled a large tree across the highway, which he permitted to remain for some time, and as a consequence Brown and wife were injured when driving. Suit was instituted under the statute mentioned, and it was said on appeal:

"The obstruction of the highway mentioned in the original petition was clearly a nuisance within the meaning of this act, and the only question made is, was the plaintiff in error 'guilty of the same.'"

Here, also, by giving the words "or otherwise" a liberal construction, the statute would have the same scope had the preceding particular words been omitted.

Robbertson v. State, 3 Tex. App. 502, held that a penal statute making it an offense to remove out of the state any personal property on which a person had given any written lien, or to sell such property, or to "otherwise dispose" thereof, with intent to defraud, included "any other method of placing the property beyond the reach of the holder of the lien with such intent. The preceding enumeration is here, again included in the terms "otherwise dispose."

Cramer v. United States (C. C. A.) 276 F. 78, is another case where the term "or otherwise" was construed in line with the foregoing decisions, and it was said that mere occupancy by the Indians of alternate sections of land was a disposition thereof under a statute providing that "when any of said alternate sections or parts of sections shall be found to have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, pre-empted, or otherwise disposed of, other lands designated as aforesaid, shall be selected * * * in lieu thereof, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

In Whelen's Appeal, 70 Pa. 429, a statutory phrase "money, stocks or otherwise," was held to have been enlarged in scope by these words so as to include everything of value, whether real estate, evidence of debt, or any kind of personal property. The things previously enumerated therefore became unnecessary, and surplusage.

A New Mexico statute provided that it was the duty of the governor to fill a vacancy occurring by reason of death, resignation, "or otherwise," and that the appointee "shall hold the office until his successor is elected and qualifies." It was held that the words "or otherwise" should not be construed ejusdem generis, but rather as extending the scope of the statute to include vacancies other than such as were created by death or resignation. Territory ex rel. Curran v. Gutierrez, 12 N. M. 254, 78 P. 139. It is apparent that the result of this construction of the words "or otherwise" is to render the particular words preceding them unnecessary.

Two California cases, construing the same section relating to public lands, are to the same effect. These are Hambleton v. Duhain, 71 Cal. 136, 11 P. 865, and Daniels v. Gualala Mill Co., 77 Cal. 300, 19 P. 519. The statute considered in these cases provided that "where indemnity school selections have been made and certified to the state, and said selections shall fail by reason of the land in lieu of which they were taken not being included within such final survey of a Mexican grant, or are otherwise defective or invalid, the same are hereby confirmed. * * *" It was held that the term "or are otherwise defective" should be given an unrestricted interpretation, so that it would include "any and all defects" in indemnity school selections which might have been made and certified to the state; hence it embraced a failure "by reason of the land * * * not being included within such final survey of a Mexican grant." Consequently the latter term becomes surplusage.

The foregoing precedents in which the exact term required to be construed in the instant case has been interpreted in the ordinary sense of the words which compose it, and allowed such meaning unrestricted by the maxim ejusdem generis, seem to be decisive without regard to any other considerations. It will be noted that the majority of them are cases in which a penal statute was construed.

Appellant has urged a number of other reasons as grounds for reversal, but it is not necessary to refer to them otherwise than to say that to my mind they are not well taken.
